It may be at once stated that as a conductor Mr. Paur is not entirely satisfactory. A man may be an artist to his finger tips, he may be an excellent musician, he may know by heart the entire literature of orchestral music, and yet, for all that, he may be but an indifferent chef d'orchestre. He must know the technique of conducting. He must have great strength of will. He must have great personal magnetism in order that the varying individualities of the artists playing under his baton may obey him willingly, unhesitatingly, blindly even. Above all he must know how to convey his wishes to the orchestra by gestures which cannot be mistaken.

And Mr. Paur does not do this! No; he is very jerky. There was a perceptible hesitation in his attack which has already communicated itself to the orchestra, notwithstanding that it is one of the best in the world. At times it was difficult to tell upon which beat the accent lay, but his most emphatic gesture was generally upon the up beat.

The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven served excellently well to display all his merits and all his defects. Mr. Paur has not the dramatic instinct. The first movement of the symphony showed that. He has a dreamy, poetic nature. That was equally easy to gather from his reading of the slow movement, which was irreproachable. He is ungraceful to a degree. And he is in earnest. Yes, he is desperately in earnest. He is so much in earnest that he makes one nervous by his unmeaningly emphatic gestures. You are compelled to think that the gentlemen of the orchestra must either undergo the toil of very laborious rehearsals or else they must be inspired. In no other way can you account for their comprehension of the signs their new conductor never wearies of giving them.

And the orchestra? Superb. The strings are unsurpassable. The violins sing. They have a sostenuto that is almost mechanical in its virtuosity. The 'cello played the little reiterated phrase in the "Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2 in G minor, by Dvorák, with a tone as pure as a thread of glass. The wood wind is excellent. Nothing can be imagined more beautiful than the delicate way the running passages in the rhapsody were executed. That the orchestra, which was also heard alone in Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, never throughout the entire evening made a climax, was not the fault of the members of the organization. That is another qualification which is lacking in Mr. Paur—the ability to work up to and effect a climax.

What can I say about Mme. Eames that has not already been said a hundred times! She sang "Pleurez Mes Yeux" from "Le Cid" and an aria from the "Marriage of Figaro." The voice is purity itself. And she has the best traditions of the bel canto. She has the very quality which I have just spoken of as lacking in Mr. Paur. She reaches the climax. And even then the voice remains as beautiful, as pure and as warm as in the most piano and tranquil passages.

[42]

New York ... By George W. Turner.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

ENTER, EMIL PAUR.

Little of the Obtrusive Has This Conductor; Indeed, He Is Fairly Frigid.

A woman sitting in front of me in Music Hall last night said after Emil Paur had finished bowing: "Why, he looks as if he came from Philadelphia; he is so respectable looking." Mr. Paur, the newly imported conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does indeed look as if he hailed from the Quaker City, or rather from that fascinating suburb, Germantown. He is very Teutonic, very haley, very earnest, very awkward, very angular, very sincere, very dry, very scholarly and absolutely devoid of magnetism. There are about 5,000 conductors of his sort in America, and about 50,000 in Europe. Yet, for all that, Mr. Paur is not to be lightly dismissed. His is not the personality that woos and wins, his temperament is leathery, but he is terribly in love with his task, and you soon find yourself listening to the music and forgetting all about this blonde-haired conductor, who fights musical windmills with his long arms and taps time with both feet.

The fashion in the musical world just now runs to conductors. Pianists also come high, but if a dramatic-looking fellow can conduct an orchestra, we go daft about his "readings," his "interpretations," and we run after the man and not the music. Nikisch's individuality was exploited until the public forgot almost his superb band. Yet that same superb band gave its first concert of the season last nght, but the glow, the glitter, the rushingly tumultuous temperament of the Hungarian were absent in all that was played, and sanity, sobriety and solemnity, a grave trio of qualities, reigned on Music Hall stage. We are fickle in Gotham, and after Beethoven's C Minor Symphony had been played we recalled Mr. Paur two or three times, possibly because it was a change from the novel, the exciting, the sometimes sensational, but always interesting conducting of Arthur Nikisch.

Yet Mr. Paur's reading was in nowise remarkable. It was more muscular than musical. He is virile enough, but lacks imagination. He is more pedantic than Gericke, while he lacks that conductor's exquisite taste and finesse. You heard all the notes, phrase after phrase, carved out for you with astonishing patience. But the bloom, the poetry, the profound meanings, where were they? I know full well that it is as difficult to give a novel interpretation to this great soul-epic of Beethoven's, as it is to invent a new rendering of Hamlet. I would have been content with the old, but it never came.

Mr. Paur is a great dissector.

His frigidity would chill Theodore Thomas, even when that conductor is below zero. So we had an honest first movement, a very, very dry, mechanical, but well-balanced andante, a respectable scherzo and the last movement was sufficiently vigorous. No fear of this conductor obtruding his personality; he is conscientious to a fault—conscientious enough to conduct a male singing society. In the delightful rhapsody of Dvorak, Mr. Paur's lack of mood-versatility was very much in evidence. The fine, free, bold rapture of this out-of-doors composition, with its gorgeous tints, was too much for the man from Leipsic. He didn't conduct it, he lectured about ita. The same with the Berlioz overture, which closed the rather drab-colored, serious evening. A remark made at my left summed up in curious fashion the newcomer. "What a pity we couldn't have had Rummel play Hummel's A minor piano concerto and Paur conduct the orchestra! What a tropical temperature would have ensued!"

Paur is cold, but he conducts accompaniments neatly, even sympathetically. This he proved when Emma Eames sang two arias by Massenet and Mozart. She was imperially beautiful and sang in the most finished manner. Her voice has gained in warmth and she phrases with artistic nicety. A moiety of brilliancy has gone from the top notes, but her work is more rounded, more intimate. She was recalled again and again. Thus ended the history of the first concert this season of the remarkable band from Boston.

NEW-YORK, THURSDAY, NOV. 9, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Emil Paur, the New Conductor, Makes His First Appearance.

There is not so deep an interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra here as there is in Boston, because the organization is not the central sun of our musical system; but there is a very lively appreciation of its work and an active curiosity as to any change in its direction. Under the admirable leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra was made known here, and leaped into public favor. Its military precision and extreme finish were a little better than anything to which we were accustomed at that time. Mr. Gericke's successor, Arthur Nikisch, endeared himself to those whose hearing is affected by their sight, and who regard effectiveness as an end justified by any means. Those who took Mr. Nikisch more seriously were delighted by his poetic, warm, highly-colored, if sometimes erratic, readings.

Again, the orchestra comes to us with a new personality as its mastering influence. If there had previously been any doubt as to the eagerness of this public to know what manner of man Emil Paur of Leipsic might be, it must all have disappeared in the presence of the brilliant and representative audience which assembled in the Music Hall last night. Hardly any of the persons who count in the musical world of the metropolis were absent, and to them must be added a goodly number of those who dislike to be missing from the places frequented by fashion and intelligence. This audience received Mr. Paur with politeness and accepted his reading of one of the most familiar works in the classical repertoire with a cordiality that must have astonished some of the local conductors who were present. It is often a good thing to be a prophet and get honor in some one else's country.

An extended review of Mr. Paur's manner of conducting and of his reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony appeared in these columns upon the occasion of his debut in Boston. It cannot be said that there is anything of vital importance to add to the comment then published. Last night's performance did not materially alter the impressions received at the former concert. The orchestra, it is true, was in better condition by reason of further rehearsals, and its playing was smoother in respect of precision and solidity of tone. Moreover, there was less of the overaccentuation noted in the Boston concert. But the reading of the symphony was calm, methodic, uninspiring. In simple truth, it was leaden-footed and discouraging.

The other numbers on the programme were Dr. Dvorak's first Slavonic rhapsody and Hector Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. Both were played well, with color and precision; but there was again a lack of vim and animation. One missed that variety of subtle nuances to which former performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have accustomed us. No fault could be found with the tone of the splendid body of strings, nor the excellent voicing of the wood wind. The brass seemed to be unusually heavy in quality. The performance, as a whole, was distinctly prosaic. Mr. Paur is a scholarly, sound, intelligent, and energetic conductor, but it seems as if the gods had not made him poetical.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Emma Eames, who returns to us as one of the prime donne of Mr. Abbey's brilliant company. The popular soprano sang "Pleurez mes yeux," from Massenet's "Le Cid," and "Non so piu," from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro." As usual, she delighted her hearers by the smoothness of her voice production, the charming quality of her tone, and the general finish of her work. It should be said, however, that in one or two spots her breathing seemed to be a little at fault, giving a labored quality to some of her phrasing, which is usually admirable. It is probable that she was not in the best of voice.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, NOV. 8, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Appearance Here of Emil Paur, Who Succeeded Nikisch.

No conductor of the Boston Symphony or any other similar orchestra has ever visited Baltimore about whom there was greater prejudice than Emil Paur, who directed for the first time here at Ford's Opera House yesterday afternoon. Rumors that he was ponderous and unmagnetic in his leading, conventional and dull in his interpretations, not to be compared with Nikisch and like discouraging reports heralded his approach and attracted Baltimoreans in throngs to the theatre to find out for themselves what manner of man this was who was stepping into the post that Nikisch had so successfully filled.

In the unpicturesque appearance of Paur the audience missed the poetic presence of his predecessor, for Paur is rather below medium height, thick-set, with bushy, red-brown hair and beard, and without pretense of being distingue. Indeed, there is no pretense of any kind in him. It is all good, substantial worth. If the two men present a striking contrast in appearance, so do they in manner; so do they in conducting. Nikisch was quiet, graceful, delicate, intense; Paur is rugged, vigorous, desperately in earnest. Nikisch was inclined to pose; Paur does not reveal a spark of affectation either in manner or in his interpretations. Nikisch was a disciple of the beautiful; Paur evidently worships the true. Taken all in all, Paur will probably wear well. When he has had the orchestra long enough under his baton to impress upon it the stamp of his individuality he will undoubtedly give the musical public some interpretations that will make a lasting impression. He is not dull, he is not unmagnetic and he is forceful. Paur is not graceful in his motions. He works from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet—indeed, both head and feet were going it vigorously in the leader's desire to bring out the rhythm strongly. His movements are short, quick, decisive, even jerky, but he is evidently bent more on getting from the orchestra what is in his own mind than on making of himself a study in the poetry of motion or a Delsarte expressionist. There are little movements of the baton between the beats that are exceedingly eloquent and effectual in conveying ideas of the phrasing to the players, while the rhythmic sense in the new leader is evidently strong.

Paur's history, briefly told, is this: He was born at Czernowitz, in Bukowina, a province of the Austrian empire. At fourteen he went to the conservatory in Vienna, where he stayed six years, and where, oddly enough, his predecessor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, was one of his fellow-students. Paur was graduated with high honors, and he soon became successful in conducting grand opera in various cities. The director of the Leipsic Opera House induced him to take the position of conductor at Leipsig, where he succeeded Nikisch, in whose footsteps, as regards musical positions, he seems destined to follow. Paur is also a violinist and pianist of ability.

The conductor had three massive works in which to show his musicianship—Beethoven's C minor symphony, Dvorak's "Slavonic Rhapsody," in G minor, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, by Berlioz. The symphony was given in a straightforward, earnest style, with finely marked rhythm, with strength where strength was needed and with delicacy where delicacy was needed. The modern works were given a spirited and strong rendering.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was the soloist. Pure and clear and true is her singing, musical in expression, really artistic in style, and Nordica has dramatic force as well. She is, besides, a charming woman in her stage presence—a combination of good qualities not too frequently found. Her numbers were an aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and a recitative and aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 53-63 PARK ROW.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

THE MUSICAL SEASON BEGINS.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Music Hall.

The musical season of 1893-94 was brilliantly inaugurated last evening at Carnegie Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Emil Paur, its new conductor.

It is with deep satisfaction that the music-lovers of this city greet the transfer of this premier instrumental organization from its former cramped quarters to the more spacious locale, which is destined to be the scene of its future musical achievements. Domiciled as it now is to be on the occasion of its monthly visits to New York in the superb building which wealth has erected for the glorification of musical art, its influence will be greater and more widespread than heretofore.

There was a very large audience present. Curiosity to see and judge of the new-comer, who has been handed the baton wielded in the past by Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch, added to the desire of listening to the superlative work of the celebrated orchestra, which, thanks to private enterprise, is to-day classified with the great orchestras of the old world.

Among the many present were both of the men who are the controlling factors in the sphere of music in this city—Walter Damrosch and Anton Seidl.

Mr. Paur chose as the symphonic composition by the interpretation of which he submitted himself to the judgment of New York, Beethoven's Fifth in C minor, op. 67. It was with the same musical work that he first faced an American audience a few weeks ago in Boston. It may be assumed that he was satisfied with the verdict rendered there, then, and relied upon its affirmation here. If this is so, his judgment was correct.

It is impossible, after listening to the playing under his direction of but three numbers—the symphony referred to, Dvorak's Slavonic Rhapsody No. 2, G minor, op. 45, and Berlioz's "Benevuto Cellini" ouvetture, to form more than a mere preliminary opinion as to his full capacities. Acuaintance with a wider range of achievements is necessary. An opinion of the sort is more an impression than a settled conviction.

The consensus of Boston opinion is that Mr. Paur is a respectful and respectable conductor. A student, a believer in tradition and convention, and not a reformer or an advanced innovator. This judgment is one that must be acquiesced in if the performance of the Fifth Symphony last evening is to be considered as the standard of his methods.

It was clear, sturdy and manly. The phrasing was correct. In expression it was precise, full of minutiae, almost mathematical. It could not be called brilliant, it was simply conservative. There were no sharp accentuations, no marked emphases, such as the predecessor of Mr. Paur indulged in. Deliberation and not impulse ruled.

In maner Mr. Paur lacks grace. His beat is firm and decisive, but awkward. He uses his left hand freely, and at times by itself. He is a man of fine, dignified appearance.

The orchestra played in its usual superb manner. The strings are certainly unequalled in tone quality.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Emma Eames.

She sang in a manner that won the admiration of many who had not shared in the adulation lavished upon her for her operatic work two years ago. Her voice was clear, pure, fresh and most sympathetic. She sang the aria from Massenet's "Le Cid"—a gem of melodic expressiveness—with genuine sentiment. In the aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" she caught the light spirit of the composition in a most exquisite manner. Mr. Paur was warmly applauded during the evening, and very corteously, by a bit of energetic pantomime, awarded to his players their share of the audience's approval.

THE MORNING HERALD

BALTIMORE,

NOVEMBER 8, and At 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The First Concert of This Season Given in Ford's Opera House Yesterday.

Emil Paur appeared before a Baltimore audience at Ford's Opera House yesterday afternoon for the first time. He is a conductor of marked ability, and under his baton the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in a new light.

Under Herr Nikisch it was effeminate; under Paur it is essentually masculine. With the new conductor there is none of the posing nor training after salon effects that characterized the old regime. Herr Paur is a musician, not a ladies' man. His whole manner in front of the music-desk shows that his art, and not his personal appearance, must count with his audience.

The programme yesterday was scarcely satisfactory. Beethoven's C minor symphony is not as interesting as some of his other works, notably the "Springtide" and the "Choral," and no amount of programme writing will bring it up to the level of these works. Still, its tricks of time and effect were handled in a masterly manner, particularly in the andante sonato and the (if they can be called so) the dual scherzos.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist, and she sang Gounod's "Reine de Saba" aria, "Pius grand dans son obscurite," and the Beethoven "Fidelio," recitative, and aria "Abhorrent One," and "Let Not the Tired One's Lost Star Fade," with an effect that caused enthusiastic recalls in both instances.

The other numbers of the programme were Antonin Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody No. 2 in G minor, and Berlioz's first overture in Benvenuto Cellini.

Morning Advertiser.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Concert.

New Yorkers were given their first opportunity last evening to see the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch conduct the peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for all save the worshipers of lilies and "stained glass attitudes" it was a great and improving spectacle. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, by reason of the fact that it is the finest aggregation of instrumentalists extant in America, is always welcome in this and in all other music loving cities it sees fit from time to time to visit, but New Yorkers have never to any conspicuous extent wept tears of ecstacy in the mere beholding of the tousle headed, china image faced and and utterly affected individual who for several years past has ethereally swayed a baton about the size of a lead pencil from a pedestal in front of the musicians.

Last night we had the Boston artists at Carnegie Music Hall without Mr. Nikisch, and a very large audience managed to extract a great deal of rare musical enjoyment from the occasion. In place of the supine and ethereal conductor of former visits, there stood facing the musicians a very earnest, energetic and thoroughly business-like Dutchman, Mr. Emil Paur, who, seeming to realize that one of the most proficient orchestras ever gotten together in this or any other country had been placed ready made at his service to command, proceeded to put them into action for (if the vulgarism be pardoned) "all they were worth."

The members of the orchestra appeared to feel the inspiration of a flesh and blood conductor and played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and later on the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Hector Berlioz, as they were never heard in New York before.

Mr. Higginson and the people of Boston are to be congratulated upon the engagement of Herr Paur. Miss Emma Eames was the soloist of last night's concert, but for some reason best known to herself refused to sing anything beyond what was put down on the bill, although frantically beseeched by the audience to do so.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, NOV. 14, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

First Public Appearance in Boston of Mrs Emil Paur.

The Kneisel quartet concert, last night, was interesting for two things, the first performance at these concerts of the Smetana quartet in E minor and the first public appearance in this country of Mrs Emil Paur.

The Smetana quartet appeared to please the large audience, but it was really not worth a performance by the artists under Mr Kneisel. The composition seemed more fitted for a hearing in a theater between the acts than in Chickering hall. It was decidedly light.

Mrs Paur, to whom, by the way, it must have seemed strange to have the title "Mrs" instead of the German "Frau" before her name, with Mr Kneisel and Mr Schroeder, played the Schubert E flat piano trio. She received an enthusiastic welcome, and her listeners did their best to make her feel at home.

Mrs Paur was characteristically German. Her face was typical of the higher German people, her dress was German and her appearance German. There was no smirking or smiling at friends in the audience. She evidently came on the platform to play her part in the trio, and for nothing else.

It is almost impossible to speak too highly of her performance. Although there were occasional flaws in the execution, these were so small that the ordinary listener would not notice them, and so much musical taste and feeling were shown that the pleasure of listening was remarkable.

She was strong and the forte passages were well brought out. She was, perhaps, even better in the softer lines; then her touch was accurate and the tone of the piano clearly produced. She showed rare discrimination between her solo and her accompanying work, and the proper balance of tone was always preserved. Mrs Paur is evidently a decided acquisition to the pianists of Boston.

Her hearers showed an amount of enthusiasm very rarely seen in a Kneisel audience; she was loudly applauded after each of the movements of the trio and at the close was twice recalled.

The last number on the program was the splendid Beethoven quartet in G major; in this the performers were at their best. Each movement was beautifully played and the adagio in particular was superb. The real worth and merit of Beethoven's music were conspicuous by comparison with the merits of the first number on the program.

The next concert will be given on Dec 4.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

A brilliant and notable gathering greeted the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening on the occasion of the second concert in the series. The programme was a delightful one and particularly interesting owing to the first appearance in this country on the concert stage of Mrs. Emil Paur, who assisted in Schubert's piano trio in E-flat major. She was given a most cordial welcome on her entrance. The first movement was at moments a little uneven, evidently owing to a slight nervousness. She however displayed great power; her execution was decidedly brilliant, the runs and trills being remarkably clear and expressive. In ensemble work she played with splendid precision and expression. At the close of the movement the enthusiasm was spontaneous, and in Mrs. Paur Boston's musical circles have received acquisition. At the close of the selection Mrs. Paur responded to two recalls. The third movement in Smetana quartet in E minor was read with breadth of tone, the theme being sustained in a truly magnificent style. Beethoven's quartet in G major, four movements, brought to a close a most delightful concert. The third concert will be on Dec. 4 at Chickering Hall.

[43]

The New York Recorder.
By George W. Turner.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

ENTER, EMIL PAUR.

Little of the Obtrusive Has This Conductor; Indeed, He Is Fairly Frigid.

A woman sitting in front of me in Music Hall last night said after Emil Paur had finished bowing: "Why, he looks as if he came from Philadelphia; he is so respectable looking." Mr. Paur, the newly imported conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does indeed look as if he hailed from the Quaker City, or rather from that fascinating suburb, Germantown. He is very Teutonic, very haley, very earnest, very awkward, very angular, very sincere, very dry, very scholarly and absolutely devoid of magnetism. There are about 5,000 conductors of his sort in America, and about 50,000 in Europe. Yet, for all that, Mr. Paur is not to be lightly dismissed. His is not the personality that woos and wins, his temperament is leathery, but he is terribly in love with his task, and you soon find yourself listening to the music and forgetting all about this blonde-haired conductor, who fights musical windmills with his long arms and taps time with both feet.

The fashion in the musical world just now runs to conductors. Pianists also come high, but if a dramatic-looking fellow can conduct an orchestra, we go daft about his "readings," his "interpretations," and we run after the man and not the music. Nikisch's individuality was exploited until the public forgot almost his superb band. Yet that same superb band gave its first concert of the season last night, but the glow, the glitter, the rushingly tumultuous temperament of the Hungarian were absent in all that was played, and sanity, sobriety and solemnity, a grave trio of qualities, reigned on Music Hall stage. We are fickle in Gotham, and after Beethoven's C Minor Symphony had been played we recalled Mr. Paur two or three times, possibly because it was a change from the novel, the exciting, the sometimes sensational, but always interesting conducting of Arthur Nikisch.

Yet Mr. Paur's reading was in nowise remarkable. It was more muscular than musical. He is virile enough, but lacks imagination. He is more pedantic than Gericke, while he lacks that conductor's exquisite taste and finesse. You heard all the notes, phrase after phrase, carved out for you with astonishing patience. But the bloom, the poetry, the profound meanings, where were they? I know full well that it is as difficult to give a novel interpretation to this great soul-epic of Beethoven's, as it is to invent a new rendering of Hamlet. I would have been content with the old, but it never came.

Mr. Paur is a great dissector.

His frigidity would chill Theodore Thomas, even when that conductor is below zero. So we had an honest first movement, a very, very dry, mechanical, but well-balanced andante, a respectable scherzo and the last movement was sufficiently vigorous. No fear of this conductor obtruding his personality; he is conscientious to a fault—conscientious enough to conduct a male singing society. In the delightful rhapsody of Dvorak, Mr. Paur's lack of mood-versatility was very much in evidence. The fine, free, bold rapture of this out-of-doors composition, with its gorgeous tints, was too much for the man from Leipsic. He didn't conduct it, he lectured about its. The same with the Berlioz overture, which closed the rather drab-colored, serious evening. A remark made at my left summed up in curious fashion the newcomer. "What a pity we couldn't have had Rummel play Hummel's A minor piano concerto and Paur conduct the orchestra! What a tropical temperature would have ensued!"

Paur is cold, but he conducts accompaniments neatly, even sympathetically. This he proved when Emma Eames sang two arias by Massenet and Mozart. She was imperially beautiful and sang in the most finished manner. Her voice has gained in warmth and she phrases with artistic nicety. A moiety of brilliancy has gone from the top notes, but her work is more rounded, more intimate. She was recalled again and again. Thus ended the history of the first concert this season of the remarkable band from Boston.

The New York Times
NEW-YORK, THURSDAY, NOV. 9, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Emil Paur, the New Conductor, Makes His First Appearance.

There is not so deep an interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra here as there is in Boston, because the organization is not the central sun of our musical system; but there is a very lively appreciation of its work and an active curiosity as to any change in its direction. Under the admirable leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra was made known here, and leaped into public favor. Its military precision and extreme finish were a little better than anything to which we were accustomed at that time. Mr. Gericke's successor, Arthur Nikisch, endeared himself to those whose hearing is affected by their sight, and who regard effectiveness as an end justified by any means. Those who took Mr. Nikisch more seriously were delighted by his poetic, warm, highly-colored, if sometimes erratic, readings.

Again, the orchestra comes to us with a new personality as its mastering influence. If there had previously been any doubt as to the eagerness of this public to know what manner of man Emil Paur of Leipsic might be, it must all have disappeared in the presence of the brilliant and representative audience which assembled in the Music Hall last night. Hardly any of the persons who count in the musical world of the metropolis were absent, and to them must be added a goodly number of those who dislike to be missing from the places frequented by fashion and intelligence. This audience received Mr. Paur with politeness and accepted his reading of one of the most familiar works in the classical repertoire with a cordiality that must have astonished some of the local conductors who were present. It is often a good thing to be a prophet and get honor in some one else's country.

An extended review of Mr. Paur's manner of conducting and of his reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony appeared in these columns upon the occasion of his debut in Boston. It cannot be said that there is anything of vital importance to add to the comment then published. Last night's performance did not materially alter the impressions received at the former concert. The orchestra, it is true, was in better condition by reason of further rehearsals, and its playing was smoother in respect of precision and solidity of tone. Moreover, there was less of the overaccentuation noted in the Boston concert. But the reading of the symphony was calm, methodic, uninspiring. In simple truth, it was leaden-footed and discouraging.

The other numbers on the programme were Dr. Dvorak's first Slavonic rhapsody and Hector Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. Both were played well, with color and precision; but there was again a lack of vim and animation. One missed that variety of subtle nuances to which former performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have accustomed us. No fault could be found with the tone of the splendid body of strings, nor the excellent voicing of the wood wind. The brass seemed to be unusually heavy in quality. The performance, as a whole, was distinctly prosaic. Mr. Paur is a scholarly, sound, intelligent, and energetic conductor, but it seems as if the gods had not made him poetical.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Emma Eames, who returns to us as one of the prime donne of Mr. Abbey's brilliant company. The popular soprano sang "Pleurez mes yeux," from Massenet's "Le Cid," and "Non so piu," from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro." As usual, she delighted her hearers by the smoothness of her voice production, the charming quality of her tone, and the general finish of her work. It should be said, however, that in one or two spots her breathing seemed to be a little at fault, giving a labored quality to some of her phrasing, which is usually admirable. It is probable that she was not in the best of voice.

THE SUN.
BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, NOV. 8, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Appearance Here of Emil Paur, Who Succeeded Nikisch.

No conductor of the Boston Symphony or any other similar orchestra has ever visited Baltimore about whom there was greater prejudice than Emil Paur, who directed for the first time here at Ford's Opera House yesterday afternoon. Rumors that he was ponderous and unmagnetic in his leading, conventional and dull in his interpretations, not to be compared with Nikisch and like discouraging reports heralded his approach and attracted Baltimoreans in throngs to the theatre to find out for themselves what manner of man this was who was stepping into the post that Nikisch had so successfully filled.

In the unpicturesque appearance of Paur the audience missed the poetic presence of his predecessor, for Paur is rather below medium height, thick-set, with bushy, red-brown hair and beard, and without pretense of being distingue. Indeed, there is no pretense of any kind in him. It is all good, substantial worth. If the two men present a striking contrast in appearance, so do they in manner; so do they in conducting. Nikisch was quiet, graceful, delicate, intense; Paur is rugged, vigorous, desperately in earnest. Nikisch was inclined to pose; Paur does not reveal a spark of affectation either in manner or in his interpretations. Nikisch was a disciple of the beautiful; Paur evidently worships the true. Taken all in all, Paur will probably wear well. When he has had the orchestra long enough under his baton to impress upon it the stamp of his individuality he will undoubtedly give the musical public some interpretations that will make a lasting impression. He is not dull, he is not unmagnetic and he is forceful. Paur is not graceful in his motions. He works from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet—indeed, both head and feet were going it vigorously in the leader's desire to bring out the rhythm strongly. His movements are short, quick, decisive, even jerky, but he is evidently bent more on getting from the orchestra what is in his own mind than on making of himself a study in the poetry of motion or a Delsarte expressionist. There are little movements of the baton between the beats that are exceedingly eloquent and effectual in conveying ideas of the phrasing to the players, while the rhythmic sense in the new leader is evidently strong.

Paur's history, briefly told, is this: He was born at Czernowitz, in Bukownia, a province of the Austrian empire. At fourteen he went to the conservatory in Vienna, where he stayed six years, and where, oddly enough, his predecessor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, was one of his fellow-students. Paur was graduated with high honors, and he soon became successful in conducting grand opera in various cities. The director of the Leipsic Opera House induced him to take the position of conductor at Leipsig, where he succeeded Nikisch, in whose footsteps, as regards musical positions, he seems destined to follow. Paur is also a violinist and pianist of ability.

The conductor had three massive works in which to show his musicianship—Beethoven's C minor symphony, Dvorak's "Slavonic Rhapsody," in G minor, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, by Berlioz. The symphony was given in a straightforward, earnest style, with finely marked rhythm, with strength where strength was needed and with delicacy where delicacy was needed. The modern works were given a spirited and strong rendering.

Mme. Lillian Nordica was the soloist. Pure and clear and true is her singing, musical in expression, really artistic in style, and Nordica has dramatic force as well. She is, besides, a charming woman in her stage presence—a combination of good qualities not too frequently found. Her numbers were an aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and a recitative and aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio."

The [illegible] Globe.
JOSEPH PULITZER.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 53-63 PARK ROW.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

THE MUSICAL SEASON BEGINS.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Music Hall.

The musical season of 1893-94 was brilliantly inaugurated last evening at Carnegie Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Emil Paur, its new conductor.

It is with deep satisfaction that the music-lovers of this city greet the transfer of this premier instrumental organization from its former cramped quarters to the more spacious locale, which is destined to be the scene of its future musical achievements. Domiciled as it now is to be on the occasion of its monthly visits to New York in the superb building which wealth has erected for the glorification of musical art, its influence will be greater and more widespread than heretofore.

There was a very large audience present. Curiosity to see and judge of the new-comer, who has been handed the baton wielded in the past by Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch, added to the desire of listening to the superlative work of the celebrated orchestra, which, thanks to private enterprise, is to-day classified with the great orchestras of the old world.

Among the many present were both of the men who are the controlling factors in the sphere of music in this city—Walter Damrosch and Anton Seidl.

Mr. Paur chose as the symphonic composition by the interpretation of which he submitted himself to the judgment of New York, Beethoven's Fifth in C minor, op. 67. It was with the same musical work that he first faced an American audience a few weeks ago in Boston. It may be assumed that he was satisfied with the verdict rendered there, then, and relied upon its affirmation here. If this is so, his judgment was correct.

It is impossible, after listening to the playing under his direction of but three numbers—the symphony referred to, Dvorak's Slavonic Rhapsody No. 2, G minor, op. 45, and Berlioz's "Benevuto Cellini" ouvetture, to form more than a mere preliminary opinion as to his full capacities. Acquaintance with a wider range of achievements is necessary. An opinion of the sort is more an impression than a settled conviction.

The consensus of Boston opinion is that Mr. Paur is a respectful and respectable conductor. A student, a believer in tradition and convention, and not a reformer or an advanced innovator. This judgment is one that must be acquiesced in if the performance of the Fifth Symphony last evening is to be considered as the standard of his methods.

It was clear, sturdy and manly. The phrasing was correct. In expression it was precise, full of minutiae, almost mathematical. It could not be called brilliant, it was simply conservative. There were no sharp accentuations, no marked emphases, such as the predecessor of Mr. Paur indulged in. Deliberation and not impulse ruled.

In maner Mr. Paur lacks grace. His beat is firm and decisive, but awkward. He uses his left hand freely, and at times by itself. He is a man of fine, dignified appearance.

The orchestra played in its usual superb manner. The strings are certainly unequalled in tone quality.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Emma Eames.

She sang in a manner that won the admiration of many who had not shared in the adulation lavished upon her for her operatic work two years ago. Her voice was clear, pure, fresh and most sympathetic. She sang the aria from Massenet's "Le Cid"—a gem of melodic expressiveness—with genuine sentiment. In the aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" she caught the light spirit of the composition in a most exquisite manner. Mr. Paur was warmly applauded during the evening, and very corteously, by a bit of energetic pantomime, awarded to his players their share of the audience's approval.

THE MORNING HERALD
BALTIMORE, [illegible]
TO NOVEMBER 8, [illegible] and At 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The First Concert of This Season Given in Ford's Opera House Yesterday.

Emil Paur appeared before a Baltimore audience at Ford's Opera House yesterday afternoon for the first time. He is a conductor of marked ability, and under his baton the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in a new light.

Under Herr Nikisch it was effeminate; under Paur it is essentually masculine. With the new conductor there is none of the posing nor training after salon effects that characterized the old regime. Herr Paur is a musician, not a ladies' man. His whole manner in front of the music-desk shows that his art, and not his personal appearance, must count with his audience.

The programme yesterday was scarcely satisfactory. Beethoven's C minor symphony is not as interesting as some of his other works, notably the "Springtide" and the "Choral," and no amount of programme writing will bring it up to the level of these works. Still, its tricks of time and effect were handled in a masterly manner, particularly in the andante sonato and the (if they can be called so) the dual scherzos.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist, and she sang Gounod's "Reine de Saba" aria, "Plus grand dans son obscurite," and the Beethoven "Fidelio," recitative, and aria "Abhorrent One," and "Let Not the Tired One's Lost Star Fade," with an effect that caused enthusiastic recalls in both instances.

The other numbers of the programme were Antonin Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody No. 2 in G minor, and Berlioz's first overture in Benvenuto Cellini.

Morning Advertiser.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

Boston Symphony Concert.

New Yorkers were given their first opportunity last evening to see the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch conduct the peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for all save the worshipers of lilies and "stained glass attitudes" it was a great and improving spectacle. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, by reason of the fact that it is the finest aggregation of instrumentalists extant in America, is always welcome in this and in all other music loving cities it sees fit from time to time to visit, but New Yorkers have never to any conspicuous extent wept tears of ecstacy in the mere beholding of the tousle headed, china image faced and and utterly affected individual who for several years past has ethereally swayed a baton about the size of a lead pencil from a pedestal in front of the musicians.

Last night we had the Boston artists at Carnegie Music Hall without Mr. Nikisch, and a very large audience managed to extract a great deal of rare musical enjoyment from the occasion. In place of the supine and ethereal conductor of former visits, there stood facing the musicians a very earnest, energetic and thoroughly business-like Dutchman, Mr. Emil Paur, who, seeming to realize that one of the most proficient orchestras ever gotten together in this or any other country had been placed ready made at his service to command, proceeded to put them into action for (if the vulgarism be pardoned) "all they were worth."

The members of the orchestra appeared to feel the inspiration of a flesh and blood conductor and played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and later on the overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," by Hector Berlioz, as they were never heard in New York before.

Mr. Higginson and the people of Boston are to be congratulated upon the engagement of Herr Paur. Miss Emma Eames was the soloist of last night's concert, but for some reason best known to herself refused to sing anything beyond what was put down on the bill, although frantically beseeched by the audience to do so.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, NOV. 14, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

First Public Appearance in Boston of Mrs Emil Paur.

The Kneisel quartet concert, last night, was interesting for two things, the first performance at these concerts of the Smetana quartet in E minor and the first public appearance in this country of Mrs Emil Paur.

The Smetana quartet appeared to please the large audience, but it was really not worth a performance by the artists under Mr Kneisel. The composition seemed more fitted for a hearing in a theater between the acts than in Chickering hall. It was decidedly light.

Mrs Paur, to whom, by the way, it must have seemed strange to have the title "Mrs" instead of the German "Frau" before her name, with Mr Kneisel and Mr Schroeder, played the Schubert E flat piano trio. She received an enthusiastic welcome, and her listeners did their best to make her feel at home.

Mrs Paur was characteristically German. Her face was typical of the higher German people, her dress was German and her appearance German. There was no smirking or smiling at friends in the audience. She evidently came on the platform to play her part in the trio, and for nothing else.

It is almost impossible to speak too highly of her performance. Although there were occasional flaws in the execution, these were so small that the ordinary listener would not notice them, and so much musical taste and feeling were shown that the pleasure of listening was remarkable.

She was strong and the forte passages were well brought out. She was, perhaps, even better in the softer lines; then her touch was accurate and the tone of the piano clearly produced. She showed rare discrimination between her solo and her accompanying work, and the proper balance of tone was always preserved. Mrs Paur is evidently a decided acquisition to the pianists of Boston.

Her hearers showed an amount of enthusiasm very rarely seen in a Kneisel audience; she was loudly applauded after each of the movements of the trio and at the close was twice recalled.

The last number on the program was the splendid Beethoven quartet in G major; in this the performers were at their best. Each movement was beautifully played and the adagio in particular was superb. The real worth and merit of Beethoven's music were conspicuous by comparison with the merits of the first number on the program.

The next concert will be given on Dec 4.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

A brilliant and notable gathering greeted the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening on the occasion of the second concert in the series. The programme was a delightful one and particularly interesting owing to the first appearance in this country on the concert stage of Mrs. Emil Paur, who assisted in Schubert's piano trio in E-flat major. She was given a most cordial welcome on her entrance. The first movement was at moments a little uneven, evidently owing to a slight nervousness. She however displayed great power; her execution was decidedly brilliant, the runs and trills being remarkably clear and expressive. In ensemble work she played with splendid precision and expression. At the close of the movement the enthusiasm was spontaneous, and in Mrs. Paur Boston's musical circles have received acquisition. At the close of the selection Mrs. Paur responded to two recalls. The third movement in Smetana quartet in E minor was read with breadth of tone, the theme being sustained in a truly magnificent style. Beethoven's quartet in G major, four movements, brought to a close a most delightful concert. The third concert will be on Dec. 4 at Chickering Hall.

[43]

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The musical season in this city had a most appropriate and dignified opening at the Music Hall last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert. The change from Chickering Hall, which was made necessary by the ever-growing popularity of the organization and the appearance of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, served to heighten the interest in the concert, and an audience of fine appearance and evident refinement filled the large music room. The programme consisted of five numbers, two of them operatic arias sung by Mme. Emma Eames, who has many admirers in New-York, and who sang in a manner to justify all the admiration felt and expressed. The list began with Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, a choice the significance of which may be read in the cirnumstance that Mr. Paur selected it as the work with which to present himself to the American people at his first concert in Boston. At that time The Tribune discussed his reading with considerable fulness. The conditions were not all propitious for a final estimate of his merits, but last night's performance did not call for a reversal of the opinion then expressed. The effect of Mr. Paur's leading is much better than its appearance, but it is exceedingly questionable whether the musical people of Boston and New-York will ever be reconciled to his conception of the tempi and spirit of the first two movements.

If there is a golden rule concerning the interpretation of the musical classics (and of all composition, ancient or modern, for that matter), it is that they must never be made tedious. Mr. Paur is not tedious in such highly colored and varied works as the Slavonic Rhapsody in G minor, by Dvorak, which was the second instrumental number in last night's scheme, or the passionately eager overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which brought the concert to a close, but he is unmistakably tedious in the first allegro, and the andante of Beethoven's fifth symphony. His conduct of holding on to the fermate in the pregnant motif of the first movement until the meaning of the context is lost seems utterly indefensible and explicable only on the theory that it is another illustration of how Wagner's hints may be perverted. In his highly suggestive essay on conducting Wagner called attention to the dramatic significance of this fermate; he wanted conductors to hold the half note grimly, with an iron hand. But he did not mean that it should be so unduly prolonged that the consistency of the movement should be disrupted. It was a dynamic effect, more than an exaggerated rubato that he was after. Properly handled, the fermate is a capital vehicle for the development of a climax; but it fails utterly in this respect under the hands of Mr. Paur. The orchestra played the Rhapsody and overture most brilliantly, and the new conductor was gratified by a most courteous welcome at the beginning and hearty approval all through the concert.

Mme. Eames's numbers, which she sang with fine dramatic feeling, albeit her technical work was obviously embarrassed by nervousness at the outset, won the air, "Pleurez, mes Yeux" from Massenet's "Cid" and "Non so Piu" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mrs. Emil Paur made her first appearance in Boston as a pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, E minor (first time at these concerts)...Smetana
Piano Trio, E flat major.....Schubert
Quartette, G major, op. 18.....Beethoven

Friedrich Smetana's reputation was for a long time bounded by the border lines of Bohemia. In 1880 the E minor quartet was played in Vienna; it was warmly received. Of late years some of his operas have crossed the frontier and have been heard in the German language.

Smetana died in 1884, sixty years of age. In 1874 he was stone deaf, and his death was in a madhouse in Prague. He was a composer of intense nationality, revered by his countrymen, although his fame as a Bohemian has been eclipsed partially by that of Dvorak. But in the string quartette played last night Smetana seems rather German than Bohemian.

Not that this music is entirely devoid of tschechisch spirit. There are suggestions of it in the scherzo, and the chief theme of the finale sounds like a folk song. But the music is not so foreign that the hearer who may understand German, French, Italian, feels the need of an interpreter to translate the speech of the Bohemian.

Surely this quartette is a strong and earnest work, eminently musical. The first movement is well made, firmly knit, free from suspicion of triteness or dullness. The scherzo and the finale are delightful, abounding in fresh melody and ingenious harmonic combinations. The slow movement seems to me less spontaneous, and it is not without affectation of profundity, as though the composer had said to himself, "I'll try Beethoven's later style." As a whole, the quartette gave genuine pleasure. It is a work that shows temperament as well as skill.

Mrs. Paur was greeted warmly when she made her appearance, and the applause that followed her performance was loud and sincere. She displayed many of the characteristics of an excellent ensemble player. Her touch was clear and crisp; her sense of rhythm was rarely at fault, although toward the end of the first movement there was false accentuation for a few measures; and she appreciated fully the relative importance of the parts. Although a woman, she did not attempt to monopolize the conversation or the attention. Her phrasing was musical; and she played with delightful accuracy and good sense. Whether she is a pianist of marked temperament remains to be seen. Her modest and womanly manner added in no small degree to the pleasure caused by her performance.

The playing of the members of the quartette was, as usual, worthy of high praise. One may quarrel, but rarely, with a tempo chosen, but in quality of tone, in nice appreciation of detail and in musical feeling displayed there is almost nothing to be desired. The Kneisel concerts are the most purely artistic events of our season.

The question of tempo is one that admits often of argument. Was not the andante con moto of the trio taken at too slow a pace? There is a custom at present of almost confounding this indication with adagio. Now in this particular movement the closing 17 measures, where a slower pace is indicated, lost in contrast, and other passages suffered: for the general tempo of the movement was too slow. And yet this movement was treated so sympathetically in other respects that it seems ungracious to insist on this point.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartette Club came on its appointed date. This does not always happen, and the many changes of date in these concerts might give the organization the name of the "Postponement Quartette." But when the concerts do come they are always excellent, and that of last night was no exception.

The Smetana quartette in E minor was a strange quodlibet. Its first movement was fierce and spasmodic in its chief theme, which, however, presented a strong figure of three notes for development. Yet the development was short and not very ingenious. The suave and gentle second theme was in excellent contrast, and the coda with its reminiscence of the chief theme was a good ending. In this movement, and in fact, all through the work, the composer shows a distinct partiality for the viola, and that dark-toned and melancholy instrument was frequently heard in important passages which were broadly played by Mr. Svecenski.

The second movement seemed light and trivial after the sonata-form of the first. It was a fantastic treatment of a polka rhythm. Among all the dance forms, the polka presents least to invite the composer: the waltz has its dreaminess and its skips, the polonaise its syncopations, the mazurka, too, sometimes becomes a rhythmic fantasie. But the polka, even when Raff (in the "Polka de la Reine") and Rubinstein ("Le Ball") attempted it, yielded nothing inspiring. Perhaps Smetana felt that he wanted national color and that the Bohemian "Pulka" must furnish it. The movement won great applause.

The folk-song element was apparent in the finale, too, and at times this tended to triviality, for folk music must be mingled with masterly harmony before it can fill a classical niche. A very strange bit of tone color was introduced near the end, where a shriek on the first violin (a harmonic) was set against a mysterious tremolo on the lower strings. It was bizarre, and so was much of the movement, although the excellent playing of the quartette reconciled one to many outre touches on the composer's part.

But the chief interest of the audience centred in Schubert's piano trio in E flat, and this time, not because of Schubert, Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. It has been customary, since paleolithic days, in Boston, to look to our symphonic conductor's wife (if he have one) for music of some sort. The conductorial sun is expected to have a moon.

It is not too much to say that Mrs. Paur shines in her own right, that she will require no fictitious puffery or adventitious aid. She is the best musician that has yet come to Boston as a conductor's spouse. She played the work earnestly, yet in a manner that showed that her reserve force had not been called upon; her limit had not been reached. The heights and depths of emotion were not scaled and sounded, but every phrase was honest, unaffected and sincere. In the first and second movements there was an occasional excess of power on the piano, but in the rest of the work the careful subordination of the instrument was remarkable, and the ensemble was perfect. Especially commendable was the crisp, demistaccato touch in the scherzo, and Mr. Schroeder's 'cello work in the finale was superb.

The Beethoven Quartette, which closed the programme, requires no detailed mention. It is pleasant to know that the standard of the Kneisel Quartette is as high as ever; and it is refreshing to hear such music in these days of musical hysteria and exaggeration.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCIV. NO. 137.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET, MRS. PAUR.

The second of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet at Chickering Hall last evening had as its prominent attractions the first American appearance of Mrs. Paur, wife of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, and the performance, for the first time at these concerts of Smetana's quartet in E minor, this work being placed first in order on the programme. Needless to say, all the beauties of this tuneful quartet were given with faultless accuracy, grace and expression quite justifying the enthusiasm shown over its performance. The final number on the evening's list was Beethoven's quartet in C major, op. 18, which also received a most enjoyable performance. The middle work was the piano trio in E flat major, op. 100, by Schubert, in the playing of which Mrs. Paur made her entrance upon a new field of labor, in which her services will unquestionably find ready demand. As an ensemble player she shows the true instincts of the musician, and subordinates her playing to the general result with fine taste. She has a delightfully distinct, clear touch, and her part of the trio was given with rare artistic effect. She has a most pleasingly unaffected manner, and altogether gained the hearty good will of her audience. Dec. 4 is the date of the next concert.

Boston Tra...

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its second concert in Chickering Hall last evening, assisted by Mrs. Emil Paur. The programme was as follows:

Smetana: Quartet in E minor.
Schubert: Pianoforte Trio in E-flat major, Opus 100.
Beethoven: Quartet in C major. Opus 18, No. 2.

The Smetana quartet is a charming composition, very free in treatment and rather loosely put together, but full of delightful invention, freshness, and talent. The composer gives himself considerable elbow-room in a musical form with which a certain strictness of style is generally associated, and shows himself by no means over-burdened with deference toward the traditional character of the string quartet. His second movement, Allegro moderato alla Polka, is fascinating enough, but is so light, even rollicking in character, that it sounds very like a quartet gone on a spree; the headache, the Katzenjammer, too, comes with a vengeance in the ensuing Largo sostenuto; but this may be a matter of race, for it is well known that the Slavs take musical sadness very dolefully indeed. But, free, fantastic, and loosely constructed as much of this quartet is, it nowhere gives the impression of mere haphazard writing; the composer seems to know perfectly well what he is about and whither he is going; one does not feel it to be either incoherent or ill-balanced. Even the desultory, recitative-like first theme of the first movement is so treated that it really gets somewhere; and the fresh, genial, unforced inventiveness shown in the writing is a very saving grace. We have something more than a suspicion that a good deal of the work is "badly scored," if the expression may be used in this connection—badly written for the instruments; certainly the Kneisel Quartet may be in general taken as a model of smooth, euphonious playing; yet a good deal in this quartet of Smetana's sounds very rough, uncouth, even "scratchy." When, with four such players, this unpleasant effect is generally noticeable in a performance, one is tempted to think the fault must lie in the writing rather than in the playing.

The Beethoven quartet went to a charm! To be sure, no one of the six Lobkowitz quartets looks very tempting on a bill of fare nowadays; Beethoven's Opus 18 has been pretty hardly ridden for the last half century or so, and is fast falling into concert-hackdom. But somehow the music manages to hold its own in spite of long familiarity, and though one might far rather go to hear something else, one comes away from the performance refreshed, well filled with sound and delicious musical nourishment, and in the happiest frame of mind. Ride it as you will, you cannot ride that hack to death! The playing was admirable at every point.

Mrs. Paur, the wife of our excellent conductor, made her first public appearance here as a pianist at this concert. Let it be said first and foremost that she had an indubitably brilliant success, a true succès d'enthousiasme! The applause was unstinted after every movement of the Schubert trio, and she was twice recalled at the end. Hers is a sort of pianoforte playing one seldom hears nowadays. In the matter of technique she is clear, facile, and sure; you feel perfect confidence in her, after the first dozen measures. Her tone is slight, indeed her physical strength seems not to be great, and she cannot make up for it by avoirdupois weight; her average, habitual tone hardly comes up to the usual concert mezzo forte; yet, light as her tone is, it is not drowned out by the other instruments, and even in strong passages she has a vitality of accent that brings her part to its full value; in no instance could she be accused of not holding her own easily and effectively. What is most charming in her playing is an entire absence of effort—of intellectual and emotional as well as merely physical effort. It is the frankest, sincerest, most unaffected sort of playing. She does not seem to be aiming at any particular effect; you do not feel, as you do with almost every pianist nowadays, that she is constantly saying to herself (and tacitly to her listeners) "Aha! here is a grand stroke—and I am making it!" She lets the music tell its own story, aiding and abetting it in no merely passive way, but without placing any particularly individual "conception" of it between it and her audience. She acts as a perfectly true and vivid reflector of the music upon her listeners, not as a magnifying lens through which they are to view it. To ears well saturated with the impressive and commanding playing of the present di majores of the key-board this sort of playing may seem a thought fade and colorless; to us it is inexpressibly restful. One feels that there is really no lack of animation nor vigor of feeling behind it; its utter refinement is neither finicking nor bloodless; and it does to perfection what only the very best playing can do: it brings you into immediate contact with the music and calls none of your attention to itself. Besides, it is by no means monotonous; it varies in animation, expressiveness, and vigor just as the music itself varies; in a word, it is delightful. To say that Mrs. Paur was admirably seconded by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder is merely saying what all knew beforehand. The trio itself made its never-failing beautiful and vivifying impression; here we have Schubert in his most characteristic and charming vein, and with something less than his usual prolixity.

New-York Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1893.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The musical season in this city had a most appropriate and dignified opening at the Music Hall last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert. The change from Chickering Hall, which was made necessary by the ever-growing popularity of the organization and the appearance of the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, served to heighten the interest in the concert, and an audience of fine appearance and evident refinement filled the large music room. The programme consisted of five numbers, two of them operatic arias sung by Mme. Emma Eames, who has many admirers in New-York, and who sang in a manner to justify all the admiration felt and expressed. The list began with Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, a choice the significance of which may be read in the circumstance that Mr. Paur selected it as the work with which to present himself to the American people at his first concert in Boston. At that time The Tribune discussed his reading with considerable fulness. The conditions were not all propitious for a final estimate of his merits, but last night's performance did not call for a reversal of the opinion then expressed. The effect of Mr. Paur's leading is much better than its appearance, but it is exceedingly questionable whether the musical people of Boston and New-York will ever be reconciled to his conception of the tempi and spirit of the first two movements.

If there is a golden rule concerning the interpretation of the musical classics (and of all composition, ancient or modern, for that matter), it is that they must never be made tedious. Mr. Paur is not tedious in such highly colored and varied works as the Slavonic Rhapsody in G minor, by Dvorak, which was the second instrumental number in last night's scheme, or the passionately eager overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which brought the concert to a close, but he is unmistakably tedious in the first allegro, and the andante of Beethoven's fifth symphony. His conduct of holding on to the fermate in the pregnant motif of the first movement until the meaning of the context is lost seems utterly indefensible and explicable only on the theory that it is another illustration of how Wagner's hints may be perverted. In his highly suggestive essay on conducting Wagner called attention to the dramatic significance of this fermate; he wanted conductors to hold the half note grimly, with an iron hand. But he did not mean that it should be so unduly prolonged that the consistency of the movement should be disrupted. It was a dynamic effect, more than an exaggerated rubato that he was after. Properly handled, the fermate is a capital vehicle for the development of a climax; but it fails utterly in this respect under the hands of Mr. Paur. The orchestra played the Rhapsody and overture most brilliantly, and the new conductor was gratified by a most courteous welcome at the beginning and hearty approval all through the concert.

Mme. Eames's numbers, which she sang with fine dramatic feeling, albeit her technical work was obviously embarrassed by nervousness at the outset, won the air, "Pleurez, mes Yeux" from Massenet's "Cid" and "Non so Piu" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. Mrs. Emil Paur made her first appearance in Boston as a pianist. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, E minor (first time at these concerts)..Smetana
Piano Trio, E flat major.....Schubert
Quartette, G major, op. 18.....Beethoven

Friedrich Smetana's reputation was for a long time bounded by the border lines of Bohemia. In 1880 the E minor quartet was played in Vienna; it was warmly received. Of late years some of his operas have crossed the frontier and have been heard in the German language.

Smetana died in 1884, sixty years of age. In 1874 he was stone deaf, and his death was in a madhouse in Prague. He was a composer of intense nationality, revered by his countrymen, although his fame as a Bohemian has been eclipsed partially by that of Dvorak. But in the string quartette played last night Smetana seems rather German than Bohemian.

Not that this music is entirely devoid of tschechisch spirit. There are suggestions of it in the scherzo, and the chief theme of the finale sounds like a folk song. But the music is not so foreign that the hearer who may understand German, French, Italian, feels the need of an interpreter to translate the speech of the Bohemian.

Surely this quartette is a strong and earnest work, eminently musical. The first movement is well made, firmly knit, free from suspicion of triteness or dullness. The scherzo and the finale are delightful, abounding in fresh melody and ingenious harmonic combinations. The slow movement seems to me less spontaneous, and it is not without affectation of profundity, as though the composer had said to himself, "I'll try Beethoven's later style." As a whole, the quartette gave genuine pleasure. It is a work that shows temperament as well as skill.

Mrs. Paur was greeted warmly when she made her appearance, and the applause that followed her performance was loud and sincere. She displayed many of the characteristics of an excellent ensemble player. Her touch was clear and crisp; her sense of rhythm was rarely at fault, although toward the end of the first movement there was false accentuation for a few measures; and she appreciated fully the relative importance of the parts. Although a woman, she did not attempt to monopolize the conversation or the attention. Her phrasing was musical; and she played with delightful accuracy and good sense. Whether she is a pianist of marked temperament remains to be seen. Her modest and womanly manner added in no small degree to the pleasure caused by her performance.

The playing of the members of the quartette was, as usual, worthy of high praise. One may quarrel, but rarely, with a tempo chosen, but in quality of tone, in nice appreciation of detail and in musical feeling displayed there is almost nothing to be desired. The Kneisel concerts are the most purely artistic events of our season.

The question of tempo is one that admits often of argument. Was not the andante con moto of the trio taken at too slow a pace? There is a custom at present of almost confounding this indication with adagio. Now in this particular movement the closing 17 measures, where a slower pace is indicated, lost in contrast, and other passages suffered; for the general tempo of the movement was too slow. And yet this movement was treated so sympathetically in other respects that it seems ungracious to insist on this point.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, NOV. 14, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartette Club came on its appointed date. This does not always happen, and the many changes of date in these concerts might give the organization the name of the "Postponement Quartette." But when the concerts do come they are always excellent, and that of last night was no exception.

The Smetana quartette in E minor was a strange quodlibet. Its first movement was fierce and spasmodic in its chief theme, which, however, presented a strong figure of three notes for development. Yet the development was short and not very ingenious. The suave and gentle second theme was in excellent contrast, and the coda with its reminiscence of the chief theme was a good ending. In this movement, and in fact, all through the work, the composer shows a distinct partiality for the viola, and that dark-toned and melancholy instrument was frequently heard in important passages which were broadly played by Mr. Svecenski.

The second movement seemed light and trivial after the sonata-form of the first. It was a fantastic treatment of a polka rhythm. Among all the dance forms, the polka presents least to invite the composer: the waltz has its dreaminess and its skips, the polonaise its syncopations, the mazurka, too, sometimes becomes a rhythmic fantasie. But the polka, even when Raff (in the "Polka de la Reine") and Rubinstein ("Le Ball") attempted it, yielded nothing inspiring. Perhaps Smetana felt that he wanted national color and that the Bohemian "Pulka" must furnish it. The movement won great applause.

The folk-song element was apparent in the finale, too, and at times this tended to triviality, for folk music must be mingled with masterly harmony before it can fill a classical niche. A very strange bit of tone color was introduced near the end, where a shriek on the first violin (a harmonic) was set against a mysterious tremolo on the lower strings. It was bizarre, and so was much of the movement, although the excellent playing of the quartette reconciled one to many outre touches on the composer's part.

But the chief interest of the audience centred in Schubert's piano trio in E flat, and this time, not because of Schubert, Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. It has been customary, since paleolithic days, in Boston, to look to our symphonic conductor's wife (if he have one) for music of some sort. The conductorial sun is expected to have a moon.

It is not too much to say that Mrs. Paur shines in her own right, that she will require no fictitious puffery or adventitious aid. She is the best musician that has yet come to Boston as a conductor's spouse. She played the work earnestly, yet in a manner that showed that her reserve force had not been called upon; her limit had not been reached. The heights and depths of emotion were not scaled and sounded, but every phrase was honest, unaffected and sincere. In the first and second movements there was an occasional excess of power on the piano, but in the rest of the work the careful subordination of the instrument was remarkable, and the ensemble was perfect. Especially commendable was the crisp, demistaccato touch in the scherzo, and Mr. Schroeder's 'cello work in the finale was superb.

The Beethoven Quartette, which closed the programme, requires no detailed mention. It is pleasant to know that the standard of the Kneisel Quartette is as high as ever; and it is refreshing to hear such music in these days of musical hysteria and exaggeration.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 137.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET, MRS. PAUR.

The second of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet at Chickering Hall last evening had as its prominent attractions the first American appearance of Mrs. Paur, wife of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, and the performance, for the first time at these concerts of Smetana's quartet in E minor, this work being placed first in or er on the programme. Needless to say, all the beauties of this tuneful quartet were given with faultless accuracy, grace and expression quite justifying the enthusiasm shown over its performance. The final number on the evening's list was Beethoven's quartet in C major, op. 18, which also received a most enjoyable performance. The middle work was the piano trio in E flat major, op. 100, by Schubert, in the playing of which Mrs. Paur made her entrance upon a new field of labor, in which her services will unquestionably find ready demand. As an ensemble player she shows the true instincts of the musician, and subordinates her playing to the general result with fine taste. She has a delightfully distinct, clear touch, and her part of the trio was given with rare artistic effect. She has a most pleasingly unaffected manner, and altogether gained the hearty good will of her audience. Dec. 4 is the date of the next concert.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1893.

Chickering Hall. The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its second concert in Chickering Hall last evening, assisted by Mrs. Emil Paur. The programme was as follows:

Smetana: Quartet in E minor.
Schubert: Pianoforte Trio in E-flat major, Opus 100.
Beethoven: Quartet in C major, Opus 18, No. 2.

The Smetana quartet is a charming composition, very free in treatment and rather loosely put together, but full of delightful invention, freshness, and talent. The composer gives himself considerable elbow-room in a musical form with which a certain strictness of style is generally associated, and shows himself by no means over-burdened with deference toward the traditional character of the string quartet. His second movement, Allegro moderato alla Polka, is fascinating enough, but is so light, even rollicking in character, that it sounds very like a quartet gone on a spree; the headache, the Katzenjammer, too, comes with a vengeance in the ensuing Largo sostenuto; but this may be a matter of race, for it is well known that the Slavs take musical sadness very dolefully indeed. But, free, fantastic, and loosely constructed as much of this quartet is, it nowhere gives the impression of mere haphazard writing; the composer seems to know perfectly well what he is about and whither he is going; one does not feel it to be either incoherent or ill-balanced. Even the desultory, recitative-like first theme of the first movement is so treated that it really gets somewhere; and the fresh, genial, unforced inventiveness shown in the writing is a very saving grace. We have something more than a suspicion that a good deal of the work is "badly scored," if the expression may be used in this connection—badly written for the instruments; certainly the Kneisel Quartet may be in general taken as a model of smooth, euphonious playing; yet a good deal in this quartet of Smetana's sounds very rough, uncouth, even "scratchy." When, with four such players, this unpleasant effect is generally noticeable in a performance, one is tempted to think the fault must lie in the writing rather than in the playing.

The Beethoven quartet went to a charm! To be sure, no one of the six Lobkowitz quartets looks very tempting on a bill of fare nowadays; Beethoven's Opus 18 has been pretty hardly ridden for the last half century or so, and is fast falling into concert-hackdom. But somehow the music manages to hold its own in spite of long familiarity, and though one might far rather go to hear something else, one comes away from the performance refreshed, well filled with sound and delicious musical nourishment, and in the happiest frame of mind. Ride it as you will, you cannot ride that hack to death! The playing was admirable at every point.

Mrs. Paur, the wife of our excellent conductor, made her first public appearance here as a pianist at this concert. Let it be said first and foremost that she had an indubitably brilliant success, a true succès d'enthousiasme! The applause was unstinted after every movement of the Schubert trio, and she was twice recalled at the end. Hers is a sort of pianoforte playing one seldom hears nowadays. In the matter of technique she is clear, facile, and sure; you feel perfect confidence in her, after the first dozen measures. Her tone is slight, indeed her physical strength seems not to be great, and she cannot make up for it by avoirdupois weight; her average, habitual tone hardly comes up to the usual concert mezzo forte; yet, light as her tone is, it is not drowned out by the other instruments, and even in strong passages she has a vitality of accent that brings her part to its full value; in no instance could she be accused of not holding her own easily and effectively. What is most charming in her playing is an entire absence of effort—of intellectual and emotional as well as merely physical effort. It is the frankest, sincerest, most unaffected sort of playing. She does not seem to be aiming at any particular effect; you do not feel, as you do with almost every pianist nowadays, that she is constantly saying to herself (and tacitly to her listeners) "Aha! here is a grand stroke—and I am making it!" She lets the music tell its own story, aiding and abetting it in no merely passive way, but without placing any particularly individual "conception" of it between it and her audience. She acts as a perfectly true and vivid reflector of the music upon her listeners, not as a magnifying lens through which they are to view it. To ears well saturated with the impressive and commanding playing of the present di majores of the key-board this sort of playing may seem a thought fade and colorless; to us it is inexpressibly restful. One feels that there is really no lack of animation nor vigor of feeling behind it; its utter refinement is neither finicking nor bloodless; and it does to perfection what only the very best playing can do: it brings you into immediate contact with the music and calls none of your attention to itself. Besides, it is by no means monotonous; it varies in animation, expressiveness, and vigor just as the music itself varies; in a word, it is delightful. To say that Mrs. Paur was admirably seconded by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder is merely saying what all knew beforehand. The trio itself made its never-failing beautiful and vivifying impression; here we have Schubert in his most characteristic and charming vein, and with something less than his usual prolixity.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert.

WE have heard the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and we are bound to confess that our opinion of him coincides perfectly with that expressed by our Boston colleagues. The first concert this season of the superb organization from Boston took place last Wednesday night at Music Hall, the auditorium of which is vastly more suitable for orchestral concerts than Chickering Hall. When Mr. Paur made his appearance to conduct Beethoven's immortal Fifth symphony he was accorded a hospitable, even a warm reception, and it did not stop there. He was called out several times in the evening and at the close of the performance. In a word, Mr. Paur was given a fair hearing, and although one concert has probably not revealed all of his possibilities as a conductor, he nevertheless gave us a taste of his quality and a very fair idea of his potentialities.

Mr. Emil Paur is a respectable but by no means a great conductor. He is no virtuoso, though very vigorous, and at first blush seemed more muscular than musical. He has, however, many excellent qualities to recommend him to our attention. There is no mistaking his beat. It is precise to harshness. His rhythmical feeling overbalances his poetic conception; he literally hews out his phrases and leaves you no doubt as to his intentions. But he is reverent, earnest and sincere to a fault. He has been trained in a very severe school—a school in which a sort of traditional truthfulness, even realism prevails at the expense of beauty.

In a word, Mr. Paur is hard, reserved to coldness and personally unsympathetic. Indeed, of the personal magnetism of his predecessor, Mr. Nikisch, he possesses absolutely nothing. He has the unyielding temperament of the Teuton. He would sacrifice all to the letter of the law, and let poor poetry knock in vain at the outer gate of our hearts. Europe has many such conductors, particularly in Germany. There they bear the respectable name of "Kappellmeister." America is not without their representatives, although they are by no means so many as a morning paper declared last week.

Mr. Paur is musicianly.

Mr. Paur is a great student. He gives you less of a "reading" than what might be called an anatomical demonstration in phrasing. You hear everything when he conducts, even if it does not sound beautifully. The cold, white light that he sheds over Beethoven does not warm you. It is too wintry; too scholastic. All the finesse and good taste which were the dominant traits of Mr. Gericke's conducting, Mr. Paur knows not, but he impresses you as having mastery over his men and getting from them what he wants. The only trouble about this is, that what he wants is not what we want. We should be tired, at least we have been told so by Boston critics, of magnetic conductors, of conductors who use the tempo rubato, of exaggerated and romantic readings, but nevertheless we cannot help drawing a fatal comparison between Mr. Paur and Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Nikisch is quite as much of an analyist as Mr. Paur. He may have sinned against the eternal verities of the classics, but he fascinated you by his warmth, luminosity and fiery temperament. Mr. Paur does not fascinate at all; to tell the truth he comes dangerously near boring one.

To give a new reading to the C minor symphony of Beethoven without violating its structural contents would be nowadays almost an impossibility; as great an impossibility as to dig a delve for a new interpretation of "Hamlet;" so we had a conventional performance of the symphony, except that it was played in rather a leaden, spiritless fashion with its phrases detached, the whole lacking in sweep and spontaneity. In the second movement the andante was mechanically well balanced as far as tone, and absolutely without poetry. The scherzo was respectable, while the last movement was the best played of the four. Its honest, straightforward themes suited Mr. Paur's style. Naturally a Dvorák composition would not be within the ken of this conductor, so the "Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2, in G minor, op. 45, was given without abandon or variety of moods and without color. It is a charming work, full of the fine, bold, free rapture of the Bohemian composer. The same may be said of the last number on the program, Hector Berlioz' overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

Mr. Paur has been spoken of as an excellent conductor for a male singing society. This is a one-sided criticism. To conduct a male singing society is no mere facile thing, as Mr. Van der Stucken will testify. But that Mr. Paur should be at the head of that superb band of Boston is we think a mistake in judgment on the part of Colonel Higginson.

We learn there has been no contract consummated between the new conductor and Colonel Higginson. This is lucky, for ten years of Paur would not only reduce the clientèle of this orchestra, but would also reduce the orchestra to a barrel organ condition of mechanical perfection and hard musical playing. Emma Eames was the singer on this occasion. She gave us Jules Massenet's aria, "Pleurez mez yeux," from "Le Cid," not a very interesting or inspired composition, and an aria from the "Marriage of Figaro." She sings with her old-time finish, and with more flavor. Her voice has lost none of its freshness, while it has gained considerably in volume and musical quality. She is more beautiful than ever. The consensus of opinion as to the merits of the new conductor is that he is an excellent musician, a sober and uninteresting leader. It may be that his angularity and awkwardness will wear off in time. Let us hope so at all events. The personnel of the orchestra is comparatively unchanged, Mr. Kneisel being at the first desk as usual, and even Mr. Paur's uncompromising beat could not rob the playing of the band of its elasticity and brilliancy. The second concert occurs December 14.

The Kneisel Quartet Plays.

THOSE four excellent artists, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Roth, Mr. Svecenski and Mr. Schroeder, who comprise the Kneisel Quartet, gave their first concert of the season at Chamber Music Hall, Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue. The program consisted of the first of Beethoven's Rasoumowski quartets, op. 59, No. 1 Haydn's quartet in G minor, op. 74, No. 3, and Brahms' beautiful quintet in F major, op. 88. Mr. Zach took the second viola part in the quintet. The finish and musical qualities of this unique organization were gratifyingly present. The club has never played better than it did on this occasion, and although the audience was small it made up in enthusiasm for its lack of numbers. The quintet is a remarkable piece of writing, lucid, full of musical meaning and interesting throughout. It goes without saying that it was almost perfectly played. The next concert will be given December 15.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. VIII. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 4, 1893. No. 192.

WE have had one or two good concerts already, but the music season in Brooklyn begins next week, and begins with éclat. Herr Seidl will lead his orchestra at the Academy on Thursday night. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Herr Emil Paur, the new director from Leipsic, will direct the rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the same place. Herr Seidl is engaged by the Seidl Society, which has been the sponsor for his enterprises here, and the Boston Orchestra comes "backed" by a wealthy banker in the Hub. With these guarantees the music of the week is certain to be good. Both orchestras are large. We know Herr Seidl and have always enjoyed his work, but the other gentleman has his reputation to make with us. So much of his fame has gone before him that nobody need have any fear in buying his tickets that he is not going to get his money's worth. His interpretation of the Fifth symphony of Beethoven, generally considered a test piece, and of some of Tschaikowsky's music will be waited with interest. The soloist with the Boston orchestra is Mme. Emma Eames. That for the Seidl Society concert will be Frau Materna. Both are well known as singers in opera, Mme. Eames in French and Italian and Frau Materna in German. Herr Seidl's bill is classic. It contains a short symphony by Mozart, an air from the opera "Fidelio," by Beethoven; Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," arranged by Herr Seidl for his orchestra; the "Tannhauser" overture by Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyl," by the same composer, and the prelude and finale to Wagner's opera of "Tristan and Isolde."

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. VIII. BROOKLYN, N. Y., NOV. 11, 1893. No. 193.

THIS (Saturday) night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Herr Emil Paur, will give its first evening concert in the Philharmonic season. The noble tone and exquisite shading of this great orchestra are what it has under all leaders. It is curiosity over the way Herr Paur is likely to employ it, not anxiety as to the effect he will make, that makes the interest of his début. Mme. Emma Eames and Herr Franz Kneisel are to be the soloists. Mme. Eames is a delightful singer.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 139.

THURSDAY, NOV. 16, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY IN NEWTON.

The first in a series of six concerts was given last evening at the clubhouse of the Newton Club at Newtonville by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Frank Kneisel, conductor. The assembly hall was well filled with representative society people of the city, and the programme was one of the finest that has been enjoyed in the new clubhouse.

The programme is appended:

Overture, "Oberon," Weber; andante, from the Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; (a) "Bridal Song," (b) "In the Garden," from the "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark; valse lente, Volkemann; scherzo, Goetz; entracte, from "Philemon and Bancis," Gounod; overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 5.

The Symphony Concert.

For the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, in Music Hall, the selections were Symphony, F-minor, op. 12, Richard Strauss; "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid," Massenet; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Ah! si la liberté, from "Armide," Gluck; and Academy Festival Overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mme. Emma Eames. The hall was packed, notwithstanding the unfavorable state of the weather. The Strauss symphony was heard here for the first time at this concert. It is a remarkable work for a young man not yet thirty years old. Its character is purely modern, and yet it is always interesting, despite an occasional tendency in the composer to prolixity. Its themes are very brief, but are strikingly melodious, and in their treatment the charm of tunefulness is never forgotten for any length of time, for even at his most recondite moments the composer recalls that he is not oblivious to the effect of grace and soulfulness. The work, as a whole, is original without having recourse to the current method of reaching that end through the vague and the extravagant. Very often the work suggests Mendelssohn, and sometimes Schumann, subjected to a process of extreme modernizing. The composer has a complete mastery over all the resources of modern orchestration, and his score is affluent in the richest and most impressive orchestral coloring. The opening movement is pervaded by a noble melancholy and holds the attention and the interest from beginning to end. The Scherzo is brilliantly new, and its orchestration is surprising in its intricacy, its piquancy and its effectiveness, while its clearness is delightful. The andante is dignified, but is perhaps something more labored in effect than are the other movements, and is prolonged beyond the capacity of its themes, to interest. It is immensely difficult, but was splendidly played. The finale is fiery and impassioned, and is worked out with great vigor and effect. Taken altogether, the symphony impressed us as among the very best that we have heard from the young composers of the new school. It was finely read and performed, and its interpretation afforded the most satisfying evidence that Mr. Paur has as yet given of his skill as a conductor, and of his command over his orchestra. The Saint-Saëns symphonic poem was exquisitely performed. It was possibly taken at too slow a tempo to bring out its characteristic swing, but the grace and the refinement of the reading and the warmth and beauty of its coloring were fairly fascinating. Mr. Paur continues to grow steadily in estimation, and it now seems beyond all question that he is a conductor who will wear well, and who is an acquisition of great value. Mme. Eames, who was welcomed heartily, sang the Massenet air very beautifully. Her lovely voice, her perfect tunefulness, the finish of her style, and her strong and chaste dramatic feeling made it very satisfying to listen to her. Her enunciation was clear, and the effort stamped her as a finished artist in music of this school. She fairly earned and deserved the applause and the four recalls that rewarded her. Vocally, her rendering of the Gluck air was faultless, but it was not a happy selection for her, as it requires a singer with a larger and more classic style than she possesses, to do it justice. It is a question, too, if the air is worth the singing. It is hopelessly antiquated, and it is not an example of the composer at his best. The principal fault in the interpretation was the discrepancy between the emphasis the artist gave the music at the expense of the sentiment of the words. She was warmly applauded and recalled after this effort. We must again pay tribute to the perfect and sympathetic manner in which Mr. Paur accompanies singers. The programme for the next concert, which will take place a week from next Saturday night, is, the "Jupiter" Symphony, Mozart; double concerto for violin and 'cello, Brahms, and Symphony in D, Haydn.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach, gave their first concert of the season in Chickering Hall. There was a fine audience present, and the performers received a very hearty welcome. The programme was: Quartet in G, op. 59, No. 1, Beethoven; Quartet, G-minor, op. 74, No. 3, Haydn; Quintet, F, op. 88, Brahms. The playing throughout was marked by the highest technical finish, precision and beauty of style, the highest point of interpretation being reached, perhaps, in the Haydn Quartet, which was given with a sympathetic warmth and a graceful simplicity that were charming in effect. The Quintet was also well read and performed. The work by Haydn brought forth the most applause, although that by Brahms met with scarcely less enthusiastic appreciation. The Beethoven Quartet, though ably rendered, and with remarkable clearness of phrasing, did not seem to make the impression that its brilliant interpretation deserved. The concert fully sustained the high reputation of the organization.

The Adamowski Quartet gave their first concert of the season in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon. The programme was: Quartet, B-flat, Haydn; Romanza for violin, Beethoven; Quartet, Bazzini, op. 70. The last named work was substituted for one by J. M. Weber, that was to have been performed, but was omitted by reason of the illness of Mr. Moldauer, whose place was taken by Mr. Otto Roth. The best work of the afternoon was in the performance of the Haydn Quartet, which was smooth, spirited and sympathetic. The Bazzini Quartet was carefully played, but, as was natural, the results of insufficient rehearsing made themselves felt. The playing of the Beethoven Romanza, by Mr. Adamowski, gave much pleasure to the audience, but the accompaniments were given in a manner that were equally original and startling.

The Musical and Dramatic World
AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY AT
NO. 8 EAST FIFTEENTH STREET, NEW YORK.
ARTHUR HORNBLOW,
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 15, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third musical feature of our last week was the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, which took place in the chamber music room at Music Hall on Friday evening. We must admit that we were heartily ashamed of the smallness of the audience. There was plenty of applause, to be sure; for C. M. Loeffler, Kneisel's desk-mate in the orchestra, Carlos Hasselbrink, Dr. Dvorak, a red-haired young lady who wore eye-glasses and read the score upside down, and the writer were very determined about waking that audience up. We are bound to confess, however, that it was old Papa Haydn, and not we who achieved the result.

The three numbers on the programme were Beethoven's F major quartet, opus 59, No. 1 (the one with the "Theme Russe" in the last movement), the Haydn quartet in C minor, opus 74, No. 3, and the Brahm's string quintet in F major, opus 88. No lover of chamber music could ask for a more delightful arrangement than this.

Beethoven's intense self-centred, complex style was excellently separated from the aggressive, exclamatory work of Brahm's by Papa Haydn's gay little burst of sunshine. Mr. Kneisel is a poet at programme-making.

As for the performance, we are at a loss for words of praise that will not sound extravagant. We can say with a clear conscience that it was the perfection of quartet-playing. The four members of the organization, Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder, are genuine virtuosi. All four are soloists of great ability, but they have learned the all-important lesson of making individuality subservient to the general effect. Their technical work is beyond criticism and their readings are musicianly and intelligent in the highest degree. In the Brahm's quintet they had excellent assistance from Mr. M. Zach, who played second viola.

F. C.

How to listen to Paur: with your eyes shut.

We are not such conductor-worshippers in the good town of Gotham as they are in Boston and Brooklyn. To be sure we have had our Thomasites, who swore that their king could do no wrong; and we have had our anti-Thomasites who always said, "Go to; he is asleep." But in Boston, where the Symphony Orchestra is the essential factor in the musical season, the personality of the conductor is a grave consideration.

First of all there is society, led toward the flowery paths of the muses by the only Mrs. "Jack" Gardiner and the only Searles. If Mrs. "Jack" does not approve of the conductor, then society is very likely to array itself on the side that is "'agin the government." If, however, "Mrs. Jack" is pleased to smile upon the conductor, society is with the authorities.

On the other hand it is now regarded as the correct thing to go to the Symphony Concerts, just as in New York it is deemed eminently proper to go to the opera. Society then is predisposed to approval, and if the conductor is not a persona grata there is trouble in the hearts of Mrs. "Jack" and all her kind.

I fancy there must be a good deal of trouble there now. Emil Paur, of Leipsic, is the cause thereof. Just look at it for a moment—I don't mean Paur by "it." Last season there was Nikisch, with an interesting countenance "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." His hair was full of gentle shadows and his eyes of semi-veiled melancholy. His hands were supple, lean, white, tapering and full of sinuous flexions. His baton moved at times in flashing arcs of light and again in dreamy, languorous curves. Like Archibald, the All-Right, he was very beautiful.

Look upon that picture and upon this. A man with a square jaw and high cheek bones; with a frowsy head of mahogany-colored hair; a ragged and ill-kept beard; a face which inevitably grows red and oleaginous under the exertion of conducting: and a down-beat which calls for the employment of arms, head and body in one dreadful jerk which threatens to dislocate something. That's Paur, of Leipsic.

Therefore I begin with this pertinent suggestion—how to listen to Paur: with your eyes shut.

Do not look at him. If you do you'll be sorry for it. Shut your eyes and drink in the music, but don't watch the conductor, unless you chance to be a German, in which case you will think him graceful.

But as I have already intimated, the personality of the conductor is of less importance to us than it is to the Bostonians. What concerns us most is to know whether Paur will maintain the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which we have learned to value very highly.

It is extremely early to form an opinion which is in the nature of a prediction, but I am seriously afraid that the new conductor will not do the orchestra any good.

The Bostonian body of players has always charmed us by the grace and daintiness, the polished elegance of its phrasing; by the superb solidity and richness of the tone of its strings; and by its minute variety of delicate and eloquent nuances of light and shade.

Already, it seems to me, the tone of the strings is less brilliant and refined, while the brass has become deficient in vibrancy. The infinite variety of shadings is dwindling, and the phrasing is stilted and elocutionary.

These things are the result of bad conductorship and nothing else. Mr. Paur is deadly heavy and slow. He dissects compositions and lays their articulated phrases before us as if he were giving a lesson in musical form, rather than a performance.

His reading of the fifth symphony of Beethoven was so bad that the audience at Music Hall last Wednesday evening became quite enthusiastic over it. The manner in which he treated the fundamental motive of the first movement, that remarkable root of melody which led Ries to exclaim, "Thus fate knocks at the portals," fully justified the irreverent remark of a cynical Bostonian after the first rehearsal: "Well, old schicksal fairly kicked the door in, didn't he?"

It is true. Fate did not knock at the portals. He kicked at them in the opening measure and presently smashed in the panels. My esteemed colleague of the Tribune has very justly noted that some of the mischief is due to our friend Richard Wagner's little book on conducting. I am sorry to offend Mr. Fink, but I am forced to admit that Wagner's unbridled criticism has done a good deal of harm. Beethoven's fermata was not played to suit Wagner, so he said, "Suppose the voice of Beethoven were heard from the grave admonishing a conductor:"

"'Hold my fermata firmly, terribly! * * * The very life blood of the tone shall be extracted to the last drop.'" And more of the same sort.

Mr. Paur appears to have got that passage by heart. But he undoubtedly forgot to note that Wagner was setting up a man of straw that he might knock him him down again. Says Wagner, after concluding his suppositious Titural-speech of Beethoven: "Suppose a conductor were to attempt to hold a fermata as here directed, what would be the result? A miserable failure."

More than that, this heavy and deliberate method of reading worked its way through Mr. Paur's entire interpretation, and he did not recover from it in his readings of Dr. Dvorak's first Slavonic rhapsody and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. There was no daintiness in the rhapsody, and no foam on Berlioz's sea of sound. It was what sailors call an "old sea"—a glassy swell, in other words.

The soloist of the concert was Mme. Emma Eames-Story, whose latest portrait appeared on the first page of last week's issue of this paper. Her numbers were "Pleurez mes yeux" from Massenet's "Le Cid" and "Non so pi" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

The stately soprano had all her dignity with her, but not quite all her voice. In fact she was not in the best of voice and her phrasing was at times rude. But this is the only respect in which she fell short of expectation.

I confess I failed to note the broadening and deepening of style of which we have been told. But the lovely quality of voice—a voice that has character—and the easy production were still there. Mme. Eames is certainly a cool and statuesque singer, but her style is very free from technical faults.

There was a noticeable French element in the audience at the first Boston Symphony Concert. I wondered whether it was the announcement of an aria by Massenet or the form of Emma Eames that attracted the Gauls. Judging from the energetic chatter which went on when the prima donna appeared, she was the magnet.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 142.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert Director Emil Paur brought forward Gluck, Brahms and Mozart as the composers of the occasion, the works chosen being Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" in C major, Brahms' concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, op. 102, and Mozart's symphony in C major ("Jupiter").

The interest of the evening centred in the appearance of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder as the solo players in the Brahms concerto, and, although to those who question the policy of admitting the absolute value of everything written by Mr. Brahm the wisdom of the expenditure of time and trouble in the performance of this work was open to question, it was evident that the superior analytical powers of the audience, as a whole, discovered rare beauties in the construction of the work and enjoyed its performance immensely. Both the players of the solo parts commanded the applause which rewarded their efforts by their admirable work.

The Mozart symphony was heard with immense gratification after the concerto, as the beauty of its flowing melodies made its hearing a continued source of pleasure. Mr. Paur gave the work a magnificent interpretation, and brought out the grand features of the final movement with masterly effect.

The arrangement of the Gluck overture used was that by Richard Wagner, and the reading of this classical overture displayed the sterling worth of Mr. Paur's abilities as a conductor to the greatest advantage.

Mrs. Emil Paur makes her American debut as a solo pianist at the concert next Saturday evening when the programme will consist of Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1; the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz's three movements from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

The Hebrew Journal.
124 EAST 14th STREET,
NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 17.

Herr Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have come to this country via Boston. Had he arrived at this port, Commissioner Senner, who is also a musical critic, would surely have detained him at Ellis Island, and compelled him to prove that he is an artist.

At his debut the other night, he did not, I am sorry to say, succeed in proving anything of the kind.

He, certainly, is the most awkward conductor I ever saw. He may be a great musical scholar, but even with this band of virtuosi under him, his interpretation of the Fifth Symphony was, as a German sitting next to me expressed it: Ach so langweilig

Herr Paur appears here only a half a dozen times in the course of the season, and we are not in any way dependent upon him for our supply of classical music His shortcomings do not, therefore, greatly interest us. The Boston critics, however, who found fault with Arthur Nikisch for making his programmes too classical—for not sufficiently encouraging the native composer—for not playing Hail Columbia," or After the Ball—will find that "the punishment fits the crime."

In order that their punishment may bring about atonement and better behavior in the future, they should have Paur unmitigated. Let not a visit from Seidl or Damrosch alleviate their sufferings.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Pleasing Programme Given in Music Hall Last Evening.

The fifth Symphony Concert was given last evening in Music Hall, when the following programme was presented: Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Brahms's concerto for violin and violoncello, op. 102, and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

Gluck's overture was the Wagner arrangement and was played in a masterly manner. The soloists in the concerto were Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder, whose efforts were loudly applauded by the members of the orchestra as well as the audience. The second movement was particularly well done, while the third movement, vivace non troppo, displayed the skill and musical taste of both soloists.

The "Jupiter" symphony was the most pleasing number. It is not unfamiliar to the patrons of these concerts, but it is doubtful if it was ever rendered in a more satisfactory manner. The first movement, with its beautiful themes, was exquisitely given, the strings being particularly fine, and the ending was full of force and spirit. The second movement, where the violins and violas are muted, was rendered with the same good taste, and marked contrasts, with which this portion of the symphony abounds, were magnificently brought out. The minuet followed for the third movement, and the famous finale concluded the entertaining programme.

At the rehearsal and the concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the selections will be Schumann's symphony in B major; Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," for the piano and orchestra; three movements from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," and Liszt's symphony poem "Fest Klaenge." Mrs. Emil Paur, wife of the conductor, will be the soloist.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was: Symphony, C, ("Jupiter"), Mozart; Concerto for Violin and Violincello, A-minor, Brahms; Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," (Wagner's arrangement), Gluck. The overture was elaborately read, and with such a variety of emphasis and contrast in color effect, that it is doubtful if Gluck would have recognized his own work, could he have heard it. The performance was thoroughly impressive, but the broad dignity and the frank simplicity of the overture melted away under the excess of effects that were crowded into it. Its almost cold classicality was changed to a warm, modern romanticism, and it was subjected generally to a treatment of which Gluck could not have even dreamed. This bringing down to date the works of the older masters is to reprehended on the ground that it utterly misrepresents them. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully played, and on the whole, with admirable judgment in regard to the pace of the different movements. It is true that Mr. Paur, in his earnest desire to bring out all that there is in the work, somewhat overloaded it with contrasts in effect. As in the overture too much modern color was forced into the Symphony, and the natural flow of the music was checked by the constantly recurring alternations in dynamic effects that were injected into it every now and then, at important moments; the continuity was interrupted and an impression of disjointedness resulted. It was evidently the intention of Mr. Paur to give a warm and fluent interpretation of the work, but the deliberate elaboration produced quite a contrary effect, and for once Mozart sounded cold;—very finished, very smooth and very proper, but cold, nevertheless. In fact, it was more of a formal analysis, in which every point was brought out with prominence in order to show that it was there, than a reading swayed by the obvious spirit of the music. It was a dissection of the work, made by one who had informed himself of the exact place of every nerve, muscle and vital organ, the veins filled with red wax to enable one to distinguish their forms and their course. This is scarcely the manner in which Mozart is to be shown. One at last becomes ear-weary of the affluence of delicate pianissimo effects, and longs for the music to be permitted to flow readily and simply. The playing was very beautiful throughout, and the always astonishing fugue in the finale came out with exceptional clearness and brilliancy. The novelty of the programme was the Brahms concerto. This is undoubtedly a fine composition, but, as it seemed to us, there is too much of it, and there were moments when we could have wished that the solo instruments had less of nothing in particular to do except setting forth difficult passages of no especial moment. The first and the second movements are the best; but, even here, it struck us that the orchestral moments, when the soloists are at rest, are the strongest and most interesting portions of the concerto. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists, and they acquitted themselves of their difficult tasks with their familiar skill in regard to perfection of technique and solidity of style. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Schumann; "Wanderer" Fantasy for piano and orchestra, Schubert-Liszt; three movements from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Symphonic Poem, "Festklaenge," Liszt. Mrs. Emil Paur is to be the soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its second concert of the season in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday night. The novelty of the programme was a quartet in E minor, by Smetana. The work is original, effective and pleasing, though it is curiously in antagonism with what is generally known as the "quartet style." The classical form is rigidly adhered to, but the themes and their treatment are startling in their unconventionality and in the narrow line that sometimes separates them from the baldly commonplace. And yet, in spite of this, the work lies interesting in the hearing, and its tunefulness is notably piquant. The inherent fault of the work was in its lack of the dignity that is one of the received essentials of the string quartet, pure and simple, and perhaps also in a certain suggestion that it was thought out orchestrally rather than in the true spirit of chamber music. Still, if a composer chooses to conceive quartets in this manner, there is no reason why he should not do so, only he should make it clear that it is not his intention that his music shall be classed with the quartet as it is usually understood. As it seems to us, the work belongs to the category of music that is written for the string orchestra, and that it would be less open to criticism in such a connection than it is in the light in which it was presented on this occasion. Schubert's trio in E-flat, for piano and strings, followed, Mrs. Ernst Paur performing the piano part. Mrs. Paur, who was very cordially welcomed, played with a clearness, a precision, and a frankness, together with a freedom from affectation that were thoroughly admirable. Her touch is crisp and certain and she plays without seeming effort. Her tone is light, and in point of expresiveness her style appeared to be somewhat colorless, but the straightforwardness and the sincerity that distinguished her work entitle it to respectful consideration. She was enthusiastically applauded and evidently won the heartiest approval of her audience. The other selection was Beethoven's quartet in C, op. 18, No. 2. The playing throughout was fully up to the best standard of the artists.

The Adamowski Quartet will give their second concert of the season, in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon. The programme is: Quartet, B-minor, J. M. Weber; Andante from quartet, A-major, Beethoven; Quinet for piano and strings, Dvorak. Mr. A Whiting will be the pianist. Tickets may be had at Music Hall.

The Musical and Dramatic World
AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY AT
NO. 8 EAST FIFTEENTH STREET, NEW YORK.
ARTHUR HORNBLOW,
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 15, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third musical feature of our last week was the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, which took place in the chamber music room at Music Hall on Friday evening. We must admit that we were heartily ashamed of the smallness of the audience. There was plenty of applause, to be sure; for C. M. Loeffler, Kneisel's desk-mate in the orchestra, Carlos Hasselbrink, Dr. Dvorak, a red-haired young lady who wore eye-glasses and read the score upside down, and the writer were very determined about waking that audience up. We are bound to confess, however, that it was old Papa Haydn, and not we who achieved the result.

The three numbers on the programme were Beethoven's F major quartet, opus 59, No. 1 (the one with the "Theme Russe" in the last movement), the Haydn quartet in C minor, opus 74, No. 3, and the Brahm's string quintet in F major, opus 88. No lover of chamber music could ask for a more delightful arrangement than this.

Beethoven's intense self-centred, complex style was excellently separated from the aggressive, exclamatory work of Brahm's by Papa Haydn's gay little burst of sunshine. Mr. Kneisel is a poet at programme-making.

As for the performance, we are at a loss for words of praise that will not sound extravagant. We can say with a clear conscience that it was the perfection of quartet-playing. The four members of the organization, Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder, are genuine virtuosi. All four are soloists of great ability, but they have learned the all-important lesson of making individuality subservient to the general effect. Their technical work is beyond criticism and their readings are musicianly and intelligent in the highest degree. In the Brahm's quintet they had excellent assistance from Mr. M. Zach, who played second viola.

F. C.

How to listen to Paur: with your eyes shut.

We are not such conductor-worshippers in the good town of Gotham as they are in Boston and Brooklyn. To be sure we have had our Thomasites, who swore that their king could do no wrong; and we have had our anti-Thomasites who always said, "Go to; he is asleep." But in Boston, where the Symphony Orchestra is the essential factor in the musical season, the personality of the conductor is a grave consideration.

First of all there is society, led toward the flowery paths of the muses by the only Mrs. "Jack" Gardiner and the only Searles. If Mrs. "Jack" does not approve of the conductor, then society is very likely to array itself on the side that is "'agin the government." If, however, "Mrs. Jack" is pleased to smile upon the conductor, society is with the authorities.

On the other hand it is now regarded as the correct thing to go to the Symphony Concerts, just as in New York it is deemed eminently proper to go to the opera. Society then is predisposed to approval, and if the conductor is not a persona grata there is trouble in the hearts of Mrs. "Jack" and all her kind.

I fancy there must be a good deal of trouble there now. Emil Paur, of Leipsic, is the cause thereof. Just look at it for a moment—I don't mean Paur by "it." Last season there was Nikisch, with an interesting countenance "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought." His hair was full of gentle shadows and his eyes of semi-veiled melancholy. His hands were supple, lean, white, tapering and full of sinuous flexions. His baton moved at times in flashing arcs of light and again in dreamy, languorous curves. Like Archibald, the All-Right, he was very beautiful.

Look upon that picture and upon this. A man with a square jaw and high cheek bones; with a frowsy head of mahogany-colored hair; a ragged and ill-kept beard; a face which inevitably grows red and oleaginous under the exertion of conducting: and a down-beat which calls for the employment of arms, head and body in one dreadful jerk which threatens to dislocate something. That's Paur, of Leipsic.

Therefore I begin with this pertinent suggestion—how to listen to Paur: with your eyes shut.

Do not look at him. If you do you'll be sorry for it. Shut your eyes and drink in the music, but don't watch the conductor, unless you chance to be a German, in which case you will think him graceful.

But as I have already intimated, the personality of the conductor is of less importance to us than it is to the Bostonians. What concerns us most is to know whether Paur will maintain the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which we have learned to value very highly.

It is extremely early to form an opinion which is in the nature of a prediction, but I am seriously afraid that the new conductor will not do the orchestra any good.

The Bostonian body of players has always charmed us by the grace and daintiness, the polished elegance of its phrasing; by the superb solidity and richness of the tone of its strings; and by its minute variety of delicate and eloquent nuances of light and shade.

Already, it seems to me, the tone of the strings is less brilliant and refined, while the brass has become deficient in vibrancy. The infinite variety of shadings is dwindling, and the phrasing is stilted and elocutionary.

These things are the result of bad conductorship and nothing else. Mr. Paur is deadly heavy and slow. He dissects compositions and lays their articulated phrases before us as if he were giving a lesson in musical form, rather than a performance.

His reading of the fifth symphony of Beethoven was so bad that the audience at Music Hall last Wednesday evening became quite enthusiastic over it. The manner in which he treated the fundamental motive of the first movement, that remarkable root of melody which led Ries to exclaim, "Thus fate knocks at the portals," fully justified the irreverent remark of a cynical Bostonian after the first rehearsal: "Well, old schicksal fairly kicked the door in, didn't he?"

It is true. Fate did not knock at the portals. He kicked at them in the opening measure and presently smashed in the panels. My esteemed colleague of the Tribune has very justly noted that some of the mischief is due to our friend Richard Wagner's little book on conducting. I am sorry to offend Mr. Fink, but I am forced to admit that Wagner's unbridled criticism has done a good deal of harm. Beethoven's fermata was not played to suit Wagner, so he said, "Suppose the voice of Beethoven were heard from the grave admonishing a conductor:"

"'Hold my fermata firmly, terribly! * * * The very life blood of the tone shall be extracted to the last drop.'" And more of the same sort.

Mr. Paur appears to have got that passage by heart. But he undoubtedly forgot to note that Wagner was setting up a man of straw that he might knock him him down again. Says Wagner, after concluding his suppositious Titural-speech of Beethoven: "Suppose a conductor were to attempt to hold a fermata as here directed, what would be the result? A miserable failure."

More than that, this heavy and deliberate method of reading worked its way through Mr. Paur's entire interpretation, and he did not recover from it in his readings of Dr. Dvorak's first Slavonic rhapsody and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture. There was no daintiness in the rhapsody, and no foam on Berlioz's sea of sound. It was what sailors call an "old sea"—a glassy swell, in other words.

The soloist of the concert was Mme. Emma Eames-Story, whose latest portrait appeared on the first page of last week's issue of this paper. Her numbers were "Pleurez mes yeux" from Massenet's "Le Cid" and "Non so pi" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

The stately soprano had all her dignity with her, but not quite all her voice. In fact she was not in the best of voice and her phrasing was at times rude. But this is the only respect in which she fell short of expectation.

I confess I failed to note the broadening and deepening of style of which we have been told. But the lovely quality of voice—a voice that has character—and the easy production were still there. Mme. Eames is certainly a cool and statuesque singer, but her style is very free from technical faults.

There was a noticeable French element in the audience at the first Boston Symphony Concert. I wondered whether it was the announcement of an aria by Massenet or the form of Emma Eames that attracted the Gauls. Judging from the energetic chatter which went on when the prima donna appeared, she was the magnet.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 142.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert Director Emil Paur brought forwar Gluck, Brahms and Mozart as the composers of the occasion, the works chosen being Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" in C major, Brahms' concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, op. 102, and Mozart's symphony in C major ("Jupiter").

The interest of the evening centred in the appearance of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder as the solo players in the Brahms concerto, and, although to those who question the policy of admitting the absolute value of everything written by Mr. Brahm the wisdom of the expenditure of time and trouble in the performance of this work was open to question, it was evident that the superior analytical powers of the audience, as a whole, discovered rare beauties in the construction of the work and enjoyed its performance immensely. Both the players of the solo parts commanded the applause which rewarded their efforts by their admirable work.

The Mozart symphony was heard with immense gratification after the concerto, as the beauty of its flowing melodies made its hearing a continued source of pleasure. Mr. Paur gave the work a magnificent interpretation, and brought out the grand features of the final movement with masterly effect.

The arrangement of the Gluck overture used was that by Richard Wagner, and the reading of this classical overture displayed the sterling worth of Mr. Paur's abilities as a conductor to the greatest advantage.

Mrs. Emil Paur makes her American debut as a solo pianist at the concert next Saturday evening when the programme will consist of Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1; the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz's three movements from symphony "Romeo and Juliet," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

The Hebrew Journal.
124 EAST 14th STREET,
NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 17.

Herr Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must have come to this country via Boston. Had he arrived at this port, Commissioner Senner, who is also a musical critic, would surely have detained him at Ellis Island, and compelled him to prove that he is an artist.

At his debut the other night, he did not, I am sorry to say, succeed in proving anything of the kind.

He, certainly, is the most awkward conductor I ever saw. He may be a great musical scholar, but even with this band of virtuosi under him, his interpretation of the Fifth Symphony was, as a German sitting next to me expressed it: Ach so langweilig

Herr Paur appears here only a half a dozen times in the course of the season, and we are not in any way dependent upon him for our supply of classical music His shortcomings do not, therefore, greatly interest us. The Boston critics, however, who found fault with Arthur Nikisch for making his programmes too classical—for not sufficiently encouraging the native composer—for not playing Hail Columbia,* or After the Ball—will find that "the punishment fits the crime."

In order that their punishment may bring about atonement and better behavior in the future, they should have Paur unmitigated. Let not a visit from Seidl or Damrosch alleviate their sufferings.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Pleasing Programme Given in Music Hall Last Evening.

The fifth Symphony Concert was given last evening in Music Hall, when the following programme was presented: Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide"; Brahms's concerto for violin and violoncello, op. 102, and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

Gluck's overture was the Wagner arrangement and was played in a masterly manner. The soloists in the concerto were Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder, whose efforts were loudly applauded by the members of the orchestra as well as the audience. The second movement was particularly well done, while the third movement, vivace non troppo, displayed the skill and musical taste of both soloists.

The "Jupiter" symphony was the most pleasing number. It is not unfamiliar to the patrons of these concerts, but it is doubtful if it was ever rendered in a more satisfactory manner. The first movement, with its beautiful themes, was exquisitely given, the strings being particularly fine, and the ending was full of force and spirit. The second movement, where the violins and violas are muted, was rendered with the same good taste, and marked contrasts, with which this portion of the symphony abounds, were magnificently brought out. The minuet followed for the third movement, and the famous finale concluded the entertaining programme.

At the rehearsal and the concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the selections will be Schumann's symphony in B major; Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasy," for the piano and orchestra; three movements from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," and Liszt's symphony poem "Fest Klaenge." Mrs. Emil Paur, wife of the conductor, will be the soloist.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was: Symphony, C, ("Jupiter"), Mozart; Concerto for Violin and Violincello, A-minor, Brahms; Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," (Wagner's arrangement), Gluck. The overture was elaborately read, and with such a variety of emphasis and contrast in color effect, that it is doubtful if Gluck would have recognized his own work, could he have heard it. The performance was thoroughly impressive, but the broad dignity and the frank simplicity of the overture melted away under the excess of effects that were crowded into it. Its almost cold classicality was changed to a warm, modern romanticism, and it was subjected generally to a treatment of which Gluck could not have even dreamed. This bringing down to date the works of the older masters is to reprehended on the ground that it utterly misrepresents them. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully played, and on the whole, with admirable judgment in regard to the pace of the different movements. It is true that Mr. Paur, in his earnest desire to bring out all that there is in the work, somewhat overloaded it with contrasts in effect. As in the overture too much modern color was forced into the Symphony, and the natural flow of the music was checked by the constantly recurring alternations in dynamic effects that were injected into it every now and then, at important moments; the continuity was interrupted and an impression of disjointedness resulted. It was evidently the intention of Mr. Paur to give a warm and fluent interpretation of the work, but the deliberate elaboration produced quite a contrary effect, and for once Mozart sounded cold;—very finished, very smooth and very proper, but cold, nevertheless. In fact, it was more of a formal analysis, in which every point was brought out with prominence in order to show that it was there, than a reading swayed by the obvious spirit of the music. It was a dissection of the work, made by one who had informed himself of the exact place of every nerve, muscle and vital organ, the veins filled with red wax to enable one to distinguish their forms and their course. This is scarcely the manner in which Mozart is to be shown. One at last becomes ear-weary of the affluence of delicate pianissimo effects, and longs for the music to be permitted to flow readily and simply. The playing was very beautiful throughout, and the always astonishing fugue in the finale came out with exceptional clearness and brilliancy. The novelty of the programme was the Brahms concerto. This is undoubtedly a fine composition, but, as it seemed to us, there is too much of it, and there were moments when we could have wished that the solo instruments had less of nothing in particular to do except setting forth difficult passages of no especial moment. The first and the second movements are the best; but, even here, it struck us that the orchestral moments, when the soloists are at rest, are the strongest and most interesting portions of the concerto. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists, and they acquitted themselves of their difficult tasks with their familiar skill in regard to perfection of technique and solidity of style. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Schumann; "Wanderer" Fantasy for piano and orchestra, Schubert-Liszt; three movements from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Symphonic Poem, "Festklaenge," Liszt. Mrs. Emil Paur is to be the soloist.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its second concert of the season in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday night. The novelty of the programme was a quartet in E minor, by Smetana. The work is original, effective and pleasing, though it is curiously in antagonism with what is generally known as the "quartet style." The classical form is rigidly adhered to, but the themes and their treatment are startling in their unconventionality and in the narrow line that sometimes separates them from the baldly commonplace. And yet, in spite of this, the work lies interesting in the hearing, and its tunefulness is notably piquant. The inherent fault of the work was in its lack of the dignity that is one of the received essentials of the string quartet, pure and simple, and perhaps also in a certain suggestion that it was thought out orchestrally rather than in the true spirit of chamber music. Still, if a composer chooses to conceive quartets in this manner, there is no reason why he should not do so, only he should make it clear that it is not his intention that his music shall be classed with the quartet as it is usually understood. As it seems to us, the work belongs to the category of music that is written for the string orchestra, and that it would be less open to criticism in such a connection than it is in the light in which it was presented on this occasion. Schubert's trio in E-flat, for piano and strings, followed, Mrs. Ernst Paur performing the piano part. Mrs. Paur, who was very cordially welcomed, played with a clearness, a precision, and a frankness, together with a freedom from affectation that were thoroughly admirable. Her touch is crisp and certain and she plays without seeming effort. Her tone is light, and in point of expresiveness her style appeared to be somewhat colorless, but the straightforwardness and the sincerity that distinguished her work entitle it to respectful consideration. She was enthusiastically applauded and evidently won the heartiest approval of her audience. The other selection was Beethoven's quartet in C, op. 18, No. 2. The playing throughout was fully up to the best standard of the artists.

The Adamowski Quartet will give their second concert of the season, in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon. The programme is: Quartet, B-minor, J. M. Weber; Andante from quartet, A-major, Beethoven; Quinct for piano and strings, Dvorak. Mr. A Whiting will be the pianist. Tickets may be had at Music Hall.

[46]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1893.

THE WEEK'S MANY CONCERTS, SYMPHONY CHAMBER, ETC.

The week in music began bright and early on Monday evening with the second of the Kneisel Quartette series, which quite filled Chickering Hall. The attractions of a hitherto unheard quartette by Smetana counted for something; but the chief interest centred in the debut of Mrs. Emil Paur, who brought with her an excellent reputation as a pianist. That reputation is well founded as her share of the Schubert trio in E-flat major, opus 100, demonstrated clearly. How far and wide her talent and her art may extend, cannot be determined from this one hearing; but that she is an admirable ensemble player, is certain. She devoted herself unobstrusively to the work as a whole, regarding its proportions above her personal part in it and accepting applause only with her two coadjutors. Her playing is sound and honest, well balanced in tone and touch, clear, although not quite brilliant in execution, full and without effort to force a great volume, sensible in phrasing and particularly careful in accentuation and rhythm. The simplicity of her manner and her evident wish to be an artist among artists, enhanced the pleasure she gave and won her individual esteem in addition to approbation for her musicianly qualities.

The Smetana quartette is interesting and would bear an early repetition. It is strange and perplexing at times, and then again it has a curious, wild beauty. In some of the music a restless figure rolls to and fro almost incessantly under the smoothly moving upper voices. A peculiar preference is shown for the deep, strenuous tones of the viola and for the searching ones of the 'cello, which appear not only in support of the themes in the full concord of instruments, but in long, detached recitativa-like passages. There are many unexpected and almost inexplicable expressions, and yet they hardly seem foreign to the general spirit of the work. The first movement does not produce the effect of an allegro, although it is one; the finale has a touch of the ballabile about it, and like the second—which is ingeniously developed along the rhythms of the Bohemian polka—seems more like the germ of an orchestral movement than an intentional assignment to chamber music. The slow movement shows less originality than the other three, but has its own interest. The quartette is short, and must have been found stimulating even by those who did not follow or approve all its diversities. The third number on the programme was Beethoven's quartette in G major, opus 18, brief, beautiful and beloved. The audience was in absolute sympathy with the players and called them forward after every movement. As for the playing itself, the comment of the captious New York Tribune on the club's recent concert in that city may be quoted as just and expressive of Monday evening's work:

For a revelation of perfect loveliness in the province of chamber music no organization in the country holds out a richer promise than the Kneisel Quartet. The playing of the club was as near perfection as one could wish, and it was almost as delightful as listening to the music to watch the play of pleasurable emotions on the faces of the listeners. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates is exquisitely true in intonation, and their readings of the music of the masters are as reverential, as eloquent, as beautiful and truthful as they are lucid and intelligent.

Mr. Paur's second thoughts about his fifth programme were better than his first ones. Accordingly the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony was put at the foot of the bill at last night's Symphony, the double concerto of Brahms kept its central place, the Haydn symphony was withdrawn, and the concert began with Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture.

Considering his programme per se, there is almost nothing to be said. The overture and the symphony are such ancient acquaintances that they can come for the welcome given to strangers before only the newest subscribers to Boston concerts and may be set down as among the "educational" features of the season. The concerto is unfamiliar, being among its author's comparatively recent compositions, of course, but Boston has heard enough from and about Brahms during the past few years to be able to cope in some degree of ease with his peculiar characteristics as therein shown—his sufficiency of distinct thematic material, his disposition toward shifting rhythms and accents, his learned and often obtuse thematic development and his sturdy and occasionally passionate insistence upon his ideas and their elaboration. The presentation of two solo instruments, although no modern novelty, is not unusual, and on the one hand gives a composer greater scope in his writing, while on the other it offers at once to the musician more food for thought and to laymen more occupation and entertainment. Mr. Paur is just the director for Brahms, because he has at once the exactitude of perception and the fixed delivery which insure the clear conveyance of form and figure and the energy and heat requisite for the more emphatic assertiveness of the composer.

That Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder read the violin and 'cello parts to perfection, hardly needs to be said. Each is a principal artist in his line, uniting to complete virtuosity, the scholar's knowledge and the artist's style.

The concerto pleases as a whole, although there are some strange jars between the parts at times—dissonances running mad, as one might say—and some short passages which cannot real please any but those who admire Brahms through thick and thin. But the slow movement is redundant in beauty and sweetness.

The overture was fairly and squarely read and with no little play of feeling, and the symphony was respectfully and consistently treated, barring, in the first movement, a few lingering delays and over-urgent accents upon an odd bar here and there.

Next week the Symphony audience will have the pleasure, already provided for at the Kneisel and Apolo concerts, of hearing Mr. Paur, who will play (with orchestra) Liszt's "Wanderer" Fantasy. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's first symphony, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Liszt's poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 19, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Two events of novelty were announced for the second of this quartette's concerts last Monday evening: one was a rendering of Smetana's E minor quartette for strings, the other the appearance as pianist of Mrs. Emil Paur, wife of our Symphony conductor. Both events proved to be very interesting to the audience. Indeed, the task which Mrs. Paur undertook, as well as the manner in which she performed that task, must at once allay any suspicion that certain disagreeable phases of the Nikisch régime are to be reproduced under the new dispensation. It is true that Mrs. Paur did not give a warm and wholly sympathetic rendering of the very familiar work—Schubert's piano trio in E flat—in which she had part. There were evidences, too, of a slight nervousness throughout the performance. But there was not the slightest evidence of inability to meet the demands which the long work makes on the technique and endurance of the artist; nor was there evidence of anything except the most complete artistic sincerity and the most thorough understanding of a player's duties toward the composer and toward the assisting players. In short, Mrs. Paur may be sure of a hearty welcome to the not too full ranks of excellent chamber concert pianists in Boston.

Smetana was Dvorak's teacher. If Smetana's expression of his ideas about music was as clear as his expression of his ideas in music, Dvorak had an exceedingly good teacher. It was certainly a man who knew thoroughly what he was about, who wrote the quartette we heard as an opening number last Monday. Each movement was a well balanced whole, and the quartette, as a whole, was begun boldly and was led to a fitting conclusion with bold and unswerving power. In fact, "Be bold, be bold," might have served as a motto for the composition; but the American listener would have been inclined, I am sure, to add the conclusion, "but not too bold," as a warning to the composer at many points in the course of the work. We do n't quarrel with the numerous sudden—and, for that matter, not always clever—changes of key which the composer makes; but we do object to the frightful overdoing of the forte of which he renders himself guilty. We might almost imagine ourselves in an Italian theatre at a rendering of an earlier Verdi opera, so uniformly intense is the volume of tone and the consequent drain on the emotional system. We know that Smetana meant it to be so. He was a Bohemian, and that is the way people enjoy themselves in Bohemia. But the American would like to revise the expression marks of every such work which he hears.

It was well, then, that this work came to us while we were fresh, and was followed by two very familiar and very delightful numbers,—for the G major quartette of Beethoven's first set, op. 18, closed the concert. The audience was, then, able to be interestedly attentive to Smetana's intensity, and applauded each movement vigorously. The players achieved a marvel of purity in intonation in their presentation of the many chromatic intricacies of the work. Such playing may almost be said to annihilate intricacy, since it makes it possible for the listener to see at once what the composer means. The work did not sound well at all times. Smetana often asks a fortissimo of a single stringed instrument which certainly no less than ten instruments in unison could clothe with a volume of tone sufficient to overpower the scratchiness. But, again, we are sure that he wanted the intensity, and was willing to let the scratchiness come, as come it must. Or it is just possible that his deafness, which finally became complete, may have caused him to lose his bearings in such matters. After all is said, however, the work is interesting, and we should like to prepare ourselves, by plenteous repose and suitable diet, to hear it again. We have only to add, concerning its performance, that Mr. Svecenski found opportunity to do some splendidly virile viola playing.

The next concert will occur on Dec. 4.

THE AMUSEMENT GLOBE.

Nov. 15 - 1893.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a splendid welcome when it came to Music Hall last Wednesday evening. Mr. Paur, the new conductor, then made his first appearance in this city. The management is to be congratulated on making a change of its base of operations to Music Hall. The attendance at the concert was large enough, doubtless, to have proved the wisdom of the change. It may be said of the work of the orchestra that it was thoroughly artistic, and that it confirmed the organization in its superiority over every other similar band in the country.

* * *

By the way, there was quite a surprise for the musical people of Boston, when that organization gave its first concert, some ten or twelve years ago. And I think I'll have to tell a story that begins even back of and beyond that period. Somewhere about 1877 or 1878, there were two or three very promising young girl singers in Boston, who appeared in classical concerts, subscription affairs, and the like, and of whom musical Bostonians were very proud. To be exact, there were two of them who were rather more promising than the others. Presently these two had their "farewell benefit" on the eve of their departure for Europe. Each departed in quest of good instruction and the broadening of her musical knowledge and taste. Both were pretty, attractive and ambitious, and each had a good voice. One went to London, and began to study under the direction of George Henschel, a young Prussian, who had come into notice as a singer, composer, teacher and musical director, quite a strong combination of abilities, you must admit; but the strange thing about it was that the abilities were very evenly distributed. A year or two later the young woman returned to Boston, amazingly developed as a singer, with a voice suitable for small halls, rather than for large ones, and her teacher came along with her, to take a look at Boston; also to marry his pupil, whom he had already wooed and won.

* * *

Well, Henschel sang two or three times in the "Hub;" directed a concert or two; and did various things, as the opportunity offered, which proved him to be a splendid musician in every sense of the word. Presently a magnificent opportunity fell in his way. The petty squabbles of two or three musical organizations prompted a wealthy banker to provide the money for the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the position of director was offered to Henschel. There was no limit to the banker's purse, apparently, for when it was decided that the famous old Music Hall was the only place suitable for the orchestra's concerts, he promptly purchased the property at a cost of some hundreds of thousands of dollars, in order that nothing should interfere with the development of the plan. Of course Henschel accepted the position of director, for a carte blanche accompanied it. He engaged as many musicians as he pleased, arranged his program as he liked, and in every way proceeded as if he himself were paying the cost of the affair.

* * *

At length the new orchestra gave its first concert, and then came the surprise. The musicians were grouped in a manner entirely new. There were something like eighty of them, a big lot, for that day. They played in a manner that startled some of the conventional old chaps in the audience, who always kept their index fingers on the score. But they played in a style which "set the pace" for the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present day. I remember well something that struck me then as an oddity. Henschel had the scores of the music at the director's desk, but he never looked at them. He said to me afterwards: "A man who is not sufficiently familiar with the music of his program to direct a performance without the scores, is not fit to pose as director."

* * *

Well, there was a great controversy among the musical writers. Lots of them were offended at the innovations, while others applauded them. But Henschel remained as leader for four years, and his work made it possible for his successors to bring the orchestra to its present condition. He found time, also, to inaugurate a series of recitals in which he and Mrs. Henschel were the principal performers, which has continued at intervals ever since, with great profit to him and great enjoyment to thousands of music-loving people, in New York as well as in Boston.

* * *

So, in a sense, we owe the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the ambition of that young Boston girl, who went abroad to study. The other girl, by the way, is not unknown in musical circles. She is the present wife of Henry Mapleson—not the famous opera manager of ten years ago, but his son—and is known on the stage as Laura Schirmer-Mapleson. She is now singing in The Fencing Master.

* * *

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1893.

The Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two composers of world-wide reputation died lately, Gounod and Tschaikowsky.

It is a matter of surprise and regret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not recognized this fact in any way whatsoever.

In certain towns of Europe, where music is regarded as an emotional art, it is the custom when a composer of great reputation dies to honor his memory, sometimes by exposing his bust or picture in concert hall or opera house, often by playing reverently one of his compositions.

But we are conservative in Boston, and music is regarded here chiefly as an intellectual pursuit, something that makes for educational righteousness. Besides, neither Gounod nor Tschaikowsky was a German.

Or Mr. Paur may say "Gounod was a maker of operas; he was not a writer for orchestra alone. How can we honor his memory in a Symphony concert?"

You have heard of the town of Leipsic, Mr. Paur; you have heard of the Gewandhaus concerts, and you are aware of the character of the said concerts. You also know how conservative musically are the good and the bad people of Leipsic.

Now I read in the Signale, No. 56 of this year, that at the Gewandhaus concert, given Nov. 2, one number of the programme was dedicated to the memory of Gounod. A march, described as "Feirlicher Marsch," by Charles Gounod, was played in honor of him. This may or may not have been the "Marche Romaine;" the point is immaterial; the fact remains that the death of the Frenchman was noticed fitly in Leipsic, in the very temple devoted to the worship of "classical" composers.

And even Mr. Bernsdorf, who is generally ill at ease when he is obliged to hear modern music or write about it, paid the memory of Gounod a handsome tribute in his critique of the concert.

Gounod never visited this country, but Tschaikowsky was our guest. It is true that he conducted no one of his works in Boston. There was apparently no desire here to even see the illustrious composer. Yet, why should not his remarkable overture to "Hamlet" or to "Romeo and Juliet," or one of his symphonies be played in Music Hall to remind us of the world's loss?

As for that matter, it might not be uninteresting to hear the second symphony of Gounod or his nonetto for wind instruments.

***

Others thought of remembering, according to their capacity, the death of Gounod, even if you, Mr. Paur, did not, you who have the resources of the Symphony Orchestra behind you, you who have the opportunity of inviting singers to join you in your work.

Such a tribute to the memory of the composer of "Faust" did not escape the thought of Mr. William Heinrich, the Manager of the New England Conservatory, or certain Roman Catholic Churches in this town.

***

The programme of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture "Iphigénie en Aulide," Gluck; Double concerto for violin and 'cello, op. 102, Brahms; Symphony C major ("Jupiter") Mozart.

Brahm's "Double Concerto" was first played in public, October 18, 1887, by Joachim and Hausmann, if I am not mistaken. It was then played at Cologne. Its first performance in America was by Max Bendix and Victor Herbert, January 5, 1889, at a Thomas Symphony concert in New York.

The concerto is in many respects a disappointing work. First of all it seems labored. The themes are neither fresh nor interesting. The thematic development is often ingenious, at times unreasonably intricate, as though the composer was so interested in the solution of a puzzle that he forgot that he was a musician, if there are occasional passages that are suggestive and almost beautiful, there are other passages in the first and third movements that are disagreeable without justification, and almost hideous. The andante is more endurable, and portions of it are charming.

The concerto is singularly arranged. Let us waive the question whether Brahms's choice of solo instruments was fortunate. The question here is, What employment did he make of them? He, first of all, favored the 'cello. The violin part is extremely thankless, and it swarms with difficulties which seem needless and without any effect, even when they are conquered by such an admirable violinist as Mr. Kneisel. But neither the violin nor the 'cello is so used individually, nor are they so used together that the hearer is able to listen to one dominating voice or to two voices that compel attention. It is as though the orchestra had invited two guests to listen to the stranger's words of wit and wisdom: but afterward the members of the orchestra forgot good breeding and insisted on showing their guests how clever they themselves were and how much they knew.

The great fault, however, is that this concerto shows a poverty of imagination. There is technique galore; but there is little genuine music. Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder performed their arduous task with skill and courage.

***

The noble overture of Gluck, with the ending by Wagner, was finely played. And the overture is surely classic, if any music may be thus termed. The Symphony of Mozart, with its Olympian serenity, its tenderness, its amazing mastery of technical problems which are never allowed to seem problems to the hearer, was played with great care.

PHILIP HALE.

[47]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1893.

THE WEEK'S MANY CONCERTS, SYMPHONY CHAMBER, ETC.

The week in music began bright and early on Monday evening with the second of the Kneisel Quartette series, which quite filled Chickering Hall. The attractions of a hitherto unheard quartette by Smetana counted for something; but the chief interest centred in the debut of Mrs. Emil Paur, who brought with her an excellent reputation as a pianist. That reputation is well founded as her share of the Schubert trio in E-flat major, opus 100, demonstrated clearly. How far and wide her talent and her art may extend, cannot be determined from this one hearing; but that she is an admirable ensemble player, is certain. She devoted herself unobstrusively to the work as a whole, regarding its proportions above her personal part in it and accepting applause only with her two coadjutors. Her playing is sound and honest, well balanced in tone and touch, clear, although not quite brilliant in execution, full and without effort to force a great volume, sensible in phrasing and particularly careful in accentuation and rhythm. The simplicity of her manner and her evident wish to be an artist among artists, enhanced the pleasure she gave and won her individual esteem in addition to approbation for her musicianly qualities.

The Smetana quartette is interesting and would bear an early repetition. It is strange and perplexing at times, and then again it has a curious, wild beauty. In some of the music a restless figure rolls to and fro almost incessantly under the smoothly moving upper voices. A peculiar preference is shown for the deep, strenuous tones of the viola and for the searching ones of the 'cello, which appear not only in support of the themes in the full concord of instruments, but in long, detached recitative-like passages. There are many unexpected and almost inexplicable expressions, and yet they hardly seem foreign to the general spirit of the work. The first movement does not produce the effect of an allegro, although it is one; the finale has a touch of the ballabile about it, and like the second—which is ingeniously developed along the rhythms of the Bohemian polka—seems more like the germ of an orchestral movement than an intentional assignment to chamber music. The slow movement shows less originality than the other three, but has its own interest. The quartette is short, and must have been found stimulating even by those who did not follow or approve all its diversities. The third number on the programme was Beethoven's quartette in G major, opus 18, brief, beautiful and beloved. The audience was in absolute sympathy with the players and called them forward after every movement. As for the playing itself, the comment of the captious New York Tribune on the club's recent concert in that city may be quoted as just and expressive of Monday evening's work:

For a revelation of perfect loveliness in the province of chamber music no organization in the country holds out a richer promise than the Kneisel Quartet. The playing of the club was as near perfection as one could wish, and it was almost as delightful as listening to the music to watch the play of pleasurable emotions on the faces of the listeners. The playing of Mr. Kneisel and his associates is exquisitely true in intonation, and their readings of the music of the masters are as reverential, as eloquent, as beautiful and truthful as they are lucid and intelligent.

Mr. Paur's second thoughts about his fifth programme were better than his first ones. Accordingly the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony was put at the foot of the bill at last night's Symphony, the double concerto of Brahms kept its central place, the Haydn symphony was withdrawn, and the concert began with Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture.

Considering his programme per se, there is almost nothing to be said. The overture and the symphony are such ancient acquaintances that they can come for the welcome given to strangers before only the newest subscribers to Boston concerts and may be set down as among the "educational" features of the season. The concerto is unfamiliar, being among its author's comparatively recent compositions, of course, but Boston has heard enough from and about Brahms during the past few years to be able to cope in some degree of ease with his peculiar characteristics as therein shown—his sufficiency of distinct thematic material, his disposition toward shifting rhythms and accents, his learned and often obtuse thematic development and his sturdy and occasionally passionate insistence upon his ideas and their elaboration. The presentation of two solo instruments, although no modern novelty, is not unusual, and on the one hand gives a composer greater scope in his writing, while on the other it offers at once to the musician more food for thought and to laymen more occupation and entertainment. Mr. Paur is just the director for Brahms, because he has at once the exactitude of perception and the fixed delivery which insure the clear conveyance of form and figure and the energy and heat requisite for the more emphatic assertiveness of the composer.

That Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder read the violin and 'cello parts to perfection, hardly needs to be said. Each is a principal artist in his line, uniting to complete virtuosity, the scholar's knowledge and the artist's style.

The concerto pleases as a whole, although there are some strange jars between the parts at times—dissonances running mad, as one might say—and some short passages which cannot real please any but those who admire Brahms through thick and thin. But the slow movement is redundant in beauty and sweetness.

The overture was fairly and squarely read and with no little play of feeling, and the symphony was respectfully and consistently treated, barring, in the first movement, a few lingering delays and over-urgent accents upon an odd bar here and there.

Next week the Symphony audience will have the pleasure, already provided for at the Kneisel and Apolo concerts, of hearing Mr. Paur, who will play (with orchestra) Liszt's "Wanderer" Fantasy. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's first symphony, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Liszt's poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 19, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Two events of novelty were announced for the second of this quartette's concerts last Monday evening: one was a rendering of Smetana's E minor quartette for strings, the other the appearance as pianist of Mrs. Emil Paur, wife of our Symphony conductor. Both events proved to be very interesting to the audience. Indeed, the task which Mrs. Paur undertook, as well as the manner in which she performed that task, must at once allay any suspicion that certain disagreeable phases of the Nikisch régime are to be reproduced under the new dispensation. It is true that Mrs. Paur did not give a warm and wholly sympathetic rendering of the very familiar work—Schubert's piano trio in E flat—in which she had part. There were evidences, too, of a slight nervousness throughout the performance. But there was not the slightest evidence of inability to meet the demands which the long work makes on the technique and endurance of the artist; nor was there evidence of anything except the most complete artistic sincerity and the most thorough understanding of a player's duties toward the composer and toward the assisting players. In short, Mrs. Paur may be sure of a hearty welcome to the not too full ranks of excellent chamber concert pianists in Boston.

Smetana was Dvorak's teacher. If Smetana's expression of his ideas about music was as clear as his expression of his ideas in music, Dvorak had an exceedingly good teacher. It was certainly a man who knew thoroughly what he was about, who wrote the quartette we heard as an opening number last Monday. Each movement was a well balanced whole, and the quartette, as a whole, was begun boldly and was led to a fitting conclusion with bold and unswerving power. In fact, "Be bold, be bold," might have served as a motto for the composition; but the American listener would have been inclined, I am sure, to add the conclusion, "but not too bold," as a warning to the composer at many points in the course of the work. We do n't quarrel with the numerous sudden—and, for that matter, not always clever—changes of key which the composer makes; but we do object to the frightful overdoing of the forte of which he renders himself guilty. We might almost imagine ourselves in an Italian theatre at a rendering of an earlier Verdi opera, so uniformly intense is the volume of tone and the consequent drain on the emotional system. We know that Smetana meant it to be so. He was a Bohemian, and that is the way people enjoy themselves in Bohemia. But the American would like to revise the expression marks of every such work which he hears.

It was well, then, that this work came to us while we were fresh, and was followed by two very familiar and very delightful numbers,—for the G major quartette of Beethoven's first set, op. 18, closed the concert. The audience was, then, able to be interestedly attentive to Smetana's intensity, and applauded each movement vigorously. The players achieved a marvel of purity in intonation in their presentation of the many chromatic intricacies of the work. Such playing may almost be said to annihilate intricacy, since it makes it possible for the listener to see at once what the composer means. The work did not sound well at all times. Smetana often asks a fortissimo of a single stringed instrument which certainly no less than ten instruments in unison could clothe with a volume of tone sufficient to overpower the scratchiness. But, again, we are sure that he wanted the intensity, and was willing to let the scratchiness come, as come it must. Or it is just possible that his deafness, which finally became complete, may have caused him to lose his bearings in such matters. After all is said, however, the work is interesting, and we should like to prepare ourselves, by plenteous repose and suitable diet, to hear it again. We have only to add, concerning its performance, that Mr. Svecenski found opportunity to do some splendidly virile viola playing.

The next concert will occur on Dec. 4.

THE AMUSEMENT GLOBE.

Nov. 15 1893

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a splendid welcome when it came to Music Hall last Wednesday evening. Mr. Paur, the new conductor, then made his first appearance in this city. The management is to be congratulated on making a change of its base of operations to Music Hall. The attendance at the concert was large enough, doubtless, to have proved the wisdom of the change. It may be said of the work of the orchestra that it was thoroughly artistic, and that it confirmed the organization in its superiority over every other similar band in the country.

* * *

By the way, there was quite a surprise for the musical people of Boston, when that organization gave its first concert, some ten or twelve years ago. And I think I'll have to tell a story that begins even back of and beyond that period. Somewhere about 1877 or 1878, there were two or three very promising young girl singers in Boston, who appeared in classical concerts, subscription affairs, and the like, and of whom musical Bostonians were very proud. To be exact, there were two of them who were rather more promising than the others. Presently these two had their "farewell benefit" on the eve of their departure for Europe. Each departed in quest of good instruction and the broadening of her musical knowledge and taste. Both were pretty, attractive and ambitious, and each had a good voice. One went to London, and began to study under the direction of George Henschel, a young Prussian, who had come into notice as a singer, composer, teacher and musical director, quite a strong combination of abilities, you must admit; but the strange thing about it was that the abilities were very evenly distributed. A year or two later the young woman returned to Boston, amazingly developed as a singer, with a voice suitable for small halls, rather than for large ones, and her teacher came along with her, to take a look at Boston; also to marry his pupil, whom he had already wooed and won.

* * *

Well, Henschel sang two or three times in the "Hub;" directed a concert or two; and did various things, as the opportunity offered, which proved him to be a splendid musician in every sense of the word. Presently a magnificent opportunity fell in his way. The petty squabbles of two or three musical organizations prompted a wealthy banker to provide the money for the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the position of director was offered to Henschel. There was no limit to the banker's purse, apparently, for when it was decided that the famous old Music Hall was the only place suitable for the orchestra's concerts, he promptly purchased the property at a cost of some hundreds of thousands of dollars, in order that nothing should interfere with the development of the plan. Of course Henschel accepted the position of director, for a carte blanche accompanied it. He engaged as many musicians as he pleased, arranged his program as he liked, and in every way proceeded as if he himself were paying the cost of the affair.

* * *

At length the new orchestra gave its first concert, and then came the surprise. The musicians were grouped in a manner entirely new. There were something like eighty of them, a big lot, for that day. They played in a manner that startled some of the conventional old chaps in the audience, who always kept their index fingers on the score. But they played in a style which "set the pace" for the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the present day. I remember well something that struck me then as an oddity. Henschel had the scores of the music at the director's desk, but he never looked at them. He said to me afterwards: "A man who is not sufficiently familiar with the music of his program to direct a performance without the scores, is not fit to pose as director."

* * *

Well, there was a great controversy among the musical writers. Lots of them were offended at the innovations, while others applauded them. But Henschel remained as leader for four years, and his work made it possible for his successors to bring the orchestra to its present condition. He found time, also, to inaugurate a series of recitals in which he and Mrs. Henschel were the principal performers, which has continued at intervals ever since, with great profit to him and great enjoyment to thousands of music-loving people, in New York as well as in Boston.

* * *

So, in a sense, we owe the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the ambition of that young Boston girl, who went abroad to study. The other girl, by the way, is not unknown in musical circles. She is the present wife of Henry Mapleson—not the famous opera manager of ten years ago, but his son—and is known on the stage as Laura Schirmer-Mapleson. She is now singing in The Fencing Master.

* * *

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1893.

The Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two composers of world-wide reputation died lately, Gounod and Tschaikowsky.

It is a matter of surprise and regret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not recognized this fact in any way whatsoever.

In certain towns of Europe, where music is regarded as an emotional art, it is the custom when a composer of great reputation dies to honor his memory, sometimes by exposing his bust or picture in concert hall or opera house, often by playing reverently one of his compositions.

But we are conservative in Boston, and music is regarded here chiefly as an intellectual pursuit, something that makes for educational righteousness. Besides, neither Gounod nor Tschaikowsy was a German.

Or Mr. Paur may say "Gounod was a maker of operas; he was not a writer for orchestra alone. How can we honor his memory in a Symphony concert?"

You have heard of the town of Leipsic, Mr. Paur; you have heard of the Gewandhaus concerts, and you are aware of the character of the said concerts. You also know how conservative musically are the good and the bad people of Leipsic.

Now I read in the Signale, No. 56 of this year, that at the Gewandhaus concert, given Nov. 2, one number of the programme was dedicated to the memory of Gounod. A march, described as "Feirlicher Marsch," by Charles Gounod, was played in honor of him. This may or may not have been the "Marche Romaine;" the point is immaterial; the fact remains that the death of the Frenchman was noticed fitly in Leipsic, in the very temple devoted to the worship of "classical" composers.

And even Mr. Bernsdorf, who is generally ill at ease when he is obliged to hear modern music or write about it, paid the memory of Gounod a handsome tribute in his critique of the concert.

Gounod never visited this country, but Tschaikowsky was our guest. It is true that he conducted no one of his works in Boston. There was apparently no desire here to even see the illustrious composer. Yet, why should not his remarkable overture to "Hamlet" or to "Romeo and Juliet," or one of his symphonies be played in Music Hall to remind us of the world's loss?

As for that matter, it might not be uninteresting to hear the second symphony of Gounod or his nonetto for wind instruments.

* * *

Others thought of remembering, according to their capacity, the death of Gounod, even if you, Mr. Paur, did not, you who have the resources of the Symphony Orchestra behind you, you who have the opportunity of inviting singers to join you in your work.

Such a tribute to the memory of the composer of "Faust" did not escape the thought of Mr. William Heinrich, the Manager of the New England Conservatory, or certain Roman Catholic Churches in this town.

* * *

The programme of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture "Iphigénie en Aulide," Gluck; Double concerto for violin and 'cello, op. 102, Brahms; Symphony C major ("Jupiter") Mozart.

Brahm's "Double Concerto" was first played in public, October 18, 1887, by Joachim and Hausmann, if I am not mistaken. It was then played at Cologne. Its first performance in America was by Max Bendix and Victor Herbert, January 5, 1889, at a Thomas Symphony concert in New York.

The concerto is in many respects a disappointing work. First of all it seems labored. The themes are neither fresh nor interesting. The thematic development is often ingenious, at times unreasonably intricate, as though the composer was so interested in the solution of a puzzle that he forgot that he was a musician. If there are occasional passages that are suggestive and almost beautiful, there are other passages in the first and third movements that are disagreeable without justification, and almost hideous. The andante is more endurable, and portions of it are charming.

The concerto is singularly arranged. Let us waive the question whether Brahms's choice of solo instruments was fortunate. The question here is, What employment did he make of them? He, first of all, favored the 'cello. The violin part is extremely thankless, and it swarms with difficulties which seem needless and without any effect, even when they are conquered by such an admirable violinist as Mr. Kneisel. But neither the violin nor the 'cello is so used individually, nor are they so used together that the hearer is able to listen to one dominating voice or to two voices that compel attention. It is as though the orchestra had invited two guests to listen to the stranger's words of wit and wisdom: but afterward the members of the orchestra forgot good breeding and insisted on showing their guests how clever they themselves were and how much they knew.

The great fault, however, is that this concerto shows a poverty of imagination. There is technique galore; but there is little genuine music. Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder performed their arduous task with skill and courage.

* * *

The noble overture of Gluck, with the ending by Wagner, was finely played. And the overture is surely classic, if any music may be thus termed. The Symphony of Mozart, with its Olympian serenity, its tenderness, its amazing mastery of technical problems, which are never allowed to seem problems to the hearer, was played with great care.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The printed programme was rather misleading at the concert of Saturday, a most unusual matter, for not only were the numbers given in reversed order (without any notice), but the time-honored Jupiter symphony was announced as being performed for the "first time in Boston," and a symphony by Schumann in the very unusual orchestral key of B was announced for the next concert. The last error is one that calls attention to the rather absurd German nomenclature of two notes in the scale. To call B flat "B," and to give B the name of "H" as is done in Germany, is simply perpetuating a clerical error made in the 11th century; there is no valid reason why Germany should deviate from the nomenclature of England or America as regards B natural, and B flat might be called "Bes," according to the rest of the German nomenclature. That concert may be called exceptional where the errors are confined to the printing, and in this case even these were so self-evident and unimportant, that it is only the rarity of such slips that leads the reviewer to chronicle them.

The overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia In Aulis" in the Wagnerian arrangement was finely performed. The touches of the modern master are quite in line with the thought of the father of dramatic music, and in such a score as this Wagner shows that he had a keen sense of fitness. The superficial observer imagines that Wagner revelled in dissonances, was not happy unless he had a ponderous orchestra, and was forever chromatic in style; if such a person will study the fidelity of the additions in this overture, or the diatonic church mode used in the Theme of Faith in "Parsifal" he will see that the composer knew when to use complexity, and when simplicity.

The Brahms concerto for violin and violoncello received its first performance in Boston at this concert. It is a difficult task to do full justice to two different instruments in a single work of this kind. Beethoven's triple concerto, in which he used the above instruments with the addition of piano, is the weakest of his concertos, and the reviewer must confess that the new work, at a first hearing, did not seem to rival the second piano concerto of Brahms. Yet in one point Brahms is the greatest, perhaps the only, follower of Beethoven in this field; one never thinks of his concertos as mere solos with orchestral accompaniment. The care with which the orchestral touches were managed in this work was evident, and they so blended with the solo themes that it was impossible to think of the composition save as an orchestral work with solo threads interwoven through the fabric. It shows a certain degree of self-abnegation to play such a work, for the soloists must needs disappear in the ensemble. It is pleasant to record that Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder played with the high musicianship that regards the composer's intention above all personal display, and it was gratifying to see that they nevertheless received abundant recognition at its close.

The first movement showed Brahms as the intellectual giant in the domain of development; in this he treads close upon the heels of Beethoven himself, yet there is this great distinction between the two masters—Beethoven was deeply emotional even in the midst of his intellectuality, while Brahms is phlegmatic. Every touch seems carefully calculated, the composer never seems to yield himself wholly up to the inspiration of his thought, he is playing a game of musical chess with the public. After all, the composer's life must in some degree influence his music; a pleasant burgher existence in Vienna is not the highway to intensity; as well expect glorious marine pictures from a painter who has never seen the ocean, as portrayals of emotion from the composer whose life has been entirely free from rude shocks of adversity or from the torments of passion. Brahms' one great sorrow, the loss of his mother, crystallized into his greatest work, the German requiem, and then the heart went into the background and the brain resumed its absolute supremacy. Therefore, while paying due tribute to the development, the symmetry, the unity, and the logic of the great first movement of this composition, the reviewer must add that he was not moved or excited any more than he would have been by some intricate demonstration of mathematics. Brahms' intellectuality overbalances what emotional power he possesses.

There were many strong touches of tone-color in the second movement, chiefly in the lower register of the strings, and there was a quaintness in some of the themes that sustained the interest. The finale offered far more of contrast than any other part of the work. There was a Hungarian flavor here, and a certain dash that had its charm. Altogether, one is disposed to consider this the most successful, the most inspired, portion of the work, although the first movement is much more elaborate, ambitious and extended.

As if the programme itself had been a rondo, it returned at its end to the style of its beginning. The modern concerto was followed by another specimen of the older style of dramatic treatment, but finer than that of Gluck, in the shape of the "Jupiter" symphony by Mozart. The conductor occasionally made this a symphony in which Jupiter Tonans was the chief character, and this thundering Jove launched some thunderbolts that were heavier than Mozart had thought of. There was an evident desire that not a scrap of the work should go to waste, and the contrasts were somewhat too palpably forced, but the delicious andante of the second movement was charmingly given by the muted strings, and the contrast with the intricate concerto, made it seem like delicious rest after a severe task. It may be that some day our music will turn back to such a style as this; it is possible that the composer of the future may combine the melodic grace of a Mozart with the tone-coloring of a Wagner.

The fugal passages of the finale were most clearly read. Mozart was probably the only composer who could construct a fugue, or a fugato, so that it should win the heart of the general public, innocent of all knowledge of the intricacies of counterpoint. Such a finale as this, or such a fugato as the chief theme of the "Magic Flute" overture, prove that the severely classical and the tunefully popular can be made to shake hands and fraternize.

Next Saturday the musical wayfarer will be guided along more modern paths, and the road will lead from Schumann to Liszt.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 19, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder were the soloists at the fifth symphony rehearsal and concert, at which conductor Paur offered the following program: Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Brahms' A minor concerto for violin and cello, and Gluck's overture to Iphigenia. The grand symphony was grandly played, the rich orchestral ornamentation and elaborate development of themes being clearly and brilliantly set forth. The famous finale, so characteristic of the wonderful tone master, was the feature of fine interpretation of Mozart's work. Gluck's overture, which was finished for concert performances by Wagner, was daintily played, and but little fault could be found with the tone of the string contingent, or the excellent work of the wood, wind and brasses.

The Brahms concert introduced Mr Kneisel, violin, and Mr Schroeder, cellist. These artists charmed their audience by an almost faultless execution of their number. Their intonations were pure and sympathetic, and they gave pleasing evidence of the result of long artistic association by the beautiful ensemble displayed throughout the whole work. The solo instruments were in perfect sympathy, and the two soloists were recalled at the close of their performance, and Mr Paur appeared as well pleased with his fellow artists as were the auditors.

At this week's concert Mrs Emil Paur will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Schumann, symphony in B major, No. 1; Schubert-Liszt, "Wanderer," fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, three movements from symphony "Romeo and Juliet;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

Boston Transcript.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," in C major (In Richard Wagner's arrangement.)
Brahms: Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, in A minor, Opus 102.
Mozart: Symphony in C major ("Jupiter").

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist and Mr. Alwin Schroeder the 'cellist.

The overture to "Iphigénie" was beautifully played, and quite according to Wagner's ideas. One hardly knows what to think of Wagner's arguments regarding the proper tempo of this overture; they are extremely plausible; they are based on a genially artistic idea, and are backed up by far more credible documentary evidence than, for instance, his reasoning about the sudden piano in the coda of the "Freischütz" overture—felicitous though his suggestion in this latter case is. And yet one can not wholly escape the feeling that his arguments about the "Iphigènie" have a flaw in them somewhere. He throws great stress upon the fact that the overture is marked "andante" at the beginning, and that this indication of tempo is cancelled by no marking of "allegro" over the twentieth measure in the original Paris edition of the score; he furthermore refers to the fact that one of the themes of the overture reappears in the opera itself in a different notation. In the chorus of mutinous Greeks in the first act it is written in eighth-notes and marked allegro; in the overture it is written in sixteenth-notes, and Wagner agues that, by retaining the marking "andante" of the beginning, the same rate of speed would be attained in both cases; that is, allegro in eighth-notes equals andante in sixteenth-notes. His whole argument tends to combat the rapid tempo at which the overture (from the last up-beat of the nineteenth measure on) was traditionally played in Germany, and the "allegro" mark over the twentieth measure in many German scores, which last he considers an unwarrantable and gratuitous intercalation. On the other side may be advanced that Mozart's coda to the overture (for concert performance) evidently assumes an exceedingly rapid tempo as taken for granted; Wagner himself admits this tacitly, for he says "it would not bear listening to at all so soon as it was played in (what he considered) the right tempo of what preceded it in the composition." This is tantamount to saying that a slower tempo made nonsense of it at once. Now, it seems not a little curious that Mozart, a contemporary of Gluck's, a man of the highest genius and musical culture, and of very exceptionally keen insight into the works of other composers, should so totally have misapprehended the character of Gluck's overture as to mistake the tempo at which it should be played. Again, it may be urged that Wagner's tempo has all the characteristics of the modern, now fashionable, "slow allegro," something that belongs almost distinctively to our own day and reflects a characteristic phase of our modern musical feeling; it did not belong to Gluck's day at all. Had Gluck really meant the main body of his overture to go at this rate, it would have shown a spirit of "modernism" in him such as would throw his other musical innovations quite into the shade; a "slow allegro" in a composition by Gluck would have been quite as much of an anachronism as, say, the B-naturals in the violins (against the C-sharps in flute and bassoon) in the twelfth and thirteenth measures of the Allegro of Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," which are still retained in some editions, but which the best authorities agree were misprints, or slips of the pen, for B-flat. By this we by no means mean to say that Wagner's slower tempo in the overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide" is nor thoroughly welcome to modern ears; it certainly is delightful—quite as much so as his sudden piano in the "Freischütz" overture, and of decidedly deeper import—and we could not find it in our hearts to wish the composition played otherwise; only its authenticity does not seem to us quite conclusive. By no means the least remarkable feature in last Saturday's performance of the work was the exquisite way the first violins played that little turn and mordent in the second theme—playing the turn clearly and smoothly, and just hinting at the mordent—it was the acme of grace!

The royal "Jupiter" symphony was grandly played. Mr. Paur, to be sure, monkeyed a little with the tempo in parts of the first movement in a way with which we could not sympathize; but the great work was given with splendid force, brilliancy and all due delicacy, and made a stupendous impression. It was interesting to compare it in one way with the "Iphigénie" overture; both this and the Finale of the symphony show frequent reflections of Handel. But, with Gluck, you cannot help feeling when he suggests Handel that the Halle giant would have been stronger, more interesting and impressive, whereas, with Mozart, you feel that he is every inch up to the height of his great model. If we have a criticism to make on the performance, it is that the trumpets and drums seemed rather too subdued almost throughout; what Mendelssohn said of Handel: " * * * when he brings up his kettledrums and trumpets towards the end, and thumps and batters away to his heart's content, as if he meant to knock you down, no mortal can remain unmoved," seems to us to apply equally well to Mozart; trumpets were trumpets in his day, and he never heard of wadded drumsticks! The uncompromising crackle of the trumpets in Mozart's symphonies and overtures (not to mention Haydn and Beethoven) is one of the good traditions of the old Leipzig Gewandhaus.

The Brahms concerto brings us back once more to our old song. One cannot but think that Brahms must have written this work (and one or two others perhaps) mainly out of gratitude to certain virtuosi who were true to him through thick and thin in the days before he was crowned King of Music; all other explanations are unsatisfactory. Brahms can in no just sense be called a conservative; if he continues to write in the traditional musical forms, it is plainly because he finds them congenial, and not from any merely conservative predetermination. He treats these forms with a freedom that precludes all notion of merely academic reverence for them; in spirit he is a modern of the moderns. This being so, one can hardly conceive of his spontaneously choosing to write for a combination of instruments (solo violin and 'cello with orchestra) that stands in the strongest imaginable antagonism to the modern musical instinct; willingly to force himself to write passages to be [illegible] would [illegible] to show their [illegible] is to do a thing which is inconceivable on purely musical grounds. And note also that modern orchestration, what might be called the modern orchestral touch, has become so habitual and inveterate with Brahms that he can hardly touch the mighty complex instrument without making it resound twice as sonorously as the elder composers did; he can hardly write for a single flute and clarinet without making them sound stronger than Mozart or Beethoven would—all of which is to the detriment of his solo instruments. In this concerto one feels inevitably, as and still more than one did in his violin concerto, that he is really fighting with one hand tied behind him, is attempting a task not congenial to his genius, a difficult and well-nigh impossible tour de force. Save in one or two passages, the solo violin and 'cello seem very like those royal personages who raise their small-piping voices in a weighty debate, and to whose fatuous utterances grave men must listen with every outward token of respect, because of the speaker's rank. Except that here the solo instruments really have something important to say, but say it so ill, so pallidly and impotently; they carry no conviction with them, and you heartily wish them in Jericho. How freely, brilliantly, and convincingly Brahms here speaks in his tuttis! and how the constant necessity he is under of allowing his violin and 'cello to be heard lames his hand in the solo passages! One feels sure that, had he been left to himself and his orchestra, he would have made something quite different out of this work, with its glorious themes, so full of titanic energy, beauty and power. The conditions in which he has placed himself even go far to paralyze his usually so convincing power of musical development. The concerto stands as a work full of sublime and beautful moments, full of flashes of commanding genius, rather than as a wholly great work, as one steady flame. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder played wonderfully. They did what might be done with their respective parts; effective they could not be! Once more we repeat it; the modern violin, or 'cello, concerto, when written by a true modern master, is not and cannot be the throne from which the virtuose rules over a willing puplic; it is rather the gallows on which he publicly hangs himself!

The next programme is: Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 61; Schubert-Liszt, "Wanderer" fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra; Berlioz, three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony, opus 17; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Festklänge." Mrs. Emil Paur will be the pianist.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1893.

OUR NEW MUSIC HALL.

First Instalment of Subscriptions Promptly Paid In.

Under the call for subscriptions to the capital stock of a new Boston Music Hall last summer, about $407,000 was subscribed. On Oct. 30 the first call for payment of those subscriptions was issued, calling for one-half of the subscription, or $203,500. The hard times and the defeat of the rapid transit act, which threatened to destroy the old Music Hall at once, have been supposed by many likely to interfere with the collection of the subscription. On the contrary $177,000 has already been paid in and the subscribers yet to be heard from are either temporarily absent from town or men of such wealth and standing and their subscriptions so large that it is only a matter of a few days when substantially the whole amount called for will be in hand. What it is proposed to do with this first $200,000 may be gathered from circular given below which was issued to the subscribers about a fortnight ago:

The undersigned committee have the honor to report to you that the total subscription for a new Music Hall in the city of Boston now amounts to a little over four hundred thousand dollars, and that, in consultation with experts, much time and thought have already been given to the preparation of plans and to other preliminary questions.

After full consideration as to possible sites, your committee have decided that the lot on the northwest corner of West Chester Park and Huntington avenue is the best lot available, taking into account location, shape, size and price. This lot was selected last year by two members of your committee and two of their friends, on the understanding that a new Music Hall would soon be a necessity, that it was the best lot to be had, and that it should be offered for the purpose at its cost, with interest and taxes. The whole of the purchase money was borrowed for five years at four and a half per cent, with an option to prepay the note, which was indorsed by the four persons above mentioned, who were to have the profit or loss of the purchase only in case the land should not be taken for a music hall within a reasonable time. Your committee think that the option to take the land for a music hall and to pay for it in full should now be exercised. For this purpose, for the cost of plans and other preliminary expenses, and for the further prosecution of the work, the committee ask each subscriber to pay one-half of his subscription on or before Nov. 15 next. A second instalment will not be asked for before May 15, 1894; but any subscriber can, if he prefers, now pay his subscription in full, and receive stock therefor. As soon as the sum actually paid into the committee shall amount to two hundred thousand dollars or more, a corporation will be organized and one share of stock issued for each one hundred dollars paid. When later instalments shall be called for, the capital stock will be increased to not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, in accordance with the statutes. As stock cannot be issued for fractions of $100, each subscriber of an odd number of hundreds must have the option to make his first payment $50 less than his share of the first instalment.

When the corporation has been organized, the question of the purchase of land, as above proposed, will be submitted to the stockholders at a special meeting, and later the plans for building will be likewise submitted for approval.

If you will kindly send to Messrs. Lee, Higginson & Co., at No. 50 State street, on or before Nov. 15, 1893, one-half or more of your subscription, the receipt of the committee will be given therefor, until stock of the corporation can be issued to you.

Yours truly,
EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

The prompt and practically unanimous response to the call for the first instalment of the subscriptions completely extinguishes the gossip that has been gaining way to the effect that the collection would be rendered difficult by what had the look of a false alarm over the destruction of the old Music Hall. The truth is, that whether the old hall is destroyed or not it has long been very generally agreed that its usefulness as a music hall had been outlived and it must have a successor more adequate to our modern requirements. At the time of Colonel Higginson's last renewal of his contracts with the musicians of the Symphony Orchestra there was a very strong appearance of probability—pretty well founded as the vote finally showed—that there might be no hall for them to play in before those contracts would expire. Hence the urgency of the call on the public last summer. But he was also brought to a realizing sense of the burden he was bearing in being responsible for both the orchestra and the hall it plays in. His friends promptly offered to see that his responsibility was eased up as regards a proper hall and home for his superb gift to musical culture and local pride. Evidently none of them are as yet repenting their action.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1893.

A concert was given in Music Hall Tuesday evening the 14th. It was the third Suffolk Musicale. The performers were members of the Campanini-Morgan Company. Miss Geraldine Morgan, the violinist, showed considerable skill and a musical temperament: Mr. Paul Morgan played an assortment of 'cello pieces; Master Lewis, a young choir boy, sang "Just a Song," "Dreams" and "M'Appari," and Campanini sang the songs that were expected from him.

* * *

The program of the fifth Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis" ..... Gluck
Concerto for violin and 'cello, A minor, op. 102 ..... Brahms
Symphony, C major, "Jupiter" ..... Mozart

The worshippers of Brahms were present, and incense was burned freely, and there were leaps of delight and perspiring pleasure and boisterous rejoicing. But this double concerto is not worthy of the composer of the Second and Third symphony.

There is an absence of spontaneity. The themes are not fresh, they are not suggestive, they are neither beautiful nor dramatic. The development is of course admirable from the purely technical standpoint, but it is often so absurdly intricate that Brahms appears as a mere propounder and solver of puzzles. There are passages in the first and in the third movement that are positively and unnecessarily disagreeable, almost hideous; and, on the other hand, in the second movement there are passages of genuine beauty.

Neither the violin nor the 'cello has a fair chance. The music is at times almost awkwardly written for the solo instruments, and the difficulties for the performers are not worth the trouble of conquering! Then the orchestra keeps up such a constant chattering. But you have heard this concerto in '89 at a Thomas Symphony concert; so let us talk no more about it.

Speaking of Brahms, I wonder if Mr. Finck has read the chapter entitled "Brahms" in "Istar," by Joséphin Sar Péladan. He would enjoy it thoroughly. I am tempted to give an extract, but refrain. You may gain an idea of it when the Sar describes Brahms' music as "Abandon qui garde son corset, félinité qui ne se risque qu'à demi au frôlement de péché; * * les réticences d'un abandon que la réflexion vient couper; d'hésitation en élans, le lyrisme du désir timoré."

The orchestra played well, and the solo performers showed courage and skill. There was nothing in the readings of Mr. Paur to excite wild approbation or virtuous indignation. He was earnest, methodical, thoroughly conscientious.

The program for the concert next Saturday will include Schumann's Symphony No. 1; Wanderer fantasy, Schubert-Liszt; three movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Liszt's "Fest-Klaenge."

The second of the Kneisel Quartet concerts was given Monday, the 13th. The program was as follows:

Quartet in E minor ..... Smetana
(First time at these concerts.)
Piano trio in E flat major, op. 100 ..... Schubert
Quartet in G major, op. 18 ..... Beethoven

The Smetana Quartet was applauded loudly and with justice, for it is a strong work, whether you sympathize with the temperament of the composer, as here displayed, or not. It is full of melancholy, but the doleful dumps are not of conventional gloom. The nationality of the composer does not serve him as a staff to support tottering footsteps. There is no apparent attempt to show the hearer how "jolly" Bohemian the music is. To be sure the second movement is labeled "à la Polka," but the polka is in suggestion rather than in evidence. This same movement was accused here in one quarter of triviality. Its "triviality" was to me a delight, and to me this movement was by far the most characteristic of the four.

When did the idea gain ground that the performance of a string quartet must necessarily be a solemn, sepulchral function? Are there no movements in the quartets of Mozart and Haydn that are so piquant, so foot-inciting that they run the risk of the accusation of triviality? But what charming harmonies there are in this abused scherzo by Smetana. The first movement is well knit, admirably developed from fresh themes. The slow movement is less satisfactory; there is more groping after effect; there is a desire to be Beethovian. The finale is influenced by the folk song, and the concluding passages are beautiful.

The melancholy of Smetana, even in his mirth, would be a good subject for an ambitious writer. The date of the composition of this quartet is unknown to me. I believe it was first played in Vienna in 1880; but I can find no record of its first performance. In 1874 Smetana was stone deaf, and did he not die in a madhouse at Prague, ten years after? It would be interesting to know how deeply this quartet was affected by personal discomfort or foreboding (?), or whether the melancholy is Bohemian. At any rate Smetana here set his "careful breast, like Philomel against the thorn."

Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. In the trio she showed certain characteristics of a good ensemble player. Her touch was crisp; her sense of rhythm was seldom at fault; she appreciated the relative importance of the parts. In a word she played accurately and with taste. But she did not on this occasion show a spark of temperament. Her bearing was modest, and although the applause reached a frenetic point she did not seem to lose her practical head.

Mrs. Paur will play piano pieces Wednesday night at the concert of the Apollo Club, and she will appear next Saturday at the Symphony concert. You will undoubtedly be favored with her apparition in New York.

It is needless to say that the performance of the Quartet was worthy of the warmest praise, although the andante con moto in the trio was taken at too slow a pace.

[49]

EVIDENCE

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, gave their second concert of this season at Infantry Hall last night. As was the case at the first concert, there was a noticeable falling off in the attendance, as compared with last year, the hall not being over two-thirds full. The prevailing stringency in financial affairs has evidently been felt by a portion of the concert-going public to the extent of denying themselves the luxury of a symphony ticket. There can hardly be any other explanation of the decreased attendance, for the orchestra is as good as ever, the programmes as interesting, and last night there were no counter-attractions to call people elsewhere. The programme offered last evening was somewhat shorter than usual, the concert being over before half-past 9. The following numbers were given:

Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," in C major (Richard Wagner's arrangement), Andante (C major). Johannes Brahms—Concerto for violin and violoncello, in A minor, Op. 102; I. Allegro (A minor); II. Andante (D major); III. Vivace non troppo (A minor), (first time at these concerts). Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart—Symphony in C major ("Jupiter"); I. Allegro vivace (C major); II. Andante cantabile (F major); III. Menuetto, Allegretto (C major); trio, l'istesso tempo (C major); IV. Finale: Allegro molto (C major).

The trio of composers represented on the programme form an interesting contrast—Gluck, the pioneer of operatic reform; Mozart, the consummate flower of music's classical epoch; and Brahms, a modern of the moderns. Gluck's changes in the form of opera as he found it were chiefly in the line of dramatic development. His music, while of undeniable melodic beauty, sounds quaint and old-fashioned by the side of Mozart's, who, although born 40 years later than Gluck, outlived him but four years. The overture played last night was written when Gluck was at the zenith of his powers, and is an excellent specimen of his musical genius and refined taste. It received a careful and entirely adequate presentation at the hands of the orchestra.

The novelty of the evening was the Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello. Johannes Brahms is without doubt the most profound musician living, the greatest master of musical form and all the technics of composition. But his style lacks clearness, oftentimes to an extent to fully justify the title of "the apostle of fog," which a noted critic who does not admire his works once applied to him. His music is elaborate, intricate, the work of a cunning artificer, but never seems to flow spontaneously from the fount of inborn genius. The concerto played last night seems less open to such criticism than some of his works, and made, upon the whole, a favorable impression. It may be said, however, that the interest of the work centres in the tuttis rather than in the solo work, although that, too, was interesting in some parts, and most artistically given by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

But if all that went before had been totally devoid of interest, the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart's would have made sufficient amends. The great composers have often been blind to the merits of their rivals' work, but none ever refused to do homage to the brilliant, the colossal genius of Mozart. All have sooner or later come around to the standpoint of Gounod in his later years. "When I was young," said he, "I said 'Gounod and Mozart;' in middle life I said 'Mozart and Gounod;' now I say—'Mozart.'" No one has ever surpassed Mozart in the complete mastery of all the intricacies of the musical art, and yet no one else's music is so apparently free from the fetters of form. And, further, no one save old "Father Bach was ever so fertile an inventor of musical ideas. In his orchestral compositions are to be found a wealth of melody, a skill in treatment and a brilliancy of instrumental coloring which have never been surpassed. It would be hard to ask for a better specimen of pure music than the "Jupiter" symphony as it was played last night.

The slight roughness and somewhat uneven playing noted at the first concert, a month ago, was conspicuously absent last night. The orchestra has got back to its old form, as was to be expected when they should have become better acquainted with their new leader. Mr. Paur himself did not work as hard as before, although he still displays a deal of energy in his manner of conducting. He seems to have the men well in hand, and is said to be personally popular with the players. Whether he is a man of the calibre of Arthur Nikisch is a question, but he is apparently a thoroughly good musician, and there will evidently be no lowering of the tone of the Symphony concerts, either in the character of the programmes or the manner of their performance.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
PROVIDENCE,
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It Delighted a Good Audience in Infantry Hall Last Evening.

An audience, excellent in size, and appreciative to a degree, was that to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra discoursed last night in Infantry Hall. That the efforts of Conductor Paur and his players to entertain and edify were not without fruitage, the unqualified praise expressed both during and after the concert convincingly indicated.

The orchestra was in capital form. In the manner of the conductor there were perhaps some particulars to criticise. Some thought he was too strai[illegible] in his interpretations, lacking the delicacy and elasticity which were so prominent in Mr. Nikisch. There was no doubt as to his earnestness, however, and it was easy to see that every effect he exhibited was an honest exemplification of how he believed the music should go.

The strictly orchestral pieces were presented with a skill and brilliancy above comparison. The famous knack these wonderful instrumentalists have of keeping together with absolute alignment, and of giving to each note trueness and polish, was apparent at every stage.

The big display of the affair was the celebrated symphony, "Jupiter," by Mozart. "Jupiter" is the appellation settled on the work on account of the powerful passages in it. It is studded with splendid originalities, such as only Mozart could have prepared, and throughout is breathlessly interesting. The solos by Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder in a concerto by Brahms were charming. The other number was Gluck's fine overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY.
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, gave their second concert of this season at Infantry Hall last night. As was the case at the first concert, there was a noticeable falling off in the attendance, as compared with last year, the hall not being over two-thirds full. The prevailing stringency in financial affairs has evidently been felt by a portion of the concert-going public to the extent of denying themselves the luxury of a symphony ticket. There can hardly be any other explanation of the decreased attendance, for the orchestra is as good as ever, the programmes as interesting, and last night there were no counter-attractions to call people elsewhere. The programme offered last evening was somewhat shorter than usual, the concert being over before half-past 9. The following numbers were given:

Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," in C major (Richard Wagner's arrangement), Andante (C major). Johannes Brahms—Concerto for violin and violoncello, in A minor, Op. 102; I. Allegro (A minor); II. Andante (D major); III. Vivace non troppo (A minor), (first time at these concerts). Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart—Symphony in C major ("Jupiter"); I. Allegro vivace (C major); II. Andante cantabile (F major); III. Menuetto, Allegretto (C major); trio, l'istesso tempo (C major); IV. Finale: Allegro molto (C major).

The trio of composers represented on the programme form an interesting contrast—Gluck, the pioneer of operatic reform; Mozart, the consummate flower of music's classical epoch; and Brahms, a modern of the moderns. Gluck's changes in the form of opera as he found it were chiefly in the line of dramatic development. His music, while of undeniable melodic beauty, sounds quaint and old-fashioned by the side of Mozart's, who, although born 40 years later than Gluck, outlived him but four years. The overture played last night was written when Gluck was at the zenith of his powers, and is an excellent specimen of his musical genius and refined taste. It received a careful and entirely adequate presentation at the hands of the orchestra.

The novelty of the evening was the Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello. Johannes Brahms is without doubt the most profound musician living, the greatest master of musical form and all the technics of composition. But his style lacks clearness, oftentimes to an extent to fully justify the title of "the apostle of fog," which a noted critic who does not admire his works once applied to him. His music is elaborate, intricate, the work of a cunning artificer, but never seems to flow spontaneously from the fount of inborn genius. The concerto played last night seems less open to such criticism than some of his works, and made, upon the whole, a favorable impression. It may be said, however, that the interest of the work centres in the tuttis rather than in the solo work, although that, too, was interesting in some parts, and most artistically given by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

But if all that went before had been totally devoid of interest, the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart's would have made sufficient amends. The great composers have often been blind to the merits of their rivals' work, but none ever refused to do homage to the brilliant, the colossal genius of Mozart. All have sooner or later come around to the standpoint of Gounod in his later years. "When I was young," said he, "I said 'Gounod and Mozart;' in middle life I said 'Mozart and Gounod;' now I say—'Mozart.'" No one has ever surpassed Mozart in the complete mastery of all the intricacies of the musical art, and yet no one else's music is so apparently free from the fetters of form. And, further, no one save old "Father Bach was ever so fertile an inventor of musical ideas. In his orchestral compositions are to be found a wealth of melody, a skill in treatment and a brilliancy of instrumental coloring which have never been surpassed. It would be hard to ask for a better specimen of pure music than the "Jupiter" symphony as it was played last night.

The slight roughness and somewhat uneven playing noted at the first concert, a month ago, was conspicuously absent last night. The orchestra has got back to its old form, as was to be expected when they should have become better acquainted with their new leader. Mr. Paur himself did not work as hard as before, although he still displays a deal of energy in his manner of conducting. He seems to have the men well in hand, and is said to be personally popular with the players. Whether he is a man of the calibre of Arthur Nikisch is a question, but he is apparently a thoroughly good musician, and there will evidently be no lowering of the tone of the Symphony concerts, either in the character of the programmes or the manner of their performance.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1893.

OUR NEW MUSIC HALL.

First Instalment of Subscriptions Promptly Paid In.

Under the call for subscriptions to the capital stock of a new Boston Music Hall last summer, about $407,000 was subscribed. On Oct. 30 the first call for payment of those subscriptions was issued, calling for one-half of the subscription, or $203,500. The hard times and the defeat of the rapid transit act, which threatened to destroy the old Music Hall at once, have been supposed by many likely to interfere with the collection of the subscription. On the contrary $177,000 has already been paid in and the subscribers yet to be heard from are either temporarily absent from town or men of such wealth and standing and their subscriptions so large that it is only a matter of a few days when substantially the whole amount called for will be in hand. What it is proposed to do with this first $200,000 may be gathered from circular given below which was issued to the subscribers about a fortnight ago:

The undersigned committee have the honor to report to you that the total subscription for a new Music Hall in the city of Boston now amounts to a little over four hundred thousand dollars, and that, in consultation with experts, much time and thought have already been given to the preparation of plans and to other preliminary questions.

After full consideration as to possible sites, your committee have decided that the lot on the northwest corner of West Chester Park and Huntington avenue is the best lot available, taking into account location, shape, size and price. This lot was selected last year by two members of your committee and two of their friends, on the understanding that a new Music Hall would soon be a necessity, that it was the best lot to be had, and that it should be offered for the purpose at its cost, with interest and taxes. The whole of the purchase money was borrowed for five years at four and a half per cent. with an option to prepay the note, which was indorsed by the four persons above mentioned, who were to have the profit or loss of the purchase only in case the land should not be taken for a music hall within a reasonable time. Your committee think that the option to take the land for a music hall and to pay for it in full should now be exercised. For this purpose, for the cost of plans and other preliminary expenses, and for the further prosecution of the work, the committee ask each subscriber to pay one-half of his subscription on or before Nov. 15 next. A second instalment will not be asked for before May 15, 1894; but any subscriber can, if he prefers, now pay his subscription in full, and receive stock therefor. As soon as the sum actually paid into the committee shall amount to two hundred thousand dollars or more, a corporation will be organized and one share of stock issued for each one hundred dollars paid. When later instalments shall be called for, the capital stock will be increased to not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, in accordance with the statutes. As stock cannot be issued for fractions of $100, each subscriber of an odd number of hundreds must have the option to make his first payment $50 less than his share of the first instalment.

When the corporation has been organized, the question of the purchase of land, as above proposed, will be submitted to the stockholders at a special meeting, and later the plans for building will be likewise submitted for approval.

If you will kindly send to Messrs. Lee, Higginson & Co., at No. 50 State street, on or before Nov. 15, 1893, one-half or more of your subscription, the receipt of the committee will be given therefor, until stock of the corporation can be issued to you.

Yours truly,
EDWARD W. HOOPER.
HENRY F. SEARS.
HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

The prompt and practically unanimous response to the call for the first instalment of the subscriptions completely extinguishes the gossip that has been gaining way to the effect that the collection would be rendered difficult by what had the look of a false alarm over the destruction of the old Music Hall. The truth is, that whether the old hall is destroyed or not it has long been very generally agreed that its usefulness as a music hall had been outlived and it must have a successor more adequate to our modern requirements. At the time of Colonel Higginson's last renewal of his contracts with the musicians of the Symphony Orchestra there was a very strong appearance of probability—pretty well founded as the vote finally showed—that there might be no hall for them to play in before those contracts would expire. Hence the urgency of the call on the public last summer. But he was also brought to a realizing sense of the burden he was bearing in being responsible for both the orchestra and the hall it plays in. His friends promptly offered to see that his responsibility was eased up as regards a proper hall and home for his superb gift to musical culture and local pride. Evidently none of them are as yet repenting their action.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1893.

A concert was given in Music Hall Tuesday evening the 14th. It was the third Suffolk Musicale. The performers were members of the Campanini-Morgan Company. Miss Geraldine Morgan, the violinist, showed considerable skill and a musical temperament: Mr. Paul Morgan played an assortment of 'cello pieces; Master Lewis, a young choir boy, sang "Just a Song," "Dreams" and "M'Appari," and Campanini sang the songs that were expected from him.

* * *

The program of the fifth Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck
Concerto for violin and 'cello, A minor, op. 102.....Brahms
Symphony, C major, "Jupiter".....Mozart

The worshippers of Brahms were present, and incense was burned freely, and there were leaps of delight and perspiring pleasure and boisterous rejoicing. But this double concerto is not worthy of the composer of the Second and Third symphony.

There is an absence of spontaneity. The themes are not fresh, they are not suggestive, they are neither beautiful nor dramatic. The development is of course admirable from the purely technical standpoint, but it is often so absurdly intricate that Brahms appears as a mere propounder and solver of puzzles. There are passages in the first and in the third movement that are positively and unnecessarily disagreeable, almost hideous; and, on the other hand, in the second movement there are passages of genuine beauty.

Neither the violin nor the 'cello has a fair chance. The music is at times almost awkwardly written for the solo instruments, and the difficulties for the performers are not worth the trouble of conquering! Then the orchestra keeps up such a constant chattering. But you have heard this concerto in '89 at a Thomas Symphony concert; so let us talk no more about it.

Speaking of Brahms, I wonder if Mr. Finck has read the chapter entitled "Brahms" in "Istar," by Joséphin Sar Péladan. He would enjoy it thoroughly. I am tempted to give an extract, but refrain. You may gain an idea of it when the Sar describes Brahms' music as "Abandon qui garde son corset, félinité qui ne se risque qu'à demi au frôlement de péché; * * les réticences d'un abandon que la réflexion vient couper; d'hésitation en élans, le lyrisme du désir timoré."

The orchestra played well, and the solo performers showed courage and skill. There was nothing in the readings of Mr. Paur to excite wild approbation or virtuous indignation. He was earnest, methodical, thoroughly conscientious.

The program for the concert next Saturday will include Schumann's Symphony No. 1; Wanderer fantasy, Schubert-Liszt; three movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Liszt's "Fest-Klaenge."

The second of the Kneisel Quartet concerts was given Monday, the 13th. The program was as follows:

Quartet in E minor.....Smetana
(First time at these concerts.)
Piano trio in E flat major, op. 100.....Schubert
Quartet in G major, op. 18.....Beethoven

The Smetana Quartet was applauded loudly and with justice, for it is a strong work, whether you sympathize with the temperament of the composer, as here displayed, or not. It is full of melancholy, but the doleful dumps are not of conventional gloom. The nationality of the composer does not serve him as a staff to support tottering footsteps. There is no apparent attempt to show the hearer how "jolly" Bohemian the music is. To be sure the second movement is labeled "à la Polka," but the polka is in suggestion rather than in evidence. This same movement was accused here in one quarter of triviality. Its "triviality" was to me a delight, and to me this movement was by far the most characteristic of the four.

When did the idea gain ground that the performance of a string quartet must necessarily be a solemn, sepulchral function? Are there no movements in the quartets of Mozart and Haydn that are so piquant, so foot-inciting that they run the risk of the accusation of triviality? But what charming harmonies there are in this abused scherzo by Smetana. The first movement is well knit, admirably developed from fresh themes. The slow movement is less satisfactory; there is more groping after effect; there is a desire to be Beethovian. The finale is influenced by the folk song, and the concluding passages are beautiful.

The melancholy of Smetana, even in his mirth, would be a good subject for an ambitious writer. The date of the composition of this quartet is unknown to me. I believe it was first played in Vienna in 1880; but I can find no record of its first performance. In 1874 Smetana was stone deaf, and did he not die in a madhouse at Prague, ten years after? It would be interesting to know how deeply this quartet was affected by personal discomfort or foreboding (?), or whether the melancholy is Bohemian. At any rate Smetana here set his "careful breast, like Philomel against the thorn."

Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. In the trio she showed certain characteristics of a good ensemble player. Her touch was crisp; her sense of rhythm was seldom at fault; she appreciated the relative importance of the parts. In a word she played accurately and with taste. But she did not on this occasion show a spark of temperament. Her bearing was modest, and although the applause reached a frenetic point she did not seem to lose her practical head.

Mrs. Paur will play piano pieces Wednesday night at the concert of the Apollo Club, and she will appear next Saturday at the Symphony concert. You will undoubtedly be favored with her apparition in New York.

It is needless to say that the performance of the Quartet was worthy of the warmest praise, although the andante con moto in the trio was taken at too slow a pace.

[49]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, gave their second concert of this season at Infantry Hall last night. As was the case at the first concert, there was a noticeable falling off in the attendance, as compared with last year, the hall not being over two-thirds full. The prevailing stringency in financial affairs has evidently been felt by a portion of the concert-going public to the extent of denying themselves the luxury of a symphony ticket. There can hardly be any other explanation of the decreased attendance, for the orchestra is as good as ever, the programmes as interesting, and last night there were no counter-attractions to call people elsewhere. The programme offered last evening was somewhat shorter than usual, the concert being over before half-past 9. The following numbers were given:

Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," in C major (Richard Wagner's arrangement), Andante (C major). Johannes Brahms—Concerto for violin and violoncello, in A minor, Op. 102; I. Allegro (A minor); II. Andante (D major); III. Vivace non troppo (A minor), (first time at these concerts). Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart—Symphony in C major ("Jupiter"); I. Allegro vivace (C major); II. Andante cantabile (F major); III. Menuetto, Allegretto (C major); trio, l'istesso tempo (C major); IV. Finale: Allegro molto (C major).

The trio of composers represented on the programme form an interesting contrast—Gluck, the pioneer of operatic reform; Mozart, the consummate flower of music's classical epoch; and Brahms, a modern of the moderns. Gluck's changes in the form of opera as he found it were chiefly in the line of dramatic development. His music, while of undeniable melodic beauty, sounds quaint and old-fashioned by the side of Mozart's, who, although born 40 years later than Gluck, outlived him but four years. The overture played last night was written when Gluck was at the zenith of his powers, and is an excellent specimen of his musical genius and refined taste. It received a careful and entirely adequate presentation at the hands of the orchestra.

The novelty of the evening was the Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello. Johannes Brahms is without doubt the most profound musician living, the greatest master of musical form and all the technics of composition. But his style lacks clearness, oftentimes to an extent to fully justify the title of "the apostle of fog," which a noted critic who does not admire his works once applied to him. His music is elaborate, intricate, the work of a cunning artificer, but never seems to flow spontaneously from the fount of inborn genius. The concerto played last night seems less open to such criticism than some of his works, and made, upon the whole, a favorable impression. It may be said, however, that the interest of the work centres in the tuttis rather than in the solo work, although that, too, was interesting in some parts, and most artistically given by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

But if all that went before had been totally devoid of interest, the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart's would have made sufficient amends. The great composers have often been blind to the merits of their rivals' work, but none ever refused to do homage to the brilliant, the colossal genius of Mozart. All have sooner or later come around to the standpoint of Gounod in his later years. "When I was young," said he, "I said 'Gounod and Mozart;' in middle life I said 'Mozart and Gounod;' now I say—'Mozart.'" No one has ever surpassed Mozart in the complete mastery of all the intricacies of the musical art, and yet no one else's music is so apparently free from the fetters of form. And, further, no one save old "Father Bach was ever so fertile an inventor of musical ideas. In his orchestral compositions are to be found a wealth of melody, a skill in treatment and a brilliancy of instrumental coloring which have never been surpassed. It would be hard to ask for a better specimen of pure music than the "Jupiter" symphony as it was played last night.

The slight roughness and somewhat uneven playing noted at the first concert, a month ago, was conspicuously absent last night. The orchestra has got back to its old form, as was to be expected when they should have become better acquainted with their new leader. Mr. Paur himself did not work as hard as before, although he still displays a deal of energy in his manner of conducting. He seems to have the men well in hand, and is said to be personally popular with the players. Whether he is a man of the calibre of Arthur Nikisch is a question, but he is apparently a thoroughly good musician, and there will evidently be no lowering of the tone of the Symphony concerts, either in the character of the programmes or the manner of their performance.

EVENING TELEGRAM,
PROVIDENCE,
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It Delighted a Good Audience in Infantry Hall Last Evening.

An audience, excellent in size, and appreciative to a degree, was that to which the Boston Symphony Orchestra discoursed last night in Infantry Hall. That the efforts of Conductor Paur and his players to entertain and edify were not without fruitage, the unqualified praise expressed both during and after the concert convincingly indicated.

The orchestra was in capital form. In the manner of the conductor there were perhaps some particulars to criticise. Some thought he was too strained in his interpretations, lacking the delicacy and elasticity which were so prominent in Mr. Nikisch. There was no doubt as to his earnestness, however, and it was easy to see that every effect he exhibited was an honest exemplification of how he believed the music should go.

The strictly orchestral pieces were presented with a skill and brilliancy above comparison. The famous knack these wonderful instrumentalists have of keeping together with absolute alignment, and of giving to each note trueness and polish, was apparent at every stage.

The big display of the affair was the celebrated symphony, "Jupiter," by Mozart. "Jupiter" is the appellation settled on the work on account of the powerful passages in it. It is studded with splendid originalities, such as only Mozart could have prepared, and throughout is breathlessly interesting. The solos by Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder in a concerto by Brahms were charming. The other number was Gluck's fine overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

THE EVENING BULLETIN.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1893.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Emil Paur, gave their second concert of this season at Infantry Hall last night. As was the case at the first concert, there was a noticeable falling off in the attendance, as compared with last year, the hall not being over two-thirds full. The prevailing stringency in financial affairs has evidently been felt by a portion of the concert-going public to the extent of denying themselves the luxury of a symphony ticket. There can hardly be any other explanation of the decreased attendance, for the orchestra is as good as ever, the programmes as interesting, and last night there were no counter-attractions to call people elsewhere. The programme offered last evening was somewhat shorter than usual, the concert being over before half-past 9. The following numbers were given:

Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," in C major (Richard Wagner's arrangement), Andante (C major). Johannes Brahms—Concerto for violin and violoncello, in A minor, Op. 102; I. Allegro (A minor); II. Andante (D major); III. Vivace non troppo (A minor), (first time at these concerts). Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart—Symphony in C major ("Jupiter"); I. Allegro vivace (C major); II. Andante cantabile (F major); III. Menuetto, Allegretto (C major); trio, l'istesso tempo (C major); IV. Finale: Allegro molto (C major).

The trio of composers represented on the programme form an interesting contrast—Gluck, the pioneer of operatic reform; Mozart, the consummate flower of music's classical epoch; and Brahms, a modern of the moderns. Gluck's changes in the form of opera as he found it were chiefly in the line of dramatic development. His music, while of undeniable melodic beauty, sounds quaint and old-fashioned by the side of Mozart's, who, although born 40 years later than Gluck, outlived him but four years. The overture played last night was written when Gluck was at the zenith of his powers, and is an excellent specimen of his musical genius and refined taste. It received a careful and entirely adequate presentation at the hands of the orchestra.

The novelty of the evening was the Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello. Johannes Brahms is without doubt the most profound musician living, the greatest master of musical form and all the technics of composition. But his style lacks clearness, oftentimes to an extent to fully justify the title of "the apostle of fog," which a noted critic who does not admire his works once applied to him. His music is elaborate, intricate, the work of a cunning artificer, but never seems to flow spontaneously from the fount of inborn genius. The concerto played last night seems less open to such criticism than some of his works, and made, upon the whole, a favorable impression. It may be said, however, that the interest of the work centres in the tuttis rather than in the solo work, although that, too, was interesting in some parts, and most artistically given by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

But if all that went before had been totally devoid of interest, the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart's would have made sufficient amends. The great composers have often been blind to the merits of their rivals' work, but none ever refused to do homage to the brilliant, the colossal genius of Mozart. All have sooner or later come around to the standpoint of Gounod in his later years. "When I was young," said he, "I said 'Gounod and Mozart;' in middle life I said 'Mozart and Gounod;' now I say—'Mozart.'" No one has ever surpassed Mozart in the complete mastery of all the intricacies of the musical art, and yet no one else's music is so apparently free from the fetters of form. And, further, no one save old "Father Bach was ever so fertile an inventor of musical ideas. In his orchestral compositions are to be found a wealth of melody, a skill in treatment and a brilliancy of instrumental coloring which have never been surpassed. It would be hard to ask for a better specimen of pure music than the "Jupiter" symphony as it was played last night.

The slight roughness and somewhat uneven playing noted at the first concert, a month ago, was conspicuously absent last night. The orchestra has got back to its old form, as was to be expected when they should have become better acquainted with their new leader. Mr. Paur himself did not work as hard as before, although he still displays a deal of energy in his manner of conducting. He seems to have the men well in hand, and is said to be personally popular with the players. Whether he is a man of the calibre of Arthur Nikisch is a question, but he is apparently a thoroughly good musician, and there will evidently be no lowering of the tone of the Symphony concerts, either in the character of the programmes or the manner of their performance.

The Musical and Dramatic Courier.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 22, 1893.

BOSTON.

People who buy tickets to Symphony concerts have, I suppose, a certain right to criticize, but I often feel like asking them if they can suggest a better way than that under consideration. These wise heads remind me of the man who attacked his friend's principles and undertook to teach him how to live a more upright life, and who ended with these words: "Well, you must not do so. Instead—why—live better."

Mr. Paur gave us a reading of Mozart's Jupiter Symphony (in C. major) at this week's concert that must have charmed every intelligent listener. If the work of the orchestra can be criticized, it must be in a certain over-precise accentuation and perhaps a lack of spontaneity in color. One wished that somebody would play a shade faster or slower than his neighbors.

I venture to assert that our splendid conductor has found it necessary to curb certain over-independent tendencies in some members of his band, and so the matter of precision has, for the moment, swung too far the other way.

The first movement went in a manner almost above criticism, and there were moments, and a plenty of them, throughout the work when no one could have withheld unstinted praise from all concerned.

The Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello (in A minor, Op. 102), performed by Messrs. Kneizel and Schroeder, was a feast for all who admire this, in some respects, the greatest composer of our time.

I felt one disappointment, however, although the composition, which bristled with technical difficulties, was splendidly played. I felt that it was sometimes thankless in point of effect.

When an artist succeeds in mastering difficulties of such gigantic proportions, and the listener, who is a firm admirer of the writer and players, must needs strain his ears to discover the fact, it stands to reason that the greater part of those who attend the concert are left too far behind to receive much satisfaction for their patience. But it is proper to admire Brahms and so this most intricate, elaborate and scholarly work received enthusiastic applause, but it came from all hands, the musicians and the amateurs, so it did no harm.

Gluck's overture to Iphegenia in Aulis (Richard Wagner's arrangement) possesses interest for the musician, but must always prove, I fear, unsatisfactory on a concert program.

The lady who wondered if it was an extra movement to the Mozart Symphony will, I believe, agree with me.

BALTIMORE.

Last Tuesday was a red letter day in the musical annals of our city, for it introduced Emil Paur, the new conductor, to the Baltimore public. His advent had been heralded by the most various newspaper reports, favorable and unfavorable, and everybody looked excited and felt excited until he had made his introductory bow. "How totally unlike Nikisch," must have been the disappointed thought uppermost in all minds, as that thick-set, vigorous-looking man, with bushy hair and whiskers that malice might term red, stepped into the place where dainty, aristocratic-looking Nikisch had so often posed. The fair maidens looked in vain for an ivory white hand swinging the bâton with Delsarte grace, or for a fascinating lock of raven hair that would stray on his forehead. No, the poetic and beautiful had made way for the realistic and true. The fifth Beethoven symphony was given in a powerful, vigorous style with strongly marked rhythm and not a bit of sentimentality, and likewise the two modern compositions, Dvorak's Slavonic Rhapsody in G minor, and the Berlioz Benvenuto Cellini overture. His appearance may have been a trifle disappointing, but he proved himself to be a conductor of sterling worth, disdaining all affectation, and earnestly bent upon imbuing the orchestra with that forcible scholarly spirit which marks his individuality. Lillian Nordica, the soloist, met with a warm reception which she fully merited. Her voice is clear and powerful, and her phrasing most artistic. Her selections were Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and Beethoven's "Al perfido."

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.....Berlioz
Part II.—Fete at Capulet's House.
Part III.—Love Scene.
Part IV.—Queen Mab, Scherzo.
Grand Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer").....Schubert
(Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra, by Franz Liszt.)
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major.....Schuman

Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. Her performance recalls a sentence of Pope: "The thoughts are plain, * * * the expression humble, yet as pure as the language will afford; neat, but not florid; easy, and yet lively." There was an old-fashioned primness in her playing. There was the precision that marked the conduct of New England maidens who vexed and solaced themselves during the long and wearying sermon by frequent application to cuff-way. There was the accuracy that fears no longer the teacher ready to rap erring knuckles. And there was little display of temperament. It was an eminently chaste performance.

The tone did not seem full enough for Music Hall, and there were many moments when an exhibition of strength would have been welcome. The sincerity, the accuracy, the sobriety and the subdued taste of the pianist pleased the large audience, and Mrs. Paur was applaud d warmly and twice recalled.

The purely orchestral numbers of the programme do not call now for extended comment. It was a great pleasure to hear again the great music of Hector Berlioz, who was treated with marked respect by Mr. Paur. What noble music the "Love-scene" is! Love-it-it reeks not of time, for it is sure of eternity. As for the Queen Mab scherzo, Handick was right in suggesting as its motto the lines of Calderon:

"As for life, it is a dream.
As for dreams, they are but dreams."

PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the Symphony concert next Saturday is as follows: Brahms, Symphony C minor, No. 1; Mozart, overture, "Magic Flute;" concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; Smetani's symphonic poem, "Vitava." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist.

EMIL PAUR.

The Distinguished Director of the Symphony Orchestra Is Thankful to Many Bostonians.

Mr. Emil Paur, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wrote the Journal in German, and his letter is reproduced in fac-simile. Following is a translation:

E. Paur thinks of the holiday with thankfulness for the agreeable and friendly reception which he has found at the hands of the Boston public, for the excellent assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for the founder of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Higginson, to whom we are indirectly indebted for our æsthetic enjoyment.

E. PAUR.

Jamaica Plain, '93.

Mr. Paur expects to pass his initial Thanksgiving Day on American soil at his home at Jamaica Plain. Roast turkey, cranberry sauce, pumpkin pie and the other adjuncts common to a New England celebration of the holiday will probably be partaken of on this occasion by the great musician and his family for the first time in their lives.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was, parts 2, 3 and 4 of the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony by Berlioz; Schubert's C major Fantasia, rearranged by Liszt, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Mrs. Emil Paur was the soloist. The playing of the orchestra was up to its very best standard from the beginning to the end of the concert. The movements from the Berlioz work were read with rare beauty of conception, and more was made out of them, and a clearer and more interesting understanding was had of them than we can remember to have been vouchsafed at any earlier performance of them here. The "Love Scene" was exquisitely colored, and the "Queen Mab" scherzo was given with fascinating delicacy, and with a precision and a finish that displayed the technique of the orchestra to the finest advantage. The Schumann symphony was interpreted along conventional lines, and with brilliant and satisfying effect. In fact, in these two works Mr. Paur did his best work of the season thus far, and increased the respect for his abilities which he had hitherto won. Mrs. Paur's performance of the Fantasia was marked by much delicate technical finish, accuracy, and frank straightforwardness. She seemed to be wanting in physical power in the more vigorous moments of the work, and her reading of it was somewhat colorless; but her execution was very neat, and her style, if somewhat cold and formal, was refined. She was warmly applauded and received three recalls. The selections for the next concerts are: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; Overture "Magic Flute," Mozart; Concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; Symphonic Poem, "Vltava," Smetana. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

Music Notes.

The Adamowski Quartet gave its second concert in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting. The selections were: Quintet, B-minor, No. 2, Joseph Miroslav Weber; Andante from Quartet, op. 18, No. 5, Beethoven; Quintet for piano and strings, in A, op. 81, Dvorak. The Weber Quartet, which was given its first performance here on this occasion, is an interesting work. It does not say anything new, but what it has to say is pleasing, and is, on the whole, clearly and well said. Its merits are tunefulness, easy flow, an absence of that violent seeking after originality at any cost, which is the bane of so much of the music of our day; and skill in the treatment of the instruments. Its fault is its monotony, the movements all being in the same vein, or, at least, having that effect in the hearing. The performance of this work, as well as of the others on the programme, was careful in style and excellent in spirit, though there was much of untunefulness, probably owing to the effect of the atmosphere, and over much rasping on the 'cello and viola, owing to dragging the bow too indiscreetly over the strings. The 'cellolst also now and then fell into the common error of taking the selections for 'cello solos with accompaniments for the other instruments, the result being an undue and unmeaning prominence of the deeper voiced implement.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 26, 1893.

Mrs. Paur made her debut as a full concert pianist at the Symphony last night, and it was successful, an unusually large number of recalls testifying both to her merit as an artist and her interesting personality. It cannot be denied that she has not the solid strength or the resplendent technique for rising with ever crescent life and light to a great climax and her best field will probably be ultimately decided upon as lying within the limits of pure chamber music. For clear and even as is her touch, just and symmetrical her phrasing, skillful and knowing her use of the pedal, direct and legitimate her employment of her means, she cannot keep the solo instrument quite to the fore in the larger ensembles nor can she make its embroideries flash out above and around the formal orchestral demonstration of a subject. But she has the sensitive spirit to her finger-tips, so that her work shows quality always and is not unsatisfactory in its intellectual or artistic presentment, however much we may feel that it would be enhanced in value by more ardor or even by a little more sheer weight of force. Yet much praise is due to her also because she plays according to her own nature and her physical constitution and falls not into the common error of attempting to simulate a passion which is foreign to her or to supplement her proper strength by factitious noise. Her work with the orchestra followed the same plan which she outlined in previous concerts, and was unostentatious, fair-minded, interested, proportionate and equable. Her selection was the rarely heard but admirably compounded orchestral arrangement made by Liszt from Schubert's "Wanderer" fantasy.

The other numbers on the programme were two—the usual orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" music and Schumann's great first symphony in B flat. The performance of these powerfully contrasted works showed that conductor and orchestra are getting into close rapport, and that the fears that he might prove a formalist—or "a d——d Austrian drill-master," as Johnny P—— called him—may take to themselves wings and set out fast upon their flight. In the rendering of the Berlioz were romance, soft sensitiveness and subdued feeling for the scenes of despondency, hope, love and grief, while for the revelry of the festal night there were clangor, flash and swing, and for the fairy fancies of Mercutio's Queen Mab imaginings an airy lightness of fluttering flight crossed by the distinct figures of the various visions. The Schumann, on the other hand, was broad, firmly knit and resonant—a little qualified, indeed, by Mr. Paur's disposition to hold and mould passing phrases, but as a whole noble and earnest.

Next week's programme is this: Brahms's first symphony; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, with Mr. Adamowski to play it, and Smetana's poem, "Vitava."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 26, 1893.

Mrs Paur the Soloist at the Sixth Symphony Concert—Past and Coming Events in the Musical World.

Mrs Paur, the wife of the highly esteemed director of the Symphony orchestra, was the soloist at last night's concert. Her appearance was looked forward to with much pleasurable anticipation, and it can be said that she fulfilled all the kindly expectations awakened in her behalf.

The cordial plaudits which greeted her appearance were repeated with many times multiplied fervor at the conclusion of her playing of Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's charming fantasia in C major. There were four recalls, and there was no question as to the honesty of the enthusiasm displayed.

She can scarcely be called a brilliant player, brilliant in the sense of marked individuality, great force or showy accomplishments, but she is a pianist whose playing affords much pleasure.

She does not seem possessed of much physical strength, and her tone is slight, even for a woman. There were times yesterday when she could scarcely be said to have held her own with the orchestra, admirably as it was controlled by conductor Paur.

But her touch was sure, and the tone brought forth clear and exact, so the effect was never otherwise than pleasing. Her technique seems equal to all requirements. She plays with delightful ease. There is nothing of an ostentatious character about her work. She gives a faithful, unassuming reflection of the composer's writing.

In the softer passages of the fantasia her playing was altogether delightful. Then there was sufficient delicacy of expression, grace and finish of execution to fairly compensate for the shortcomings in the more forcible and showy movements.

The other numbers constituting the program of yesterday's concert were three movements (second, third and fourth) of Berlioz' symphony "Romeo and Juliet" and Schumann's No. 1 symphony. Although the advisability of placing practically three symphonies on one program may be questioned, Mr Paur's selections were of such a varied character and all were so splendidly interpreted that one cannot find fault with him.

The Berlioz symphony, one of the most novel, interesting and brilliant orchestral works ever written by this wonderful composer, was charmingly performed. Especially delightful was the interpretation of the third movement, or love scene, as it is termed. The Schumann symphony was given with intelligence and artistic effect.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 1 Brahms; overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; symphonic poem, "Vltava," Smetana; soloist, Mr T. Adamowski.

BOSTON
The Representative Paper of the Theatre OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 26, 1893.

At the Symphony Orchestra concert in Music Hall last evening the following programme was given: Three movements from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliette"; Schubert's grand fantasia, "Wanderer," arranged for piano and orchestra by Franz Liszt, and Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B flat.

The three movements selected from Berlioz's work are perhaps the most pleasing of the whole symphony. The first introduced the street fight of the Capulets and Montagues, the concert and ball and the fete scene. The second was the balcony scene, and the third was the Queen Mab, famous for its muted string accompaniments and striking contrasts.

Mr. Paur's skill as a conductor has not perhaps been more clearly shown than in the rendering of these three movements. Between each there is a wide difference, but all were given with an artistic rendering and musical taste which found ready appreciation with the audience. The balcony scene, with its exquisite love theme, was admirably done, while the "Queen Mab" displayed Mr. Paur's remarkable control over his forces.

Mrs. Paur was the piano soloist in the Schubert fantasia. The efforts of the lady have been commented upon at previous appearances in Boston. The present, however, was the most pretentious work she has performed here. She has a light, artistic touch, which in the heavier passages is rather weak, and there is also at times a lack of color in her playing. She has a clear and pronounced style of execution, and possibly might be heard to better advantage in a smaller hall. Her efforts were well received by the audience, and she was given a recall. The Schumann symphony proved a fitting termination of the concert. Next week T. Adamowski will be the soloist, and the following programme will be given:

Brahms. Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Mozart. Overture, "Magic Flute."
Tschaikowsky. Concerto for violin.
Smetana. Symphonic poem, "Vitava."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV., NO. 149.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A conductor who can play the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz in a way to satisfy a Frenchman, who can read the Schuman Symphony No. 1 in a manner to satisfy the strongest admirer of this great German writer, and who can conduct the orchestra in a performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" Fantasie in a way to meet the approval of his wife, is a conductor to be proud of. This is what Mr. Emil Paur did last evening at Music Hall, and it is entirely safe to say that the great audience present were entirely satisfied with the newcomer in the work of the Symphony orchestra on this occasion.

Such a performance of the second movement of the Berlioz Symphony depicting the fete at the Capulets' house has never been heard here, and the audience was carried from one stage of enthusiasm to another until the excitement at the finale found vent in applause which must have surprised the new conductor. He certainly discovered from the impression created by this remarkable orchestral performance that a Boston public can always be relied upon to show its appreciation of good work done. His performance of the love scene was an exquisitely sentimental effort, the delightful Queen Mab Scherzo was played with a fascinating brilliancy and delicacy. It is questionable if any one present enjoyed this performance more than the conductor, and he showed his appreciation by the efforts of his men in the most emphatic fashion. Among the good work done by the leading instruments that of the first oboe deserves especial commendation. The purity of the tone and the skill shown by the player deserving the warmest commendation.

Following the Berlioz symphony came the appearance of Mme. Paur, who on this occasion took the piano part in the famous "Wanderer" fantasie. Her playing on this occasion confirmed the estimate made of her abilities upon the occasion of her recent appearance with the Kneisel quartet. She is a most enjoyable pianist, and in her playing she shows a warm musical nature, thorough skill, and absolute command of the key-board, and withall an intelligence that gives an especial charm to all her work. She recalls in many ways the playing of Mme. Schiller, although she lacks somewhat the force of her predecessor, and has not the strong personality which so distinguishes Mme. Schiller's playing. Her touch is delightfully pure and clear, and the beautiful theme of the second movement was sung upon the instrument in a most expressive manner. She met the demands of the finale with good success, and, altogether, created a most favorable estimate of her value as an orchestral player. She was most heartily received and recalled repeatedly after her conclusion of the fantasie. The great first symphony of Schumann ended the programme, and the masterly fashion in which it was interpreted met the severest criticism. Altogether, Mr. Paur emphasized his success in this concert in an unusual degree. Next Saturday Mr. Timothy Adamowski will be soloist, and the programme will include the Tchaikowsky concerto, Brahms' First Symphony, "The Magic Flute" overture and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava."

The Musical and Dramatic Gazette

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 22, 1893.

BOSTON.

People who buy tickets to Symphony concerts have, I suppose, a certain right to criticize, but I often feel like asking them if they can suggest a better way than that under consideration. These wise heads remind me of the man who attacked his friend's principles and undertook to teach him how to live a more upright life, and who ended with these words: "Well, you must not do so. Instead—why—live better."

Mr. Paur gave us a reading of Mozart's Jupiter Symphony (in C. major) at this week's concert that must have charmed every intelligent listener. If the work of the orchestra can be criticized, it must be in a certain over-precise accentuation and perhaps a lack of spontaneity in color. One wished that somebody would play a shade faster or slower than his neighbors.

I venture to assert that our splendid conductor has found it necessary to curb certain over-independent tendencies in some members of his band, and so the matter of precision has, for the moment, swung too far the other way.

The first movement went in a manner almost above criticism, and there were moments, and a plenty of them, throughout the work when no one could have withheld unstinted praise from all concerned.

The Brahms concerto for violin and 'cello (in A minor, Op. 102), performed by Messrs. Kneizel and Schroeder, was a feast for all who admire this, in some respects, the greatest composer of our time.

I felt one disappointment, however, although the composition, which bristled with technical difficulties, was splendidly played. I felt that it was sometimes thankless in point of effect.

When an artist succeeds in mastering difficulties of such gigantic proportions, and the listener, who is a firm admirer of the writer and players, must needs strain his ears to discover the fact, it stands to reason that the greater part of those who attend the concert are left too far behind to receive much satisfaction for their patience. But it is proper to admire Brahms and so this most intricate, elaborate and scholarly work received enthusiastic applause, but it came from all hands, the musicians and the amateurs, so it did no harm.

Gluck's overture to Iphegenia in Aulis (Richard Wagner's arrangement) possesses interest for the musician, but must always prove, I fear, unsatisfactory on a concert program.

The lady who wondered if it was an extra movement to the Mozart Symphony will, I believe, agree with me.

BALTIMORE.

Last Tuesday was a red letter day in the musical annals of our city, for it introduced Emil Paur, the new conductor, to the Baltimore public. His advent had been heralded by the most various newspaper reports, favorable and unfavorable, and everybody looked excited and felt excited until he had made his introductory bow. "How totally unlike Nikisch," must have been the disappointed thought uppermost in all minds, as that thick-set, vigorous-looking man, with bushy hair and whiskers that malice might term red, stepped into the place where dainty, aristocratic-looking Nikisch had so often posed. The fair maidens looked in vain for an ivory white hand swinging the bâton with Delsarte grace, or for a fascinating lock of raven hair that would stray on his forehead. No, the poetic and beautiful had made way for the realistic and true. The fifth Beethoven symphony was given in a powerful, vigorous style with strongly marked rhythm and not a bit of sentimentality, and likewise the two modern compositions, Dvorak's Slavonic Rhapsody in G minor, and the Berlioz Benvenuto Cellini overture. His appearance may have been a trifle disappointing, but he proved himself to be a conductor of sterling worth, disdaining all affectation, and earnestly bent upon imbuing the orchestra with that forcible scholarly spirit which marks his individuality. Lillian Nordica, the soloist, met with a warm reception which she fully merited. Her voice is clear and powerful, and her phrasing most artistic. Her selections were Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and Beethoven's "Al perfido."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.....Berlioz
Part II.—Fete at Capulet's House.
Part III.—Love Scene.
Part IV.—Queen Mab, Scherzo.
Grand Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer").....Schubert
(Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major.....Schuman

Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. Her performance recalls a sentence of Pope: "The thoughts are plain, * * * the expression humble, yet as pure as the language will afford: lean, but not florid; easy, and yet lively." There was an old-fashioned primness in her playing. There was the precision that marked the conduct of New England maidens who years ago solaced themselves during the long and wearying sermon by frequent application to caraway. There was the accuracy that fears no longer the teacher ready to rap erring knuckles. And there was little display of temperament. It was an eminently chaste performance.

The tone did not seem full enough for Music Hall, and there were many moments when an exhibition of strength would have been welcome. The sincerity, the accuracy, the propriety and the subdued taste of the pianist pleased the large audience, and Mrs. Paur was applaud d warmly and twice recalled.

***

The purely orchestral numbers of the programme do not call now for extended comment. It was a great pleasure to hear again the great music of Hector Berlioz, who was treated with marked respect by Mr. Paur. What noble music the "Love-Scene" is! Love that reeks not of time, for it is sure of eternity. As for the Queen Mab scherzo, Hanslick was right in suggesting as its motto the lines of Calderon:

"As for life, it is a dream.
As for dreams, they are but dreams."

PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the Symphony concert next Saturday is as follows: Brahms, Symphony C minor, No. 1; Mozart, overture, "Magic Flute;" concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist.

EMIL PAUR.

The Distinguished Director of the Symphony Orchestra Is Thankful to Many Bostonians.

Mr. Emil Paur, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wrote the Journal in German, and his letter is reproduced in fac-simile. Following is a translation:

E. Paur thinks of the holiday with thankfulness for the agreeable and friendly reception which he has found at the hands of the Boston public, for the excellent assistance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for the founder of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Higginson, to whom we are indirectly indebted for our æsthetic enjoyment.

E. PAUR.

Jamaica Plain, '93.

Mr. Paur expects to pass his initial Thanksgiving Day on American soil at his home at Jamaica Plain. Roast turkey, cranberry sauce, pumpkin pie and the other adjuncts common to a New England celebration of the holiday will probably be partaken of on this occasion by the great musician and his family for the first time in their lives.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was, parts 2, 3 and 4 of the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony by Berlioz; Schubert's C-major Fantasia, rearranged by Liszt, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Mrs. Emil Paur was the soloist. The playing of the orchestra was up to its very best standard from the beginning to the end of the concert. The movements from the Berlioz work were read with rare beauty of conception, and more was made out of them, and a clearer and more interesting understanding was had of them than we can remember to have been vouchsafed at any earlier performance of them here. The "Love Scene" was exquisitely colored, and the "Queen Mab" scherzo was given with fascinating delicacy, and with a precision and a finish that displayed the technique of the orchestra to the finest advantage. The Schumann symphony was interpreted along conventional lines, and with brilliant and satisfying effect. In fact, in these two works Mr. Paur did his best work of the season thus far, and increased the respect for his abilities which he had hitherto won. Mrs. Paur's performance of the Fantasia was marked by much delicate technical finish, accuracy, and frank straightforwardness. She seemed to be wanting in physical power in the more vigorous moments of the work, and her reading of it was somewhat colorless; but her execution was very neat, and her style, if somewhat cold and formal, was refined. She was warmly applauded and received three recalls. The selections for the next concerts are: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; Overture "Magic Flute," Mozart; Concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; Symphonic Poem, "Vltava," Smetana. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

Music Notes.

The Adamowski Quartet gave its second concert in Chickering Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, assisted by Mr. Arthur Whiting. The selections were: Quintet, B-minor, No. 2, Joseph Miroslav Weber; Andante from Quartet, op. 18, No. 5, Beethoven; Quintet for piano and strings, in A, op. 81, Dvorak. The Weber Quartet, which was given its first performance here on this occasion, is an interesting work. It does not say anything new, but what it has to say is pleasing, and is, on the whole, clearly and well said. Its merits are tunefulness, easy flow, an absence of that violent seeking after originality at any cost, which is the bane of so much of the music of our day; and skill in the treatment of the instruments. Its fault is its monotony, the movements all being in the same vein, or, at least, having that effect in the hearing. The performance of this work, as well as of the others on the programme, was careful in style and excellent in spirit, though there was much of untunefulness, probably owing to the effect of the atmosphere, and over much rasping on the 'cello and viola, owing to dragging the bow too indiscreetly over the strings. The 'celloist also now and then fell into the common error of taking the selections for 'cello solos with accompaniments for the other instruments, the result being an undue and unmeaning prominence of the deeper voiced implement.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 26, 1893.

Mrs. Paur made her debut as a full concert pianist at the Symphony last night, and it was successful, an unusually large number of recalls testifying both to her merit as an artist and her interesting personality. It cannot be denied that she has not the solid strength or the resplendent technique for rising with ever crescent life and light to a great climax and her best field will probably be ultimately decided upon as lying within the limits of pure chamber music. For clear and even as is her touch, just and symmetrical her phrasing, skillful and knowing her use of the pedal, direct and legitimate her employment of her means, she cannot keep the solo instrument quite to the fore in the larger ensembles nor can she make its embroideries flash out above and around the formal orchestral demonstration of a subject. But she has the sensitive spirit to her finger-tips, so that her work shows quality always and is not unsatisfactory in its intellectual or artistic presentment, however much we may feel that it would be enhanced in value by more ardor or even by a little more sheer weight of force. Yet much praise is due to her also because she plays according to her own nature and her physical constitution and falls not into the common error of attempting to simulate a passion which is foreign to her or to supplement her proper strength by factitious noise. Her work with the orchestra followed the same plan which she outlined in previous concerts, and was unostentatious, fair-minded, interested, proportionate and equable. Her selection was the rarely heard but admirably compounded orchestral arrangement made by Liszt from Schubert's "Wanderer" fantasy.

The other numbers on the programme were two—the usual orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" music and Schumann's great first symphony in B flat. The performance of these powerfully contrasted works showed that conductor and orchestra are getting into close rapport, and that the fears that he might prove a formalist—or "a d——d Austrian drill-master," as Johnny P—— called him—may take to themselves wings and set out fast upon their flight. In the rendering of the Berlioz were romance, soft sensitiveness and subdued feeling for the scenes of despondency, hope, love and grief, while for the revelry of the festal night there were clangor, flash and swing, and for the fairy fancies of Mercutio's Queen Mab imaginings an airy lightness of fluttering flight crossed by the distinct figures of the various visions. The Schumann, on the other hand, was broad, firmly knit and resonant—a little qualified, indeed, by Mr. Paur's disposition to hold and mould passing phrases, but as a whole noble and earnest.

Next week's programme is this: Brahms's first symphony; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, with Mr. Adamowski to play it, and Smetana's poem, "Vitava."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 26, 1893.

Mrs Paur the Soloist at the Sixth Symphony Concert—Past and Coming Events in the Musical World.

Mrs Paur, the wife of the highly esteemed director of the Symphony orchestra, was the soloist at last night's concert. Her appearance was looked forward to with much pleasurable anticipation, and it can be said that she fulfilled all the kindly expectations awakened in her behalf.

The cordial plaudits which greeted her appearance were repeated with many times multiplied fervor at the conclusion of her playing of Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's charming fantasia in C major. There were four recalls, and there was no question as to the honesty of the enthusiasm displayed.

She can scarcely be called a brilliant player, brilliant in the sense of marked individuality, great force or showy accompaniments, but she is a pianist whose playing affords much pleasure.

She does not seem possessed of much physical strength, and her tone is slight, even for a woman. There were times yesterday when she could scarcely be said to have held her own with the orchestra, admirably as it was controlled by conductor Paur.

But her touch was sure, and the tone brought forth clear and exact, so the effect was never otherwise than pleasing. Her technique seems equal to all requirements. She plays with delightful ease. There is nothing of an ostentatious character about her work. She gives a faithful, unassuming reflection of the composer's writing.

In the softer passages of the fantasia her playing was altogether delightful. Then there was sufficient delicacy of expression, grace and finish of execution to fairly compensate for the shortcomings in the more forcible and showy movements.

The other numbers constituting the program of yesterday's concert were three movements (second, third and fourth) of Berlioz' symphony "Romeo and Juliet" and Schumann's No. 1 symphony. Although the advisability of placing practically three symphonies on one program may be questioned, Mr Paur's selections were of such a varied character and all were so splendidly interpreted that one cannot find fault with him.

The Berlioz symphony, one of the most novel, interesting and brilliant orchestral works ever written by this wonderful composer, was charmingly performed. Especially delightful was the interpretation of the third movement, or love scene, as it is termed. The Schumann symphony was given with intelligence and artistic effect.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 1 Brahms; overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; symphonic poem, "Vltava," Smetana; soloist, Mr T. Adamowski.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 26, 1893.

At the Symphony Orchestra concert in Music Hall last evening the following programme was given: Three movements from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliette"; Schubert's grand fantasia "Wanderer," arranged for piano and orchestra by Franz Liszt, and Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B flat.

The three movements selected from Berlioz's work are perhaps the most pleasing of the whole symphony. The first introduced the street fight of the Capulets and Montagues, the concert and ball and the fete scene. The second was the balcony scene, and the third was the Queen Mab, famous for its muted string accompaniments and striking contrasts.

Mr. Paur's skill as a conductor has not perhaps been more clearly shown than in the rendering of these three movements. Between each there is a wide difference, but all were given with an artistic rendering and musical taste which found ready appreciation with the audience. The balcony scene, with its exquisite love theme, was admirably done, while the "Queen Mab" displayed Mr. Paur's remarkable control over his forces.

Mrs. Paur was the piano soloist in the Schubert fantasia. The efforts of this lady have been commented upon at previous appearances in Boston. The present, however, was the most pretentious work she has performed here. She has a light, artistic touch, which in the heavier passages is rather weak, and there is also at times a lack of color in her playing. She has a clear and pronounced style of execution, and possibly might be heard to better advantage in a smaller hall. Her efforts were well received by the audience, and she was given a recall. The Schumann symphony proved a fitting termination of the concert. Next week T. Adamowski will be the soloist, and the following programme will be given:

Brahms. Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Mozart. Overture, "Magic Flute."
Tschaikowsky. Concerto for violin.
Smetana. Symphonic poem, "Vitava."

.....

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 149.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A conductor who can play the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz in a way to satisfy a Frenchman, who can read the Schuman Symphony No. 1 in a manner to satisfy the strongest admirer of this great German writer, and who can conduct the orchestra in a performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" Fantasie in a way to meet the approval of his wife, is a conductor to be proud of. This is what Mr. Emil Paur did last evening at Music Hall, and it is entirely safe to say that the great audience present were entirely satisfied with the newcomer in the work of the Symphony orchestra on this occasion.

Such a performance of the second movement of the Berlioz Symphony depicting the fete at the Capulets' house has never been heard here, and the audience was carried from one stage of enthusiasm to another until the excitement at the finale found vent in applause which must have surprised the new conductor. He certainly discovered from the impression created by this remarkable orchestral performance that a Boston public can always be relied upon to show its appreciation of good work done. His performance of the love scene was an exquisitely sentimental effort, the delightful Queen Mab Scherzo was played with a fascinating brilliancy and delicacy. It is questionable if any one present enjoyed this performance more than the conductor, and he showed his appreciation by the efforts of his men in the most emphatic fashion. Among the good work done by the leading instruments that of the first oboe deserves especial commendation. The purity of the tone and the skill shown by the player deserving the warmest commendation.

Following the Berlioz symphony came the appearance of Mme. Paur, who on this occasion took the piano part in the famous "Wanderer" fantasie. Her playing on this occasion confirmed the estimate made of her abilities upon the occasion of her recent appearance with the Kneisel quartet. She is a most enjoyable pianist, and in her playing she shows a warm musical nature, thorough skill, and absolute command of the key-board, and withall an intelligence that gives an especial charm to all her work. She recalls in many ways the playing of Mme. Schiller, although she lacks somewhat the force of her predecessor, and has not the strong personality which so distinguishes Mme. Schiller's playing. Her touch is delightfully pure and clear, and the beautiful theme of the second movement was sung upon the instrument in a most expressive manner. She met the demands of the finale with good success, and, altogether, created a most favorable estimate of her value as an orchestral player. She was most heartily received and recalled repeatedly after her conclusion of the fantasie. The great first symphony of Schumann ended the programme, and the masterly fashion in which it was interpreted met the severest criticism. Altogether, Mr. Paur emphasized his success in this concert in an unusual degree. Next Saturday Mr. Timothy Adamowski will be soloist, and the programme will include the Tchaikowsky concerto, Brahms' First Symphony, "The Magic Flute" overture and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava."

[50]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 27, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

Berlioz's symphonic setting of "Romeo and Juliet" is probably the most successful musical outcome of Shakespeare's tragedy. No literary work except Goethe's "Faust" has ever brought forth so much music. All the world loves a lover, and here was a pair of them ready to the musician's hand; as a consequence, overture, symphony and opera have been built upon the theme. Yet it is safe to say that the Shakespearian ideal has never been attained in the last-named form, spite of the efforts of Gounod, Bellini and a host of others. Berlioz had suffered the agony of love for an actual Juliet (the actress whom he subsequently married), and certain parts of his musical setting must have been almost auto-biographical; however this may be, it is certain that in the third part of his "Romeo and Juliet" symphony he attained a spontaneity which is far beyond that exhibited in his other works. The "balcony scene" is here presented in a picture to the ear as graphic as any painting that appeals to the eye. It is the idealized personification of instruments.

The absence of chorus and soloiists made it impossible to present more than parts II., III. and IV., and the work began with the picture of Romeo in his solitary meditation, with the Ball of the Capulets in the distance. The picture was most clearly drawn, although the dance rhythm which formed the background could have been more elastic. There was a tendency to bring out the details en silhoutte, which did not quite suit to the vague outlines which Berlioz has drawn. But it meant much to give so difficult a score so clean a performance, and both the technique of the orchestra and the intelligence of the conductor were well displayed in the movement. The oboe work was something exceptionally artistic, and Mr. Sautet deserves especial mention. The "balcony scene" was perfectly given and the tender dialogue of the lovers, the abrupt calls of the nurse, entire action, in short, was as dramatic and fully as poetic, as if the scene had been enacted by personages, which is an auspicious indication of the emotional capaci-ties of Mr. Paur.

"Queen Mab" is one of those movements which Berlioz occasionally dragged in by the ears (as the death of Childe Harold among brigands or the sending of Faust to perdition) to show his orchestral technique. Such movements are their own sufficient raison d'etre, and the composer always shines in them. It was a technical triumph for all concerned, and if not as capricious as it has been heard here, was certainly clearer than we have had it in recent times.

Now came Schubert's piano fantasie, op. 15, magnified into a very free concerto by Liszt, with the piano part played by Mrs. Paur. This is the work which, like the creation of Frankenstein, overthrew its own maker, for Schubert was unable to play it; once he attempted it before an audience, and after three failures, sprang from the piano exclaiming, "Das Zeug mag der Teufel spielen!" Mrs. Paur did not follow Schubert's example, but played the movements in a very clear and intelligent manner. There was a trifle of formality in the presentation of the theme of "Der Wanderer," and there was more of precision than of abandon in other parts of the work, but the beautiful embellishments of the song, by the piano, while the melody appeared upon the 'cello and the horn (both played exquisitely) were worthy of praise, and the contrapuntal touches of the finale were brilliantly done. As yet we have found more of intelligence and musicianly fidelity in Mrs. Paur's playing, than of fire or enthusiasm. It is to her credit that she is not in the least sensational and attempts no tricks either personal or musical, to catch the multitude. The contrapuntal effects of the finale of the fantasie at once call to mind that in some respects Schubert was at the very beginning of his career when he died. Had he studied counterpoint (he made arrangements to take lessons of Sechter the week before he died) he might have been a greater composer than any of them all, except Bach, and would probably have reconciled contrapuntal complexity with melodic beauty more thoroughly than any other composer.

The concert ended with that outburst of spring and sunshine called "Symphony in B flat" by Schumann, but which narrowly escaped the deserved title of "Spring Symphony." There was something of timidity in the first horn and trumpet call, but these instruments were excellently played after this. Schumann originally wrote this call a third lower, a totally impracticable passage for the natural horns and trumpets which he employed, but as today we use the keyed horn and trumpet (ventil-horns in F are the only ones generally found in the modern orchestra) it might be well to restore the passage as it stood originally, using the notes B flat, G and A. As regards the trumpets this would be easy enough as they are at present. In this connection one may express the hope that we may yet have two natural trumpets in our orchestra. We were the first to abolish the desecration of substituting the cornet for the trumpet, why not make a step further in artistic progress in the same direction?

The symphony was beautifully played, with a sufficiency of energy yet without any suspicion of exaggeration, and became a pure delight from beginning to end.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Three Movements from the Symphony "Roméo et Juliette," Opus 17.
Schubert: Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), Opus 15, symphonically rearranged for Pianoforte and Orchestra by Liszt.
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Opus 38.
Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist.

A delightful programme, if ever there were one. The three movements—"Romeo alone, Fête at Capulet's house:" "Love-scene!" and "Queen Mab" from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony, lose a good deal by being given out of their proper surroundings in the work; it is with them much as Berlioz himself said it was with the Pilgrims' March in his "Harold en Italie" symphony; "whenever the whole symphony was played, the March was always encored; but when the March was given by itself, it hardly got a hand!" Of the three movements in question the Love-scene undoubtedly suffers most. The "Romeo alone and Fête at Capulet's house" is the best adapted to stand by itself as an independent movement; in form it is very like a concert overture, with its slow introduction and long Allegro, and makes a fair pendant to the composer's overture to the "Carnaval Romain," with which it has much in common. To be sure, its exceedingly quiet and rather vague beginning makes more effect when it comes immediately after the solemn A minor chords that end the Prologue; still it finds little difficulty in standing on its own legs. But the Love-scene, beginning with those mysterious, soft 5ths on the flutes and clarinet, comes very strangely after the resounding closing climax of the "Fête at Capulet's," and much needs the little intervening scene of the young Capulets passing through the garden on their way home from the ball to put the listener into the right mood for it. The "Queen Mab" scherzo, on the other hand, loses nothing; it follows the Love-scene quite as when the whole symphony is given. Yet half a loaf is better than no bread, and it is better to hear these three scenes even at a slight disadvantage than not to hear them at all.

They were, one and all, wonderfully played; the performance per se left nothing to be desired. Here Mr. Paur's frequent modifications of the tempo were exactly in place and consequently wonderfully effective; the music needs them, and can not well do without them. Hans von Bülow once said, on being asked what sort of a conductor Berlioz was, that "he was absolutely superb, when conducting his own works, but that in the classical repertory he was a mere metronome." Bülow is a well known advocate of great rhythmic elasticity in orchestral performance, and his praise of Berlioz's conducting his own works—when taken together with his slighting remark upon his conducting of other things—plainly implies that he intended his own compositions to be played with considerable rhythmic freedom. With Berlioz the musical form is, in general, so loose-jointed and the development often so erratic that one does not feel the need of preserving that unity of tempo, without which a movement by Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven loses much of its unity of form. Berlioz seldom wrote impersonally; he treated the orchestra much as he would a solo instrument, as the medium through which he expressed his own personal emotion in a perfectly personal and individual way; his style was largely what the Germans call freiphantasierend, bound to no typical forms of expression, but reflecting every slightest momentary change in his own mood. One can imagine him standing at the head of his orchestra, as a pianist sits improvising at the pianoforte: letting his fancy carry him whither it will. His inspiration seldom crystallized into that closely knit and stoutly organic form we find in the works of the classic masters, which always has something of the elemental and impersonal in it. Accordingly his music is to be treated in a different spirit from theirs: in it the impulse of the moment rises superior to the general predetermined plan. Thus Mr. Paur's modifications of the tempo all seemed natural, they all responded to an inner necessity and vindicated their own reason of being; they never seemed obtrusive nor out of place. In a word, the playing of the three "Roméo et Juliette" movements was one of the finest triumphs of Mr. Paur and the orchestra.

Schumann's symphony, on the other hand, seemed to us to go less satisfyingly; the playing was generally clear enough and certainly lacked nothing in vigor and animation: but it was not always highly finished, and one felt that there was more in the work than the performance showed. It would be folly to call this symphony of Schumann's less exciting, even in a merely physical sense, that Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette,"—not to mention other comparisons that might be drawn between the two works—but there was no place in any of the four movements in which the orchestra produced so magnetic and overwhelming an effect as it did in the Coda of the "Fête at Capulet's"—from the point where the ascending scales in triplets begin, up to the end. And there is not a little in the Schumann symphony that ought to to be quite as maddeningly effective as that.

Mrs. Paur made an exceedingly favorable impression in the Liszt-Schubert fantasia. That she is not physically quite strong enough to play with orchestra in the Music Hall must be admitted. This is fair criticism; no artist can claim immunity from criticism on the ground that her short-comings are not her own fault. Neither can it justly be said in this case that the orchestra unduly covered her playing; the orchestra played just right, it played the music as it was written. But, apart from this lack of physical strength, Mrs. Paur played the fantasia very beautifully indeed. In sentiment, conception, facility and clearness of execution, beauty of tone, and vitality of accent, she left nothing to be desired. Her concentration, not upon herself, but upon the music she is playing, is absolute; and how delightful this pure, musical, honest playing is! How it shows you the music, and nothing but the music! The charm of her playing may be thus summed up: she plays, as Brillat-Savarin would say, pour faire briller le compositeur—so as to let the composer shine!

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68; Mozart, overture to "Die Zauberflöte;" Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" (2d, 3d and 4th movements).....Berlioz
Grand Fantasia in C major, "Wanderer".....Schubert
Symphony No. 1 in B flat major..Schumann
Mrs. Emil Paur was the soloist.

The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was excellent, for only in the last movement of the Schumann Symphony was there any discrepancy observed. An exact precision was wanting in the wind instruments at the beginning of this movement, but this may have been because of the slower tempo that was taken by Conductor Paur, slower than that of any of his predecessors, the players not being quite prepared for so slow a pace. The shortcoming in the playing was immediately remedied, but I don't think that the slower tempo improved the movement.

The Berlioz number was admirably performed. Mr. Paur's conception of the great Frenchman's composition is to be commended and one observes with gratification the manner in which Mr. Paur devotes his whole soul to his work. The delicacy with which he touched the scherzo has never been surpassed in these concerts.

The "Wanderer" fantasie, which Liszt symphonically rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra, gave Mrs. Paur the opportunity to display her refined, classical taste and facile, clean technique. Within a certain scope Mrs. Paur plays admirably, but her apparently impassionate nature and lack of power rather subject her to limitations that serve in keeping her without the circle of effective concert artists in the broader sense. Mrs. Paur's capacity seems to be rather that of an excellent chamber music performer, or a salon player, if one does not demand warmth of temperament in the latter.

Mr. Paur was not as discreet in directing the accompaniment in this number as he should have been. Almost always it was too loud, and even boisterous sometimes. It was rather a surprise that he should have offended in this manner, for his accompanying has generally been quite judiciously managed.

Next Saturday evening, if the programme be not rearranged in the meantime, we shall hear Brahm's Symphony No. 1; overture to "Magic Flute," Mozart, concerto for violin, Tschaikousky, and "Vltave," a movement from a symphonic poem by Swetana, entitled "My Fatherland." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

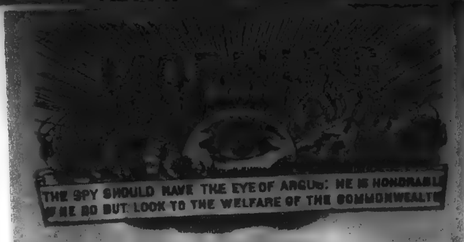
THE TELEGRAM.
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 29, 1893.

FIRST OF THE SYMPHONIES.

A Splendid Concert, But a Slim Crowd.

The first of the series of symphony concerts took place, last night, in Mechanics hall, and the audience was given a decided artistic treat. It need scarcely be said that the Boston symphony orchestra is the finest combination of musical instruments in the country, nor need it be added that Alwin Schroeder is one of the kings of 'celloists.

And when to all this is added the brilliant singing of Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who was the soloist of the evening, it can be easily understood that the first of the symphonies opened under highly auspicious circumstances.



WORCESTER.
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 29, 1893.

MR. PAUR MAKES HIS BOW.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND ITS NEW CONDUCTOR.

The People Seemed to Like His Schoolmaster Air—A Fine Concert and a Pretty Songstress.

The historic State Theatre in Leipsic has given three conductors to America. First came Anton Seidl, whose place at the theatre was immediately filled by Arthur Nikisch. When Nikisch sailed for this country Emil Paur succeeded him at Leipsic. Three more widely contrasted conductors could hardly have been selected. Two of them are well known in this city. The third and last of the succession made his first appearance here last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its second annual series of concerts in Mechanics Hall.

The program was:

Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, B flat, op. 38
Bizet.....Aria, "Pearl Fishers"
Volkmann.....
Serenade for strings, No. 3, D minor, op. 69
Gounod.....Waltz, "Romeo and Juliet"
Beethoven....Overture to "Leonore," No. 3 op. 72

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist.

Hardly a better program could have been chosen to show off the new conductor, for he has attempted nothing in Boston that has won higher commendation than his readings of Schumann's cheery, strong and vivacious "Spring" symphony and the noble overture to Beethoven's only opera. The music was superbly played. The unhappy Volkmann's melancholy serenade did not exhibit Alwin Schroeder at his best as a 'cellist, but there were many moments of great beauty in his solo, and the great body of strings was magnificent. The conductor manages his rubato effects exquisitely, but for general sorts of prettinesses, he is no match for Nikisch. Whether this implies superiority or the reverse, will depend much upon the temperament of the hearer.

Petite, pretty Lillian Blauvelt has a voice as lovely as her face, and that is saying considerable. What is quite as important, she knows how to use her voice. The popular "Pearl Fishers" aria and the well-known "Romeo and Juliet" waltz were delivered with rare grace and spirit and in excellent tune. The young singer earned both her double recalls, and showed her good sense by refusing encores. As a matter of fact, the orchestra was in a hurry to get back to Boston, and encores were not to be thought of. The concert was over by 9.05—a very comfortable time—so that people really hankered for more music.

Those newspaper writers who ventured an opinion of Mr. Paur's characteristics after a single hearing have had their estimates confirmed by successive hearings, save in one important particular. Under his baton the orchestra does not habitually play with that enthusiastic fervor which the first performance seemed to promise. For lack of it the music sometimes approaches tameness. There will be general rejoicing, however, that Boston at last has a conductor who is "correct." It will be interesting to observe how soon that town will grow weary of his correctness.

It is not to be disputed that the orchestra has gained something in changing from Nikisch to Paur. The discipline is better, the morale is better. Ubiquitous sweet femininity and languorousness give place to virility and robustness when such qualities are required. The balance of parts is more perfect, and more careful attention is given to details. The inner parts are no longer buried, and secondary figures receive an attention unknown in Boston since Gericke's day. There is also greater precision. On the other hand the new conductor is not conspicuous for poetic sympathy. With him passion does not seem to be a very strong emotion. There is an air of studious, intellectual calculation about his playing that often minimizes romantic effect. He is a man of force and intellectuality rather than of emotion and sentiment. Then, too, he has the phrasing habit rather severely developed, so that the classics are apt to come forth like cubes, prisms and octahedrons, or sharply dissected as the squares of a checker board. The result is to disjoint the music and interrupt its continuity. The stern emphasis and angular rigidity of his beat tend to intensify this impression.

This is a very brief and general summary of the praise and criticism that has been visited upon Mr. Paur. It is encouraging to note that the band has been steadily improving, especially in flexibility, since Mr. Paur's abrupt change of method first robbed it of some measure of that quality. Last night's concert was one of the most satisfactory that the band has given under the new conductor, and it is fair to expect that still further progress will be noticed as the season moves on.

The audience was of fair size, but would have been much larger had not there been so many other calls that the usual symphony patrons could not refuse. The next concert will be given Thursday, Dec. 28.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1893.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony..Berlioz
Grand fantasia in C major, "Wanderer".....Schubert
(Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major.....Schumann

The orchestra played exceedingly well. The movements from the Berlioz' symphony were read artistically by the conductor. His love for carefulness in detail did not here cause him to forget the poetry of the composer that found expression in music.

Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. Her tone, while it was agreeable and lady-like, was not full enough for the hall. She displayed the results of careful instruction in the decorum of piano playing.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert next Saturday is as follows:

Symphony, C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture, "Magic Flute".....Mozart
Concerto for violin.....Tschaikowsky
Symphonic poem, "Vitava".....Smetana

Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 29, 1893.

BOSTON.

I must modify my previously expressed admiration of Herr Paur: but as Ruskin made himself greater in the eyes of many by retracting his criticisms of Turner than by any other act of his life, I trust that my honesty may plead for me.

Here is a man coming direct from Leipzig, the home of sober-going plod, unpoetic in appearance, ungraceful in gesture and attire, who gives us a rather coarse, unbalanced performance of the Schumann Symphony (No. 1, op. 38, in B. flat major) and in the same programme, a brilliant, masterly rendition of three movements of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

Who could have forseen anything so incongruous?

The Berlioz work included:

Part II. The fêto: Andante and Allegro.
" III. Love Scene: Adagio.
" IV. Queen Mab: Scherzo: Prestissimo.
Trio: Allegretto.

It has always seemed incomprehensible to me that Berlioz should have received early recognition from Germany and but little, until after his death, from France. And now to hear such a performance as this work from a German conductor, while the same concert gives the Schuman Symphony in an almost coarse and thoroughly disappointing manner is a great surprise.

The absolute freshness, care, enthusiasm and finish of Herr Paur's reading, left little to be desired. Regarding the tempi in such a work, I question any critic's right to express radical opinion.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; two movements from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D, Tschaikowsky, and Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," Smetana. It was, on the whole, a dull and dry programme. The Symphony was industriously interpreted, not a point that was possible to make, was missed, and, on the whole, we doubt if the work has had a more elaborate reading than was accorded it by Mr. Paur. The resulting effect of all this minute care did not seem felicitous, for it emphasized the studious pedagogy of the composition and deprived it of what slight flexibility it has, and made it more severe and more tiresome than was necessary. Now and then, however, some portions of the work came out clearer than they did at any of its earlier performances here and the vigorous close of the finale was given with stirring power. The playing of the orchestra was steadily fine throughout. The applause at the close was very enthusiastic. The Mozart Overture came like a gleam of sunshine after the heaviness and the pedantry that preceded it. Here there is profound learning, but there is facility in the use of it, and the effect is as clear as crystal. It is possibly rank heresy to express the belief that there is more true music and more real genius in this one brief movement, than there is in the whole of the symphony, but we hold to that faith. Mr. Paur gave the tempo a very rapid pace; so rapid, in fact, that many of the passages for the wind instruments, especially for the bassoons, did not, and could not have been made to come out distinctly. The composer's indication is allegro, but it was construed into something very closely resembling the presto of the "Figaro" overture. It would seem though that this is the established modern view of the time in which the work should be played. The performance, which was admirable, was not rewarded with any very hearty applause. Perhaps the work is too easily comprehended to excite such approbation as attended the more vague music of Brahms. The last movement of the violin concerto was omitted. The andante was played first, and the opening allegro followed. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and he acquitted himself of his difficult task with skill and brilliancy. There was an occasional lapse in intonation in the more elaborate and trying passages, but the performance as a whole was able and interesting. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and twice recalled. At the next concert will be played: Dramatic Symphony, Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann. There will be no soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1893.

Acquaintance with the now almost familiar first symphony of Brahms cannot yet make its almost confusedly composite opening movement lucid or agreeable to many ears. Its tremendous vigor and determination, its unrelaxing persistence in pushing its fierce way along, its power and grasp of the means of thematic development must be felt at once and they have a great weight of influence. But this is chiefly the influence of an immense volume of energetic tonal figures forcing themselves onward in an excited and closely banded mass, and does not reconcile one to the strange and clamorous dissonances, the complications of counterpoint and the apparently conflicting cries which arise here and there in the musical tumult. But if one can get safely through this, then comes relief and balm in the succeeding movements. The serious suavity of the second movement, the lilting gayety of the third and the variety of the fourth come welcomely with contentment, transparency, poetry and a sufficiency of vehemence and demonstrativeness to bring out the finale with the utmost sonority of which a band is capable. Mr. Paur's rendering, at last night's Symphony, was admirable in attention to the moods as well as the manner of the composer, and was received with great evidences of satisfaction, the applause—as was to be expected—being lightest after the first movement and most decided after the last.

The programme continued well with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, which offered a charming contrast. Its opening adagio, with those few grand chords which give it solemnity, bridged well the distance between the potential strains of the symphony and the merry themes, the rippling buoyant fugal passages and the airy fancies of the main body of the overture. The audience were quick to appreciate this, and their attention was close and their recognition immediate and emphatic.

The solo number came next—the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's second violin concerto. These are, it will be remembered, a sweet and lovely canzonetta, presented almost naively in simplicity of diction and quaint but delicate embroidery of accompaniment, and a vivid and rapid finale based upon two themes of unmistakable Russian type. Mr. Adamowski was the player, and he won many ecomiums. His tone, always notably pure, soft and charming, was all itself; his expected delicacy of taste did not fail him, his execution was more easy and free than it sometimes is in music so difficult as this finale, and he very rarely in intonation, where he has been apt to be a little errant in awkward passages. Toward the close he needed a more nervous and rougher fashion of emphasis; but with this exception made, his performance may be given a very honorable place on the record.

The evening ended with an earnest, picturesque spirited and enthusiastic rendering of Smetana's really poetic orchestral scene, "The Moldau" River" the fine flowing fancies being fascinatingly clear and the statelier passages swelling out to the full strength of the orchestra.

Next week's programme is thus announced:—Rubenstein's "Dramatic" symphony; orchestral variations by Brahms, and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. It will not be a solo week.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 156.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Adamowski.

The programme of the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, had as its leading features a performance of the first of the Brahm's symphonies, and the appearance of Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

In his reading of the first of the symphonic conundrums propounded by Brahms, the new conductor made its meaning as clear as any of his predecessors, and he had the satisfaction of having his efforts in elucidating its mysteries fully appreciated. The beauties of the last movement were given with rare clearness, and the finale was worked up with splendid fire and energy. The performance of the symphony added another to the former triumphs of the new conductor.

Mr. Adamowski selected for his annual appearance as soloist in these concerts two movements—the canzonetta and the finale of the violin concerto No. 2, op. 35, by Tschaikowsky. He had his usual hearty reception as he stepped to the soloist's place, and his popularity with his public was as distinctly shown as in former years. In the canzonetta his playing had all the delightful characteristics which made and have maintained his favor with American audiences—the purity of his tone, the sympathetic quality of his playing and the feeling and expression with which he interpreted this movement giving great satisfaction. In the finale his success was equally great. Mr. Adamowski is not altogether suited to the demands of such a composition, as he lacks the freedom and dash of the virtuoso, but he gave the movement with fine finish and great brilliancy despite this characteristic of his play. He was warmly commended by his audience for his performance.

A highly artistic reading of the "Magic Flute" overture and a very satisfying performance of Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau" completed the programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a delightful concert at the Newton Club house in Newtonville Wednesday evening. There were beautiful floral decorations, and 300 guests enjoyed Mr. Kneisel's band and the violin playing of Miss Olive Mead, the soloist of the occasion.

The Seventh Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, C minor.....Brahms
Overture, "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
First two movements from concerto for violin, D major, Tschaikowsky
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana

Brahms still excites discussion, and all are not yet ready to bow the knee to the son of the double-bass player of Hamburg. The discussion is protracted and often hot, because the followers of Brahms insist that you must take the works of "the Master" in bulk. Everything is "wonderful, wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful, and yet again wonderful, and after that out of all whooping!" These worshipers are not unlike Brahms himself, as described some years ago by Beatty-Kingston: "Loud, dictatorial, a little too obviously penetrated with a sense of his surpassing greatness." What marvel then that he who cannot admire or love honestly such a work as the C minor symphony is tempted to imitate the conduct of Count Laurencin in discussing Wagner, and is apt "to foam slightly at the mouth and to grind his teeth in a highly alarming manner."

After many hearings of the C minor symphony of Brahms I am almost reconciled to the Wagner of the Nibelungen period.

For if Wagner is constantly striving to make an effect on the public, Brahms seems to parody a phrase of Grillparzer, to be very busy in making an effect upon himself. The Ego of this symphony is not sympathetic; and whether this Ego is affected or not by the endeavor is of little importance to the outsider.

Joncières once said of one of Brahms's more popular symphonies that it was too full of brushwood. The phrase is expressive, and it may be applied more justly to the first than to the second symphony, which in comparison with the former is clearness itself. For the C minor symphony is obscure, wilfully obscure; and if, as some think, obscurity is synonomous with greatness, then the symphony is sublime. Let us admit cheerfully that there are fine passages; passages of an austere nobility; but how much spontaneous music is there in the work from beginning to end? Or is there one honest, or, dishonest dramatic appeal to a human emotion? But music must be emotional, or it is not genuine music. The chief pleasure inspired by such a work of Brahms seems to be the effort of the brain to detect wherein the pleasure lies. Such pleasure then implies a real or feigned intellectuality in the person who is or pretends to be pleased. It is not surprising that such works of Brahms are fashionable and heard with a petrified smile of rapt enjoyment, even when the work lasts an hour. And yet "how endurable life would be, were it not for its pleasures!"

In this symphony of Brahms the players seem to wander in a forest imagined by Maeterlinck. The forest is dark, although it is high noon, and the sky is clear. No birds sing in this forest. There are no wild-flowers in this forest; nor in this forest are there any trees of beauty. The trees, indeed, seem dream trees, seen in restless sleep. The players wander blindly. Alarmed, they call to each other; they sound their alarm together. They try to weep, but terror forbids tears. They try to be gay: but their jests fall without laughter. They suspect the presence of winged things. The air grows dull and heavy. Suddenly they come into clear ground, and they see a canal with green water. Beyond is a hospital, with the sick people looking out of the windows. A boat is dragged along, and queerly-dressed men and women sing a tune that sounds like unto a travesty of the hymn in Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Then all is dark. The dreamer wakes. There is darkness. There is the remembrance of a dark dream.

* * *

Perhaps it was not the fault of conductor or orchestra, but the concert as a whole seemed dull. The marvelous overture of Mozart was taken at such a rapid pace that passages for the wood-wind were inaudible. I admit that there has been much discussion concerning the proper tempo of this allegro. But Mozart did not write certain passages for the wood-wind as a mere stop-gap; and when that which should be clear is muddy, and when the players are men of skill, the fault lies surely in the tempo chosen by the conductor.

How delightfully clear, however, is the design of this overture. Perhaps on account of this very clearness, and on account of the classic beauty of theme and development, the overture failed apparently to please as much as did the reading for one hour of the gospel of Brahms.

* * *

Mr. T. Adamowski played portions of the concerto for violin in D major by Tschaikowsky. Mr. Adamowski is not without the gift of awakening pleasing emotions. He often plays admirably; still, when he is at his best he is too apt to suggest a room hung with heavy tapestry, perfumed with pastils and tuberoses. He was applauded warmly, but Tschaikowsky called for a more heroic player.

PHILIP HALE.

[illegible]

Established [illegible]

MONDAY MORNING, [illegible]

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Gericke, who had very pronounced ideas on the subject of programme making, generally placed the symphony last on his programmes, saying "the effect of a masterpiece should not be lessened by hearing anything after it." Mr. Paur evidently proceeds on a different theory, holding that the audience can best appreciate a long symphony while unfatigued by other music, and he therefore places the large instrumental epic first on his list. There is truth in both views, and certainly there seemed to be an advantage in hearing Brahms' most complex symphony at the outset. Shakespeare's apothegm that music is "to refresh the mind of man after his studies or his usual pain," is certainly not sustained by Brahms' C minor symphony, for its every measure demands active mental effort on the part of the auditor. The first movement especially is full of "life's endless toil and endeavor," and there are few passages suggestive of repose in its deeply intellectual scheme. It is sufficient praise to say that it was clearly played, and, excepting a preponderance of kettle drum, with excellent balance of parts. The two interior movements were admirably shaded and the woodwind did excellent work. The finale is, to the reviewer at least, the finest part of the work; here one finds an epitome of all the movements, an idea possibly suggested by the instrumental part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony. This movement was played with great breadth, but there were certain points in the reading which differed from the interpretation of any of the three preceding conductors. The striking effect of the accelerando in the pizzicato passage was avoided altogether, the phrase being taken with a deliberation which was new and scarcely advantageous. On the other hand, the majesty with which the theme upon the brasses was played deserves commendation. It was a welcome surprise to find the public becoming enthusiastic over this, and the critic can join in the popular verdict, even while recommending a restoration of the accelerated style of the pizzicati spoken of above.

The "Magic Flute" overture was taken at a breakneck speed, once the introduction was passed. Mr. Paur has plenty of precedent here, and even the cautious and conservative Mr. Gericke used to give this fugato (the most beautiful fugal exposition in the world) at a presto pace. It is wrong, though, for all that; Mozart marked it "allegro" and the beauty of its subject, the exact relation of its answer, and the effect of the wind passages, are all lost by an exaggerated speed. A thousand precedents would not justify this tempo.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the concert, came rather late upon the programme, with two movements of Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major. What wonderful effects this Russian achieved with the wind instruments! They formed a most impressive background to the sadness expressed by the violin in the slow movement. Perhaps the only fault of the work as a composition, however, is that the orchestra is too often kept as a background. Beethoven and Brahms have taught the world what a true concerto should be—an orchestral composition with a thread of solo running through its warp and woof. This the work in question was not, for it gave constant prominence to the soloist, and often in passages of greatest virtuosity. In the slow movement Mr. Adamowski played with great expression and with absolute surety. Russian sadness is the deepest melancholy to which a musical composer can ever attain; the Slav goes to extremes in his tonal emotions. When he is glad he is very, very glad, and when he is sad he is horrid. Mr. Adamowski was best in the melancholic side of the question, for in the allegro he seemed overweighted at times. There is scarcely a technical point of difficulty which does not appear here (except double harmonics). Following the example of Mendelssohn the composer has the cadenza long before the close. Skips, double stopping in chromatic passages, harmonics natural and artificial, and a host of other difficulties were overcome, but not with absolute ease. One felt a trifle anxious at times, a feeling not conducive to the full success of the work. There were, however, no important slips to condone, and the artist was most heartily applauded, and deserved to be.

After the Southeastern Slav came the Western branch in the shape of a Czech, and Smetana's river picture "Vltava" brought the concert to a close. This was a very changeable musical panorama, but through it all there ran the ripple of the stream, and there was coherency even in the midst of contrast. There were moments when the effect would have been enhanced by a slower tempo, and the dance rhythm seemed too ponderous and inelastic, but as a whole the work was effectively performed and it was evident that even the outre touches of this and the preceding number were by no means Caviare to the general.

LOUIS. C. ELSON.

[52]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1893.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony..Berlioz
Grand fantasia in C major, "Wanderer".....Schubert
(Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major.....Schumann

The orchestra played exceedingly well. The movements from the Berlioz' symphony were read artistically by the conductor. His love for carefulness in detail did not here cause him to forget the poetry of the composer that found expression in music.

Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist. Her tone, while it was agreeable and lady-like, was not full enough for the hall. She displayed the results of careful instruction in the decorum of piano playing.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert next Saturday is as follows:

Symphony, C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Overture, "Magic Flute".....Mozart
Concerto for violin.....Tschaikowsky
Symphonic poem, "Vitava".....Smetana

Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 29, 1893.

BOSTON.

I must modify my previously expressed admiration of Herr Paur: but as Ruskin made himself greater in the eyes of many by retracting his criticisms of Turner than by any other act of his life, I trust that my honesty may plead for me.

Here is a man coming direct from Leipzig, the home of sober-going plod, unpoetic in appearance, ungraceful in gesture and attire, who gives us a rather coarse, unbalanced performance of the Schumann Symphony (No. 1, op. 38, in B. flat major) and in the same programme, a brilliant, masterly rendition of three movements of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

Who could have forseen anything so incongruous?

The Berlioz work included:

Part II. The fête: Andante and Allegro.
" III. Love Scene: Adagio.
" IV. Queen Mab: Scherzo: Prestissimo.
Trio: Allegrétto.

It has always seemed incomprehensible to me that Berlioz should have received early recognition from Germany and but little, until after his death, from France. And now to hear such a performance as this work from a German conductor, while the same concert gives the Schuman Symphony in an almost coarse and thoroughly disappointing manner is a great surprise.

The absolute freshness, care, enthusiasm and finish of Herr Paur's reading, left little to be desired. Regarding the tempi in such a work, I question any critic's right to express radical opinion.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; two movements from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D, Tschaikowsky, and Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," Smetana. It was, on the whole, a dull and dry programme. The Symphony was industriously interpreted, not a point that was possible to make, was missed, and, on the whole, we doubt if the work has had a more elaborate reading than was accorded it by Mr. Paur. The resulting effect of all this minute care did not seem felicitous, for it emphasized the studious pedagogy of the composition and deprived it of what slight flexibility it has, and made it more severe and more tiresome than was necessary. Now and then, however, some portions of the work came out clearer than they did at any of its earlier performances here and the vigorous close of the finale was given with stirring power. The playing of the orchestra was steadily fine throughout. The applause at the close was very enthusiastic. The Mozart Overture came like a gleam of sunshine after the heaviness and the pedantry that preceded it. Here there is profound learning, but there is facility in the use of it, and the effect is as clear as crystal. It is possibly rank heresy to express the belief that there is more true music and more real genius in this one brief movement, than there is in the whole of the symphony, but we hold to that faith. Mr. Paur gave the tempo a very rapid pace; so rapid, in fact, that many of the passages for the wind instruments, especially for the bassoons, did not, and could not have been made to come out distinctly. The composer's indication is allegro, but it was construed into something very closely resembling the presto of the "Figaro" overture. It would seem though that this is the established modern view of the time in which the work should be played. The performance, which was admirable, was not rewarded with any very hearty applause. Perhaps the work is too easily comprehended to excite such approbation as attended the more vague music of Brahms. The last movement of the violin concerto was omitted. The andante was played first, and the opening allegro followed. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and he acquitted himself of his difficult task with skill and brilliancy. There was an occasional lapse in intonation in the more elaborate and trying passages, but the performance as a whole was able and interesting. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and twice recalled. At the next concert will be played: Dramatic Symphony, Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann. There will be no soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1893.

Acquaintance with the now almost familiar first symphony of Brahms cannot yet make its almost confusedly composite opening movement lucid or agreeable to many ears. Its tremendous vigor and determination, its unrelaxing persistence in pushing its fierce way along, its power and grasp of the means of thematic development must be felt at once and they have a great weight of influence. But this is chiefly the influence of an immense volume of energetic tonal figures forcing themselves onward in an excited and closely banded mass, and does not reconcile one to the strange and clamorous dissonances, the complications of counterpoint and the apparently conflicting cries which arise here and there in the musical tumult. But if one can get safely through this, then comes relief and balm in the succeeding movements. The serious suavity of the second movement, the lilting gayety of the third and the variety of the fourth come welcomely with contentment, transparency, poetry and a sufficiency of vehemence and demonstrativeness to bring out the finale with the utmost sonority of which a band is capable. Mr. Paur's rendering, at last night's Symphony, was admirable in attention to the moods as well as the manner of the composer, and was received with great evidences of satisfaction, the applause—as was to be expected—being lightest after the first movement and most decided after the last.

The programme continued well with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, which offered a charming contrast. Its opening adagio, with those few grand chords which give it solemnity, bridged well the distance between the potential strains of the symphony and the merry themes, the rippling buoyant fugal passages and the airy fancies of the main body of the overture. The audience were quick to appreciate this, and their attention was close and their recognition immediate and emphatic.

The solo number came next—the second and third movements from Tschaikowsky's second violin concerto. These are, it will be remembered, a sweet and lovely canzonetta, presented almost naively in simplicity of diction and quaint but delicate embroidery of accompaniment, and a vivid and rapid finale based upon two themes of unmistakable Russian type. Mr. Adamowski was the player, and he won many ecomiums. His tone, always notably pure, soft and charming, was all itself; his expected delicacy of taste did not fail him, his execution was more easy and free than it sometimes is in music so difficult as this finale, and he very rarely in intonation, where he has been apt to be a little errant in awkward passages. Toward the close he needed a more nervous and rougher fashion of emphasis; but with this exception made, his performance may be given a very honorable place on the record.

The evening ended with an earnest, picturesque spirited and enthusiastic rendering of Smetana's really poetic orchestral scene, "The Moldau" River" the fine flowing fancies being fascinatingly clear and the statelier passages swelling out to the full strength of the orchestra.

Next week's programme is thus announced:—Rubenstein's "Dramatic" symphony; orchestral variations by Brahms, and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. It will not be a solo week.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 156.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Adamowski.

The programme of the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, had as its leading features a performance of the first of the Brahm's symphonies, and the appearance of Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

In his reading of the first of the symphonic conundrums propounded by Brahms, the new conductor made its meaning as clear as any of his predecessors, and he had the satisfaction of having his efforts in elucidating its mysteries fully appreciated. The beauties of the last movement were given with rare clearness, and the finale was worked up with splendid fire and energy. The performance of the symphony added another to the former triumphs of the new conductor.

Mr. Adamowski selected for his annual appearance as soloist in these concerts two movements—the canzonetta and the finale of the violin concerto No. 2, op. 35, by Tschaikowsky. He had his usual hearty reception as he stepped to the soloist's place, and his popularity with his public was as distinctly shown as in former years. In the canzonetta his playing had all the delightful characteristics which made and have maintained his favor with American audiences—the purity of his tone, the sympathetic quality of his playing and the feeling and expression with which he interpreted this movement giving great satisfaction. In the finale his success was equally great. Mr. Adamowski is not altogether suited to the demands of such a composition, as he lacks the freedom and dash of the virtuoso, but he gave the movement with fine finish and great brilliancy despite this characteristic of his play. He was warmly commended by his audience for his performance.

A highly artistic reading of the "Magic Flute" overture and a very satisfying performance of Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau" completed the programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a delightful concert at the Newton Club house in Newtonville Wednesday evening. There were beautiful floral decorations, and 300 guests enjoyed Mr. Kneisel's band and the violin playing of Miss Olive Mead, the soloist of the occasion.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1893.

The Seventh Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, C minor.....Brahms
Overture, "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
First two movements from concerto for violin, D major, Tschaikowsky
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana

Brahms still excites discussion, and all are not yet ready to bow the knee to the son of the double-bass player of Hamburg. The discussion is protracted and often hot, because the followers of Brahms insist that you must take the works of "the Master" in bulk. Everything is "wonderful, wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful, and yet again wonderful, and after that out of all whooping!" These worshipers are not unlike Brahms himself, as described some years ago by Beatty-Kingston: "Loud, dictatorial, a little too obviously penetrated with a sense of his surpassing greatness." What marvel then that he who cannot admire or love honestly such a work as the C minor symphony is tempted to imitate the conduct of Count Laurencin in discussing Wagner, and is apt "to foam slightly at the mouth and to grind his teeth in a highly alarming manner."

After many hearings of the C minor symphony of Brahms I am almost reconciled to the Wagner of the Nibelungen period.

For if Wagner is constantly striving to make an effect on the public, Brahms seems to parody a phrase of Grillparzer, to be very busy in making an effect upon himself. The Ego of this symphony is not sympathetic; and whether this Ego is affected or not by the endeavor is of little importance to the outsider.

Joncières once said of one of Brahms's more popular symphonies that it was too full of brushwood. The phrase is expressive, and it may be applied more justly to the first than to the second symphony, which in comparison with the former is clearness itself. For the C minor symphony is obscure, wilfully obscure; and ff, as some think, obscurity is synonomous with greatness, then the symphony is sublime. Let us admit cheerfully that there are fine passages; passages of an austere nobility; but how much spontaneous music is there in the work from beginning to end? Or is there one honest, or, dishonest dramatic appeal to a human emotion? But music must be emotional, or it is not genuine music. The chief pleasure inspired by such a work of Brahms seems to be the effort of the brain to detect wherein the pleasure lies. Such pleasure then implies a real or feigned intellectuality in the person who is or pretends to be pleased. It is not surprising that such works of Brahms are fashionable and heard with a petrified smile of rapt enjoyment, even when the work lasts an hour. And yet "how endurable life would be, were it not for its pleasures!"

In this symphony of Brahms the players seem to wander in a forest imagined by Maeterlinck. The forest is dark, although it is high noon, and the sky is clear. No birds sing in this forest. There are no wild-flowers in this forest; nor in this forest are there any trees of beauty. The trees, indeed, seem dream trees, seen in restless sleep. The players wander blindly. Alarmed, they call to each other; they sound their alarm together. They try to weep, but terror forbids tears. They try to be gay: but their jests fall without laughter. They suspect the presence of winged things. The air grows dull and heavy. Suddenly they come into clear ground, and they see a canal with green water. Beyond is a hospital, with the sick people looking out of the windows. A boat is dragged along, and queerly-dressed men and women sing a tune that sounds like unto a travesty of the hymn in Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Then all is dark. The dreamer wakes. There is darkness. There is the remembrance of a dark dream.

* * *

Perhaps it was not the fault of conductor or orchestra, but the concert as a whole seemed dull. The marvelous overture of Mozart was taken at such a rapid pace that passages for the wood-wind were inaudible. I admit that there has been much discussion concerning the proper tempo of this allegro. But Mozart did not write certain passages for the wood-wind as a mere stop-gap; and when that which should be clear is muddy, and when the players are men of skill, the fault lies surely in the tempo chosen by the conductor.

How delightfully clear, however, is the design of this overture. Perhaps on account of this very clearness, and on account of the classic beauty of theme and development, the overture failed apparently to please as much as did the reading for one hour of the gospel of Brahms.

* * *

Mr. T. Adamowski played portions of the concerto for violin in D major by Tschaikowsky. Mr. Adamowski is not without the gift of awakening pleasing emotions. He often plays admirably; still, when he is at his best he is too apt to suggest a room hung with heavy tapestry, perfumed with pastils and tuberoses. He was applauded warmly, but Tschaikowsky called for a more heroic player.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Gericke, who had very pronounced ideas on the subject of programme making, generally placed the symphony last upon his programmes, saying "the effect of a masterpiece should not be lessened by hearing anything after it;" Mr. Paur evidently proceeds on a different theory, holding that the audience can best appreciate a long symphony while unfatigued by other music, and he therefore places the large instrumental epic first on his list. There is truth in both views, and certainly there seemed to be an advantage in hearing Brahms' most complex symphony at the outset. Shakespeare's apothegm that music is "to refresh the mind of man after his studies or his usual pain," is certainly not sustained by Brahms' C minor symphony, for its every measure demands active mental effort on the part of the auditor. The first movement especially is full of "life's endless toil and endeavor," and there are few passages suggestive of repose in its deeply intellectual scheme. It is sufficient praise to say that it was clearly played, and, excepting a preponderance of kettle drum, with excellent balance of parts. The two interior movements were admirably shaded and the woodwind did excellent work. The finale is, to the reviewer at least, the finest part of the work; here one finds an epitome of all the movements, an idea possibly suggested by the instrumental part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony. This movement was played with great breadth, but there were certain points in the reading which differed from the interpretation of any of the three preceding conductors. The striking effect of the accelerando in the pizzicato passage was avoided altogether, the phrase being taken with a deliberation which was new and scarcely advantageous. On the other hand, the majesty with which the theme upon the brasses was played deserves commendation. It was a welcome surprise to find the public becoming enthusiastic over this, and the critic can join in the popular verdict, even while recommending a restoration of the accelerated style of the pizzicati spoken of above.

The "Magic Flute" overture was taken at a breakneck speed, once the introduction was passed. Mr. Paur has plenty of precedent here, and even the cautious and conservative Mr. Gericke used to give this fugato (the most beautiful fugal exposition in the world) at a presto pace. It is wrong, though, for all that; Mozart marked it "allegro" and the beauty of its subject, the exact relation of its answer, and the effect of the wind passages, are all lost by an exaggerated speed. A thousand precedents would not justify this tempo.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the concert, came rather late upon the programme, with two movements of Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major. What wonderful effects this Russian achieved with the wind instruments! They formed a most impressive background to the sadness expressed by the violin in the slow movement. Perhaps the only fault of the work as a composition, however, is that the orchestra is too often kept as a background. Beethoven and Brahms have taught the world what a true concerto should be—an orchestral composition with a thread of solo running through its warp and woof. This the work in question was not, for it gave constant prominence to the soloist, and often in passages of greatest virtuosity. In the slow movement Mr. Adamowski played with great expression and with absolute surety. Russian sadness is the deepest melancholy to which a musical composer can ever attain; the Slav goes to extremes in his tonal emotions. When he is glad he is very, very glad, and when he is sad he is horrid. Mr. Adamowski was best in the melancholic side of the question, for in the allegro he seemed overweighted at times. There is scarcely a technical point of difficulty which does not appear here (except double harmonics). Following the example of Mendelssohn the composer has the cadenza long before the close. Skips, double stopping in chromatic passages, harmonics natural and artificial, and a host of other difficulties were overcome, but not with absolute ease. One felt a trifle anxious at times, a feeling not conducive to the full success of the work. There were, however, no important slips to condone, and the artist was most heartily applauded, and deserved to be.

After the Southeastern Slav came the Western branch in the shape of a Czech, and Smetana's river picture "Vltava" brought the concert to a close. This was a very changeable musical panorama, but through it all there ran the ripple of the stream, and there was coherency even in the midst of contrast. There were moments when the effect would have been enhanced by a slower tempo, and the dance rhythm seemed too ponderous and inelastic, but as a whole the work was effectively performed and it was evident that even the outre touches of this and the preceding number were by no means Caviare to the general.

LOUIS. C. ELSON.

[52]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 3, 1893.

Echoes from the Symphony—Several Benefit Concerts Tonight—Coming Events.

The program offered by director Paur for the seventh Symphony concert consisted of Brahm's first symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Friedrich Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau," and the second and third movements of Tschaikowsky's No. 2 concerto for violin, with Mr T. Adamowski as soloist.

The Friday afternoon performance was more suggestive of its name of rehearsal than is often the case with this splendid band, but the shortcomings of the orchestra were such as to be noticed only by comparison with its generally almost perfect work.

It was, however, surprising that the soloist should have proved so unfamiliar with, or forgetful of, the music selected for interpretation that it became necessary for him to receive assistance from the score on the conductor's desk. This break might have demoralized a less perfectly trained orchestra, and resulted disastrously to a soloist who had less command of himself.

As it was the incident probably passed unobserved by many in the audience, for there were demonstrative plaudits and three recalls for Mr Adamowski after he had played the concerto.

Mr Adamowski is such a strong social favorite that it is probable a majority of the Friday afternoon gathering would have been thoroughly well satisfied with a much less meritorious performance than he did give.

An extended review of his playing is not necessary. He is, of course, an intelligent musician and possesses more than common talent, but there are so many violinists of great ability that there seems no reason for going into raptures over his performance.

He played the Tschaikowsky concerto with refinement and good taste, and brought out its delicious melodies with good effect. His tone was not always clear, however, in the passages where a high degree of skill in technique was required.

The Brahms symphony received splendid interpretation from Mr Paur. A more intelligent or satisfactory reading of this truly grand composition has seldom if ever been given here. The symphony is severely scholarly in style, and that its performance should have awakened so much enthusiasm is certainly very complimentary to Mr Paur, and this is said without any intentional reflection upon the musical intelligence of the audience. The second and third movements, the latter especially, might have been better played at the Friday rehearsal, but the brilliant final movement was superbly interpreted.

The Mozart overture was gracefully and artistically performed, and a genuine treat was offered those of the audience who profess to know more about melody than harmony by the exceedingly dainty and expressive interpretation given Smetana's lovely little poem, "The Moldau."

The program announced for the eighth symphony concert is as follows: Dramatic symphony, Rubinstein; variations, Brahms; overture, "Manfred," Schumann.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 3, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Pleasing and Well-Rendered Programme---Other Music Notes.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience that filled Music Hall last evening. The programme was a long but delightful one, and consisted of Brahms's symphony No. 1 in C minor, Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," two movements from Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin, No. 2 in D major, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

The first number Brahms's symphony, four movement, was rendered in a magnificent manner. It is regarded as Brahms's greatest work, and is in his most characteristic vein. The adagio movement was distinctly brilliant, and the splendid work of the strings gave great delight. At the close of this movement Mr. Paur was compelled to repeatedly acknowledge the great enthusiasm his splendid reading evoked.

Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute" was given in a most artistic and pleasing manner.

Mr. T. Adamowski was given a cordial greeting on his appearance as the soloist of the evening. His rendering of the second and third movements from the Tschaikowsky concerto displayed considerable dash and brilliancy, and occasionally great breadth of tone. At times his playing was rough and unsatisfactory and not up to his highest standard. The piece has a peculiarly rude and rustic flavor that is pleasing, owing to its oddness. The symphonic poem, "The Moldau," was delightful. The piece is intensely romantic, and was given in a most expressive manner. The finale was particularly well done and with excellent effect, displaying the remarkable skill Mr. Paur has attained over his musicians. The programme for the next rehearsal and concert, Dec. 8 and 9, will be Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony," Brahms's "Variations" and Schumann's overture, "Manfred."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1893.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY.

An Attractive Programme Excellently Well Rendered.

The programme given at the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms.
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Two movements for Concerto for violin, No. 2.....Tzschaikowsky.
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".Smetana.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

The Brahms Symphony, which has been given previously in these concerts, three times by Henschel, three times by Nikisch and once by Gericke, is a noble specimen of its author's great scholarship. It is great in a scientific way, although the second movement is gracefully melodious and spontaneous, and the listener must, generally speaking, seek pleasure in following the masterly contrapuntal treatment of the composer upon the basis of an exercised intellectuality, rather than upon a stirring of the emotions. Consequently it is that the only performance in this city of this remarkable work that has done its author full justice was the one that Gericke conducted. The themes treated in an almost overelaborate manner, in the first movement in particular, need the infinite variety of the exact expression marked by the author, if the effect is to be relieved of an otherwise dryness that becomes wearisome in the working out. Mr. Gericke succeeded, in his acute conception of the author and with his marvellous ability as a drill master, in bringing forth the characteristics of this symphony, being thereby as eminent in his success, as the others named, including Mr. Paur, have been unsuccessful in displaying the work in its most favorable light. The audience Saturday evening became excited over the thundering of the last movement and recalled Mr. Paur again and again with loud applause.

The Mozart overture, however, fell flat upon these same listeners, whether because of the breakneck speed it was taken, thereby robbing it of its effect, or because the audience had not recovered from the effect of the loudness and excitement of the Brahms which had stunned its sensibilities for the time being.

"The Moldau," the second of six symphonic poems by Smetana entitled "My Fatherland," was played for the first time in this city and as far as I know for the first time in this country. The No. 1, "A Bohemian fortress," was played in New York some time since, these performances being probably the only ones that any of the series have received in this country. "The Moldau," which is supposed to describe a forest brook that flows on through Bohemia's valleys and ending in a mighty stream vanishes in the distance, contains within its pages much that were it developed in the playing as clearly as the composer has indicated in his score would prove a most interesting composition. It was, however, so roughly rendered that the brook became a rushing torrent and the mighty river a foaming and roaring Niagara. The constantly undulating figures in the strings that should represent the surface of the hurrying river were so submerged by the overloud playing of the wind instruments that they might as well have been at the bottom of the ocean as far as any opportunity was offered for their becoming a feature in the characteristic delineation intended by the composer. So constantly overloud was the whole performance that the grand fortissimo climax, just before the final pin moto, was without contrasted effect, utterly ruined, for there was nothing left to do except to make a little more noise at the fff. As for the following arpeggios in the strings they might as well have been omitted, for all the effect they had. It was hoped that this overloudness and coarseness had departed with Mr. Paur's predecessor. It would be interesting to hear "The Moldau" played with a due regard for the demands of the composition.

Mr. Adamowski played the second movement and the first movement in succession, of the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, No. 2. This concerto was played in its complete form by Mr. Adolf Brodsky at a Damrosch concert at the Tremont Theatre early in this year.

Its performance at that time excited much comment regarding its real value as a musical composition. The last movement militates the most against the acceptance of the work as a whole, and maybe Mr. Adamowski consequently substituted the allegro moderato for the finale. When Mr. Brodsky first played this concerto in Vienna, Dr. Hanslick, the eminent critic, severely criticised both the barbarity of the music and of the player's efforts, admitting, of course, the tenderness of the "Canzonetta." Without discussing whether the doctor was or was not a little too severe in his remarks, it is pleasant to note that Mr. Adamowski played the tender and melancholy canzonetta with fine feeling and great delicacy. So also did the player overcome the difficulties of the first movement without the rasping and fury that marked Brodsky's efforts, and with marked excellence in expression, technical facility and good intonation. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and recalled. Great credit is due Mr. Paur for the delightful manner in which he accompanied the soloist.

The distressing manner in which the first clarinet played the theme in the andante of the Brahms Symphony, where it is taken up just as the oboe ends, both as regards bad intonation and inartistic style was not an agreeable feature of the playing on this occasion. Add to this the bungling manner in which this player executed the figure for clarinet and flute unison at the beginning of the last movement of Schumann's B-flat symphony a week ago Saturday night, and it must be admitted that it is not creditable that such inability should be observed on the part of one holding a principal position in a first-class orchestra.

The following numbers are announced for next Saturday evening's programme: "Dramatic Symphony," Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert was as follows:
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Opus 68.
Mozart: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."
Tschaikowsky: Two movements from the Concerto for Violin, in D major, Opus 35.
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vltava."
Mr. Timothée Adamowski was the violinist.

The great Brahms symphony, greatest of the four, seemed to us taken too slow all through, save perhaps in the third movement. The first and last movements suffered especially from it. That the first theme of the first Allegro is no very sure guide to the tempo, of and by itself, may be readily conceded; but so much of the development of the movement runs on plain chords (two to the measure) that any over-slowness in the tempo is exceedingly liable to efface the whole A llegro character of the music and make it sound like an Andante. To be sure, the modern "slow A llegro" is in general peculiarly applicable to Brahms; it might almost be called his natural gait. Still there is such a thing as over-doing it, even with Brahms, and making it come dangerously near to being no allegro at all. Apart from this, the symphony was played with great force, and was most enthusiastically received by the audience. The time seems pretty distant now when this symphony was looked upon by audiences as a thing of terror merely.

The playing of the bright and beautiful "Zauberflöte" overture was of fair average excellence; but the orchestra covered itself with glory in Smetana's "Vltava"—which outlandish word means the river Moldau. This symphonic poem of Smetana's was a delightful surprise; so much of the Czech and Russian music we hear nowadays is of a sort to strike terror into the ears of the average listener who has no Slavic blood in his veins that one may well be pardoned for feeling a touch of surprise at anything so natural, easily flowing, and perspicuous as this "Vltava" coming from the pen of a thoroughbred Czech. It is by no means great music; the themes are perhaps rather commonplace than other wise,—one of them bears a terribly close resemblance to the tune of a little Austrian nursery ditty about a fox stealing a goose—but the music is all so sunny, the development so natural and coherent, the poetic suggestiveness so unforced and genial, and the orchestration so masterly at every point, that one listens to it with unfeigned pleasure. As a piece of scoring the work is especially remarkable in that it never lapses into mere eccentricity of color, never even reaches that point of super-refinement and, so to speak, orchestral dandyism some of the modern French masters have been guilty of; there is no affectation about it; it is simply the sort of scoring that insures a constantly beautiful quality of tone, rich without being cloying, enormously powerful and sonorous in the stronger passages, without ever being noisy. The orchestra played the poem to perfection.

The two movements of Tschaikowsky's second violin concerto played by Mr. Adamowski —Allegro and Andante, the second movement being played first—do not show the composer in a very characteristic or very brilliant light. The Andante is a pretty little canzonetta, graceful in melody and not without a certain sensibility; but it is in no wise superior to hundreds of pretty salon pieces for violin, with which the market is flooded. Perhaps, after all, it may conceal some virtue that appeals strongly to the Slavic sense; but music must have something more than "national" merit to be considered seriously on a concert basis. With the best will in the world, we cannot find the first movement otherwise than commonplace and dull; the themes lack distinction, the working-out for the solo instrument does not rise above the old Alard or De Bériot passage-work, and nothing in the movement gives one a very convincing reason for its having been written at all. Mr. Adamowski's playing was rather uneven; reaching the highest pitch of beauty of sentiment and elegance of phrasing in the broader cantilena, but falling somewhat short of due effectiveness in the more brilliant passages. In short, what we have heard of this concerto of Tschaikowsky's does not seem calculated to induce the goddess of Music to take down the bill she has had up in her window for some time: "Wanted—an effective Violin Concerto!"

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Manfred;" Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Rubinstein, "Dramatic" symphony, No. 4, in D minor, opus 95.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, DEC 5, 1893.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

At the Kneisel concert in Chickering hall last night, the third of the present season, the regular members of the quartet were assisted by Mr Leo Schulz, who played the second cello part in the Schubert quintet, the last number on the program. The other numbers were the Mozart quartet in D minor and the d'Albert quartet in E flat minor. The d'Albert quartet has never before been performed in this country.

The Mozart selection is an old favorite. The beautiful andante movement is familiar to all who have heard string quartets and the menuetto is also well known. Last night's performance roused the greatest enthusiasm in the audience.

The d'Albert quartet was long drawn out and not particularly brilliant. The first movement, an andante, was nothing but a succession of meaningless chords and themes, of which there were enough for a half-dozen quartets. The allegro might well have been a dance for the brownies, and a little disturbance in the front seats almost led one to think that the castanets had been introduced. The last two movements, however, were a little better.

But the Schubert quintet made up for any lack in the proceeding number. Like many of Schubert's compositions it was very long. The music was superb and the performance exquisite. The adagio was particularly well done.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The third concert of the Kneisel Quartette was given in Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Quartette, D minor.....Mozart
Quartette, E flat major, op. 11.....D'Albert
Quintette, C major, op. 163.....Schubert

The quartette by D'Albert was played for the first time in this country. It is a singular and strong work. In singularity it approaches at times the grotesque; its strength is at times harsh, almost rank.

The first movement, an andante con moto, brings the thought that D'Albert attempted to paint too broadly on a very small canvas. The contrasting emotions have little room in which to play; there is jostling; there is so much material that after one hearing the result is a vague impression of power. The second movement, an allegro vivace, is an extraordinary piece of work. Here D'Albert hunts color. They that delight to find in music everything but music may look at this scherzo in different ways. One may hear the whirring of a spinning-wheel, a spectral spinning-wheel worked by some one unseen. Another may find the music fit as an accompaniment to the pursuit of the fly by young Pierrot in "L'Enfant Prodigue." A third may be reminded of the gathering of witches at midnight, when hags and reckless women of beauty dance to Old Nick's strange tune played on the violin. It is not likely that D'Albert had any particular idea in his head when he planned this movement. It is more likely that he tried to gain novel effects from four conventional instruments. In this he was eminently successful, and ingenious rhythm and surprising harmonies, added to unexpected appeals to peculiar registers of the instruments, unite in producing a most suggestive and haunting movement. It may be said that here, as in other places, he defies the schools and thinks alternately of the piano and the orchestra. It would be very easy to say, "Look at the purity and the frankness of the quartette that preceded, and look at the melodic beauty of the quintette that followed." But D'Albert is a man of to-day.

It would be absurd to demand of him that he should write in the spirit of former generations, even if it were in his power. Each generation has its own form of expression. If a genius arises in his own generation, his music will survive in spite of the form. Contemporaries of lesser talent will be forgotten in spite of the form. D'Albert takes four instruments, and his first thought is, "What can I get out of them?" Now it does not follow necessarily that D'Albert is a genius, or that this quartette will live. But let the man have the right to express himself as he pleases.

The question then comes up, Is the composer of such a movement honest; or is he a poseur; or a juggler; or a man who builds coolly his idol and then really worships it. I believe this Scherzo to be a sincere piece of work; as sincere as it is remarkable, and yet the sincerity of D'Albert may not be the sincerity of a Mozart, or the sincerity of Verdi.

In the slow movement, there are symptoms of an eagerness to be profound. The real or mock profundity is suddenly abandoned for a passionate melody for first violin with a throbbing accompaniment; this melody rises to a dramatic height; there is a convulsive spasm. This scene of passion is introduced suddenly. It is an episode. The episode is the one thing remembered in the movement.

The finale is not without passages of beauty and nobility, but the impression made by it is inferior to the scherzo.

It is not to be denied that certain measures of this quartette seem unnecessarily brutal. There is scraping and there is growling. Beauty of tone is not infrequently sacrificed in the attempt to be dramatic. The musical speech of D'Albert is often gutteral or sibilant with consonants, and one longs for a sprinkling of vowels. If D'Albert builds on the foundation of another man, that man is Johannes Brahms; but the building raised shows the individuality of the builder. It is easy to find fault with certain passages. It is impossible to deny the beauty, the originality, and the dramatic force of many portions of the work. The quartette was played superbly, and it was received enthusiastically.

Equally admirable was the performance of the immortal quartette of Mozart. In the Schubert quintette the second 'cello was played by Mr. Leo Schulz. The quintette is a notable example of the strength and the weakness of Schubert in works of long breath. There is the melodic charm, the exquisite grace of modulation; there is also the fatal fluency, the unwillingness to take leave; so that the composer seems like unto a guest who, hat in hand, persists in amiable speech; the host stands, he grows impatient; but the guest apparently has forgotten that there is a door in the room.

The fourth concert will be Jan. 1.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

At Chickering Hall last evening the Kneisel Quartet gave its third recital. The programme was an interesting one and was received with great pleasure by the audience, which was a large and enthusiastic one. Mozart's quartet in D minor, four movements, was delightful. The third movement, menuetto, was dashingly and brilliantly rendered. D'Albert's quartet in E flat was presented for the first time in this country, and was treated in a most artistic manner. It is not a particularly interesting composition, being rather dry and heavy. The allegro vivace movement was exceptionally weird and wild, and is of the most eccentric style. The piece was given a masterly and artistic reading and introduced under the most favorable conditions. It is not one that is likely to gain any great popularity, being too laborious.

The Schubert quintet in C major, with Mr. Leo Schulz assisting as second 'cello, was read with great expression. The adagio movement was particularly beautiful. The playing of the quartet thus far this season has been of the highest artistic order, and the members are deservedly classed among the leading musical artists of this country.

The next concert will be on Jan. 1, 1894, at Chickering Hall.

[53]

Established 1873.

[illegible] MORNING, [illegible], 5, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Concerts which require no criticism, like nations that require no history, are always the most enjoyable. The concert in Chickering Hall last night was one of these. Its execution took it out of the reach of animadversion, and its contents, with one exception, were well enough known to demand no analysis. Mozart's D minor quartette and Schubert's quintette in C major are, of course, not new to our concert-goers, but they seemed almost so in the artistic interpretation which they received, and the size and enthusiasm of the audience proved abundantly that the Kneisel Quartette need not depend upon solo talent for "drawing" power. The programme was an ideal of true Chamber music without other attraction of any kind.

Mr. Leo Schulz was added as second 'cello to make a quintette for the Schubert number. The pure and restful style of the two numbers above mentioned cannot be exaggerated. The novel element in the programme was D'Albert's E flat quartette, heard for the first time in America. It was a severe test for the new work, to place it between Mozart and Schubert, but it left a good impression spite of the juxtaposition. The first movement presented some brilliant development of the first four notes of the chief t. eme, w[illegible] med a fine figure for thematic treat[illegible] The second movement (a scherzo) [illegible]n of the work. It begins like a [illegible]lin Dance, the muted strings givi[illegible]ling and humming, with quaint pizzica[illegible]ects that suggested Fairy Follets. The [illegible]ic is corrected somew[illegible]by the legato [illegible]e of the trio, but the fairies come back to make a symmetrical ending. The entire movement is very successful. Much less so is the succeeding movement. The "Adagio" is the Achilles heel of the modern composer. He piles on agony, he froths a little at the mouth, he indulges in fierce dissonances and wild progressions, in his adagio, and then is obliterated even by the gentlest and simplest Haydn effort in the same tempo. D'Albert formed no exception to the rule. The finale had spirit and good contrast, and a brusque treatment that was effective. In each movement the cello had especial prominence, and a fine duet for cello and viola began the third movement while the former had much work in the finale. Where all played splendidly it seems almost invidious to say that Mr. Schroeder played with especial nobility of tone.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 158.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1893.

The Kneisel quartet gave a Mozart quartet, a new quartet by D'Albert and Schubert's quintet in C at their concert in Chickering Hall last night. Mr. Leo Schulz played the second 'cello in the quintet.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1893.

The sixth of our Symphony Concerts was the best so far. The director's wife, was the pianist, in Schubert's Wanderer Fantasy, as symphonically arranged by Liszt; and perhaps this induced such a sale of standee tickets as left the demand unequal to the supply, as Mrs. Paur is already popular in Boston, speaking English, which her husband does not. Her playing was so clear and musical as to reach the extremes of the hall and reflect great credit upon herself. The symphony was Schumann's First, and royally rendered, from horn and trumpet call to coda. In the romantic line we enjoyed parts 2, 3, 4, of Belioz's Romeo and Juliet, the ball, balcony, and Queen Mab episodes.

FIGARO.

Sonnabend, den 2. Dezember 1893.

Providence, 29. Nov.

Die Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte, welche uns allwinterlich eine Reihe musikalischer Genüsse gediegenster Art bereiten, brachten als Neuheit in dem zweiten Konzert, welches am Mittwoch in der Infantry Hall stattfand, ein Konzert für Violine und Violincello in A-moll von Johannes Brahms. In dieser Schöpfung von Brahms bekundete sich sein kräftiges Talent, das mit empfindungsvoller Vertiefung seine eigenen Wege geht und schöne Ergebnisse zu Tage fördert. Wir können nicht umhin, hier zu bemerken, daß der Eindruck, welchen die Composition auf uns machte, nicht fortreißend war und nach den Beifallsbezeugungen des Publikums zu urtheilen, nicht viel Sympathie erregte — nicht einmal konnten die guten Leistungen der Herren Kneisel und Schröder darüber helfen. Das prächtige Werk, die Jupiter-Symphonie in C-moll von Mozart, welche den Schluß des Konzertes bildete, fesselte von Anfang bis Ende durch die bekannten musikalischen Schönheiten. Die Vollendung, mit welcher das Orchester unter Paur's Leitung spielte, ist von uns schon öfters besprochen worden. Es ist sicher, daß das Boston Symphonie Orchester unter den zahlreichen Orchester-Organisationen eine höchst hervorragende Stellung einnimmt, indem die Leistungen des Orchesters von Kennern und von Laien oft als einzig dastehend anerkannt werden. Dieses Konzert zeichnete sich durch besondere Kürze aus, was von unserem Standpunkt aus ganz angenehm ist, doch ist dies den Amerikanern schwer begreiflich, da dieselben so viel wie möglich für ihre Dollars haben wollen. Daß das Konzert nur 1½ Stunden dauerte, darüber mußten wir viele Bemerkungen beim Verlassen des Konzertsaales hören.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

TUESDAY, DEC. 5, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third concert of the ninth season of the Kneisel Quartet took place in Chickering Hall last evening. The following was the programme:

Quartet in D minor.....Mozart
Quartet in E-flat major, op. 11.....D'Albert
(First time in America.)
Quintet in C major, op. 163.....Schubert

Mr. Leo Schulz was the second violoncellist in the latter piece.

The playing of the Kneisel Quartet is so wonderfully perfect that the critic's task is one of unalloyed pleasure.

We once had an orchestra in Boston—thanks to the exquisite taste and rigid discipline of Wilhelm Gericke—that equally disarmed criticism. It remained only then to praise the playing, to comment upon the works produced, and to criticise the often unhappy selection of programmes. With the Kneisel Quartet this latter item does not present itself, for Mr. Kneisel and his associates cast the programmes with exceptional judgment and variety. So one can speak critically only of the works performed.

The Mozart and Schubert numbers are familiar in the repertoire of chamber music. The melodic purity, the delightful harmonies and the chaste elaboration of these classic models were revealed, to the extreme gratification of the listeners through the faultless performance of the players.

The D'Albert Quartet was first played by the Joachim Quartet in Berlin, April 12, 1893, before a most distinguished audience, including the master Anton Rubinstein. It had a remarkable success at its first hearing. Probably it was no better rendered than last evening, even though the performers were the celebrated quartet with Joachim at its head. The perfect performance of this work last evening by the Kneisel Quartet did not conceal the extraordinary difficulties to be surmounted. I can hardly imagine artists of less ability doing much with such a composition. The first movement showed the musical knowledge of the composer, for it was finely developed upon its short theme. The Scherzo was an exhibition of his invention after the manner of Berlioz's "Queen Mab," with muted strings, the melody alternating pizzicato between the two lower and two upper instruments. There was also an episode in the form of a trio with unmuted strings that was an exquisite bit of writing. The slow movement did not yield as much as the composer probably intended, for it made evident the effort to do something that failed of consummation.

The hand of the musician was always to be observed, however, but a real depth of emotion was not reached. D'Albert is not the only writer who has failed to grasp the true cantabele of the adagio, breathing only spontaneous gen us. The finale movement was extremely effective. It had rhythm, it was fresh, and it was ingenious in the working out. On the whole, this quartet is to be praised as a most remarkable work, and one that will excite great interest in every musician.

From what we have had from D'Albert's pen previously this work gives the greatest encouragement that he must shine as a composer, as well as a great piano virtuoso. As is said above the playing of the quartet was faultless. Mr. Schulz in the Schubert quintet rendered admirable assistance.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[54]

[illegible]

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the third concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening; the Quartet was assisted by Mr. Leo Schulz in the following programme:

Mozart: Quartet in D-minor (Peters edition, No. 2).
D'Albert: Quartet in E-flat major.
(First time in America).
Schubert: Quintet in C major, Opus 163.

The Mozart quartet is an old friend, whose face one is always glad to see; who but Mozart could have written that heavenly Andante with its oft-repeated imitations on an ascending arpeggio figure, and made it positively entrancing instead of tiresome? The whole work was admirably played.

In the new D'Albert quartet one finds a work before which anyone can take off his hat in respect. For a young composer today to write four movements in so essentially a quartet style, willingly to forego those quasi-orchestral effects that have been so tempting to quartet-writers ever since Beethoven, and are doubly tempting now, means a good deal. The quartet is throughout an excellent piece of part-writing; with occasional harsh spots, to be sure, but stoutly built and carried through with a very firm hand. At the first hearing one finds places in it where one is not quite sure the composer is fully aware whither he is going; but further and better acquaintence with the work would in all probability clear up these puzzling passages. With all his adherence to a pure quartet style, D'Albert does not once fall into the merely academic vein; there is nothing dry and merely formal in the work. He gives his imagination free play, and is not afraid to say what he wants to. Take, for instance, that bit of rather trite, Meyerbeer and Verdi, "pump-handle" counterpoint in the second violin, near the end of the Adagio; a man less sure of himself might well have fought shy of this sort of thing, as derogatory to his dignity; but D'Albert here makes good play with it, to excellent purpose, and without any triviality of effect. Then, too, there is great seriousness of purpose and no little depth of feeling shown in the composition; neither is the airy, imaginative, poetic element wanting; witness the dainty second movement, with its swift flitting to and fro of the muted violins. Upon the whole, it is one of the best things in the form we have heard for a great twhile. It was played to perfection.

Schubert's ever beautiful quintet, with the two 'cells, made a delightful close to the concert. It, too, was admirably, wonderfully played.

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 6, 1893.

I wonder if the erroneous opinions about America entertained by foreigners is a sufficient reason or excuse for some expressions of their judgment.

For instance, I doubt if the management of this week's Symphony Concert programme would have passed muster in any German or French centre.

A. Brahm's Symphony (No. 1, in C Minor, Op. 68), the one containing the least material of a popular kind, one theme in the last movement excepted, of any he has written; a work on which he was engaged, off and on, for ten years; then the overture to Mozart's Magic Flute; next two movements of a violin; concerts by Tschaikowski; a composition for the virtuoso, and one in which the old time fireworks had full play; and last, a symphonic poem "The Moldau." by Frederick Smetana, which, it seems to me, had no possible excuse for being present.

If Mr. Paur has been told that an American audience cannot take a Brahm's Symphony without something very trivial with it, to make it palatable to the half developed Boston, taste he must have been undeceived this time, for the Symphony received enthusiastic applause; the Mozart Overture nearly the same, while many left the hall before the Smetana piece was over.

Why cannot a leader continue in the path that gave him his reputation? The contract to conduct the Boston orchestra extends over several years, and long before the man's time expires he is found out and obliged to take the place in which he best fits. During the first season one finds himself treated to surprises that make him feel that the new leader is endeavoring to hide or disguise his true colors.

Speaking of the performance this week, the band threw itself into the Brahm's Symphony with its whole soul and from the leader down seemed to be inspired.

It is always gratifying to see the deep interest all routine players show in Brahm's. His almost unlimited resources appeal in the strongest manner to men who have long ago become satiated with conventional means.

Mr. Paur again delighted us with his masterly reading of the great work, and his treatment of every point ought to command the admiration of all except constitutional grumblers.

The Mozart Overture was not so satisfactory, albeit its tremendous pace, which though robbing it of its finer beauties, gave it an unwonted fire and converted it into a far better foil to the Brahm's piece than it otherwise would have proved.

Mr. Adamowski's playing of the Tschuikowsky Concerts was far from successful. I do not refer to a lapse of memory, which might be forgiven, but to continued false intonations and a tone that was at least inadequate.

In the hands of a great executant the composition possesses elements that would stir the listener through and through, but which in Mr. Adamonski's case became only a show of difficulties with which he was unable to cope.

The Symphonic Poem by Smetana, is fresh, full of clever, well-balanced material and shows an experienced hand. It was crisply played; but I repeat: It did not merit a place beside Brahms and Mozart.

Frederick Smetana, a Bohemian, was born at Leitomischl, March 2, 1824, and died at Prag, May 12, 1884. An exceedingly brilliant pianist, his greatest reputation is as an opera composer, although but one opera, "The Devil's Well," is much known outside of Bohemia. Still several overtures and one piano concerto have been heard in many of the great cities of the world.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1893.

If to do is to be dramatic, then the Rubinstein symphony—No. 4, in D minor, opus 95—certainly deserves that title, which is indeed the one which it bears. For if ever an orchestra had to be up and doing for a good solid hour and the most of the time playing as if their lives depended upon the amount of sound they produced, this composition gives them the occasion. Nobody gets any let-up, except the three trombone players, who are kept in reserve for the last movement; but they, unless they were of wood or stone, could not get any real rest, backed up as they are by that merciless and judgmentless kettle drummer, who has been coming out of late with more than his former muscularity. It is really time that he should be put into his place in relation to the rest of the band. The instruments of percussion are meant to emphasize only, not to overpower.

But there is a good deal more than noise and bustle in these exceedingly protracted movements. Indeed, if there were not, their vehemence, nervous excitement, clangor, hot haste and eager insistence, would wear out the hearer utterly long before the end was reached. But if there be power almost to excess, there is also poetry and there is fancy as well as fury. One can interpret the symphony in detail as his notions rise under its influence; but, considered in a general way, it may suggest to many a scheme something like this: The first movement, with varying phrase and mood, might present the tense, hard, combative spirit of life, rising from ignorance and gloom to struggle with hand and head to accomplishment and independence; the second, life's comedy, ranging from the rude, heavy-footed mirth of clowns to quieter and less earthy gayety; the third, a sense of possible repose and rest and gentle pleasure; the fourth, a recapitulation of the past experiences and states, concluding in the fulness of assurance and content. In the course of these expositions there are many passages wherein single instruments speak reflectively, beautifully, persuasively or pungently; but generally the mass of the orchestra is at work, and energetically if not always to the satisfaction of the professional examiner who looks for logic and for adherence to customary systems of development. The themes are many and often as graceful as they are original; there are odd shifts of rhythm and sudden, sharp syncopations, and one often seems to feel a kind of impatience on the composer's part that, with all his forces at work, he cannot get more out of them.

This symphony, which was placed judiciously at the end of the programme, was the hardest test of the season thus far of the orchestra's attention and endurance. Not only full strength is constantly demanded, but the ability to show this while executing very difficult passages at top speed, and the further capacity to enthuse and be authoritative. The playing was, however, almost always remarkable for accuracy, vigor, sonority and regard for form; and if an occasional phrase sounded a little weak, thin or reluctant or some small individual slip was noticeable, this certainly was not to be wondered at.

The concert began with a good reading of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, broad and smooth in the introduction, urgent and decided afterwards, with a moulding toward softness in the Astarte allusions. And, by the way, we could hardly help feeling that the beginning of the fourth movement in the symphony had for a few moments a temperament and form closely akin to the opening of this overture.

The intermediate number was Brahms's opus 56 A—the variations upon a serious, ecclesiastical theme by Haydn, known as the Chorale of St. Anthony. Variations are unquestionably caviar to the general, especially when, as in the present case, their connection with the nominal theme is so remote that the musician with score and pencil in hand can hardly find and follow it. But in this set Brahms has not confined himself to contrapuntal and figurative exercises. He has given his fancy free rein to choose keys, rhythms, tempi and orchestral combinations. So, with two or three dryer exceptions, these separate studies interest and almost divert by their varieties of movement and of tone color, until the finale comes to cap the climax with its martial swing, its keen accentuations and its lively orchestration brightened by the flurry of the piccolo and the jingle of the triangle. The whole got good playing and two or three of the variations were particularly brilliant, distinct and inspiriting.

A delightful announcement is made for the next concert, which does not come until the 23d inst. Mr. Carl Baermann, whose long absence could be attributed to nothing but Mr. Nikisch's freakishness, is to be the soloist. His choice of music is not yet made known, but the programme includes Beethoven's first symphony; a serenade by Mozart, Mr. Kneisel giving the violin obbligato, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel Quartette's third programme, played on Monday evening, introduced between two works always regarded with familiar friendliness—Mozart's D-minor quartette and Schubert's C-major quintette, opus 163—the first American performance of D'Albert's eleventh opus, a quartette in E-flat major. The Kneisel programmes are almost invariably well arranged, and the dispositions of the present one gave this new work, for hearing which all the audience wished to be in the best of attitudes, a capital preparation in the pellucid coolness of the Mozart, which put everybody into a pleasant temper, musically disposed and void of any prejudicial bias. The characteristics of D'Albert as a pianist must be clear in many readers' minds, and they will rise up to show to strange contrasts between his almost fairy-like delicacy of fancy and his tempestuous outbursts as of a formless passion which must find vent through the clangor of chords and under vehement hammers. Such qualities show themselves in this quartette, wherein one finds passages to which justice cannot be done unless the bow strikes roughly upon strident strings and beats out unreasoning and apparent causeless dissonances, together with others most dainty, airy and fascinating. The distinct personal talent of the author is always felt, and one observes constantly knowledge and command of constructive means and technical resource. On the other hand, while there is no reason for looking upon the composition as in any wise outre, it is independent from adhesion to formal and academic methods and proclaims itself in its own way. It has a free, various and masterly expression of a generous, impetuous, sincere and not indiscreet spirit, and as it was warmly welcomed, it is sure to be cordially cherished, and while some of its movements, the second—a picturesque and piquant allegro—especially, will probably be not infrequently chosen for separate performance. Of course the playing was all first rate, and Mr. Schulz added his 'cello for the Schubert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, DEC. 5, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Concerts which require no criticism, like nations that require no history, are always the most enjoyable. The concert in Chickering Hall last night was one of these. Its execution took it out of the reach of animadversion, and its contents, with one exception, were well enough known to demand no analysis. Mozart's D minor quartette and Schubert's quintette in C major are, of course, not new to our concert-goers, but they seemed almost so in the artistic interpretation which they received, and the size and enthusiasm of the audience proved abundantly that the Kneisel Quartette need not depend upon solo talent for "drawing" power. The programme was an ideal of true Chamber music without other attraction of any kind.

Mr. Leo Schulz was added as second 'cello to make a quintette for the Schubert number. The pure and restful style of the two numbers above mentioned cannot be exaggerated. The novel element in the programme was D'Albert's E flat quartette, heard for the first time in America. It was a severe test for the new work, to place it between Mozart and Schubert, but it left a good impression spite of the juxtaposition. The first movement presented some brilliant development of the first four notes of the chief t. eme, w[illegible]med a fine figure for thematic treat[illegible] The second movement (a scherzo) [illegible]rom of the work. It begins like a [illegible]lin Dance, the muted strings giv[illegible]ling and humming, with quaint pizzica[illegible]ects that suggested Les Follets. The b[illegible]rio is corrected somew[illegible]by the legato [illegible]e of the trio, but the fairies come back to make a symmetrical ending. The entire movement is very successful. Much less so is the succeeding movement. The "Adagio" is the Achilles heel of the modern composer. He piles on agony, he froths a little at the mouth, he indulges in fierce dissonances and wild progressions, in his adagio, and then is obliterated even by the gentlest and simplest Haydn effort in the same tempo. D'Albert formed no exception to the rule. The finale had spirit and good contrast, and a brusque treatment that was effective. In each movement the cello had especial prominence, and a fine duet for cello and viola began the third movement while the former had much work in the finale. Where all played splendidly it seems almost invidious to say that Mr. Schroeder played with especial nobility of tone.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 158.
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1893.

The Kneisel quartet gave a Mozart quartet, a new quartet by D'Albert and Schubert's quintet in C at their concert in Chickering Hall last night. Mr. Leo Schulz played the second 'cello in the quintet.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1893.

The sixth of our Symphony Concerts was the best so far. The director's wife, was the pianist, in Schubert's Wanderer Fantasy, as symphonically arranged by Liszt; and perhaps this induced such a sale of standee tickets as left the demand unequal to the supply, as Mrs. Paur is already popular in Boston, speaking English, which her husband does not. Her playing was so clear and musical as to reach the extremes of the hall and reflect great credit upon herself. The symphony was Schumann's First, and royally rendered, from horn and trumpet call to coda. In the romantic line we enjoyed parts 2, 3, 4, of Belioz's Romeo and Juliet, the ball, balcony, and Queen Mab episodes.

NEIGARO
Sonnabend, den 2. Dezember 1893.

Providence, 29. Nov.

Die Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte, welche uns allwinterlich eine Reihe musikalischer Genüsse gediegenster Art bereiten, brachten als Neuheit in dem zweiten Konzert, welches am Mittwoch in der Infantry Hall stattfand, ein Konzert für Violine und Violincello in A-moll von Johannes Brahms. In dieser Schöpfung von Brahms bekundete sich sein kräftiges Talent, das mit empfindungsvoller Vertiefung seine eigenen Wege geht und schöne Ergebnisse zu Tage fördert. Wir können nicht umhin, hier zu bemerken, daß der Eindruck, welchen die Composition auf uns machte, nicht fortreißend war und nach den Beifallsbezeugungen des Publikums zu urtheilen, nicht viel Sympathie erregte — nicht einmal konnten die guten Leistungen der Herren Kneisel und Schröder darüber helfen. Das prächtige Werk, die Jupiter-Symphonie in C-moll von Mozart, welche den Schluß des Konzertes bildete, fesselte von Anfang bis Ende durch die bekannten musikalischen Schönheiten. Die Vollendung, mit welcher das Orchester unter Paur's Leitung spielte, ist von uns schon öfters besprochen worden. Es ist sicher, daß das Boston Symphonie Orchester unter den zahlreichen Orchester-Organisationen eine höchst hervorragende Stellung einnimmt, indem die Leistungen des Orchesters von Kennern und von Laien oft als einzig dastehend anerkannt werden. Dieses Konzert zeichnete sich durch besondere Kürze aus, was von unserem Standpunkt aus ganz angenehm ist, doch ist dies den Amerikanern schwer begreiflich, da dieselben so viel wie möglich für ihre Dollars haben wollen. Daß das Konzert nur 1½ Stunden dauerte, darüber mußten wir viele Bemerkungen beim Verlassen des Konzertsaales hören.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
TUESDAY, DEC. 5, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The third concert of the ninth season of the Kneisel Quartet took place in Chickering Hall last evening. The following was the programme:

Quartet in D minor.....Mozart
Quartet in E-flat major, op. 11.....D'Albert
(First time in America.)
Quintet in C major, op. 163.....Schubert

Mr. Leo Schulz was the second violoncellist in the latter piece.

The playing of the Kneisel Quartet is so wonderfully perfect that the critic's task is one of unalloyed pleasure.

We once had an orchestra in Boston — thanks to the exquisite taste and rigid discipline of Wilhelm Gericke — that equally disarmed criticism. It remained only then to praise the playing, to comment upon the works produced, and to criticise the often unhappy selection of programmes. With the Kneisel Quartet this latter item does not present itself, for Mr. Kneisel and his associates cast the programmes with exceptional judgment and variety. So one can speak critically only of the works performed.

The Mozart and Schubert numbers are familiar in the repertoire of chamber music. The melodic purity, the delightful harmonies and the chaste elaboration of these classic models were revealed, to the extreme gratification of the listeners through the faultless performance of the players.

The D'Albert Quartet was first played by the Joachim Quartet in Berlin, April 12, 1893, before a most distinguished audience, including the master Anton Rubinstein. It had a remarkable success at its first hearing. Probably it was no better rendered than last evening, even though the performers were the celebrated quartet with Joachim at its head. The perfect performance of this work last evening by the Kneisel Quartet did not conceal the extraordinary difficulties to be surmounted. I can hardly imagine artists of less ability doing much with such a composition. The first movement showed the musical knowledge of the composer, for it was finely developed upon its short theme. The Scherzo was an exhibition of his invention after the manner of Berlioz's "Queen Mab," with muted strings, the melody alternating pizzicato between the two lower and two upper instruments. There was also an episode in the form of a trio with unmuted strings that was an exquisite bit of writing. The slow movement did not yield as much as the composer probably intended, for it made evident the effort to do something that failed of consummation.

The hand of the musician was always to be observed, however, but a real depth of emotion was not reached. D'Albert is not the only writer who has failed to grasp the true cantabele of the adagio, breathing only spontaneous gen us. The finale movement was extremely effective. It had rhythm, it was fresh, and it was ingenious in the working out. On the whole, this quartet is to be praised as a most remarkable work, and one that will excite great interest in every musician.

From what we have had from D'Albert's pen previously this work gives the greatest encouragement that he must shine as a composer, as well as a great piano virtuoso. As is said above the playing of the quartet was faultless. Mr. Schulz in the Schubert quintet rendered admirable assistance.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[54]

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1893.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet gave the third concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening; the Quartet was assisted by Mr. Leo Schulz in the following programme:

Mozart: Quartet in D-minor (Peters edition, No. 2).
D'Albert: Quartet in E-flat major.
(First time in America).
Schubert: Quintet in C major, Opus 163.

The Mozart quartet is an old friend, whose face one is always glad to see; who but Mozart could have written that heavenly Andante with its oft-repeated imitations on an ascending arpeggio figure, and made it positively entrancing instead of tiresome? The whole work was admirably played.

In the new D'Albert quartet one finds a work before which anyone can take off his hat in respect. For a young composer today to write four movements in so essentially a quartet style, willingly to forego those quasi-orchestral effects that have been so tempting to quartet-writers ever since Beethoven, and are doubly tempting now, means a good deal. The quartet is throughout an excellent piece of part-writing; with occasional harsh spots, to be sure, but stoutly built and carried through with a very firm hand. At the first hearing one finds places in it where one is not quite sure the composer is fully aware whither he is going; but further and better acquaintence with the work would in all probability clear up these puzzling passages. With all his adherence to a pure quartet style, D'Albert does not once fall into the merely academic vein; there is nothing dry and merely formal in the work. He gives his imagination free play, and is not afraid to say what he wants to. Take, for instance, that bit of rather trite, Meyerbeer and Verdi, "pump-handle" counterpoint in the second violin, near the end of the Adagio; a man less sure of himself might well have fought shy of this sort of thing, as derogatory to his dignity; but D'Albert here makes good play with it, to excellent purpose, and without any triviality of effect. Then, too, there is great seriousness of purpose and no little depth of feeling shown in the composition; neither is the airy, imaginative, poetic element wanting; witness the dainty second movement, with its swift flitting to and fro of the muted violins. Upon the whole, it is one of the best things in the form we have heard for a great while. It was played to perfection.

Schubert's ever beautiful quintet, with the two 'cellis, made a delightful close to the concert. It, too, was admirably, wonderfully played.

The Musical and Dramatic World
NEW YORK, DECEMBER 6, 1893.

I wonder if the erroneous opinions about America entertained by foreigners is a sufficient reason or excuse for some expressions of their judgment.

For instance, I doubt if the management of this week's Symphony Concert programme would have passed muster in any German or French centre.

A. Brahm's Symphony (No. 1, in C Minor, Op. 68 the one containing the least material of a popular kind, one theme in the last movement excepted, of any he has written; a work on which he was engaged, off and on, for ten years; then the overture to Mozart's Magic Flute; next two movements of a violin; concerts by Tschaikowski; a composition for the virtuoso, and one in which the old time fireworks had full play; and last, a symphonic poem "The Moldau," by Frederick Smetana, which, it seems to me, had no possible excuse for being present.

If Mr. Paur has been told that an American audience cannot take a Brahm's Symphony without something very trivial with it, to make it palatable to the half developed Boston, taste he must have been undeceived this time, for the Symphony received enthusiastic applause; the Mozart Overture nearly the same, while many left the hall before the Smetana piece was over.

Why cannot a leader continue in the path that gave him his reputation? The contract to conduct the Boston orchestra extends over several years, and long before the man's time expires he is found out and obliged to take the place in which he best fits. During the first season one finds himself treated to surprises that make him feel that the new leader is endeavoring to hide or disguise his true colors.

Speaking of the performance this week, the band threw itself into the Brahm's Symphony with its whole soul and from the leader down seemed to be inspired.

It is always gratifying to see the deep interest all routine players show in Brahm's. His almost unlimited resources appeal in the strongest manner to men who have long ago become satiated with conventional means.

Mr. Paur again delighted us with his masterly reading of the great work, and his treatment of every point ought to command the admiration of all except constitutional grumblers.

The Mozart Overture was not so satisfactory, albeit its tremendous pace, which though robbing it of its finer beauties, gave it an unwonted fire and converted it into a far better foil to the Brahm's piece than it otherwise would have proved.

Mr. Adamowski's playing of the Tschuikowsky Concerts was far from successful. I do not refer to a lapse of memory, which might be forgiven, but to continued false intonations and a tone that was at least inadequate.

In the hands of a great executant the composition possesses elements that would stir the listener through and through, but which in Mr. Adamonski's case became only a show of difficulties with which he was unable to cope.

The Symphonic Poem by Smetana, is fresh, full of clever, well-balanced material and shows an experienced hand. It was crisply played; but I repeat: It did not merit a place beside Brahms and Mozart.

Frederick Smetana, a Bohemian, was born at Leitomischl, March 2, 1824, and died at Prag, May 12, 1884. An exceedingly brilliant pianist, his greatest reputation is as an opera composer, although but one opera, "The Devil's Well," is much known outside of Bohemia. Still several overtures and one piano concerto have been heard in many of the great cities of the world.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1893.

If to do is to be dramatic, then the Rubinstein symphony—No. 4, in D minor, opus 95—certainly deserves that title, which is indeed the one which it bears. For if ever an orchestra had to be up and doing for a good solid hour and the most of the time playing as if their lives depended upon the amount of sound they produced, this composition gives them the occasion. Nobody gets any let-up, except the three trombone players, who are kept in reserve for the last movement; but they, unless they were of wood or stone, could not get any real rest, backed up as they are by that merciless and judgmentless kettle-drummer, who has been coming out of late with more than his former muscularity. It is really time that he should be put into his place in relation to the rest of the band. The instruments of percussion are meant to emphasize only, not to overpower.

But there is a good deal more than noise and bustle in these exceedingly protracted movements. Indeed, if there were not, their vehemence, nervous excitement, clangor, hot haste and eager insistence, would wear out the hearer utterly long before the end was reached. But if there be power almost to excess, there is also poetry and there is fancy as well as fury. One can interpret the symphony in detail as his notions rise under its influence; but, considered in a general way, it may suggest to many a scheme something like this: The first movement, with varying phrase and mood, might present the tense, hard, combative spirit of life, rising from ignorance and gloom to struggle with hand and head to accomplishment and independence; the second, life's comedy, ranging from the rude, heavy-footed mirth of clowns to quieter and less earthy gayety; the third, a sense of possible repose and rest and gentle pleasure; the fourth, a recapitulation of the past experiences and states, concluding in the fulness of assurance and content. In the course of these expositions there are many passages wherein single instruments speak reflectively, beautifully, persuasively or pungently; but generally the mass of the orchestra is at work, and energetically if not always to the satisfaction of the professional examiner who looks for logic and for adherence to customary systems of development. The themes are many and often as graceful as they are original; there are odd shifts of rhythm and sudden, sharp syncopations, and one often seems to feel a kind of impatience on the composer's part that, with all his forces at work, he cannot get more out of them.

This symphony, which was placed judiciously at the end of the programme, was the hardest test of the season thus far of the orchestra's attention and endurance. Not only full strength is constantly demanded, but the ability to show this while executing very difficult passages at top speed, and the further capacity to enthuse and be authoritative. The playing was, however, almost always remarkable for accuracy, vigor, sonority and regard for form; and if an occasional phrase sounded a little weak, thin or reluctant or some small individual slip was noticeable, this certainly was not to be wondered at.

The concert began with a good reading of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, broad and smooth in the introduction, urgent and decided afterwards, with a moulding toward softness in the Astarte allusions. And, by the way, we could hardly help feeling that the beginning of the fourth movement in the symphony had for a few moments a temperament and form closely akin to the opening of this overture.

The intermediate number was Brahms's opus 56 A—the variations upon a serious, ecclesiastical theme by Haydn, known as the Chorale of St. Anthony. Variations are unquestionably caviar to the general, especially when, as in the present case, their connection with the nominal theme is so remote that the musician with score and pencil in hand can hardly find and follow it. But in this set Brahms has not confined himself to contrapuntal and figurative exercises. He has given his fancy free rein to choose keys, rhythms, tempi and orchestral combinations. So, with two or three dryer exceptions, these separate studies interest and almost divert by their varieties of movement and of tone color, until the finale comes to cap the climax with its martial swing, its keen accentuations and its lively orchestration brightened by the flurry of the piccolo and the jingle of the triangle. The whole got good playing and two or three of the variations were particularly brilliant, distinct and inspiriting.

A delightful announcement is made for the next concert, which does not come until the 23d inst. Mr. Carl Baermann, whose long absence could be attributed to nothing but Mr. Nikisch's freakishness, is to be the soloist. His choice of music is not yet made known, but the programme includes Beethoven's first symphony; a serenade by Mozart, Mr. Kneisel giving the violin obbligato, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Kneisel Quartette's third programme, played on Monday evening, introduced between two works always regarded with familiar friendliness—Mozart's D-minor quartette and Schubert's C-major quintette, opus 163—the first American performance of D'Albert's eleventh opus, a quartette in E-flat major. The Kneisel programmes are almost invariably well arranged, and the dispositions of the present one gave this new work, for hearing which all the audience wished to be in the best of attitudes, a capital preparation in the pellucid coolness of the Mozart, which put everybody into a pleasant temper, musically disposed and void of any prejudicial bias. The characteristics of D'Albert as a pianist must be clear in many readers' minds, and they will rise up to show to strange contrasts between his almost fairy-like delicacy of fancy and his tempestuous outbursts as of a formless passion which must find vent through the clangor of chords and under vehement hammers. Such qualities show themselves in this quartette, wherein one finds passages to which justice cannot be done unless the bow strikes roughly upon strident strings and beats out unreasoning and apparent causeless dissonances, together with others most dainty, airy and fascinating. The distinct personal talent of the author is always felt, and one observes constantly knowledge and command of constructive means and technical resource. On the other hand, while there is no reason for looking upon the composition as in any wise outre, it is independent from adhesion to formal and academic methods and proclaims itself in its own way. It has a free, various and masterly expression of a generous, impetuous, sincere and not indiscreet spirit, and as it was warmly welcomed, it is sure to be cordially cherished, and while some of its movements, the second—a picturesque and piquant allegro—especially, will probably be not infrequently chosen for separate performance. Of course the playing was all first rate, and Mr. Schulz added his 'cello for the Schubert.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 10, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

There was a feeling of satisfaction in the musical world when, less than a half dozen years ago, it became generally known that Eugen d'Albert, who had already proved himself to be a doughty knight of the pianoforte, had completed some compositions in the larger forms, and was likely to work hereafter quite as much in originating as in interpreting works of large dimensions and of serious nature. Since the time of that report, numerous compositions of d'Albert have been published, and several have been heard here. Unfortunately, they have, so far as we have heard, served only to dissipate or chill the latent enthusiasm which was ready to burst forth in welcome of new and worthy achievements of the gifted pianist. D'Albert shows in his compositions the same seriousness of purpose which he manifests as a performer. It is pretty clear, too, that a deal of poetic intensity accompanies the development of his musical thoughts. But the power to be musically significant is well-nigh totally lacking. His themes are vapid. They say nothing and lead nowhere. Any of them might be likened to a lifeless football, which exists only to be put in play again and again for the sole purpose of being tossed or kicked about, or scrambled for, by the various players. With d'Albert it is not at all the theme, but the antics of the players which interest us. And when we have a team like the Kneisel quartette, we are sorry to have them fool away their time on such poor stuff. It goes without saying that the numerous instrumental cleverenesses of the work were perfectly rendered last Monday evening; and the scherzo, with its con sordino suggestions of scampering fairies, provoked hearty applause.

It was doubtless our quartette's duty to present this important novelty. But the work made a dismal desert in the midst of a programme whose outskirts were delightful; for a D minor quartette of Mozart and Schubert's well-known string quintette (with two 'celli) in C made the opening and closing numbers. Mr. Leo Schulz's beautiful tone and perfect taste made the ensemble in the quintette simply ideal.

The next concert will be Jan. 1.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 10.

A notice of last night's Symphony concert is unavoidably postponed until our next issue.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its third concert in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, the programme being: Quartet, D-minor, Mozart; Quartet, E-flat, op. 11, D'Albert; Quintet C, op. 163, Schubert. The D'Albert work was given for the first time in this country. It is not without a certain originality and positive strength, but as a whole it is rugged, not to say crabbed; and suggests that it was written at the piano rather than thought out primarily for stringed instruments. Here and there is to be found a bit of warm and tender melody, and here and there, also, a powerfully dramatic outburst; but these are but drops in the bucket of catewauling and rasping, blatant vagueness and bizarre ugliness in effect. Nevertheless there is much that shows the composer to be an original thinker, and he certainly seeks for and finds new and striking combinations for the instruments. The scherzo is a surprising bit of work in this direction, but it has been built up laboriously, and astonishes rather than gratifies. It is genuine fin de siècle, and after it is all over, one recalls the remark of Dickens's character, who, experiencing a difficulty in learning the alphabet, has his doubts whether it is worth while to go through so much for so little. The work was brilliantly performed, and was vigorously applauded. The other selections were given faultlessly and in that finished and sympathetic style that marks all the performances of the players. The next concert is announced for Jan. 1.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eighth concert by the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; Brahms's "Variations" and Finale, on a Theme by Haydn" and Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony No. 4 in D Minor." The selections were interesting and highly classical, but of the rather dry and unsympathetic order. Mr. Paur again demonstrated his superior ability as a director. His readings were characterized by their great intelligence and precision, and his command over his orchestra is almost perfect. Rubinstein's Dramatic Symphony in four movements was exquisitely performed. The second movement, presto in D minor, in the form of a scherzo, was decidedly intricate, but was rendered in a most brilliant and dashing manner. The delicate, yet perfect, execution was received with hearty applause. The third movement, adagio, is a romanza with great elaboration and variation. The finale is highly dramatic, and was worked out with great vigor and effect.

There will be no rehearsal or concert the coming week, the next taking place Dec. 22 and 23, when Carl Baermann will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 10, 1893.

Echoes From the Eighth Symphony —Concerts and Entertainments Tonight—Musical Notes.

The principal number on the program of last week's symphony concert was Rubinstein's dramatic symphony No. 4, given for the first time in this city. The peculiarities of the celebrated Russian composer and pianist are shown in his orchestral work. There is a wealth of melodic forms and suggestions running through the four movements, but the lack of development, either intentional or otherwise, is marked. Rubinstein, although one of the foremost pianists and composers of the day, is uneven in his work, a fact plainly evident to those who have heard him at the piano.

Moods govern him. At times he plays superbly and then he has spells of relapsing into carelessness. This contrast appears in his symphonic work. It is a beautiful composition, judged in its entirety, but marred by passages and orchestral treatment which are annoyingly inartistic when the abilities of the writer are considered.

The work opens with a familiar, moaning rhythm, frequently employed by Rubinstein, which leads up to a minor theme, introduced and developed by a strikingly curious orchestration for double basses and horns. New themes appear in the fantasia, at first lively, then of a military character, and after a strange bit of instrumentation the true fantasia really begins; and in this finale the genius of the compcser is clearly shown. The dramatic climax is thrilling and worthy of his name and fame.

In the second and third movements a long scherzo and a dramatic ending of a majestic four-part harmony are excellent examples of contrasted writing of a high character. In the finale of the fourth movement occur several careless methods of working out thematic ideas which gives to the closing number the appearance of an unfinished composition.

Much of the orchestral work was very fine. The double basses gave the arpeggi in the first movement splendidly. The climax of the fantasia was forcefully and smoothly played. The celli and basses in the coda of the third movement, and the rondo in the finale were also worthy of special praise.

The symphony as a whole is interesting because it is a Rubinstein composition, but the excellences of the writing are somewhat overshadowed by the defects which appear throughout the work.

Schumann's great overture to "Manfred" was performed admirably, the beautiful deviations in the third part being notably delicater in shadings and crescendo variations. Bahm's variations on a theme by Haydn was the gem of the program, the excellent team work of the orchestra showing plainly in the numerous changes of tempo and treatments of the original motif. The precision of the men was marked and the brilliancy of the performance was appreciated by the auditors most heartily.

The next symphony concert will be given Dec 22. The program includes Beethoven's first symphony, a serenade by Mozart, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 1163.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1893.

The element of frivolous enjoyment was carefully eliminated from the first half of last evening's symphony programme.

There were probably those who revel in a performance of the "Manfred" overture by Schumann, and those who are characterized by this peculiarity had their liking appealed to very successfully in Mr. Paur's performance of that unemotional composition. The tendencies of the audience in this direction were not shown to any considerable extent upon this occasion, but no exceptions can be taken to the reading of the work by Mr. Paur or its performance under his direction.

Following this tedious opening of the programme came Johannes Brahms' variations and finale upon a theme by Joseph Haydn, opus 56 A. The theme itself was delightfully played by the orchestra, and the men under Mr. Paur's direction were equally successful in dealing with the various treatments of the subject by Mr. Brahms, but just why Mr. Brahms should treat Mr. Haydn's theme in such a way, and why the audience should be compelled to listen to its performance, are questions for discussion.

The final work of the evening was Rubinstein's dramatic symphony No. 4, opus 95. The depression which had taken good hold upon the audience up to this time was not relieved by the lento and the largo of the opening movement, in which the mechanical side of the composer is made so prominent. With the beginning of the presto came a well appreciated relief from the monotony of the evening's work up to that point, and from that on to the grand finale of the symphony the performance was both entertaining and instructive. Better work has rarely been done by the players under Mr. Paur's direction than in the last three movements of this symphony, the beauties of the lovely adagio and the brilliant characteristics of the final allegro being brought out in splendid fashion.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour next week, and for Saturday evening, Dec. 23, Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and Beethoven's first symphony will be played.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1893.

The Eighth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred" ..... Schumann
Variations on a theme of Haydn ..... Brahms
Symphony No. 4, D minor ..... Rubinstein

The overture to "Manfred" was played finely, with a full appreciation of its passion, beauty, depair. The variations by Brahms were read carefully, but the work was sandwiched injudiciously between the overture and the symphony. Mr. Paur has yet to prove that he is a master of the difficult art of arranging a program.

Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony has not been heard here for some time. The composer is fond of it. When he played the E flat major concerto of Beethoven in Berlin in November, 1883, he was asked by Wuellner, the conductor, which of his symphonies he would direct at the same concert, and he chose the fourth without hesitation. There is no denying the ingenuity or the power of certain passages of this work. The scherzo is captivating throughout. There is tender beauty in the slow movement, and alas! there is also sentimentali-m. But as an organic whole the symphony cannot be called consistently great. Too many people are introduced into the drama who have no connection with the development of the plot, and they take up a great deal of time with their chatter. There is a waste of ingenious elaboration in the instrumentation. Many of the figures of the wood-wind are ineffective against the strings, and at times they are unheard. Indeed, it may be said that this instrumentation appeals often more to the reader of the score than to the hearer of the instruments. At the same time there are many striking effects, as in the strange chromatic progression of clarionets and bassoons shortly after the beginning of the first allegro. The symphony is long enough to outlast a night in Russia. It is as long and as unequal as one of Dostoievsky's later novels. But with all its faults, and they are many, the claw of the lion is visible. The symphony, which swarms with technical difficulties, was played with spirit and, generally, with accuracy. Mr. Paur was inclined in the first movement to abuse freedom of tempo, when any instrument had a fugitive solo; but in the main his reading was eminently satisfactory.

There will be no concert this week. The program for the 23d will be Beethoven's First Symphony, Mozart's Serenade, Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

PHILIP HALE.

A most estimable acquaintance told me the other day that his pleasure at the Symphony Concerts was often disturbed by Mr. Paur. It seems that the new Conductor, a man of sincerity, one who puts his soul in the appointed task, is inclined to show openly his earnestness and zeal in the service of his employer by beating time lustily with his foot. As a result, the sitters in the front seats hear the creaking of the orchestral machine; and one of them, my friend, is likely to be a sitter in the seat of the scornful, for, just as he is prepared to dilate with the proper emotion,

"He hears a foot begin to stump,
Thump! lump!
Lump! thump!
Like the spectre in 'Don Giovanni!'"

***

And yet nothing could more clearly show the honesty of Mr. Paur than this same beating the floor with a foot. It is not his fault if the players go astray. With his arms he cuts all manner of geometric figures in the air until he becomes a series of living diagrams; he is an atlas of conductorial charts; with his fingers he picks nuances off the orchestra; his face is constantly in action; and then there is his foot! Stolid and sodden must the musician be who can fail to understand the sign boards, admonitory, prohibitive, encouraging, that are thus set up before him.

Then, too, there is a simplicity about this manner of marking time that commends the man. Years ago in our choir lofts, perhaps even now in some, the man with the strongest voice beat time with the heaviest foot.

***

Mr. Paur would certainly be horrified if he knew that his habit disturbed anyone prepared to admire him. The habit, if unconscious, is probably confirmed. Now what shall be done?

When Mr. Nikisch was here great pains were taken for his comfort. He was exalted on high by the aid of platforms, and rugs of texture and design that suited his Oriental fancy did homage to his noble feet.

Why should not Mr. Paur be presented with a pair of thick fur boots with felt soles? With them might be given the subscription list of "patrons and patronesses of music;" and the list might be headed with the motto, "Suaviter in modo," or "Do good by stealth." Rubber boots are cheaper; but they would chafe the conductor in his more impassioned moments; they yield an unsavory smell; they have a cold, wet noise of their own, even when they are perfectly dry.

***

Or there might be a return to a habit long ago in Italy, where the conductor beat time with a handkerchief.

Beating with the foot was a well-established practice years ago in many countries. Among the ancients the Coryphæus wore sandals made heavy by wood or iron, and as he stamped he struck the hollow of his left hand with his right hand. Sometimes he clashed together shells. Before Lulli ruled in France, a roll of paper served as a baton.

It was Lulli, by the way, who struck his foot violently with the conductor's stick and died from the resulting wound—an awful warning to all magnetic and fiery leaders of orchestras. Lulli's stick is said to have been five feet long.

After Lulli, conductors used a thick piece of wood, and they hammered the desk with it. Grimm compared the conductor at the Opéra to a wood-chopper. Rousseau claimed that without this noise the time could not be determined; "the ears are shocked," said Rousseau, "by this disagreeable and continuous noise, but the evil is inevitable." In this connection read the story by Berlioz, "Une victime du tack."

One of those learned men who apparently have nothing else to do save writing to the newspaper, which serves them as a "waste-pipe to the intellect," claimed lately that the stick dated back only to the end of the 18th century. But in Dom Le Clerc's treatise on Plain Song, 1673, we find an allusion to the churches of the East and the West, in which the directors of the music employed a stick for the proper performance of the mass.

Deldevez, excellent musician and conductor of the Société des Concerts at the Paris Conservatory for at least a dozen years, believes that the ideal conductor should be a violinist and should direct with a fiddle-bow, not with a stick.

***

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The heaviness of the programme of Saturday's concert was in some degree counterbalanced by the excellence of the performance. Viewed from a technical standpoint, this was the best performance of the season, and Mr. Paur and his orchestra may well be proud of it. It began with Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which is perhaps the most even of all the orchestral compositions of this master. The subject seems to have appealed to Schumann's nature with especial force, and it was natural to expect that the composer who came nearest to the poetic ideal in the setting of "Faust" should also be very successful in so kindred a subject as "Manfred." Schumann was a veritable magician of rhythms, and always revelled in syncopations, and here these shiftings of natural rhythm are peculiarly appropriate as picturing the distorted soul of the weird hero, and their contrast with the clear yet pathetic theme which represents Astarte is one of the most impressive of pictures. The shading of the close was most delicate, the contrasts were strongly brought out, and the trumpets were most effective in their soft passages. Altogether then, a notable performance.

But the interpretation of the Brahms variations of a Haydn theme went beyond even this standard. With many composers of the modern school orchestral variations mean a display of separate instruments; there is generally a flute variation, a chance for the bassoon, a bit of pyrotechnics for the violin, etc., etc. Brahms will have none of this; he goes back to the grander school of Beethoven for his model, and his variations not only have a true symphonic ring in their scoring but frequently cross the border-line between variation and development. To make this technical point more clear it may be explained that in variation the organic shape generally remains the same, in development it is usually altered; in variation it is the whole theme that is treated, in development its figures; in variation the composer merely redecorates the house in various ways, in development he builds entirely anew with the old material. The process in this case led to something quite different from the pretty villa which Haydn had built, but the rich tonal palace which Brahms made out of it was its own sufficient raison d'etre. The orchestral combinations here were a study, and the clearness of the performance made the study an especially valuable one. The contrapuntal passages were marvellously clear-cut, and in every respect the performance was something to awaken enthusiasm.

The concert ended with Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony." It would not be a misnomer to entitle this work the "spasmodic symphony," for seldom has passion been torn into minutiæ tatters than in this work. It would be folly to deny that there are great moments in the composition, but there are also moments of dulness, much repetition, not of themes, but of ideas and of style, and the symphony is far too long for what it has to say. Rubinstein seems to be a musical Narcissus who takes leave of himself with great regret. He is also the most unequal of composers; at one moment he is scaling Olympus, and for the next half hour he is giving the auditor a geological survey of the route. The first movement is long enough for an entire symphony, and does not attain the grandeur of the immortal first movement of his "Ocean Symphony." There is plenty of combat in it, a good use of the strange Oriental scales, plenty of mystery, some touches of spectral horror on the chalumeau register of the clarinette (Weber has told some better ghost stories on this instrument in this deep register), but at the end one feels like echoing the question of Southey's young Peterkin—"Now tell us what 'twas all about?"

The performance was especially fine, beyond any that the work has yet received here. The horn, clarinette and oboe in the first movement, the crisp effect of the march-like theme of the second, the cellos in the theme of the adagio, the violin fury of the finale, the oboe in the adagio, and the brio of the figure which runs through the wood-wind from bassoon to flute near the close of the work, these were but a few of the excellent points of execution. The ensemble was without noticeable flaw, spite of the appropriately capricious tempi which the conductor employed. But while heartily congratulating the conductor and performers on the brilliant accomplishment of the arduous task, at the end one could not help wishing that if Rubinstein achieved Schubert's "heavenly length" he had also achieved his charming coherency.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 5 Dezember 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Am Mittwoch, den 13. Dezember, um 8 Uhr Abends giebt das berühmte Boston Symphonie Orchester unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Herrn Emil Paur, das zweite von fünf großen Symphonie-Konzerten, in der hiesigen Academy of Music. — Die F dur Symphonie von Hermann Göp gelangt zur Aufführung, auch wird der rühmlichst bekannte Violin-Virtuose Herr Franz Kneisel wird als Solist fungiren und den ersten Satz von Beethovens Violin-Konzert zum Vortrag bringen. Tickets sind bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, DEC. 10, 1893.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

There was a feeling of satisfaction in the musical world when, less than a half dozen years ago, it became generally known that Eugen d'Albert, who had already proved himself to be a doughty knight of the pianoforte, had completed some compositions in the larger forms, and was likely to work hereafter quite as much in originating as in interpreting works of large dimensions and of serious nature. Since the time of that report, numerous compositions of d'Albert have been published, and several have been heard here. Unfortunately, they have, so far as we have heard, served only to dissipate or chill the latent enthusiasm which was ready to burst forth in welcome of new and worthy achievements of the gifted pianist. D'Albert shows in his compositions the same seriousness of purpose which he manifests as a performer. It is pretty clear, too, that a deal of poetic intensity accompanies the development of his musical thoughts. But the power to be musically significant is well-nigh totally lacking. His themes are vapid. They say nothing and lead nowhere. Any of them might be likened to a lifeless football, which exists only to be put in play again and again for the sole purpose of being tossed or kicked about, or scrambled for, by the various players. With d'Albert it is not at all the theme, but the antics of the players which interest us. And when we have a team like the Kneisel quartette, we are sorry to have them fool away their time on such poor stuff. It goes without saying that the numerous instrumental clevernesses of the work were perfectly rendered last Monday evening; and the scherzo, with its con sordino suggestions of scampering fairies, provoked hearty applause.

It was doubtless our quartette's duty to present this important novelty. But the work made a dismal desert in the midst of a programme whose outskirts were delightful; for a D minor quartette of Mozart and Schubert's well-known string quintette (with two 'celli) in C made the opening and closing numbers. Mr. Leo Schulz's beautiful tone and perfect taste made the ensemble in the quintette simply ideal.

The next concert will be Jan. 1.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 10.

A notice of last night's Symphony concert is unavoidably postponed until our next issue.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its third concert in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, the programme being: Quartet, D-minor, Mozart; Quartet, E-flat, op. 11, D'Albert; Quintet C, op. 163, Schubert. The D'Albert work was given for the first time in this country. It is not without a certain originality and positive strength, but as a whole it is rugged, not to say crabbed; and suggests that it was written at the piano rather than thought out primarily for stringed instruments. Here and there is to be found a bit of warm and tender melody, and here and there, also, a powerfully dramatic outburst; but these are but drops in the bucket of catewauling and rasping, blatant vagueness and bizarre ugliness in effect. Nevertheless there is much that shows the composer to be an original thinker, and he certainly seeks for and finds new and striking combinations for the instruments. The scherzo is a surprising bit of work in this direction, but it has been built up laboriously, and astonishes rather than gratifies. It is genuine fin de siècle, and after it is all over, one recalls the remark of Dickens's character, who, experiencing a difficulty in learning the alphabet, has his doubts whether it is worth while to go through so much for so little. The work was brilliantly performed, and was vigorously applauded. The other selections were given faultlessly and in that finished and sympathetic style that marks all the performances of the players. The next concert is announced for Jan. 1.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 10, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the eighth concert by the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; Brahms's "Variations" and Finale, on a Theme by Haydn" and Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony No. 4 in D Minor." The selections were interesting and highly classical, but of the rather dry and unsympathetic order. Mr. Paur again demonstrated his superior ability as a director. His readings were characterized by their great intelligence and precision, and his command over his orchestra is almost perfect. Rubinstein's Dramatic Symphony in four movements was exquisitely performed. The second movement, presto in D minor, in the form of a scherzo, was decidedly intricate, but was rendered in a most brilliant and dashing manner. The delicate, yet perfect, execution was received with hearty applause. The third movement, adagio, is a romanza with great elaboration and variation. The finale is highly dramatic, and was worked out with great vigor and effect.

There will be no rehearsal or concert the coming week, the next taking place Dec. 22 and 23, when Carl Baermann will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 10, 1893.

Echoes From the Eighth Symphony —Concerts and Entertainments Tonight—Musical Notes.

The principal number on the program of last week's symphony concert was Rubinstein's dramatic symphony No. 4, given for the first time in this city. The peculiarities of the celebrated Russian composer and pianist are shown in his orchestral work. There is a wealth of melodic forms and suggestions running through the four movements, but the lack of development, either intentional or otherwise, is marked. Rubinstein, although one of the foremost pianists and composers of the day, is uneven in his work, a fact plainly evident to those who have heard him at the piano.

Moods govern him. At times he plays superbly and then he has spells of relapsing into carelessness. This contrast appears in his symphonic work. It is a beautiful composition, judged in its entirety, but marred by passages and orchestral treatment which are annoyingly martistic when the abilities of the writer are considered.

The work opens with a familiar, moaning rhythm, frequently employed by Rubinstein, which leads up to a minor theme, introduced and developed by a strikingly curious orchestration for double basses and horns. New themes appear in the fantasia, at first lively, then of a military character, and after a strange bit of instrumentation the true fantasia really begins; and in this finale the genius of the composer is clearly shown. The dramatic climax is thrilling and worthy of his name and fame.

In the second and third movements a long scherzo and a dramatic ending of a majestic four-part harmony are excellent examples of contrasted writing of a high character. In the finale of the fourth movement occur several careless methods of working out thematic ideas which gives to the closing number the appearance of an unfinished composition.

Much of the orchestral work was very fine. The double basses gave the arpeggi in the first movement splendidly. The climax of the fantasia was forcefully and smoothly played. The celli and basses in the coda of the third movement, and the rondo in the finale were also worthy of special praise.

The symphony as a whole is interesting because it is a Rubinstein composition, but the excellences of the writing are somewhat overshadowed by the defects which appear throughout the work.

Schumann's great overture to "Manfred" was performed admirably, the beautiful deviations in the third part being notably delicater in shadings and crescendo variations. Bahm's variations on a theme by Haydn was the gem of the program, the excellent team work of the orchestra showing plainly in the numerous changes of tempo and treatments of the original motif. The precision of the men was marked and the brilliancy of the performance was appreciated by the auditors most heartily.

The next symphony concert will be given Dec 22. The program includes Beethoven's first symphony, a serenade by Mozart, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 163.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1893.

The element of frivolous enjoyment was carefully eliminated from the first half of last evening's symphony programme.

There were probably those who revel in a performance of the "Manfred" overture by Schumann, and those who are characterized by this peculiarity had their liking appealed to very successfully in Mr. Paur's performance of that unemotional composition. The tendencies of the audience in this direction were not shown to any considerable extent upon this occasion, but no exceptions can be taken to the reading of the work by Mr. Paur or its performance under his direction.

Following this tedious opening of the programme came Johannes Brahms' variations and finale upon a theme by Joseph Haydn, opus 56 A. The theme itself was delightfully played by the orchestra, and the men under Mr. Paur's direction were equally successful in dealing with the various treatments of the subject by Mr. Brahms, but just why Mr. Brahms should treat Mr. Haydn's theme in such a way, and why the audience should be compelled to listen to its performance, are questions for discussion.

The final work of the evening was Rubinstein's dramatic symphony No. 4, opus 95. The depression which had taken good hold upon the audience up to this time was not relieved by the lento and the largo of the opening movement, in which the mechanical side of the composer is made so prominent. With the beginning of the presto came a well appreciated relief from the monotony of the evening's work up to that point, and from that on to the grand finale of the symphony the performance was both entertaining and instructive. Better work has rarely been done by the players under Mr. Paur's direction than in the last three movements of this symphony, the beauties of the lovely adagio and the brilliant characteristics of the final allegro being brought out in splendid fashion.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour next week, and for Saturday evening, Dec. 23, Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and Beethoven's first symphony will be played.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1893.

The Eighth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred" ..... Schumann
Variations on a theme of Haydn ..... Brahms
Symphony No. 4, D minor ..... Rubinstein

The overture to "Manfred" was played finely, with a full appreciation of its passion, beauty, depair. The variations by Brahms were read carefully, but the work was sandwiched injudiciously between the overture and the symphony. Mr. Paur has yet to prove that he is a master of the difficult art of arranging a program.

Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony has not been heard here for some time. The composer is fond of it. When he played the E flat major concerto of Beethoven in Berlin in November, 1883, he was asked by Wuellner, the conductor, which of his symphonies he would direct at the same concert, and he chose the fourth without hesitation. There is no denying the ingenuity or the power of certain passages of this work. The scherzo is captivating throughout. There is tender beauty in the slow movement, and alas! there is also sentimentality. But as an organic whole the symphony cannot be called consistently great. Too many people are introduced into the drama who have no connection with the development of the plot, and they take up a great deal of time with their chatter. There is a waste of ingenious elaboration in the instrumentation. Many of the figures of the wood-wind are ineffective against the strings, and at times they are unheard. Indeed, it may be said that this instrumentation appeals often more to the reader of the score than to the hearer of the instruments. At the same time there are many striking effects, as in the strange chromatic progression of clarionets and bassoons shortly after the beginning of the first allegro. The symphony is long enough to outlast a night in Russia. It is as long and as unequal as one of Dostoievsky's later novels. But with all its faults, and they are many, the claw of the lion is visible. The symphony, which swarms with technical difficulties, was played with spirit and, generally, with accuracy. Mr. Paur was inclined in the first movement to abuse freedom of tempo, when any instrument had a fugitive solo; but in the main his reading was eminently satisfactory.

There will be no concert this week. The program for the 23d will be Beethoven's First Symphony, Mozart's Serenade, Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

PHILIP HALE.

A most estimable acquaintance told me the other day that his pleasure at the Symphony Concerts was often disturbed by Mr. Paur. It seems that the new Conductor, a man of sincerity, one who puts his soul in the appointed task, is inclined to show openly his earnestness and zeal in the service of his employer by beating time lustily with his foot. As a result, the sitters in the front seats hear the creaking of the orchestral machine; and one of them, my friend, is likely to be a sitter in the seat of the scornful, for, just as he is prepared to dilate with the proper emotion,

> "He hears a foot begin to stump,
> Thump! lump!
> Lump! thump!
> Like the spectre in 'Don Giovanni!'"

***

And yet nothing could more clearly show the honesty of Mr. Paur than this same beating the floor with a foot. It is not his fault if the players go astray. With his arms he cuts all manner of geometric figures in the air until he becomes a series of living diagrams; he is an atlas of conductorial charts; with his fingers he picks nuances off the orchestra; his face is constantly in action; and then there is his foot! Stolid and sodden must the musician be who can fail to understand the sign boards, admonitory, prohibitive, encouraging, that are thus set up before him.

Then, too, there is a simplicity about this manner of marking time that commends the man. Years ago in our choir lofts, perhaps even now in some, the man with the strongest voice beat time with the heaviest foot.

***

Mr. Paur would certainly be horrified if he knew that his habit disturbed anyone prepared to admire him. The habit, if unconscious, is probably confirmed. Now what shall be done?

When Mr. Nikisch was here great pains were taken for his comfort. He was exalted on high by the aid of platforms, and rugs of texture and design that suited his Oriental fancy did homage to his noble feet.

Why should not Mr. Paur be presented with a pair of thick fur boots with felt soles? With them might be given the subscription list of "patrons and patronesses of music;" and the list might be headed with the motto, "Suaviter in modo," or "Do good by stealth." Rubber boots are cheaper; but they would chafe the conductor in his more impassioned moments; they yield an unsavory smell; they have a cold, wet noise of their own, even when they are perfectly dry.

***

Or there might be a return to a habit long ago in Italy, where the conductor beat time with a handkerchief.

Beating with the foot was a well-established practice years ago in many countries. Among the ancients the Coryphæus wore sandals made heavy by wood or iron, and as he stamped he struck the hollow of his left hand with his right hand. Sometimes he clashed together shells. Before Lulli ruled in France, a roll of paper served as a baton.

It was Lulli, by the way, who struck his foot violently with the conductor's stick and died from the resulting wound—an awful warning to all magnetic and fiery leaders of orchestras. Lulli's stick is said to have been five feet long.

After Lulli, conductors used a thick piece of wood, and they hammered the desk with it. Grimm compared the conductor at the Opera to a wood-chopper. Rousseau claimed that without this noise the time could not be determined; "the ears are shocked," said Rousseau, "by this disagreeable and continuous noise, but the evil is inevitable." In connection read the story by Berlioz, "Une victime du tack."

One of those learned men who apparently have nothing else to do save writing to the newspaper, which serves them as a "waste-pipe to the intellect," claimed lately that the stick dated back only to the end of the 18th century. But in Dom Le Clerc's treatise on Plain Song, 1673, we find an allusion to the churches of the East and the West, in which the directors of the music employed a stick for the proper performance of the mass.

Deldevez, excellent musician and conductor of the Société des Concerts at the Paris Conservatory for at least a dozen years, believes that the ideal conductor should be a violinist and should direct with a fiddle-bow, not with a stick.

***

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

The heaviness of the programme of Saturday's concert was in some degree counterbalanced by the excellence of the performance. Viewed from a technical standpoint, this was the best performance of the season, and Mr. Paur and his orchestra may well be proud of it. It began with Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which is perhaps the most even of all the orchestral compositions of this master. The subject seems to have appealed to Schumann's nature with especial force, and it was natural to expect that the composer who came nearest to the poetic ideal in the setting of "Faust" should also be very successful in so kindred a subject as "Manfred." Schumann was a veritable magician of rhythms, and always revelled in syncopations, and here these shiftings of natural rhythm are peculiarly appropriate as picturing the distorted soul of the weird hero, and their contrast with the clear yet pathetic theme which represents Astarte is one of the most impressive of pictures. The shading of the close was most delicate, the contrasts were strongly brought out, and the trumpets were most effective in their soft passages. Altogether then, a notable performance.

But the interpretation of the Brahms variations of a Haydn theme went beyond even this standard. With many composers of the modern school orchestral variations mean a display of separate instruments; there is generally a flute variation, a chance for the bassoon, a bit of pyrotechnics for the violin, etc., etc. Brahms will have none of this; he goes back to the grander school of Beethoven for his model, and his variations not only have a true symphonic ring in their scoring but frequently cross the border-line between variation and development. To make this technical point more clear it may be explained that in variation the organic shape generally remains the same, in development it is usually altered; in variation it is the whole theme that is treated, in development its figures; in variation the composer merely redecorates the house in various ways, in development he builds entirely anew with the old material. The process in this case led to something quite different from the pretty villa which Haydn had built, but the rich tonal palace which Brahms made out of it was its own sufficient raison d'etre. The orchestral combinations here were a study, and the clearness of the performance made the study an especially valuable one. The contrapuntal passages were marvellously clear-cut, and in every respect the performance was something to awaken enthusiasm.

The concert ended with Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony." It would not be a misnomer to entitle this work the "spasmodic symphony," for seldom has passion been torn into minuter tatters than in this work. It would be folly to deny that there are great moments in the composition, but there are also moments of dulness, much repetition, not of themes, but of ideas and of style, and the symphony is far too long for what it has to say. Rubinstein seems to be a musical Narcissus who takes leave of himself with great regret. He is also the most unequal of composers; at one moment he is scaling Olympus, and for the next half hour he is giving the auditor a geological survey of the route. The first movement is long enough for an entire symphony, and does not attain the grandeur of the immortal first movement of his "Ocean Symphony." There is plenty of combat in it, a good use of the strange Oriental scales, plenty of mystery, some touches of spectral horror on the chalumeau register of the clarinette (Weber has told some better ghost stories on this instrument in this deep register), but at the end one feels like echoing the question of Southey's young Peterkin—"Now tell us what 'twas all about?"

The performance was especially fine, beyond any that the work has yet received here. The horn, clarinette and oboe in the first movement, the crisp effect of the march-like theme of the second, the cellos in the theme of the adagio, the violin fury of the finale, the oboe in the adagio, and the brio of the figure which runs through the wood-wind from bassoon to flute near the close of the work, these were but a few of the excellent points of execution. The ensemble was without noticeable flaw, spite of the appropriately capricious tempi which the conductor employed. But while heartily congratulating the conductor and performers on the brilliant accomplishment of the arduous task, at the end one could not help wishing that if Rubinstein achieved Schubert's "heavenly length" he had also achieved his charming coherency.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Dienstag, 5 Dezember 1893.

Boston Symphonie Orchester. Am Mittwoch, den 13. Dezember, um 8 Uhr Abends giebt das berühmte Boston Symphonie Orchester unter Leitung seines neuen Dirigenten, Heern Emil Paur, das zweite von fünf großen Symphonie-Konzerten, in der hiesigen Academy of Music. — Die F dur Symphonie von Hermann Götz gelangt zur Aufführung, auch wird der rühmlichst bekannte Violin-Virtuose Herr Franz Kneisel wird als Solist fungiren und den ersten Satz von Beethovens Violin-Konzert zum Vortrag bringen. Tickets sind bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben.

[illegible] Herald.

[illegible], DECEMBER 11, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Opus 115.

Brahms: Variations and Finale on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, in B flat major, Opus 56a.

Rubinstein: "Dramatic" Symphony, No. 4, in D minor, Opus 95.

A pretty serious programme! The "Manfred" overture to begin with, which disputes with Beethoven's to "Coriolan" and Cherubini's to "Medea" the claim of being the most profoundly tragic overture in the world; then the Brahms variations, which show that the composer, as Wagner once said of him, was certainly not writing in joke; and, to conclude, the Rubinstein symphony, which is perhaps the toughest morsel our audience has had to chew on this winter.

The Schumann overture was admirably played; some points in it were taken differently from the way we have commonly heard the overture go, but the general effect was grandly inspiring. The second theme was given more passionately, with less pathos of expression than we have usually heard it, and that other theme which comes in (in the violas, 'celli, and bassoons) towards the end of the working-out, in C sharp minor, was given with greater tragic breadth and less of passionate, despairing fury than we have heard it before. This latter theme has always seemed to us to justify what a certain enthusiastic violinist once said of it, after taking part in a performance of the overture: "Ja! das wühlt!" (Yes, that rages!); Mr. Paur gives it another expression, but we are by no means sure it loses thereby. As for the second, the so-called "Astarte" theme, we could not but feel that the passionate expression imparted to it by Mr. Paur's adhering unflinchingly to the "leidenschaftliches Tempo," at which Schumann has marked the whole movement, detracted a little from its feminine grace, beauty and appealing pathos—here, for once, we should have liked the tempo held back a little—but, per contra, this stronger and more fervid reading of the passage made the last dying return of the theme, when the flute just hints at it over the mournful harmonies in the other wind instruments, seem doubly beautiful and pathetic by contrast. In a word, Mr. Paur's conception of the whole overture is admirably self-consistent and proclaims its own reason of being quite unmistakably; it is in some ways new to us, but that is nothing against it. The performance was simply masterly.

The Brahms variations seem clearer, more masterly and instinct with genius every time one hears them; one feels little hesitation in calling them a truly great work. With all the learning and ever-growing elaboration with which Brahms has treated the theme, there is a great deal in the work that is wonderfully poetic and imaginative; the not infrequent allusions to the sacred character of the theme, the "Chorale Sancti Antoni," both in the style of writing and in the instrumentation, are exceedingly beautiful. And how satisfyingly and inspiringly the composer shows at moments that classic, "old Hellenic" serenity of mood which he alone of all modern writers has known how to preserve in music in all its beauty! In these variations, too, the orchestra was in its best form; the performance was admirable at every point.

The Rubinstein "dramatic" symphony is unquestionably a huge dose; yet one can easily understand and agree with many musicians in recognizing it as the composer's best symphony. That the quality of its thematic material nowhere places it on the high level of the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony may readily be conceded; but nowhere either does it suffer from such careless, slipshod, impotent working-out as does that otherwise great movement. The themes themselves in the "dramatic" symphony can not in general be called remarkable, even with the best will in the world; the development in all four movements is excessive, prolix, and more than the themes will bear; the terrible persistency of the key of D minor is exceedingly monotonous and provoking; after hearing the work, even those persons who have the faintest imaginable perception of absolute pitch ought to be able to recognize the key of D minor whenever they hear it. Then, too, the composer has not invariably steered clear of the trivial and tawdry; what he puts forth as "dramatic" sometimes bears an all too marked family resemblance to the "Meyerbeer-operatic."

Yet, with all these imperfections, which sorely mar the pleasure with which one listens to the work, one cannot but treat the composition with a certain respect. Here Rubinstein has shown for once that he was thoroughly in earnest, that he took himself quite seriously; he has evidently willed more in this symphony than in any other orchestral work of his we know. He does not give the impression of shirking anything, but writes on and on in the grimmest earnest. The very character of the orchestration is serious and restrained; Rubinstein has scored the symphony for the old Beethoven orchestra, with the usual pairs of wooden wind instruments, only two horns, with trumpets and drums, the three trombones appearing only in the Finale. Likely enough this moderation in the use of orchestral resources may have been prompted by a certain anti-Wagnerian bravado; but the orchestration is in general excellent and often exceedingly brilliant; it is far finer than the instrumentation in the "Ocean" symphony. In short, here is a work one can respect; could the composer cut it down by one-half, one might even wish to hear it again. The performance was very fine indeed.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58; Mozart, serenade with violin obbligato; Schubert, overture to "Rosamunde," opus 26. Carl Baermann will be the pianist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist. The concert comes on Dec. 28; there will be no concert this week.

[illegible] DAILY [illegible]

MONDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Overture to "Manfred".....Schumann
Variations and Finale on a theme by Haydn.....Brahms
Dramatic Symphony, No. 4, in D minor.....Rubinstein

The overture to "Manfred," which has been given many times at these concerts, is a work of deep emotion and great beauty. If one does not exact the nicety of detail that goes so far towards enhancing the value of such passionate music, but is willing to accept the rendering in the light of a strong drawing in outline, then it must be said that the overture was effectively played.

The Brahms variations show the unlimited resources of the author as a musical scientist, and although they may not appeal to the sentimental listener, to the musician they are interesting in the variety of the treatment of the theme, which often appears in a most ideal form. Here again the playing lacked in fineness of expression, although there was much to commend in the precision and rhythmical excellence with which the number was read.

The "Dramatic" Symphony of Rubinstein, which occupies 55 minutes in the playing, has been given in this city but once before to my knowledge, and that was in January, 1876, by Theodore Thomas's orchestra. Perhaps no one of the symphonic compositions of its eminent author shows his masterly genius in so vivid a light as this symphony, which he has pleased to entitle "dramatic." It is more fantastic, and in some portions sentimentally emotional, than strange, and far from dramatic, either in the older or more modern sense. The general character of the composition is certainly far from any resemblance to the mighty Wagner's modes of dramatic display, and does not in the least encroach upon that great innovator's forms of orchestral scoring.

The spontaneous genius, the masterly skill and the wide and deep emotional nature of Rubinstein are displayed, however, throughout this symphony, which is classical in its intention, if the pendulum does swing wide with its author's well-known fiery impulsiveness.

A want of space forbids an analysis of its movements, but it is sufficient to say that, regardless of its length, it is intensely interesting and commands the attention of the musical listener from beginning to end, even though the latter be not a profound musician, and this fact does not in the least detract from its value as a composition of deep and noble proportions.

The orchestra played the symphony with fine effect and Mr. Paur deserves great praise for the able manner in which he conducted the band through the difficulties of the composition. There are but two horns in the scoring of the symphony and they are used with fine effect. The horn solos by Mr. Harkenbarth, the first horn player of the orchestra, calls for especial mention, they were so delightfully and artistically rendered. So also in the Brahm's "Variations" this player took advantage of the many opportunities offered to display his beautiful tone and marked skill. The orchestra is to be congratulated upon the possession of such a rare performer.

Mr. Paur has not yet shown himself a master in programme making. He should also remember that he is no longer confined within the narrow limits of a Conservatory Leipsic, but is now upon the broad and expansive continent of America, that looks forth over the whole musical world for the best specimens of composition that exist in the musical repertoire of individual communities of every nation represented in high musical art. He should certainly acquaint himself with the works of worthy American composers and lend a hand in the encouragement of our native authors by producing in fair proportion the results of their artistic labors.

Mr. Higginson in his noble undertaking in the cause of art should manifest his patriotism in requiring that the foreign conductor who comes here to enjoy the financial benefits arising from the position accorded him, to say nothing of the fame to which thereby he may ascend, should exert himself in the advancement of American musical art by being liberally disposed towards a performance of the works of our best native composers whose ability, be it known, is sufficiently great to demand such recognition.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. For the evening of Dec. 22 the programme announced is: Beethoven's Symphony No. 1; "Serenade," Mozart, with violin obligato by Mr. Kneisel; overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE METRONOME

NEW YORK, DECEMBER, 1893.

In its criticism on Herr Paur's debut at Carnegie Music Hall on Wednesday, Nov. 9th, the New York Herald spoke as follows in relation to the work of the new leader of the Boston Symphony Society: "It may be at once stated that as a conductor Mr. Paur is not entirely satisfactory. A man may be an artist to his finger tips, he may be an excellent musician, he may know by heart the entire literature of orchestral music, and yet, for all that, he may be but an indifferent chef d'orchestre. He must know the technique of conducting. He must have great strength of will. He must have great personal magnetism in order that the varying individualities of the artists playing under his baton may obey him willingly, unhesitatingly, blindly even. Above all he must know how to convey his wishes to the orchestra by gestures which cannot be mistaken. And Mr. Paur does not do this? No; he is very jerky. There was a perceptible hesitation in his attack which has already communicated itself to the orchestra, notwithstanding that it is one of the best in the world. At times it was difficult to tell upon which beat the accent lay, but his most emphatic gesture was generally upon the up beat. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven served excellently well to display all his merits and all his defects. Mr. Paur has not the dramatic instinct. The first movement of the symphony showed that. He has a dreamy, poetic nature. That was equally easy to gather from his reading of the slow movement, which was irreproachable. He is ungraceful to a degree. And he is in earnest. Yes, he is desperately in earnest. He is so much in earnest that he makes one nervous by his unmeaningly emphatic gestures. You are compelled to think that the gentlemen of the orchestra must either undergo the toil of very laborious rehearsals or else they must be inspired. In no other way can you account for their comprehension of the signs their new conductor never wearies of giving them."

HOME JOURNAL SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16,

Mrs. Emil Paur, whose picture is presented this week, is the lady said by Mr. Elson to be the best musician of any that has yet come to Boston as a conductor's spouse, or words to that effect. Mrs. Paur certainly made a deep impression upon her appearance in our city, under her husband's conductorship, not only showing herself a fine musician but a most refined and charming personality. VALENTINE MARTIN.

The Musical and Dramatic World

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 13, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston will give a concert at Chamber Music Hall (Carnegie Hall) on Friday evening. With the assistance of Mr. Zach and Mr. Schulz, a sextuor for two violins, two violas, and two 'celli, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, will be played for the first time. The programme also includes the quartet in D minor, Mozart, and the piano trio in E flat, Opus 100, Schubert. Mrs. Emil Paur will be the pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give its second concert at Carnegie Music Hall to-morrow evening. The programme is as follows: Symphony in F major, Opus 9, Goetz; first movement of the concerto for violin, in D major, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Saint-Saens; overture, Lenore No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Frank Kneisel will be the soloist.

[illegible]

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music this afternoon, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, will be repeated at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The concert will be conducted by Emil Paur and the soloist will be Franz Knersel. The programme is a most attractive one.

[illegible]

[56]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Opus 115.

Brahms: Variations and Finale on a Theme by Josef Haydn, in B-flat major, Opus 56a.

Rubinstein: "Dramatic" Symphony, No. 4, in D minor, Opus 95.

A pretty serious programme! The "Manfred" overture to begin with, which disputes with Beethoven's to "Coriolan" and Cherubini's to "Medea" the claim of being the most profoundly tragic overture in the world; then the Brahms variations, which show that the composer, as Wagner once said of him, was certainly not writing in joke; and, to conclude, the Rubinstein symphony, which is perhaps the toughest morsel our audience has had to chew on this winter.

The Schumann overture was admirably played; some points in it were taken differently from the way we have commonly heard the overture go, but the general effect was grandly inspiring. The second theme was given more passionately, with less pathos of expression than we have usually heard it, and that other theme which comes in (in the violas, 'celli, and bassoons) towards the end of the working-out, in C sharp minor, was given with greater tragic breadth and less of passionate, despairing fury than we have heard it before. This latter theme has always seemed to us to justify what a certain enthusiastic violinist once said of it, after taking part in a performance of the overture: "Ja! das wühlt!" (Yes, that rages!); Mr. Paur gives it another expression, but we are by no means sure it loses thereby. As for the second, the so-called "Astarte" theme, we could not but feel that the passionate expression imparted to it by Mr. Paur's adhering unflinchingly to the "leidenschaftliches Tempo," at which Schumann has marked the whole movement, detracted a little from its feminine grace, beauty and appealing pathos—here, for once, we should have liked the tempo held back a little—but, per contra, this stronger and more fervid reading of the passage made the last dying return of the theme, when the flute just hints at it over the mournful harmonies in the other wind instruments, seem doubly beautiful and pathetic by contrast. In a word, Mr. Paur's conception of the whole overture is admirably self-consistent and proclaims its own reason of being quite unmistakably; it is in some ways new to us, but that is nothing against it. The performance was simply masterly.

The Brahms variations seem clearer, more masterly and instinct with genius every time one hears them; one feels little hesitation in calling them a truly great work. With all the learning and ever-growing elaboration with which Brahms has treated the theme, there is a great deal in the work that is wonderfully poetic and imaginative; the not infrequent allusions to the sacred character of the theme, the "Chorale Sancti Antoni," both in the style of writing and in the instrumentation, are exceedingly beautiful. And how satisfyingly and inspiringly the composer shows at moments that classic, "old Hellenic" serenity of mood which he alone of all modern writers has known how to preserve in music in all its beauty! In these variations, too, the orchestra was in its best form; the performance was admirable at every point.

The Rubinstein "dramatic" symphony is unquestionably a huge dose; yet one can easily understand and agree with many musicians in recognizing it as the composer's best symphony. That the quality of its thematic material nowhere places it on the high level of the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony may readily be conceded; but nowhere either does it suffer from such careless, slipshod, impotent working-out as does that otherwise great movement. The themes themselves in the "dramatic" symphony can not in general be called remarkable, even with the best will in the world; the development in all four movements is excessive, prolix, and more than the themes will bear; the terrible persistency of the key of D minor is exceedingly monotonous and provoking; after hearing the work, even those persons who have the faintest imaginable perception of absolute pitch ought to be able to recognize the key of D minor whenever they hear it. Then, too, the composer has not invariably steered clear of the trivial and tawdry; what he puts forth as "dramatic" sometimes bears an all too marked family resemblance to the "Meyerbeer-operatic."

Yet, with all these imperfections, which sorely mar the pleasure with which one listens to the work, one cannot but treat the composition with a certain respect. Here Rubinstein has shown for once that he was thoroughly in earnest, that he took himself quite seriously; he has evidently willed more in this symphony than in any other orchestral work of his we know. He does not give the impression of shirking anything, but writes on and on in the grimmest earnest. The very character of the orchestration is serious and restrained; Rubinstein has scored the symphony for the old Beethoven orchestra, with the usual pairs of wooden wind instruments, only two horns, with trumpets and drums, the three trombones appearing only in the Finale. Likely enough this moderation in the use of orchestral resources may have been prompted by a certain anti-Wagnerian bravado; but the orchestration is in general excellent and often exceedingly brilliant; it is far finer than the instrumentation in the "Ocean" symphony. In short, here is a work one can respect; could the composer cut it down by one-half, one might even wish to hear it again. The performance was very fine indeed.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58; Mozart, serenade with violin obbligato; Schubert, overture to "Rosamunde," opus 26. Carl Baermann will be the pianist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist. The concert comes on Dec. 23: there will be no concert this week.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLE

MONDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Overture to "Manfred".....Schumann
Variations and Finale on a theme by Haydn.....Brahms
Dramatic Symphony, No. 4, in D minor.....Rubinstein

The overture to "Manfred," which has been given many times at these concerts, is a work of deep emotion and great beauty. If one does not exact the nicety of detail that goes so far towards enhancing the value of such passionate music, but is willing to accept the rendering in the light of a strong drawing in outline, then it must be said that the overture was effectively played.

The Brahms variations show the unlimited resources of the author as a musical scientist, and although they may not appeal to the sentimental listener, to the musician they are interesting in the variety of the treatment of the theme, which often appears in a most ideal form. Here again the playing lacked in fineness of expression, although there was much to commend in the precision and rhythmical excellence with which the number was read.

The "Dramatic" Symphony of Rubinstein, which occupies 55 minutes in the playing, has been given in this city but once before to my knowledge, and that was in January, 1876, by Theodore Thomas's orchestra. Perhaps no one of the symphonic compositions of its eminent author shows his masterly genius in so vivid a light as this symphony, which he has pleased to entitle "dramatic." It is more fantastic, and in some portions sentimentally emotional, than strange, and far from dramatic, either in the older or more modern sense. The general character of the composition is certainly far from any resemblance to the mighty Wagner's modes of dramatic display, and does not in the least encroach upon that great innovator's forms of orchestral scoring.

The spontaneous genius, the masterly skill and the wide and deep emotional nature of Rubinstein are displayed, however, throughout this symphony, which is classical in its intention, if the pendulum does swing wide with its author's well-known fiery impulsiveness.

A want of space forbids an analysis of its movements, but it is sufficient to say that, regardless of its length, it is intensely interesting and commands the attention of the musical listener from beginning to end, even though the latter be not a profound musician, and this fact does not in the least detract from its value as a composition of deep and noble proportions.

The orchestra played the symphony with fine effect and Mr. Paur deserves great praise for the able manner in which he conducted the band through the difficulties of the composition. There are but two horns in the scoring of the symphony and they are used with fine effect. The horn solos by Mr. Harkenbarth, the first horn player of the orchestra, calls for especial mention, they were so delightfully and artistically rendered. So also in the Brahm's "variations" this player took advantage of the many opportunities offered to display his beautiful tone and marked skill. The orchestra is to be congratulated upon the possession of such a rare performer.

Mr. Paur has not yet shown himself a master in programme making. He should also remember that he is no longer confined within the narrow limits of a Conservatory Leipsic, but is now upon the broad and expansive continent of America, that looks forth over the whole musical world for the best specimens of composition that exist in the musical repertoire of individual communities of every nation represented in high musical art. He should certainly acquaint himself with the works of worthy American composers and lend a hand in the encouragement of our native authors by producing in fair proportion the results of their artistic labors.

Mr. Higginson in his noble undertaking in the cause of art should manifest his patriotism in requiring that the foreign conductor who comes here to enjoy the financial benefits arising from the position accorded him, to say nothing of the fame to which thereby he may ascend, should exert himself in the advancement of American musical art by being liberally disposed towards a performance of the works of our best native composers whose ability, be it known, is sufficiently great to demand such recognition.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. For the evening of Dec. 22 the programme announced is: Beethoven's Symphony No. 1; "Serenade," Mozart, with violin obligato by Mr. Kneisel; overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE METRONOME

NEW YORK, DECEMBER, 1893.

In its criticism on Herr Paur's debut at Carnegie Music Hall on Wednesday, Nov. 9th, the New York Herald spoke as follows in relation to the work of the new leader of the Boston Symphony Society: "It may be at once stated that as a conductor Mr. Paur is not entirely satisfactory. A man may be an artist to his finger tips, he may be an excellent musician, he may know by heart the entire literature of orchestral music, and yet, for all that, he may be but an indifferent chef d'orchestre. He must know the technique of conducting. He must have great strength of will. He must have great personal magnetism in order that the varying individualities of the artists playing under his baton may obey him willingly, unhesitatingly, blindly even. Above all he must know how to convey his wishes to the orchestra by gestures which cannot be mistaken. And Mr. Paur does not do this? No; he is very jerky. There was a perceptible hesitation in his attack which has already communicated itself to the orchestra, notwithstanding that it is one of the best in the world. At times it was difficult to tell upon which beat the accent lay, but his most emphatic gesture was generally upon the up beat. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven served excellently well to display all his merits and all his defects. Mr. Paur has not the dramatic instinct. The first movement of the symphony showed that. He has a dreamy, poetic nature. That was equally easy to gather from his reading of the slow movement, which was irreproachable. He is ungraceful to a degree. And he is in earnest. Yes, he is desperately in earnest. He is so much in earnest that he makes one nervous by his unmeaningly emphatic gestures. You are compelled to think that the gentlemen of the orchestra must either undergo the toil of very laborious rehearsals or else they must be inspired. In no other way can you account for their comprehension of the signs their new conductor never wearies of giving them."

THE STANDARD [illegible]

FRIDAY EVENING, DEC. 15, 1[illegible]

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music this afternoon, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, will be repeated at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The concert will be conducted by Emil Paur and the soloist will be Frans Knersel. The programme is a most attractive one.

HOME JOURNAL A PAPER OF TO-DAY SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16,

Mrs. Emil Paur, whose picture is presented this week, is the lady said by Mr. Elson to be the best musician of any that has yet come to Boston as a conductor's spouse, or words to that effect. Mrs. Paur certainly made a deep impression upon her appearance in our city, under her husband's conductorship, not only showing herself a fine musician but a most refined and charming personality. VALENTINE MARTIN.

The Musical and Dramatic World

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 13, 1893.

The Kneisel Quartet of Boston will give a concert at Chamber Music Hall (Carnegie Hall) on Friday evening. With the assistance of Mr. Zach and Mr. Schulz, a sextuor for two violins, two violas, and two 'celli, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, will be played for the first time. The programme also includes the quartet in D minor, Mozart, and the piano trio in E flat, Opus 100, Schubert. Mrs. Emil Paur will be the pianist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will give its second concert at Carnegie Music Hall to-morrow evening. The programme is as follows: Symphony in F major, Opus 9, Goetz; first movement of the concerto for violin, in D major, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Saint-Saens; overture, Lenore No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Frank Kneisel will be the soloist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1893.

THE third concert of the series given by the Kneisel Quartet took place Monday evening, the 4th, in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet, D minor.....Mozart
Quartet, E flat major, op. 11.....D'Albert
(First time in America.)
Quintet, C major, op. 163.....Schubert.

The second 'cello in the quintet was played by Mr. Leo Schulz. D'Albert's personality was to me ever displeasing; I mean his stage personality, for otherwise I do not know him. I heard him about ten years ago in Berlin, when he seemed to be the gnome of the piano. His behavior toward "perfidious Albion," because certain Englishmen did not approve of one of his compositions would have been childish and absurd had it not revealed an utter absence of gratitude; and it then looked as though he were wanting in humor. Nor were sundry performances over here, performances non-musical, calculated to win to him respect or affection.

Now, singularly enough to anyone who still persists in the belief that the character of a man dwells in his music, the quartet by D'Albert is conspicuous first of all for its humor. And yet may not this humor be the Elizabethan word?

The scherzo is a marvelous piece of saturnine humor. This humor is fantastic, not human. To describe the manner in which D'Albert gains his peculiar effects would be to the effects as a mere sketch to the completed work ready for the frame, the jury, the hanging and the final criticism.

In this scherzo there is whistling and buzzing, whizzing and rustling and whirring, but it is all subdued, as the foul suggestions whispered by invisible things in the ears of a pure and radiant maiden. There are chuckles of cruel laughter—laughter such as moved the muscles of Parysatis when she relished her portion of the delicate bird as she saw her daughter-in-law eating the half that had touched the poisoned side of the carving knife. There is mockery in the laugh; the sense of superiority, the delight in destruction, the gratified cunning. Or what means this whirring? Is it a spectral spinning wheel, such as enlarges the reputation of a plantation house in Virginia? Or do witches gather at night, and young, voluptuous, restless, dissatisfied women leave their marriage beds and fly by night to hear Satan play that wild tune on his fiddle? For in the midst of this strange buzzing and whirring, sought out by D'Albert, comes a stranger tune for the first violin. And it is as though there were no apparent harmonic relation between the accompaniment and the solo; yet the effect is entrancing.

In the scherzo D'Albert goes gunning for color, and his aim is sure. The first movement, an andante con moto, is not as successful. He tried to crowd too much into one movement. His ideas jostle each other; there is an incongruous gathering in a small reception room.

Next me at this concert sat a poet of no mean reputation; not a Bostonian; not a New Yorker; largely Parisian in thought and make up; an acquaintance of the Sar. After the first movement he said: "Did you hear the viola keep saying 'W— W— W— W—'?" I remember the remark; I have forgotten the movement.

In the slow movement there is something that is not easily forgotten, and that is a tune for the first violin, a passionate tune with a convulsive, hysterical accompaniment; there is a rise to the highest pitch of nervous intensity; there is a spasmodic shock, and the pulses of the instruments flag; they are slow and languid. Yet this tune is an episode. The rest of the movement is barren labor, profundity that baffles conjecture. The finale is strong, with strength that is not always free from rankness.

But these are only impressions after one hearing. I believe the quartet to be a work that will repay earnest attention. One may say that it is thought out for other instruments. D'Albert seemed to say to himself, "Here are four instruments that have said in different generations the same things: let's see what we can get out of them." In his fierce eagerness to be dramatic there are sacrifices to beauty of tone, and there is a sardonic brutality which finds vent in guttural or sibilant speech. There are more consonants than vowelsin D'Albert's language, and the consonants are accentuated in ugliness when there is a desire to be very original. But what noble music there is in this same quartet!

The performance by the members of the quartet was superb throughout the evening.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Variations on a theme of Haydn.....Brahms
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Rubinstein

A friend told me the other day that his pleasure at the Symphony concerts was disturbed greatly by a habit of Mr. Paur. Our new conductor, as you know, is a man of action. He cuts with his arms all manner of figures in the air, he is a series of living diagrams, he is an animated conductorial chart. With his fingers he picks effects off the players.

And, ah! his foot!

You remember perhaps in your earlier days the church choir in the country, where the most earnest man had the loudest voice and the heaviest foot.

Well, Mr Paur is so in earnest that he cannot control his foot. It beats with his arm. As a result the sitters near the stage, just as they are ready to enjoy the proper emotion,

Hear a foot begin to stump
Thump! lump!
Lump! thump!
Like the spectre in "Don Giovanni."

Mr. Paur is undoubtedly unconscious of the trick. His foot moves without express desire, as would the members of Adam have moved, according to St. Augustine, if the fruit tree had not proved irresistible.

But what can be done?

Why should not Mr. Paur be presented with a pair of thick fur boots with felt soles? There might be a subscription list, with the motto, "Suaviter in modo."

I would not advise that he conduct in rubber boots, although such a gift would be less costly to the patronesses of art; but such boots would chafe Mr. Paur in his more impassioned moments; they smell unpleasantly; they have an offensive noise of their own.

* * *

The overture to "Manfred" was played finely, and the impression left was one of unalloyed satisfaction.

The "Dramatic" symphony has not been heard here for some time. Do yon remember Stépan Trophimovitch in Dostoievsky's "Les Possédés?" Stépan who when aroused to any marked degree of emotion suffered from cholarine! Rubinstein in this symphony reminds me of him. There is such terrible diffuseness. Strength is suddenly weakness just when it should be strongest. Yet there is no denying the ingenuity or the power of certain passages. The scherzo is captivating throughout, but it is as long as a three volume Russian novel. There are beautiful moments in the slow movements, and yet the composer spoke lightly of it when in 1883 he conducted it in Berlin.

As an organic whole the symphony escapes greatness. There are so many people in the drama who have nothing to do with the development of the plot; and how they chatter and take up time! Nor is the instrumentation, in spite of the infinite pains of the composer, always effective. There is figuration in the woodwind that is utterly ineffective, although to the reader of the score it would appear of marked import. But with all its faults the symphony contains glorious moments, and the hearer is conscious that it is the creation of a Man, a man with imagination that is perhaps uncombed, ragged, careless, at times brutal; but it is imagination.

PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.—The Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, will give a concert in Chamber Music Hall (Carnegie Hall) next Friday evening. With the assistance of Mr. Zach and Mr. Schulz a sextuor for two violins, two violas and two 'celli by Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be played for the first time. The program also includes the quartet in D minor, Mozart, and the piano trio in E flat, op. 100, Schubert. Mrs. Emil Paur will be the pianist.

Boston Symphony Program.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give its second concert at Carnegie Music Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony in F major, op. 9, Goetz; first movement of the concerto for violin in D major, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Saint-Saëns; overture, "Lenore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Paur in Brooklyn.—The second public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The program includes Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony; the Beethoven concerto for violin (soloist, Mr. Kneisel), variations on a theme by Hadyn, Brahms, and symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

A rare treat was the Kneisel Quartet concert, given at Chamber Music Hall last evening. Such perfect playing of a delightful programme is seldom heard. The audience, larger than usual, gave marked evidence of its satisfaction. Mrs. Emil Paur made her first appearance in New York and played the piano part in Schubert's Trio, E flat major. Her touch is clear and forcible. She was conspicuous in subduing her instrument to those she was accompanying without in any way lessening its importance. The other numbers on the programme were Mozart's quartet in D major, and a sextet for strings, played for the first time here, and written by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second movement of this, founded on a Russian theme, was beautifully harmonized and richly colored. The different instruments were ably handled by Messrs. Franz Kneisel and Otto Roth, violinists; Alwin Schroeder and Leo Schulz, 'cellists; the first viola by Mr. Svecenski and the second by Mr. Zachs.

HERR PAUR LEADS IN BROOKLYN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its conductor, Herr Emiel Paur, gave a public rehearsal in the Brooklyn Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. The audience was large, but the building was not crowded. The programme contained only one number, played in New York at the Thursday evening concert. This was the first movement from Beethoven's violin concerto, in which Mr. Franz Kneisel, as soloist, won fresh laurels for his good work. The other orchestral numbers were Rubenstein's dramatic symphony No. 4 in D minor, Brahm's variations on one of Haydn's themes and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." They were all played with that wonderful precision for which the orchestra is famous.

SATURDAY EVE[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston society was given yesterday afternoon, under those trying conditions of weather which are sure to affect the strings, and put both performers and audience a little out of sorts. Yet it is impossible to be thoroughly dissatisfied with anything given us by this orchestra, which, while playing somewhat differently under its new leadership, is, nevertheless, far ahead of any similar organization of the kind in this country, and, perhaps, in any other. But why is it that from such superb musicians as these, not less than from our own Seidl men, the public is always obliged to receive a mass of novelties, while the good, old, incomparable compositions are not heard half enough? Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart; even the Tannhauser overture, and other familiar Wagner features, with the exhilarating fancies of Liszt, are heard only occasionally; while a host of unpronounceable names, preceding the parenthetical commentary ("new") or ("first time in America)," fill the whole horizon. The true enjoyment or all good music lies in its constant repetition; the best compositions, particularly when interpreted right royally, or by the Boston Orchestra, cannot be heard too often, since of their subtle harmonies it is impossible to tire; but these latter-day novelties, in nine cases out of ten, are but variations of spirit to the average listener, even if their technique proves interesting to the professional musician.

Yesterday's programme was not obtrusively novel, unlike the Seidl concert of the night before; and these remarks are made more with hope for the future than as criticism of the past—though undoubtedly there might be a more ideal list than that of the rehearsal. The Rubinstein Dramatic Symphony may be a very learned piece of music, but, with the exception of the beautiful Adagio, it is loose and disjointed in its movement, and often tedious. Its action, perhaps, forbids a very spirited rendering; certainly that of yesterday was, to a large extent, perfunctory and soulless; it can hardly be said that the audience was sorry to see it ended.

Besides the Rubinstein Symphony, there were Brahms' variations as a theme, by Haydn—a statuesque and dignified composition, but lacking in tone, vital force—and the brilliant symphonic poem, "Vltava," by Friedrich Smetana. The orchestra also accompanied the soloist, Mr. Kneisel, in the first movement, from the great Beethoven concerto for violin, which proved the most enjoyable feature of the afternoon. Mr. Kneisel's tone is exceptionally smooth and lovely, and his music fell upon the ear most caressingly. The audience would have liked an encore, but the performer very wisely declined to repeat a performance quite perfect in its first rendition, and therefore best left alone.

Altogether, the rehearsal was somewhat disappointing. Either because of the character of the selections, the state of the weather, or the change of leadership, there seemed a perceptible diminution in the richness, spirit and energy of the performances. That magnificent torrent of musical expression, so beautifully regulated by a most finished technique, could hardly be recognized in yesterday's numbers. The audience was almost as lukewarm as the musicians, and no one was sorry when the last chord was sounded.

This evening the programme will be repeated, it is to be hoped, under happier auspices.

....Stageland.

Philadelphia, Saturday, December 16, 1893.

Will Mr. Paur give us some of the poetry of his predecessor's leadership? It is a fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under his baton does not present that delightful perfection of romantic playing which it gained under the magnetic Hungarian.

In some other ways it has gained. The orchestra is more a collection of virtuosos than ever before. Nikisch refined his gold until it lost the quality of life, Under him the Symphony Orchestra was overtrained. The verve was wanting in their playing. Paur has given greater spirit to the band, but were he more the romancist and less the kapelmeister the Symphony might be greater than it is.

Philadelphia does appreciate the Boston orchestra. and it is truly one unsurpassed. Europe does not produce a finer. The strings are absolutely perfect and there are excellencies among the wind and brass that make the average very hign. The French horns are unequaled in this country.

But Mr. Paur cuts his programs short. We don't want three hours of musical caviarre and terrapin but we do want something nearer two.

Wednesday night's concert was a fine one and much more enjoyable than the first of the series. The band was in exquisite form and but little more poetry, into the reading of the symphonic poem of St. Saens and it would have been very near to perfection.

Franz Kneisel is a violinist of the first rank. He played the great Beethoven concert in masterly style. I often think the Boston Symphony has reached perfection and wonder why we cavil at straws.

[57]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1893.

THE third concert of the series given by the Kneisel Quartet took place Monday evening, the 4th, in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet, D minor.....Mozart
Quartet, E flat major, op. 11.....D'Albert
(First time in America.)
Quintet, C major, op. 163.....Schubert.

The second 'cello in the quintet was played by Mr. Leo Schulz. D'Albert's personality was to me ever displeasing; I mean his stage personality, for otherwise I do not know him. I heard him about ten years ago in Berlin, when he seemed to be the gnome of the piano. His behavior toward "perfidious Albion," because certain Englishmen did not approve of one of his compositions would have been childish and absurd had it not revealed an utter absence of gratitude; and it then looked as though he were wanting in humor. Nor were sundry performances over here, performances non-musical, calculated to win to him respect or affection.

Now, singularly enough to anyone who still persists in the belief that the character of a man dwells in his music, the quartet by D'Albert is conspicuous first of all for its humor. And yet may not this humor be the Elizabethan word?

The scherzo is a marvelous piece of saturnine humor. This humor is fantastic, not human. To describe the manner in which D'Albert gains his peculiar effects would be to the effects as a mere sketch to the completed work ready for the frame, the jury, the hanging and the final criticism.

In this scherzo there is whistling and buzzing, whizzing and rustling and whirring, but it is all subdued, as the foul suggestions whispered by invisible things in the ears of a pure and radiant maiden. There are chuckles of cruel laughter—laughter such as moved the muscles of Parysatis when she relished her portion of the delicate bird as she saw her daughter-in-law eating the half that had touched the poisoned side of the carving knife. There is mockery in the laugh; the sense of superiority, the delight in destruction, the gratified cunning. Or what means this whirring? Is it a spectral spinning wheel, such as enlarges the reputation of a plantation house in Virginia? Or do witches gather at night, and young, voluptuous, restless, dissatisfied women leave their marriage beds and fly by night to hear Satan play that wild tune on his fiddle? For in the midst of this strange buzzing and whirring, sought out by D'Albert, comes a stranger tune for the first violin. And it is as though there were no apparent harmonic relation between the accompaniment and the solo; yet the effect is entrancing.

In the scherzo D'Albert goes gunning for color, and his aim is sure. The first movement, an andante con moto, is not as successful. He tried to crowd too much into one movement. His ideas jostle each other; there is an incongruous gathering in a small reception room.

Next me at this concert sat a poet of no mean reputation; not a Bostonian; not a New Yorker; largely Parisian in thought and make up; an acquaintance of the Sar. After the first movement he said: "Did you hear the viola keep saying 'W— W— W— W—'?" I remember the remark; I have forgotten the movement.

In the slow movement there is something that is not easily forgotten, and that is a tune for the first violin, a passionate tune with a convulsive, hysterical accompaniment; there is a rise to the highest pitch of nervous intensity; there is a spasmodic shock, and the pulses of the instruments flag; they are slow and languid. Yet this tune is an episode. The rest of the movement is barren labor, profundity that baffles conjecture. The finale is strong, with strength that is not always free from rankness.

But these are only impressions after one hearing. I believe the quartet to be a work that will repay earnest attention. One may say that it is thought out for other instruments. D'Albert seemed to say to himself, "Here are four instruments that have said in different generations the same things: let's see what we can get out of them." In his fierce eagerness to be dramatic there are sacrifices to beauty of tone, and there is a sardonic brutality which finds vent in guttural or sibilant speech. There are more consonants than vowelsin D'Albert's language, and the consonants are accentuated in ugliness when there is a desire to be very original. But what noble music there is in this same quartet!

The performance by the members of the quartet was superb throughout the evening.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Variations on a theme of Haydn.....Brahms
Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Rubinstein

A friend told me the other day that his pleasure at the Symphony concerts was disturbed greatly by a habit of Mr. Paur. Our new conductor, as you know, is a man of action. He cuts with his arms all manner of figures in the air, he is a series of living diagrams, he is an animated conductorial chart. With his fingers he picks effects off the players.

And, ah! his foot!

You remember perhaps in your earlier days the church choir in the country, where the most earnest man had the loudest voice and the heaviest foot.

Well, Mr Paur is so in earnest that he cannot control his foot. It beats with his arm. As a result the sitters near the stage, just as they are ready to enjoy the proper emotion,

Hear a foot begin to stump
Thump! lump!
Lump! thump!
Like the spectre in "Don Giovanni."

Mr. Paur is undoubtedly unconscious of the trick. His foot moves without express desire, as would the members of Adam have moved, according to St. Augustine, if the fruit tree had not proved irresistible.

But what can be done?

Why should not Mr. Paur be presented with a pair of thick fur boots with felt soles? There might be a subscription list, with the motto, "Suaviter in modo."

I would not advise that he conduct in rubber boots, although such a gift would be less costly to the patronesses of art; but such boots would chafe Mr. Paur in his more impassioned moments; they smell unpleasantly; they have an offensive noise of their own.

* * *

The overture to "Manfred" was played finely, and the impression left was one of unalloyed satisfaction.

The "Dramatic" symphony has not been heard here for some time. Do yon remember Stépan Trophimovitch in Dostoievsky's "Les Possédés?" Stépan who when aroused to any marked degree of emotion suffered from cholarine! Rubinstein in this symphony reminds me of him. There is such terrible diffuseness. Strength is suddenly weakness just when it should be strongest. Yet there is no denying the ingenuity or the power of certain passages. The scherzo is captivating throughout, but it is as long as a three volume Russian novel. There are beautiful moments in the slow movements, and yet the composer spoke lightly of it when in 1883 he conducted it in Berlin.

As an organic whole the symphony escapes greatness. There are so many people in the drama who have nothing to do with the development of the plot; and how they chatter and take up time! Nor is the instrumentation, in spite of the infinite pains of the composer, always effective. There is figuration in the woodwind that is utterly ineffective, although to the reader of the score it would appear of marked import. But with all its faults the symphony contains glorious moments, and the hearer is conscious that it is the creation of a Man, a man with imagination that is perhaps uncombed, ragged, careless, at times brutal; but it is imagination.

PHILIP HALE.

The Kneisel Quartet Concert.—The Kneisel Quartet, of Boston, will give a concert in Chamber Music Hall (Carnegie Hall) next Friday evening. With the assistance of Mr. Zach and Mr. Schulz a sextuor for two violins, two violas and two 'celli by Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be played for the first time. The program also includes the quartet in D minor, Mozart, and the piano trio in E flat, op. 100, Schubert. Mrs. Emil Paur will be the pianist.

Boston Symphony Program.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will give its second concert at Carnegie Music Hall to-morrow evening. The program is as follows: Symphony in F major, op. 9, Goetz; first movement of the concerto for violin in D major, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Saint-Saëns; overture, "Lenore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Paur in Brooklyn.—The second public rehearsal and concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The program includes Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony, the Beethoven concerto for violin (soloist, Mr. Kneisel), variations on a theme by Hadyn, Brahms, and symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1893.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

A rare treat was the Kneisel Quartet concert, given at Chamber Music Hall last evening. Such perfect playing of a delightful programme is seldom heard. The audience, larger than usual, gave marked evidence of its satisfaction. Mrs. Emil Paur made her first appearance in New York and played the piano part in Schubert's Trio, E flat major. Her touch is clear and forcible. She was conspicuous in subduing her instrument to those she was accompanying without in any way lessening its importance. The other numbers on the programme were Mozart's quartet in D major, and a sextet for strings, played for the first time here, and written by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The second movement of this, founded on a Russian theme, was beautifully harmonized and richly colored. The different instruments were ably handled by Messrs. Franz Kneisel and Otto Roth, violinists; Alwin Schroeder and Leo Schulz, 'cellists; the first viola by Mr. Svecenski and the second by Mr. Zachs.

HERR PAUR LEADS IN BROOKLYN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its conductor, Herr Emiel Paur, gave a public rehearsal in the Brooklyn Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. The audience was large, but the building was not crowded. The programme contained only one number, played in New York at the Thursday evening concert. This was the first movement from Beethoven's violin concerto, in which Mr. Franz Kneisel, as soloist, won fresh laurels for his good work. The other orchestral numbers were Rubenstein's dramatic symphony No. 4 in D minor, Brahm's variations on one of Haydn's themes and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava." They were all played with that wonderful precision for which the orchestra is famous.

THE STANDARD UNION.

SATURDAY EVENING, DEC. 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second public rehearsal of the Boston society was given yesterday afternoon, under those trying conditions of weather which are sure to affect the strings, and put both performers and audience a little out of sorts. Yet it is impossible to be thoroughly dissatisfied with anything given us by this orchestra, which, while playing somewhat differently under its new leadership, is, nevertheless, far ahead of any similar organization of the kind in this country, and, perhaps, in any other. But why is it that from such superb musicians as these, not less than from our own Seidl men, the public is always obliged to receive a mass of novelties, while the good, old, incomparable compositions are not heard half enough? Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart; even the Tannhauser overture, and other familiar Wagner features, with the exhilarating fancies of Liszt, are heard only occasionally; while a host of unpronounceable names, preceding the parenthetical commentary ("new") or ("first time in America)," fill the whole horizon. The true enjoyment or all good music lies in its constant repetition; the best compositions, particularly when interpreted right royally, or by the Boston Orchestra, cannot be heard too often, since of their subtle harmonies it is impossible to tire; but these latter-day novelties, in nine cases out of ten, are but variations of spirit to the average listener, even if their technique proves interesting to the professional musician.

Yesterday's programme was not obtrusively novel, unlike the Seidl concert of the night before; and these remarks are made more with hope for the future than as criticism of the past—though undoubtedly there might be a more ideal list than that of the rehearsal. The Rubinstein Dramatic Symphony may be a very learned piece of music, but, with the exception of the beautiful Adagio, it is loose and disjointed in its movement, and often tedious. Its action, perhaps, forbids a very spirited rendering; certainly that of yesterday was, to a large extent, perfunctory and soulless; it can hardly be said that the audience was sorry to see it ended.

Besides the Rubinstein Symphony, there were Brahms' variations as a theme, by Haydn—a statuesque and dignified composition, but lacking in tone, vital force—and the brilliant symphonic poem, "Vltava," by Friedrich Smetana. The orchestra also accompanied the soloist, Mr. Kneisel, in the first movement, from the great Beethoven concerto for violin, which proved the most enjoyable feature of the afternoon. Mr. Kneisel's tone is exceptionally smooth and lovely, and his music fell upon the ear most caressingly. The audience would have liked an encore, but the performer very wisely declined to repeat a performance quite perfect in its first rendition, and therefore best left alone.

Altogether, the rehearsal was somewhat disappointing. Either because of the character of the selections, the state of the weather, or the change of leadership, there seemed a perceptible diminution in the richness, spirit and energy of the performances. That magnificent torrent of musical expression, so beautifully regulated by a most finished technique, could hardly be recognized in yesterday's numbers. The audience was almost as lukewarm as the musicians, and no one was sorry when the last chord was sounded.

This evening the programme will be repeated, it is to be hoped, under happier auspices.

....Stageland

Philadelphia, Saturday, December 16, 1893.

Will Mr. Paur give us some of the poetry of his predecessor's leadership? It is a fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under his baton does not present that delightful perfection of romantic playing which it gained under the magnetic Hungarian.

In some other ways it has gained. The orchestra is more a collection of virtuosos than ever before. Nikisch refined his gold until it lost the quality of life, Under him the Symphony Orchestra was overtrained. The verve was wanting in their playing. Paur has given greater spirit to the band, but were he more the romancist and less the kapelmeister the Symphony might be greater than it is.

Philadelphia does appreciate the Boston orchestra. and it is truly one unsurpassed. Europe does not produce a finer. The strings are absolutely perfect and there are excellencies among the wind and brass that make the average very hign. The French horns are unequaled in this country.

But Mr. Paur cuts his programs short. We don't want three hours of musical caviarre and terrapin but we do want something nearer two.

Wednesday night's concert was a fine one and much more enjoyable than the first of the series. The band was in exquisite form and but little more poetry, into the reading of the symphonic poem of St. Saens and it would have been very near to perfection.

Franz Kneisel is a violinist of the first rank. He played the great Beethoven concert in masterly style. I often think the Boston symphony has reached perfection and wonder why we cavil at straws.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Concert—Mr. Paur's Wise Digression From the Rule.

Mr. Paur makes a departure from the leaders of the Boston Orchestra who have preceded him in putting the symphonies at the beginning of the program. At his second concert given yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House he led off with Rubenstein's Dramatic Symphony (No. 4). His decision was wise. The composer's "Ocean" symphony is one of his best and certainly the most popular. Most audiences are familiar with it, but the Dramatic is played comparatively rarely, and it was, therefore, best to give it while the listeners were fresh.

The symphony is characteristic of Rubenstein. All through it are fine, deep veins of melody, original harmony and thorough technical skill in producing effects which, if sometimes apparently odd and a departure from conventional style, are always rich, striking and pleasing. As a composer of piano music, Rubenstein is one of the greatest the world has seen. His resources are also abundantly displayed in his works written for the orchestra. In the symphony played yesterday the themes are managed in a masterly style, the rythmic innovations, transitions, treatment of counterpoint and wealth of elaboration contributing toward working out brilliant effects, and demonstrating the wonderful skill and unique originality of the writer. The long involved but bright sherzo is succeeded by a beautiful adagio in the form of a romanza, in which the composer varies and elaborates his themes in a masterly style, the whole orchestra working together with beautiful precision in revealing the breadth an i depth of the movement. Mr. Paur is skilful and successful in treating piano passages, and he has the appreciation of a thorough musician as to the proper way to work out climaxes. The symphony was admirably played.

Mr. Franz Kneisel, the accomplished first violinist of the orchestra, was the soloist in the first movement of Beethoven's only violin concerto. It is a remarkably difficult composition. Mr. Kneisel mastered it so thoroughly to the satisfaction of his hearers that he was called at its close again and again to the footlights, but, of course, it was too much to ask him to repeat it. Joachim's cadenza is now used to the movement. At the conclusion Mr. Kneisel gave an illustration of his remarkable technique in playing the ornamental music, running the scale passages, dashing off arpeggios, trilling in tones like a bird, and rioting generally in musical sweets. He has a rich, pure tone, beautiful expression, and the skill of a finished performer.

The orchestra also played Brahm's eight variations and finale on Haydn's melody, "The Choral of St. Anthony," in which Brahm lets his fancy loose with delicious effect.

The final number was a symphonic poem by Frederick Smetana, a Bohemian composer, descriptive of the course of the river Moldau, through forest and field and over rocks. It is full of contrasts and bright melody, and was effectively played by the orchestra. The attendance was good.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, DEC. 13, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.—Emil Paur does not lose in public favor through second acquaintance, and in his work at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday at Ford's Opera House the auditors found much to admire.

At his first appearance he had to undergo comparison with predecessors. Yesterday Paur was measured by his own worth. His directing is earnest and intelligent. He plainly loves his work, and is bringing to it his best energies. The result is a strong, careful and often vigorous performance. While he will probably not stamp himself on the popular mind as a strongly individualized leader, or even as a great leader, he will surely make his influence felt in the musical world by scholarly and thoughtful interpretations of the great orchestral works. He does not make a graceful or a picturesque leader, but his clear-cut beating must be very acceptable to the players, who are more concerned with performing correctly the measures before them than with the pictorial effect, and the work that Paur gets out of his men is good, solid and effective.

Aside from that, however, it must be acknowieded that his seldom-ceasing movements with his left foot and leg seem wholly unnecessary. They are surely no aid to the performers, for two hands and arms and a head are quite enough to convey the owner's wishes as to time and rhythm.

The programme included Rubinstein's splendid "Dramatic Symphony," in D minor; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms, and Friedrich Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava." The last is descriptive of the gushing forth of two springs in the Bohemian forest and their union into a sparkling river, which flows past woodland and field, reflecting in its shining bosom the changing scenes along its banks and finally dashing into a noisy cataract, which hews out a path for itself.

The only soloist was Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster of the orchestra and the leader of the famous Kneisel Quartette, which has made his name favorably known to all music lovers in the city. Mr. Kneisel's popularity in Baltimore was plainly shown before he had played a note of his solo number, for the audience greeted him with rounds of applause. His selection—the first movement of Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major—was eminently suited to his style and he rendered it with conscientious attention to the details of phrasing, purity of intonation and musicianly interpretation. Mr. Kneisel has not a powerful tone, but he has a remarkably clear and smooth one, and his technical power, which is never, with him, made the main motive of a performance, had abundant scope in the concerto and in the strong cadenza written for it by Joachim. His chords, double notes and octave passages in the latter were finely given.

THE [illegible]NING HERALD
PUBLISHED BY THE HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY, A. BECHHOFER.
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Modern Programme Exquisitely Played by the Boston Orchestra.

Rubinstein's dramatic (D minor, op. 95) symphony; the Beethoven violin concerto, with Joacim's cadenza; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Smetana's "Symphonic Poem No 2," made up the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon.

To many it was much more enjoyable than the almost exclusively Beethoven programmes that have been the rule in Baltimore this season. Beethoven is so universally served up on every occasion, and with every degree of virtuosity from the performance of the young lady who is afflicted with the idea that she can play the "Moonlight Sonata" to a Wad or Burmeister rendition of the "Sonata Appassionata," that he sometimes becomes tiresome, and there is a longing to hear newer and less known works. This chance the programme yesterday afternoon gave to the large and appreciative audience present.

The Brahms symphony—a massive work scored, with the exception of the allegro con fuoco of the final movement, for classic orchestra—was exquisitely played.

The solo number was the first movement of Beethoven's one violin concerto (D, op. 61), with Joacim's cadenza. It was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. The audience was prepared for a treat from the concertmeister of the orchestra, and Mr. Kneisel's performance more than equaled its expectations. The composition ranks with those of Paganini in its demand for execution, and it was given with a delicacy of expression and a perfection that was surprising, especially so when it is considered that the soloist had just gone through the heavy first volin work of the Rubinstein symphony.

The florid Brahms variations and the Smetana symphonic poem, which is above the average of ordinary "programme" music, ended the concert.

Mr. Pauer as a conductor grows in favor every time he is heard. His readings are frequently original, but always artistic and comprehensive. The orchestra—strings, wood wind, brass and precussion—was perfection, but why they should have been placed in a box scene representing a mediæval alchemist's laboratory with anatomical specimens and an anachronism in the shape of an electrical generator painted on the walls, the whole surmounted by the dome of the New York City Hall, was more than the audience could understand.

The third Boston Symphony concert occurs on Thursday, January 9.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1893.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of M. Emil Paur, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, and a very brilliant and delightful concert it was. Hermann Goetz' symphonyin F major, with which the programme opened, has not been played in this city before, and is quite unfamiliar to Philadelphia amateurs, but one does not need to hear it a second time to pronounce it a bright, melodious and interesting work, in which a number of fresh and admirable ideas are skilfully and effectively developed. The first number is somewhat unduly elaborated, and owing to the brevity and persistent reiteration of the theme upon which it is built up, it produces an impression of fragmentariness and incoherence, but the following allegretto is delightfully compact, symmetrical ond piquant, and except that its complex harmonies recall the Schumann manner, the lovely adagio might, in its grace and tenderness, have been from the pen of a Mendelssohn. The closing movement, an allegro con fuoco, is not on the same artistic level as the second and third, but in its buoyancy, simplicity and good humor it has an attractiveness of its own, and it brought the work to an agreeable and appropriate conclusion. The symphony was beautifully played, and it pleased the audience so much that its repetition, after a befitting interval, would no doubt be welcome. The College Festival overture of Brahm, and Saint-Saens' dainty and fascinating "Poeme Symponique," known as "Le Rouet d'Omphale" were also on the programme, and in the manly, vigorous straightforwardness of the one and the feminine grace and piquancy of the other they formed a singularly well marked and striking contrast. It would be hard to say which went best, but certainly the fairy-like delicacy with which the last-named was played could not have been excelled. The concert closed with a fine though not an extraordinary performance of Beethoven's overture "Leonora No. 3," which might advantageously have been interpreted with a greater breadth of treatment and a stronger passion. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist, and his rendering of the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto, dignified in spirit, sincere in sentiment and faultless in technique, was an important feature of the evening's entertainment.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1893.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Magnificent Composition by Herman Goetz Played Here for the First Time.

The second of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last evening at the Academy of Music in the presence of an audience that completely filled the house. The favorable impression that Emil Paur, the new conductor, made at the last concert a few weeks ago, raised the expectations of his auditors to a high pitch, yet his superb work last evening was more than even his most ardent admirers could have hoped.

The improvement found in the playing of this excellent organization since the new conductor took charge of the baton is truly marvelous. The smoothness, precision and color now shown in the works of the orchestra have not been equalled by this or any other organization in late years.

The only new composition to a Philadelphia audience was the Symphony in F Major, Opus 9, by Herman Goetz, of whom comparatively little is known in America. He died in Switzerland in 1876, at the age of 35, and judging from the work presented last evening his early death was a great loss to his art. The symphony was written on the theme of Schiller's lines:—

> "Into the quiet, sacred spaces of the heart > Must thou flee from the stress of life."

The first movement impresd one that the composer intended to depict the tempest of the heart, and at the very outset a small, beautiful leit motif of only about four bars, which permeates the entire composition, is carried through all the different sections of the orchestra and treated, it seems, in almost every conceivabe form. Masterly contrapunctal and narmonic skill is shown and the different instruments are placed in a contest for supremacy, but the end of the movement brings all of them out in their respective beauties.

The intermezzo is a charming allegretto which opens with a dulcet phrase by the French horns, followed by a beautiful cadenza for the flute. Then comes a vivacious and solemn movement gracefully intermingled, which demonstrates the light and dark sides of life, and at the finish the struggle is still undecided.

The third movement, the adagio, is beautiful in its weirdness and solemnity. The profundity of treatment is very impressive, and when the dainty violin passage comes to a close with a zypher-like harmonic a sigh of relief follows. The finale is an allegro, which illustrates a heated discussion, from all the instruments, and borders on a state of confusion that seems to be sure to end in a storm, but by the masterly distribution of mere dashes of many bright musical ideas it settles down to a vivacious movement that convinces the listener that the composer concludes that with all its vicissitudes this life is worth the living.

The Brahms "Academic Festival" overture has been heard here before, but it is doubtful if its beauties have ever prior to this rendition been brought out so clearly as on this occasion. From the most insignificant German college songs evolves a beautiful overture bordering on the classic, and the delightful reading of Herr Paur showed all its charms. The first movement of the Beethoven violin "Concerto" was superbly played, and the extremely difficult Joachim cadenza displayed Franz Kneisel's superior technique advantageously.

The "Leonore No. 3" overture was the last number on the programme, and thi familiar, charming composition agai showed Herr Paur's intelligence and masterly conducting. The audience was very demonstrative and the conductor and soloist had to acknowledge many recalls.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Academy Crowded at the Concert Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert, under the direction of Emil Paur, last night before a crowded audience at the Academy of Music. The program:

Goetz.....Symphony in F major, Op. 9
Brahms, Academic Festival-Overture in C minor, Op. 80.
Beethoven, First Movement from Concerto for Violin, in D major, Op. 61.
Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," in A major, Op. 31.
Beethoven, Overture "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72.

It cannot be said that Mr. Paur personally improves on acquaintance. His style last night was more jerky than on his first appearance. He has a way of keeping just ahead of the orchestra and wields his baton in such a labored style that he seems to be dragging the orchestra after him. In consequence it was not pleasant to watch the orchestra. Listening was pleasanter. Mr. Paur's characteristics, noted on the first night, were again indicated—earnestness, thoroughness almost to Pedantry, but a lack of the poetic temperament.

The Goetz symphony was interesting. It is the work of a young composer, indicating rather what maturity might have wrought than any great merit in itself. There is a lack of depth in it, notwithstanding its many merits of instrumentation. It is not a symphony of the higher type, but more of a suite. The music is pleasing and there are some excellent ideas in it, but it hardly hangs together. The first movement is too much involved. The second is full of musical beauty but somewhat out of place, the third is delightful and the last spirited.

Mr. Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, carried off the lion's share of the applause. Mr. Kneisel is an artist but not a virtuoso. He plays with the greatest expression, perfect technique and with great modesty; that is to say, it is the score he calls attention to and never to himself. He played the concerto with the greatest delicacy and thorough comprehension, though with less force than most soloists would have insisted on. This very failure to pose, his devotion to the score won him golden opinions. It was simply charming.

The Saint-Saens number was delicately handled, though with more Teutonic conception than Mr. Nikisch would have allowed. An excellent rendering of the Leonore Overture No. 3 closed the evening.

The audience was seemingly pleased but far from enthusiastic. Mr. Paur is far from magnetic and it will take time for him to gain popularity.

PUBLIC LEDGER
AND DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
Philadelphia, Thursday, Dec. 14, 1893.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Concert.

The inspiration that comes from a large audience was conspicuously in evidence at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its present series. The programme, without being pretentious, proved thoroughly attractive, and consequently much more satisfying than many a more ambitious one might have been. To be sure it was not relieved by any vocal number, but Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, made amends for what might otherwise have seemed an unwelcome departure from the usual order of things by his admirable performance in the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto. Mr. Kneisel plays with remarkable finesse and delicacy of expression, though he may not rank among the great virtuosos, and there is about all that he does the stamp of the true artist. Perhaps this was never more apparent than last night, when his really exquisite execution in the concerto brought forth round after round of applause.

The symphony was the F major of Hermann Goetz (op. 9), which was placed at the head of the list. It is a thoughtful, poetically conceived composition, made especially notable by a pretty intermezzo (an allegretto movement) and a noble adagio. The orchestra made the most of the work under the diction of Emil Paur, who is, happily, free of Mr. Nikisch's desire to keep his men down to over-refined effects.

Following the symphony came Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture in C minor, which was played with great verve and picturesqueness, while the remaining selections included Saint-Saens's symphonic poem of "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and the familiar, but always lovely, third "Leonore" overture.

The Times

EIGHT PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 14, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Programme Including Goetz, Brahms, Saint-Saens and Beethoven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, and the new conductor, Mr. Paur, strengthened the impression he made last month as a musician of knowledge and skill and of strong individuality. The one novelty, a symphony in F by Hermann Goetz, was not subject to comparison with previous interpretations. It is essentially modern in style, rather prolix, but fresh in musical ideas, and it was played not only with great delicacy, but with fervor and force. Brahms' Academic overture followed, and after that the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto, Mr. Kneisel playing the solo part with great accuracy, if not with very great breadth. Saint-Saens' familiar "Rouet d'Omphale" was beautifully played, with brightness and precision, and the concert closed with the great "Leonore" overture, in which Mr. Paur showed some of the peculiarities noticed in his interpretation of the C minor symphony, but which, with this splendid body of strings, formed a noble climax to an interesting programme.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, December 14, 1893.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

A large audience gathered last evening at the Academy of Music to listen to Herr Emil Paur's band of musicians in a programme of classical music, which was rendered with all the precision for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is noted. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, was the soloist, and his proficiency in technique and breadth of style were finely exemplified in his rendering of Mendelssohn's concerto for violin. The orchestra numbers were familiar to the audience, which evidently enjoyed the music greatly.

[58]

[illegible] 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Well-Arranged Programme, with Plenty of Contrast and Diversified Interest Conducted by Paur.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Music Hall last night, included symphony in F, Goetz; the first movement from Beethoven's violin concerto, with the Joachim cadenza, played by Mr. Kneisel; Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3. Certainly a thoroughly well-arranged programme, with plenty of contrast and diversified interest.

That it was well rendered goes almost without saying. Leaving behind him only two completed works of importance an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and the symphony played last night, besides an unfinished opera, "Francesca di Rimini"—Goetz, like Bizet, was cut off at the very outset of a career which opened hardly less brilliantly, and with barely less notable promise than that of the ever-lamented French composer. As it was, Goetz's all too short artistic life was a hard struggle against poverty and adverse fate. The story is told that when his symphony in F was produced for the first time in Vienna, in 1876, Goetz was invited to be present, but could not go, not being able to procure the trifling sum necessary to pay his railroad fare, and died the same year without ever having heard his production. All in all a delightful work, if not an absolutely great one. And yet the romantic feeling, intensity and breadth of the first movement; the graceful charm and piquancy of the intermezzo; the suavity of the andante, and the vigor, passion and pathos of the finale, not to speak of the structural strength of the entire composition, point conclusively to what Goetz might have done as a symphonist had he been allowed to finish his life work. A thoroughly intelligent, contained and finished reading of the symphony was given by Mr. Paur.

As a conductor he may not have the strongly marked, insistent personality and dramatic brilliancy of Mr. Nikisch, but he is ever refined, tactful and finished, and wanting in neither force nor repose. He evidently knows what he wants and gets it done as he wants it. The Symphony Orchestras have certainly in no respect fallen off under his baton. His reading, for instance, of the "Rouet d'Omphale"—exquisitely played last night—while not so spectacular as that of Mr. Nikisch, is saner, more legitimate, and, on the whole, more effective. His considerably slower tempo [illegible] which might, perhaps, have been quickened to advantage on the apparance of the "Hercules" theme—is probably much nearer the true one.

Mr. Kneisel's reading and rendering of the Beethoven concerto might well be taken as a model of thorough artistic work; clean-cut, finished and brilliant. Lacking, perhaps, a trifle in warmth and contrasting color, but still admirable and enthusiastically received by the audience. Mr. Gilbert is responsible for the dictum, "now isn't your life exceedingly flat when you've nothing whatever to grumble at," and an opportunity for grumbling to a certain extent was afforded by the rendering of the "Lenore" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

The playing, indeed, of the virtuoso violin passages at the close could hardly have been surpassed in smoothness and finish, but there were certain lapses from absolute precision and unanimity of feeling and purpose between orchestra and conductor not remarkable in an ordinary orchestra playing so difficult a work, but noticeable indeed with an orchestra like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Still, even Homer nodded, and constant and unwavering perfection can hardly be expected from any one.

One can, on the whole, only rejoice that the Boston Symphony is what it is—an organization which can hardly be equalled anywhere, and certainly not surpassed. Though Mr. Paur's effects are at times a trifle explosive, and his contrasts a little abrupt, the nicety of shading and phrasing and the variety of color and expression in the playing of the orchestra as a rule is one of its most marked and admirable characteristics.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

[illegible]

By George W. [illegible]

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1893.

A BEARDED BULOW.

Conductor Paur of Boston's Crack Orchestra Is Precise, but Lacks Our Seidl's Poetry.

You may not agree with Emil Paur's readings, but there is no escaping the fact that the organization he conducts is the crack orchestra of America, and this, too, despite the "quack" made by the trumpet (by courtesy; cornet in grim reality) in the Leonore overture No. 3, which terminated the concert given last night in Music Hall. The house was not by any means filled, but a bad night had something to do with that, the advance subscription sale being very large. The programme was all in healthy major keys—Goetz's symphony in F, Beethoven's D major violin concerto, Saint-Saens' "Rouet D'Omphale," in A major; and the Beethoven overture in C major. Mr. Emil Paur was the other major.

The man lacks passion, spiritual and animal. Everything last night ran in grooves, and phrase after phrase was neatly exhibited, then docketed for further use. Mr. Paur flaps his arms, but his brain never flaps. He is precise, a perfect type of a martinet mentality. He is a Bulow with a beard, and he has not a climax in his make-up. The symphony, a sunny, simple, idyllic thing, the themes hardly large enough for the symphonic treatment, was smoothly played, the slow movement in particular. The first two movements are better than the last two. There is little fantasy in the work, but it is evidently the product of a gentle, agreeable, musical nature, and, above all, that of a scholar. The intermezzo contains a graceful conceit, and the work throughout is excellently scored. Mr. Franz Kneisel played a movement of Beethoven's beautiful violin concerto faultlessly. The Joachim cadenza was nobly delivered. The gifted violinist, whose purity of tone and exquisite style make him a great metropolitan favorite, was warmly applauded and recalled several times.

Saint-Saens' clever tone-piece was well done, but the climax never came, and as to finish, we have heard it better from Nikisch. Glow, grace and tonal variety were lacking. Everything had been analyzed down to the marrow-bone, and poetry fled dismayed. The overture was mechanically played, and lacked the sweep and lift of Seidl's interpretation. Technically it was a marvel, with the exception referred to above. Mr. Paur leaves one cold. His band is a great band nevertheless.

NEW YORK HERALD,

DECEMBER 15, 1893.—

[illegible] in

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was far from a sensational programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at Carnegie Music Hall last evening.

But it contained one of the most beautiful of symphonies—Hermann Goetz's in F. It contained Beethoven's most dramatic overture, and it gave New York concert goers an opportunity of listening to the same master's great violin concerto.

The symphony was played irreproachably. The passages in the first movement divided between the 'cellos, violas and violins were played like a continuous stream of sound. And it is so easy for there to be "holes" at this particular part. The Allegretto, was charmingly done. The solo horn is something remarkable in the way of nobility of tone. The lovely melody, broad and simple as a folk song, was delivered by the violins with a broad sonority and yet so tenderly. It was an ideal performance.

The violin concerto was excellently played by the chef-d'attaque, Mr. Franz Kneisel. He has a pure tone. But how tiny! It sounded as though he were in another room.

It was a performance that somehow suggested the word "respectable" or "nice," but it was very loudly applauded, and certainly Herr Kneisel's technique is admirabl .

The "Leonora" overture was given in excellent style. Again the violins showed their virtuosity by playing with an almost painful precision the awkward unison passage near the end. The entire work was well played, as was also the symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," by Camille Saint-Saens. Herr Emil Paur conducted in a manner which did not cause one to change the previously expressed opinion of him as an orchestral conductor.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening to an audience of smaller proportions than was present on the occasion of the first, and one whose ardor was somewhat affected by the inclement weather. Its manner was at least cordial, however, and Mr. Kneisel received the lion's share of the genial recognition accorded all the excellent work. This favorite artist was the only soloist of the evening, playing the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto with admirable neatness and finish, a tone which, though not large, was pure and sweet, and an exactness and fluency which can only come from conscientious and industrious labor. In breadth of rendering Mr. Kneisel hardly did Beethoven the justice that many other violinists who have played this concerto have set the example for. It was a narrow rendering, cautious almost to the confines of timidity, and conventional quite to coldness. The perfection of his intonation cannot be too highly praised. Certainly, if one must choose between precision and intensity of expression the preference must be for the former attribute.

Goetz's lovely symphony, with which the concert began, has often been heard in this city, but never so beautifully played, with such purity and sweetness of tone not only in the violins, which are remarkable in their handling, but in every other portion of the orchestra. Goetz's music is full of sunshine and the song of birds, of youth and happiness, and all nature's joy. It is written more in the old Mendelssohnian form than in the modern style, but it is as fresh and welcome as the refreshing things it pictures.

A bit of French piquancy in the shape of Saint-Saën's "Rouet d'Omphale" was put into the programme and deliciously emphasized in all its dainty points by Mr. Paur's clever bâton. His orderly mind and steady, commanding power are admirably perceptible, and there is no doubt that he will stand longer and firmer upon his present pedestal than any of his predecessors.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in the Music Hall, the features of noteworthy interest were the symphony in F by Herrmann Goetz, and the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. In addition to these two compositions the programme contained Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and the third of Beethoven's Leonore's overtures, which were played in admirable style, but not so as to excite especial comment. In fact, both works have been played better by the same organization. The symphony is a pretty but not a deep composition, with a most engagingly dainty and graceful intermezzo in place of the conventional scherzo, and was delightfully performed. Mr. Kneisel is so favorably known as a player of solo and chamber music, as well as the leader of the orchestra's string forces, that it would be little better than carrying coals to Newcastle to dwell on his merits at this time. He never attempts a task that he does not perform well, and last night the finish of his playing and the suavity of his tone set the audience quite beside themselves with pleasurable emotion. As the child Mozart said of the violin of one of his father's friends, Mr. Kneisel has a "butter fiddle," its tone flows on with such delicious smoothness. The orchestra will play in Brooklyn this afternoon and to-morrow evening.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is here to give its second concert of the season to-night, and the programme was rehearsed in public at the Academy of Music yesterday. It is a good programme and it is superbly played, but it is monotonous in merit. An intermezzo for strings, or a couple of short things with sentiment would have relieved the bill, if introduced where the violin solo occurs. Each number is long. The "Dramatic" symphony of Rubinstein, noble, emotional, artistic as that work is, takes the best of an hour. It could be shortened by omission of certain of the codas, and ought to be. Rubinstein talks like one of the most modest men in the world, but he writes music as he were persuaded that the world could not hear too much of him. He does not have that breathless continuity of Mendelssohn that can be so irritating, as it is in some of his "Songs Without Words," where he allows no pauses, dodging away into a new theme just as he promises to discontinue; but he uses a motive for a fearless while and returns to it as if he was sure that the public liked it. It does, but better too little than too much of most things. It is not the nineteenth century way to write music. It is a busy age and we take our pleasures and our art and our meals and make our fortunes in as short a time as decency allows. We like things to be concentrated and strong, and if they leave a good impression on our palate we will call for more. An hour symphony goes with the three volume novel and the two hour sermon. For all that the work is really beautiful and interesting. It has a charm that the author does not suspect, that of revealing Russian history and temperament; for he, a Russian, does not believe in Russian music; he turns to Germany. The symphony is rightly named: it is dramatic and impressive, the first movement especially, for in that we discover the passion, the storm and stress that make a drama. And it was played yesterday with force and feeling. Mr. Paur has more feeling than he has been getting credit for. His uncouthness takes away from the effect, provided it is thought necessary to watch him, for it is not pleasant to see a man shake his head and stamp his foot before his band; but he is in earnest, unconscious of his farmerisms, and everyone likes an earnest man. His reading of the symphony was marked by vigor and comprehension and he had the ready response of his men. Franz Kneisel, kappelmeister, played the solo part of the Beethoven violin concerto, with a fine, clear tone and good phrasing, and he did not make too much of the foolish trills in it, though he did lug in Joachim's useless cadenza. This, also, was a long number, and is not so good as the Fifth symphony. Following this came Brahms' variations on the "St. Anthony" choral of Haydn, sweet, sedate, with the air of leisure, patience and formality, which pertains to so many things that are old, be they poetry, tapestry, furniture, dances or tunes. Brahms' additions and transpositions are more in the nature of a technical exploit than an inspiration, but they are interesting as showing the resource and variety of the modern orchestra, as compared with that of Haydn's day and the richness and sonority of Brahms' scoring. There was but one new thing on the programme: a symphonic poem by Smetana, the Bohemian. It was the second in the picturesque cyclus entitled "My Country" and this one describes in animated and beautiful phrases the river known to us as the Moldau, because its real name is Vltava. If Mr. Paur chooses on some later occasion to revive the fourth poem, "Z Ceskych Luhuv a Hajuv," it will be interesting to know what he will do with the name. Leave it in the lobby, maybe. In this "Vltava" we have a flowing figure for strings that begins in a while to sound like unconscious cerebration after the "Rheingold" opening. As the "Rheingold" had something like twenty or thirty years the start perhaps Smetana had in the meantime forgotten that he had heard it. But, anyway, he has made good music and it makes an awakening and delightful end to the concert. The orchestration is fitting; it sparkles, it thunders; we hear the hunt and the rustic dance on the shores; we note the solemn rising of the moon; we hear the dainty frisking of the nymphs; the falls are pictured and the battery roars at us; then comes peace again as the Vltava spreads into the plains and murmurs away toward the sea. Only the ending is conventional. Smetana wants to tell the audience that he has finished.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1893.

HALF OF THE SERIES.

Symphony Orchestra Gives the Third of Its Great Concerts.

As was bound to be the course of events, the third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall last night was complete in the enjoyment it created.

The attendance showed a gain over that at the second concert.

The appearance as a piano soloist of Mrs. Paur, wife of the new conductor, was the point of interest of the affair, and it was the declaration of the audience that she is a valuable new-comer to the ranks of American music providers. Her solo was performed with great proficiency.

The orchestra, naturally, gave a splendid performance and with its leader received frequent and enthusiastic applause.

Particularly inspiriting on account of the masterly way in which their measures were discoursed, were Brahms' Symphony No. 1, and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

There are three more concerts in the course.

THE ENTERTAINMENT MONTHLY,

BOSTON, DECEMBER, 1893.

Mr. Paur's First Tour.

Mr. Emil Paur made his first tour in America during the week commencing Nov. 6, having conducted the first of the season's series of concerts announced by the Boston orchestra in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Not a little interest was felt in the reception which the Boston orchestra should meet with in the cities named with its new conductor, for it is one thing to meet the demands of an audience inclined to favor a home undertaking, and others having no interest beyond the actual artistic results of a performance.

The concert given on Monday evening, Nov. 6, in Washington, called out an audience limited in numbers only by the size of the hall. The matinee on Tuesday following, at Baltimore, was more largely attended than any before given in that city, and on Wednesday evening the audience at Carnegie Hall, New York, filled the great house to overflowing, every one of the sixty-four private boxes being fully occupied. The records of former seasons in Philadelphia were more than maintained in the concert given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, as the audience numbered over 3500, and hundreds of persons had to receive their money back because they could not gain admittance. The concerts given in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were attended by equally gratifying results, as both audiences showed a gain over any in that city during last season.

Mrs. Paur made her first appearance in this city as a pianist, Monday evening, Nov. 13. when she played in a trio by Schubert at the second Kneisel concert. She was the soloist at the first of the Apollo concerts, Nov. 22.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the ninth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major; Mozart's Serenade No. 7 in D major; the violin obligato by Mr. Frank Kneisel; Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in G major, Mr. Carl Baermann soloist, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" in C major. It was a long and rather dry programme and not particularly interesting.

Beethoven's symphony was splendidly rendered. The third movement, "menuetto," was played in a bright, brilliant manner that was delightful.

Mozart's Serenade was very prosy and dull. Mr. Kneisel's playing was in his usual masterly style. He was heartily applauded at the end of the fourth movement.

Mr. Carl Baermann was given a cordial welcome as the soloist of the evening, and he was heard to good advantage in Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte. While Mr. Baermann is not to be ranked among the leading soloists of the world, he is a most pleasing, intelligent artist. His touch is delightful and his execution decidedly brilliant and his playing is marked for its honest and sincere style. He was recalled several times amid great enthusiasm.

Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" was daintily played. The next concert promises to be an interesting one, there being two numbers which will be presented in Boston for the first time. It will include Dvorak's "American Symphony," Beethoven's concerto for the violin and Tschaikowsky's overture "1812."

[59]

THE WORLD: FRIDAY

DECEMBER 15, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Well-Arranged Programme, with Plenty of Contrast and Diversified Interest Conducted by Paur.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Music Hall last night, included symphony in F, Goetz; the first movement from Beethoven's violin concerto, with the Joachim cadenza, played by Mr. Kneisel; Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and Beethoven's "Lenore" overture, No. 3. Certainly a thoroughly well-arranged programme, with plenty of contrast and diversified interest.

That it was well rendered goes almost without saying. Leaving behind him only two completed works of importance—an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and the symphony played last night, besides an unfinished opera, "Francesca di Rimini"—Goetz, like Bizet, was cut off at the very outset of a career which opened hardly less brilliantly, and with barely less notable promise than that of the ever-lamented French composer. As it was, Goetz's all too short artistic life was a hard struggle against poverty and adverse fate. The story is told that when his symphony in F was produced for the first time in Vienna, in 1876, Goetz was invited to be present, but could not go, not being able to procure the trifling sum necessary to pay his railroad fare, and died the same year without ever having heard his production. All in all a delightful work, if not an absolutely great one. And yet the romantic feeling, intensity and breadth of the first movement; the graceful charm and piquancy of the intermezzo; the suavity of the andante, and the vigor, passion and pathos of the finale, not to speak of the structural strength of the entire composition, point conclusively to what Goetz might have done as a symphonist had he been allowed to finish his life work. A thoroughly intelligent, contained and finished reading of the symphony was given by Mr. Paur.

As a conductor he may not have the strongly marked, insistent personality and dramatic brilliancy of Mr. Nikisch, but he is ever refined, tactful and finished, and wanting in neither force nor repose. He evidently knows what he wants and gets it done as he wants it. The Symphony Orchestras have certainly in no respect fallen off under his baton. His reading, for instance, of the "Rouet d'Omphale"—exquisitely played last night—while not so spectacular as that of Mr. Nikisch, is saner, more legitimate, and, on the whole, more effective. His considerably slower tempo—which might, perhaps, have been quickened to advantage on the apparance of the "Hercules" theme—is probably much nearer the true one.

Mr. Kneisel's reading and rendering of the Beethoven concerto might well be taken as a model of thorough artistic work; clean-cut, finished and brilliant. Lacking, perhaps, a trifle in warmth and contrasting color, but still admirable and enthusiastically received by the audience. Mr. Gilbert is responsible for the dictum, "now isn't your life exceedingly flat when you've nothing whatever to grumble at," and an opportunity for grumbling to a certain extent was afforded by the rendering of the "Lenore" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

The playing, indeed, of the virtuoso violin passages at the close could hardly have been surpassed in smoothness and finish, but there were certain lapses from absolute precision and unanimity of feeling and purpose between orchestra and conductor not remarkable in an ordinary orchestra playing so difficult a work, but noticeable indeed with an orchestra like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Still, even Homer nodded, and constant and unwavering perfection can hardly be expected from any one.

One can, on the whole, only rejoice that the Boston Symphony is what it is—an organization which can hardly be equalled anywhere, and certainly not surpassed. Though Mr. Paur's effects are at times a trifle explosive, and his contrasts a little abrupt, the nicety of shading and phrasing and the variety of color and expression in the playing of the orchestra as a rule is one of its most marked and admirable characteristics.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1893.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening to an audience of smaller proportions than was present on the occasion of the first, and one whose ardor was somewhat affected by the inclement weather. Its manner was at least cordial, however, and Mr. Kneisel received the lion's share of the genial recognition accorded all the excellent work. This favorite artist was the only soloist of the evening, playing the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto with admirable neatness and finish, a tone which, though not large, was pure and sweet, and an exactness and fluency which can only come from conscientious and industrious labor. In breadth of rendering Mr. Kneisel hardly did Beethoven the justice that many other violinists who have played this concerto have set the example for. It was a narrow rendering, cautious almost to the confines of timidity, and conventional quite to coldness. The perfection of his intonation cannot be too highly praised. Certainly, if one must choose between precision and intensity of expression the preference must be for the former attribute.

Goetz's lovely symphony, with which the concert began, has often been heard in this city, but never so beautifully played, with such purity and sweetness of tone not only in the violins, which are remarkable in their handling, but in every other portion of the orchestra. Goetz's music is full of sunshine and the song of birds, of youth and happiness, and all nature's joy. It is written more in the old Mendelssohnian form than in the modern style, but it is as fresh and welcome as the refreshing things it pictures.

A bit of French piquancy in the shape of Saint-Saën's "Rouet d'Omphale" was put into the programme and deliciously emphasized in all its dainty points by Mr. Paur's clever bâton. His orderly mind and steady, commanding power are admirably perceptible, and there is no doubt that he will stand longer and firmer upon his present pedestal than any of his predecessors.

The New York Recorder.

By George W. Turner.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1893.

A BEARDED BULOW.

Conductor Paur of Boston's Crack Orchestra Is Precise, but Lacks Our Seidl's Poetry.

You may not agree with Emil Paur's readings, but there is no escaping the fact that the organization he conducts is the crack orchestra of America, and this, too, despite the "quack" made by the trumpet (by courtesy; cornet in grim reality) in the Leonore overture No. 3, which terminated the concert given last night in Music Hall. The house was not by any means filled, but a bad night had something to do with that, the advance subscription sale being very large. The programme was all in healthy major keys—Goetz's symphony in F, Beethoven's D major violin concerto, Saint-Saens' "Rouet D'Omphale," in A major; and the Beethoven overture in C major. Mr. Emil Paur was the other major.

The man lacks passion, spiritual and animal. Everything last night ran in grooves, and phrase after phrase was neatly exhibited, then docketed for further use. Mr. Paur flaps his arms, but his brain never flaps. He is precise, a perfect type of a martinet mentality. He is a Bulow with a beard, and he has not a climax in his make-up. The symphony, a sunny, simple, idyllic thing, the themes hardly large enough for the symphonic treatment, was smoothly played, the slow movement in particular. The first two movements are better than the last two. There is little fantasy in the work, but it is evidently the product of a gentle, agreeable, musical nature, and, above all, that of a scholar. The intermezzo contains a graceful conceit, and the work throughout is excellently scored. Mr. Franz Kneisel played a movement of Beethoven's beautiful violin concerto faultlessly. The Joachim cadenza was nobly delivered. The gifted violinist, whose purity of tone and exquisite style make him a great metropolitan favorite, was warmly applauded and recalled several times.

Saint-Saens' clever tone-piece was well done, but the climax never came, and as to finish, we have heard it better from Nikisch. Glow, grace and tonal variety were lacking. Everything had been analyzed down to the marrow-bone, and poetry fled dismayed. The overture was mechanically played, and lacked the sweep and lift of Seidl's interpretation. Technically it was a marvel, with the exception referred to above. Mr. Paur leaves one cold. His band is a great band nevertheless.

NEW YORK HERALD,

DECEMBER 15, 1893.—

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was far from a sensational programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at Carnegie Music Hall last evening.

But it contained one of the most beautiful of symphonies—Hermann Goetz's in F. It contained Beethoven's most dramatic overture, and it gave New York concert goers an opportunity of listening to the same master's great violin concerto.

The symphony was played irreproachably. The passages in the first movement divided between the 'cellos, violas and violins were played like a continuous stream of sound. And it is so easy for there to be "holes" at this particular part. The Allegretto, was charmingly done. The solo horn is something remarkable in the way of nobility of tone. The lovely melody, broad and simple as a folk song, was delivered by the violins with a broad sonority and yet so tenderly. It was an ideal performance.

The violin concerto was excellently played by the chef-d'attaque, Mr. Franz Kneisel. He has a pure tone. But how tiny! It sounded as though he were in another room.

It was a performance that somehow suggested the word "respectable" or "nice," but it was very loudly applauded, and certainly Herr Kneisel's technique is admirable.

The "Leonora" overture was given in excellent style. Again the violins showed their virtuosity by playing with an almost painful precision the awkward unison passage near the end. The entire work was well played, as was also the symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," by Camille Saint-Saens. Herr Emil Paur conducted in a manner which did not cause one to change the previously expressed opinion of him as an orchestral conductor.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1893.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in the Music Hall, the features of noteworthy interest were the symphony in F by Herrmann Goetz, and the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. In addition to these two compositions the programme contained Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and the third of Beethoven's Leonore's overtures, which were played in admirable style, but not so as to excite especial comment. In fact, both works have been played better by the same organization. The symphony is a pretty but not a deep composition, with a most engagingly dainty and graceful intermezzo in place of the conventional scherzo, and was delightfully performed. Mr. Kneisel is so favorably known as a player of solo and chamber music, as well as the leader of the orchestra's string forces, that it would be little better than carrying coals to Newcastle to dwell on his merits at this time. He never attempts a task that he does not perform well, and last night the finish of his playing and the suavity of his tone set the audience quite beside themselves with pleasurable emotion. As the child Mozart said of the violin of one of his father's friends, Mr. Kneisel has a "butter fiddle," its tone flows on with such delicious smoothness. The orchestra will play in Brooklyn this afternoon and to-morrow evening.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 16, 1893.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is here to give its second concert of the season to-night, and the programme was rehearsed in public at the Academy of Music yesterday. It is a good programme and it is superbly played, but it is monotonous in merit. An intermezzo for strings, or a couple of short things with sentiment would have relieved the bill, if introduced where the violin solo occurs. Each number is long. The "Dramatic" symphony of Rubinstein, noble, emotional, artistic as that work is, takes the best of an hour. It could be shortened by omission of certain of the codas, and ought to be. Rubinstein talks like one of the most modest men in the world, but he writes music as he were persuaded that the world could not hear too much of him. He does not have that breathless continuity of Mendelssohn that can be so irritating, as it is in some of his "Songs Without Words," where he allows no pauses, dodging away into a new theme just as he promises to discontinue; but he uses a motive for a fearless while and returns to it as if he was sure that the public liked it. It does, but better too little than too much of most things. It is not the nineteenth century way to write music. It is a busy age and we take our pleasures and our art and our meals and make our fortunes in as short a time as decency allows. We like things to be concentrated and strong, and if they leave a good impression on our palate we will call for more. An hour symphony goes with the three volume novel and the two hour sermon. For all that the work is really beautiful and interesting. It has a charm that the author does not suspect, that of revealing Russian history and temperament; for he, a Russian, does not believe in Russian music; he turns to Germany. The symphony is rightly named: it is dramatic and impressive, the first movement especially, for in that we discover the passion, the storm and stress that make a drama. And it was played yesterday with force and feeling. Mr. Paur has more feeling than he has been getting credit for. His uncouthness takes away from the effect, provided it is thought necessary to watch him, for it is not pleasant to see a man shake his head and stamp his foot before his band; but he is in earnest, unconscious of his farmerisms, and everyone likes an earnest man. His reading of the symphony was marked by vigor and comprehension and he had the ready response of his men. Franz Kneisel, kappelmeister, played the solo part of the Beethoven violin concerto, with a fine, clear tone and good phrasing, and he did not make too much of the foolish trills in it, though he did lug in Joachim's useless cadenza. This, also, was a long number, and is not so good as the Fifth symphony. Following this came Brahms' variations on the "St. Anthony" choral of Haydn, sweet, sedate, with the air of leisure, patience and formality, which pertains to so many things that are old, be they poetry, tapestry, furniture, dances or tunes. Brahms' additions and transpositions are more in the nature of a technical exploit than an inspiration, but they are interesting as showing the resource and variety of the modern orchestra, as compared with that of Haydn's day and the richness and sonority of Brahms' scoring. There was but one new thing on the programme: a symphonic poem by Smetana, the Bohemian. It was the second in the picturesque cyclus entitled "My Country" and this one describes in animated and beautiful phrases the river known to us as the Moldau, because its real name is Vltava. If Mr. Paur chooses on some later occasion to revive the fourth poem, "Z Ceskych Luhuv a Hajuv," it will be interesting to know what he will do with the name. Leave it in the lobby, maybe. In this "Vltava" we have a flowing figure for strings that begins in a while to sound like unconscious cerebration after the "Rheingold" opening. As the "Rheingold" had something like twenty or thirty years the start perhaps Smetana had in the meantime forgotten that he had heard it. But, anyway, he has made good music and it makes an awakening and delightful end to the concert. The orchestration is fitting; it sparkles, it thunders; we hear the hunt and the rustic dance on the shores; we note the solemn rising of the moon; we hear the dainty frisking of the nymphs; the falls are pictured and the battery roars at us; then comes peace again as the Vltava spreads into the plains and murmurs away toward the sea. Only the ending is conventional. Smetana wants to tell the audience that he has finished.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1893.

HALF OF THE SERIES.

Symphony Orchestra Gives the Third of Its Great Concerts.

As was bound to be the course of events, the third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall last night was complete in the enjoyment it created.

The attendance showed a gain over that at the second concert.

The appearance as a piano soloist of Mrs. Paur, wife of the new conductor, was the point of interest of the affair, and it was the declaration of the audience that she is a valuable new-comer to the ranks of American music providers. Her solo was performed with great proficiency.

The orchestra, naturally, gave a splendid performance and, with its leader received frequent and enthusiastic applause.

Particularly inspiriting on account of the masterly way in which their measures were discoursed, were Brahms' Symphony No. 1, and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

There are three more concerts in the course.

THE ENTERTAINMENT MONTHLY,

BOSTON, DECEMBER, 1893.

Mr. Paur's First Tour.

Mr. Emil Paur made his first tour in America during the week commencing Nov. 6, having conducted the first of the season's series of concerts announced by the Boston orchestra in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Not a little interest was felt in the reception which the Boston orchestra should meet with in the cities named with its new conductor, for it is one thing to meet the demands of an audience inclined to favor a home undertaking, and others having no interest beyond the actual artistic results of a performance.

The concert given on Monday evening, Nov. 6, in Washington, called out an audience limited in numbers only by the size of the hall. The matinee on Tuesday following, at Baltimore, was more largely attended than any before given in that city, and on Wednesday evening the audience at Carnegie Hall, New York, filled the great house to overflowing, every one of the sixty-four private boxes being fully occupied. The records of former seasons in Philadelphia were more than maintained in the concert given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, as the audience numbered over 3500, and hundreds of persons had to receive their money back because they could not gain admittance. The concerts given in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were attended by equally gratifying results, as both audiences showed a gain over any in that city during last season.

Mrs. Paur made her first appearance in this city as a pianist, Monday evening, Nov. 13, when she played in a trio by Schubert at the second Kneisel concert. She was the soloist at the first of the Apollo concerts, Nov. 22.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1893.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the ninth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major; Mozart's Serenade No. 7 in D major; the violin obligato by Mr. Frank Kneisel; Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in G major, Mr. Carl Baermann soloist, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" in C major. It was a long and rather dry programme and not particularly interesting.

Beethoven's symphony was splendidly rendered. The third movement, "menuetto," was played in a bright, brilliant manner that was delightful.

Mozart's Serenade was very prosy and dull. Mr. Kneisel's playing was in his usual masterly style. He was heartily applauded at the end of the fourth movement.

Mr. Carl Baermann was given a cordial welcome as the soloist of the evening, and he was heard to good advantage in Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte. While Mr. Baermann is not to be ranked among the leading soloists of the world, he is a most pleasing, intelligent artist. His touch is delightful and his execution decidedly brilliant and his playing is marked for its honest and sincere style. He was recalled several times amid great enthusiasm.

Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" was daintily played. The next concert promises to be an interesting one, there being two numbers which will be presented in Boston for the first time. It will include Dvorak's "American Symphony," Beethoven's concerto for the violin and Tschaikowsky's overture "1812."

[59]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1893.

The eminent feature of the ninth Symphony concert was Mr. Carl Baermann's re-entrance after an absence of several seasons. Mr. Paur had provided a preposterously long programme, and more than an hour had been occupied with Beethoven's first symphony and five selected movements from Mozart's seventh serenade for orchestra, before Mr. Baermann's number—which was Beethoven's G major concerto—was reached. But the audience had been waiting too many years for that fine artist's reappearance to begrudge now a trifling half hour or so of unnecessary delay, and it is safe to say that no person left the hall before the conclusion of the concerto whom some exigency like an early-departing train did not summon away. Mr. Baermann could not but feel flattered at the great cordiality of his reception, the attentive interest with which he was followed and the earnest applause which called and recalled him when his task was done. A truly catholic musician, a student of far wider range than that of his own profession, and a pianist who comprehends and illustrates many schools, Mr. Baermann is especially delightful, strong and authoritative in the classics. His limpid style and his elegant simplicity become the unaffected beauty and delicate detail of Mozart, while he has also the geniality, the humor and the emotional sensitiveness without which the best executant can give only the form of Beethoven without his spirit. His reading of this great concerto, which dates from that productive period when its author was preparing the fifth symphony and Fidelio," was at all points noble, true and sympathetic. The busy energy of the first movement, the quiet melancholy of the second and the buoyant vitality of the third, were expressed in turn with lucidity of phrasing, ample technical resource and variety and with sensitive feeling. The cadenzas were of Mr. Baermann's writing—the first of their kind which he has given to Boston—and admirably adapted to their places. Sufficiently elaborate and difficult to satisfy that expectancy which the professional man no less than the dilettante encourages in himself at such points, they were not written to display tours de force, but to develop ideas, and their consonancy with the movements into which they were incorporated was at once apparent. The orchestra took both pains and pleasure in supporting the piano, and Mr. Paur directed them with elastic conformity to Mr. Baermann's intention and interpretation.

The reading of the symphony was easy, bright and charming, rarely modified from a steady tempo into any moulding of individual bars, and there was clear portraval of the dawning tendencies which the master was soon to heighten into the most resplendent noon which has ever illuminated and warmed the world of music. The Mozart movements, which should not have been intruded into a programme necessarily long otherwise, were enjoyed upon the whole, although many persons were trying to save themselves for the event of the evening. They are of diverse natures and the choice made of them was favorable to contrast and relief, but some (especially the andante) are protracted and would sound best to fresh ears. Four of the five had either an obbligato or a cadenza for a solo violin—some, indeed, had both. These passages, often almost co-extensive with the movements themselves, were beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel, who was much applauded therefor. A commendable reading of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture ended the programme.

For the next concert two novelties are announced—Dvorak's "American" symphony, which has just been heard with favor in New York and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. Between these Mr. Kneisel will play from Beethoven a violin concerto.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 24, 1893.

The symphony concert program last night was attractive in many ways, and yet if it had not been for the Schubert "Rosamunde" overture, the last number of the evening, many of the listeners would have gone home rather tired than otherwise.

It is possible to have too much solid, substantial food just as it is to have too much of a light nature. The first three numbers on the program were long and absorbing. In order to appreciate them fully one had to listen with his ears wide open and watch with all his eyes.

This exercise kept up for almost two hours is exhausting, consequently it is safe to say that almost every person in the large audience was glad to hear the "Rosamunde" overture, for that can be understood and enjoyed without very close attention. As it was, people went home satisfied.

The program was made up of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, Mozart's serenade No. 7 in D major (Haffner), Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in G major, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" in C major. Mr Baermann was the soloist, and Mr Kneisel played the violin obligato in the Mozart serenade.

Mr Baermann played the piano with his usual smoothness and general excellence of execution. The piano obligato, however, seemed too far away from the orchestral parts and occasionally the soloist and the other players seemed to be at a little variance in regard to time.

Mr Kneisel played beautifully. The tone of his violin seemed even better than ever and he performed with a depth of feeling well suited to the character of the composition, which is pervaded with something akin to religious fervor.

The work of the orchestra as a whole was satisfactory, although precision in tempo was frequently lacking. Mr Paur conducted with great vigor and manly enthu-

[illegible] week's concert will [illegible] Symphony M88 [illegible] concerto for

[illegible]

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1[illegible]

The Ninth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade, No. 7, ("Hafner").....Mozart
Concerto for piano, G major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert

Once on a time there lived in Salzburg a man named Sigmund Hafner. He was a wholesale merchant and a burgomaster. He was fond of music, and when there were festivals in his house he summoned the musicians of the town. This "worthy and public-spirited" citizen had a daughter, known as Elisabeth, who, after the manner of her sex, fell in love, and with a certain Mr. Spaeth.

In Germany a betrothment is a serious matter, as fickle-minded Americans have found to their surprise and cost. Some say that for the betrothment of Miss Hafner, the great Mozart wrote the serenade played here last evening. Others say that the serenade was composed for the joyous celebration of her marriage. For a later festal gathering in the house of Hafner, Mozart wrote a symphony in D major, a work well worth hearing to-day.

Now the word serenade in Mozart's time was loosely applied to evening music. The lover who sang beneath a balcony and turned about only to see the pale face of a rival with drawn sword or dagger sang a serenade. Serenades were played or sung on Venetian canals. Serenades accompanied the clinking of glasses and the low laughter of coquettes. Serenades tickled the vanity of illustrious visitors, whose fine plumage glittered in the light of torches. And Elisabeth Hafner looked at her lover and pondered her fate while the musicians played the serenade of Mozart.

There are eight movements in this particular serenade; and they were not all played last evening. The first allegro might have given the pitch to rejoicing, or to the play of knife and fork. The andante, with the charming violin obbligato, was for tenderer moments, moments of confidences, vows and promises. And the other numbers were for merriment and pledging of toasts.

It is delightful music, this serenade of Mozart: old-fashioned, quaint, at times formal, at times full of a gracious and courtly tenderness unknown in these days of nervous depression or exaltation. And it was played by orchestra and Mr. Kneisel delightfully.

***

There are some who only recognize one Beethoven, the strange giant of the mysterious latter musical years. They look askew at the young Beethoven. They do not find the lion. But it is a pleasure to see the cub at play.

In the first Symphony of Beethoven, there is no marked departure from the symphony of the time. Perhaps in the menuetto there are suggestions of the future scherzo; but there is nothing revolutionary in the symphony. There are the voices of Haydn and of Mozart; but although we recognize them—see, for instance, how Figaro enters in the finale—they somehow speak with an accent that seems a little foreign.

***

But the Beethoven of the G major concerto is another man. In the concerto there is but one voice, and that is the voice of Beethoven.

Mr. Carl Baermann gave an admirable performance of the solo part. It was pure, without exaggeration, without caprice, without the slightest symptom of the feverish desire for personal display. The concerto, with Mr. Baermann at the piano, was a homogeneous work. There was no apparent rivalry between orchestra and piano. The hearer thought of Beethoven, and not of the pianist, and, after all, this is the highest praise. But after the last chord sounded through the hall there was spontaneous and grateful thought of the pianist who had assisted so artistically in giving unalloyed pleasure, and he was applauded most heartily.

***

Such concerts as that of last evening are not only a musical delight; they are a liberal education. It is well, it is indeed necessary that modern works of every school and nationality should receive prompt and due attention. But it is also well to escape from the hot air of the modern palace of art, and meditate calmly and serenely in the temple of the ancient masters. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were great composers before Brahms and Wagner.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was, Symphony, No. 1, Beethoven; Serenade, No. 7 (Haffner), Mozart; Concerto for piano-forte, in G major, Beethoven; and overture, "Rosamond," Schubert. Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist. The concert was too long to be be listened to without experiencing a sense of fatigue. It was not judiciously arranged, for before the concerto there were two long works, nine movements in all. The symphony was given with that minuteness of detail, in regard to making every possible point in it, which we have now learned to recognize as the weakness of Mr. Paur's conducting. The reading was pre-eminently conscientious; but it was too conscientious, and the result was that a work that is essentially genial in itself, and is peculiarly spontaneous in effect, seemed labored, owing to the excess of emphasis that was laid on it wherever opportunity served, in and out of season. Another consequence of so much elaboration was that the climaxes were anticipated, and when they arrived they were shorn of their impressiveness. The Mozart serenade was interpreted in a much better spirit, though even here there was a tendency to find something in the music that it did not say freely of itself, and its broad simplicity was often marred by this over-study in the direction of making it say more than is discoverable on its surface. Mozart, of all composers, is the one that bears a pedantic interpretation the least. However, this work has become somewhat passé, and could well have been spared. The re-appearance of Mr. Baermann at these concerts was welcomed with great heartiness, and his reception was of a warmth that must have been gratifying to him as an evidence of the affectionate esteem in which he is held. His performance of the concerto was an example of Beethoven playing at its very best, and after the long reign of sensational piano playing through which we have passed, it was a genuine pleasure to listen again to an artist of Mr. Baermann's solid and sterling qualities. In its delightful freshness, its thorough devotion to the composer, in its clearness as an interpretation, its clean-cut finish of technique, and its true musicianly qualities, it may justly be ranked as one of the most perfect and satisfying readings and performances of the work that has ever been heard here. It was a comfort to listen to such thoroughly honest and manly playing again as an antidote to the flood of sophisticated sentiment and affected femininity of style of which we have had so much of late. It met with the enthusiastic approval of the large audience, the artist being rewarded with tremendous outburst of applause after the first movement, and receiving three stormy recalls at the close. The programme for the next concert is: American Symphony, Dvorak; Concerto for Violin, Beethoven; Overture "1812," Tschaikowsky. Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 176.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Carl Baermann.

The annual appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann, the pianist, made the event of last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur. The programme was not a happy effort in this line, being singularly lacking in contrast and somewhat wearisome.

With the first of the Beethoven symphonies to begin with, followed by five movements of the "Haffner" serenade by Mozart, the pianoforte concerto No. 4, in G major, op. 58, by Beethoven, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" as a finale, the list of works had little to stir the audience to enthusiasm, however much respect was felt for the several compositions.

Mr. Baermann's presence, however, largely atoned for any lack of interest in the several parts of the programme, and his entrance was made the occasion of a welcoming ovation which conclusively proved his continued popularity with the Symphony concert patrons. His performance of the great concerto, with his own cadenza, was what was to be expected from an artist of his sterling worth, and his thoroughly satisfying interpretation of its movements was recognized in the most complimentary manner. He has never been more successful in his appearance with the home orchestra, and his value in this yearly scheme of concerts has at no time been more pronounced.

A very delightful interpretation of the first, second, third, fourth and eighth movements of Mozart's "Haffner" serenade was given by Mr. Paur, the solos for the violin being charmingly played by Mr. Kneisel.

Mr. Paur's reading of the familiar first of the Beethoven symphonies was in keeping with the conservative tendencies he has shown since he assumed his position, and he was highly successful in bringing out all the manifold beauties of the work, free from exaggeration or excessive contrasts. The equally familiar "Rosamunde" overture made a pleasing ending to the evening's programme.

Mr. Paur will give an "up to date" character to his programme by bringing out the "From the New World" symphony by Dr. Dvorak next Saturday evening, when, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloist, the programme will also include the Beethoven violin concerto and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

Although the programme of Saturday had some superb numbers, it was by no means well arranged, its length was abnormal, even with an excision from the printed list which made Saturday's concert considerably shorter than Friday's rehearsal, and before the soloist came upon the scene the audience had been fed even to tonal dyspepsia upon movement after movement, all in the same general vein—the early classical school. That with such a handicap Mr. Carl Baermann was able to win a great success proves his power in the most decided manner, but scarcely excuses the monotony of the first two thirds of the programme.

Beethoven's first symphony began the concert. It is the weakest sister of the nine, but it shows that Beethoven began where Haydn ended. Had Beethoven died at the age that Schubert did, this symphony would have been the chief indication of his genius, and the biographers would have classed him as a worthy exponent of the Haydn school. Schubert's C major symphony, written at about the same age that Beethoven was at this epoch, stands much higher, and it is one of the "ifs" of musical history whether Schubert might not have gone beyond the Beethoven heights had he lived longer. But even in this work one can perceive the giant tugging at his chain and striving to break his fetters; this is notably the case in the third movement, for here Beethoven achieved a minuet that Haydn would not have attained in a century. Nothing seems so typical of Haydn as the graceful and melodious minuets which he wrote in such profusion, and nothing shows the sturdy Beethoven more clearly than the manner in which he at once tried to give ruggedness and virility to this form; there is more of the spirit of the Scherzo in this movement than in any other minuet ever written, more even than in the first symphonic Scherzo which came in Beethoven's next symphony. To the present writer this movement is the gem of the symphony, and Mr. Paur read it with just the right spirit and dash. The finale drops back into the exact vein of Haydn, and the light rollicking style reminds one of the fact that the ending of the Suite (the Gigue) had a decided influence upon the conclusion of the early symphonies. It was played in a clear and definite manner, and the toying with the tempo of the fragmentary scale-work of its introduction was not ineffective. Time was when German conductors ridiculed this short prelude and some even omitted it altogether.

The Mozart Serenade, even in a twice abbreviated state, was de trop. It only repeated the style of what had been presented in the preceding symphony. It gave Mr. Kneisel a chance to do some commendably pure violin work, showed an excellent dialogue between violins and horn, and ended with some most brilliant passages for the violins, a sort of perpetuum mobile.

Now followed the real Beethoven, and a real Beethoven player, too. From the very beginning Mr. Carl Baermann was in his element in this work, a concerto which is not a whit inferior to, although so different from, the "Emperor," which succeeded it. The performance was dignified and manly, capricious enough to give the subtle changes of expression, but far removed from trickiness or sensationalism. The cadenza of the first movement, composed by the pianist, although somewhat long for the continuity of the work, was a fine development of preceding matter and never became irrelevant. In the last movement Mr. Baermann obeyed the composer's injunction ("La cadenza sia corta") and gave a brief but brilliant display of virtuosity. Spite of the fact that the audience had listened to almost an entire concert before this work, they were aroused to a pitch of enthusiasm and recall followed recall in a most spontaneous outburst of approbation.

The melodic Schubert, closed the concert with that strange compound of blood and thunder, of heavy brasses and tender song-themes,—the overture to "Rosemunde." This was splendidly performed, and its strong contrasts were made without the slightest lapse from perfect ensemble. The irreverent auditor could not be impressed with the fact that one of the most important themes was first cousin to "Way down upon the Suwannee River," but that only showed that folksong has a kinship all the world over, and that Foster's work is to be classed with the genuine inspirations in this school. Next Saturday we shall have an entire symphony founded upon such cis-Atlantic themes, for Dvorak's new work, idealizing our typical music, is to receive its first performance in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[60]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 24, 1893.

The eminent feature of the ninth Symphony concert was Mr. Carl Baermann's re-entrance after an absence of several seasons. Mr. Paur had provided a preposterously long programme, and more than an hour had been occupied with Beethoven's first symphony and five selected movements from Mozart's seventh serenade for orchestra, before Mr. Baermann's number—which was Beethoven's G major concerto—was reached. But the audience had been waiting too many years for that fine artist's reappearance to begrudge now a trifling half hour or so of unnecessary delay, and it is safe to say that no person left the hall before the conclusion of the concerto whom some exigency like an early-departing train did not summon away. Mr. Baermann could not but feel flattered at the great cordiality of his reception, the attentive interest with which he was followed and the earnest applause which called and recalled him when his task was done. A truly catholic musician, a student of far wider range than that of his own profession, and a pianist who comprehends and illustrates many schools, Mr. Baermann is especially delightful, strong and authoritative in the classics. His limpid style and his elegant simplicity become the unaffected beauty and delicate detail of Mozart, while he has also the geniality, the humor and the emotional sensitiveness without which the best executant can give only the form of Beethoven without his spirit. His reading of this great concerto, which dates from that productive period when its author was preparing the fifth symphony and Fidelio," was at all points noble, true and sympathetic. The busy energy of the first movement, the quiet melancholy of the second and the buoyant vitality of the third, were expressed in turn with lucidity of phrasing, ample technical resource and variety and with sensitive feeling. The cadenzas were of Mr. Baermann's writing—the first of their kind which he has given to Boston—and admirably adapted to their places. Sufficiently elaborate and difficult to satisfy that expectancy which the professional man no less than the dilettante encourages in himself at such points, they were not written to display tours de force, but to develop ideas, and their consonancy with the movements into which they were incorporated was at once apparent. The orchestra took both pains and pleasure in supporting the piano, and Mr. Paur directed them with elastic conformity to Mr. Baermann's intention and interpretation.

The reading of the symphony was easy, bright and charming, rarely modified from a steady tempo into any moulding of individual bars, and there was clear portraval of the dawning tendencies which the master was soon to heighten into the most resplendent noon which has ever illuminated and warmed the world of music. The Mozart movements, which should not have been intruded into a programme necessarily long otherwise, were enjoyed upon the whole, although many persons were trying to save themselves for the event of the evening. They are of diverse natures and the choice made of them was favorable to contrast and relief, but some (especially the andante) are protracted and would sound best to fresh ears. Four of the five had either an obbligato or a cadenza for a solo violin—some, indeed, had both. These passages, often almost co-extensive with the movements themselves, were beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel, who was much applauded therefor. A commendable reading of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture ended the programme.

For the next concert two novelties are announced—Dvorak's "American" symphony, which has just been heard with favor in New York and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. Between these Mr. Kneisel will play from Beethoven a violin concerto.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 24, 1893.

The symphony concert program last night was attractive in many ways, and yet if it had not been for the Schubert "Rosamunde" overture, the last number of the evening, many of the listeners would have gone home rather tired than otherwise.

It is possible to have too much solid, substantial food just as it is to have too much of a light nature. The first three numbers on the program were long and absorbing. In order to appreciate them fully one had to listen with his ears wide open and watch with all his eyes.

This exercise kept up for almost two hours is exhausting, consequently it is safe to say that almost every person in the large audience was glad to hear the "Rosamunde" overture, for that can be understood and enjoyed without very close attention. As it was, people went home satisfied.

The program was made up of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, Mozart's serenade No. 7 in D major (Haffner), Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in G major, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" in C major. Mr Baermann was the soloist, and Mr Kneisel played the violin obligato in the Mozart serenade.

Mr Baermann played the piano with his usual smoothness and general excellence of execution. The piano obligato, however, seemed too far away from the orchestral parts and occasionally the soloist and the other players seemed to be at a little variance in regard to time.

Mr Kneisel played beautifully. The tone of his violin seemed even better than ever and he performed with a depth of feeling well suited to the character of the composition, which is pervaded with something akin to religious fervor.

The work of the orchestra as a whole was satisfactory, although precision in tempo was sometimes wanting. Mr Paur conducted with great gusto and manly enthusiasm.

The program of this week's concert will be as follows: American symphony, MSS, Dvorak, first time in Boston; concerto for violin, Beethoven; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky, first time; soloist, Mr Franz Kneisel.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1893.

The Ninth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade, No. 7, ("Hafner").....Mozart
Concerto for piano, G major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert

Once on a time there lived in Salzburg a man named Sigmund Hafner. He was a wholesale merchant and a burgomaster. He was fond of music, and when there were festivals in his house he summoned the musicians of the town. This "worthy and public-spirited" citizen had a daughter, known as Elisabeth, who, after the manner of her sex, fell in love, and with a certain Mr. Spaeth.

In Germany a betrothment is a serious matter, as fickle-minded Americans have found to their surprise and cost. Some say that for the betrothment of Miss Hafner, the great Mozart wrote the serenade played here last evening. Others say that the serenade was composed for the joyous celebration of her marriage. For a later festal gathering in the house of Hafner, Mozart wrote a symphony in D major, a work well worth hearing to-day.

Now the word serenade in Mozart's time was loosely applied to evening music. The lover who sang beneath a balcony and turned about only to see the pale face of a rival with drawn sword or dagger sang a serenade. Serenades were played or sung on Venetian canals. Serenades accompanied the clinking of glasses and the low laughter of coquettes. Serenades tickled the vanity of illustrious visitors, whose fine plumage glittered in the light of torches. And Elisabeth Hafner looked at her lover and pondered her fate while the musicians played the serenade of Mozart.

There are eight movements in this particular serenade; and they were not all played last evening. The first allegro might have given the pitch to rejoicing, or to the play of knife and fork. The andante, with the charming violin obbligato, was for tenderer moments, moments of confidences, vows and promises. And the other numbers were for merriment and pledging of toasts.

It is delightful music, this serenade of Mozart: old-fashioned, quaint, at times formal, at times full of a gracious and courtly tenderness unknown in these days of nervous depression or exaltation. And it was played by orchestra and Mr. Kneisel delightfully.

***

There are some who only recognize one Beethoven, the strange giant of the mysterious latter musical years. They look askew at the young Beethoven. They do not find the lion. But it is a pleasure to see the cub at play.

In the first Symphony of Beethoven, there is no marked departure from the symphony of the time. Perhaps in the menuetto there are suggestions of the future scherzo; but there is nothing revolutionary in the symphony. There are the voices of Haydn and of Mozart; but although we recognize them—see, for instance, how Figaro enters in the finale—they somehow speak with an accent that seems a little foreign.

***

But the Beethoven of the G major concerto is another man. In the concerto there is but one voice, and that is the voice of Beethoven.

Mr. Carl Baermann gave an admirable performance of the solo part. It was pure, without exaggeration, without caprice, without the slightest symptom of the feverish desire for personal display. The concerto, with Mr. Baermann at the piano, was a homogeneous work. There was no apparent rivalry between orchestra and piano. The hearer thought of Beethoven, and not of the pianist, and, after all, this is the highest praise. But after the last chord sounded through the hall there was spontaneous and grateful thought of the pianist who had assisted so artistically in giving unalloyed pleasure, and he was applauded most heartily.

***

Such concerts as that of last evening are not only a musical delight; they are a liberal education. It is well, it is indeed necessary that modern works of every school and nationality should receive prompt and due attention. But it is also well to escape from the hot air of the modern palace of art, and meditate calmly and serenely in the temple of the ancient masters. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were great composers before Brahms and Wagner.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 24.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was, Symphony, No. 1, Beethoven; Serenade, No. 7 (Haffner), Mozart; Concerto for piano-forte, in G-major, Beethoven; and overture, "Rosamond," Schubert. Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist. The concert was too long to be be listened to without experiencing a sense of fatigue. It was not judiciously arranged, for before the concerto there were two long works, nine movements in all. The symphony was given with that minuteness of detail, in regard to making every possible point in it, which we have now learned to recognize as the weakness of Mr. Paur's conducting. The reading was pre-eminently conscientious; but it was too conscientious, and the result was that a work that is essentially genial in itself, and is peculiarly spontaneous in effect, seemed labored, owing to the excess of emphasis that was laid on it wherever opportunity served, in and out of season. Another consequence of so much elaboration was that the climaxes were anticipated, and when they arrived they were shorn of their impressiveness. The Mozart serenade was interpreted in a much better spirit, though even here there was a tendency to find something in the music that it did not say freely of itself, and its broad simplicity was often marred by this over-study in the direction of making it say more than is discoverable on its surface. Mozart, of all composers, is the one that bears a pedantic interpretation the least. However, this work has become somewhat passé, and could well have been spared. The re-appearance of Mr. Baermann at these concerts was welcomed with great heartiness, and his reception was of a warmth that must have been gratifying to him as an evidence of the affectionate esteem in which he is held. His performance of the concerto was an example of Beethoven playing at its very best, and after the long reign of sensational piano playing through which we have passed, it was a genuine pleasure to listen again to an artist of Mr. Baermann's solid and sterling qualities. In its delightful freshness its thorough devotion to the composer, in its clearness as an interpretation, its clean-cut finish of technique, and its true musicianly qualities, it may justly be ranked as one of the most perfect and satisfying readings and performances of the work that has ever been heard here. It was a comfort to listen to such thoroughly honest and manly playing again as an antidote to the flood of sophisticated sentiment and affected femininity of style of which we have had so much of late. It met with the enthusiastic approval of the large audience, the artist being rewarded with tremendous outburst of applause after the first movement, and receiving three stormy recalls at the close. The programme for the next concert is: American Symphony, Dvorak; Concerto for Violin, Beethoven; Overture "1812," Tschaikowsky. Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 176.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Carl Baermann.

The annual appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann, the pianist, made the event of last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur. The programme was not a happy effort in this line, being singularly lacking in contrast and somewhat wearisome.

With the first of the Beethoven symphonies to begin with, followed by five movements of the "Haffner" serenade by Mozart, the pianoforte concerto No. 4, in G major, op. 58, by Beethoven, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" as a finale, the list of works had little to stir the audience to enthusiasm, however much respect was felt for the several compositions.

Mr. Baermann's presence, however, largely atoned for any lack of interest in the several parts of the programme, and his entrance was made the occasion of a welcoming ovation which conclusively proved his continued popularity with the Symphony concert patrons. His performance of the great concerto, with his own cadenza, was what was to be expected from an artist of his sterling worth, and his thoroughly satisfying interpretation of its movements was recognized in the most complimentary manner. He has never been more successful in his appearance with the home orchestra, and his value in this yearly scheme of concerts has at no time been more pronounced.

A very delightful interpretation of the first, second, third, fourth and eighth movements of Mozart's "Haffner" serenade was given by Mr. Paur, the solos for the violin being charmingly played by Mr. Kneisel.

Mr. Paur's reading of the familiar first of the Beethoven symphonies was in keeping with the conservative tendencies he has shown since he assumed his position, and he was highly successful in bringing out all the manifold beauties of the work, free from exaggeration or excessive contrasts. The equally familiar "Rosamunde" overture made a pleasing ending to the evening's programme.

Mr. Paur will give an "up to date" character to his programme by bringing out the "From the New World" symphony by Dr. Dvorak next Saturday evening, when, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloist, the programme will also include the Beethoven violin concerto and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1893.

The Symphony Concert.

Although the programme of Saturday had some superb numbers, it was by no means well arranged, its length was abnormal, even with an excision from the printed list which made Saturday's concert considerably shorter than Friday's rehearsal, and before the soloist came upon the scene the audience had been fed even to tonal dyspepsia upon movement after movement, all in the same general vein—the early classical school. That with such a handicap Mr. Carl Baermann was able to win a great success proves his power in the most decided manner, but scarcely excuses the monotony of the first two thirds of the programme.

Beethoven's first symphony began the concert. It is the weakest sister of the nine, but it shows that Beethoven began where Haydn ended. Had Beethoven died at the age that Schubert did, this symphony would have been the chief indication of his genius, and the biographers would have classed him as a worthy exponent of the Haydn school. Schubert's C major symphony, written at about the same age that Beethoven was at this epoch, stands much higher, and it is one of the "ifs" of musical history whether Schubert might not have gone beyond the Beethoven heights had he lived longer. But even in this work one can perceive the giant tugging at his chain and striving to break his fetters; this is notably the case in the third movement, for here Beethoven achieved a minuet that Haydn would not have attained in a century. Nothing seems so typical of Haydn as the graceful and melodious minuets which he wrote in such profusion, and nothing shows the sturdy Beethoven more clearly than the manner in which he at once tried to give ruggedness and virility to this form; there is more of the spirit of the Scherzo in this movement than in any other minuet ever written, more even than in the first symphonic Scherzo which came in Beethoven's next symphony. To the present writer this movement is the gem of the symphony, and Mr. Paur read it with just the right spirit and dash. The finale drops back into the exact vein of Haydn, and the light rollicking style reminds one of the fact that the ending of the Suite (the Gigue) had a decided influence upon the conclusion of the early symphonies. It was played in a clear and definite manner, and the toying with the tempo of the fragmentary scale-work of its introduction was not ineffective. Time was when German conductors ridiculed this short prelude and some even omitted it altogether.

The Mozart Serenade, even in a twice abbreviated state, was de trop. It only repeated the style of what had been presented in the preceding symphony. It gave Mr. Kneisel a chance to do some commendably pure violin work, showed an excellent dialogue between violins and horn, and ended with some most brilliant passages for the violins, a sort of perpetuum mobile.

Now followed the real Beethoven, and a real Beethoven player, too. From the very beginning Mr. Carl Baermann was in his element in this work, a concerto which is not a whit inferior to, although so different from, the "Emperor," which succeeded it. The performance was dignified and manly, capricious enough to give the subtle changes of expression, but far removed from trickiness or sensationalism. The cadenza of the first movement, composed by the pianist, although somewhat long for the continuity of the work, was a fine development of preceding matter and never became irrelevant. In the last movement Mr. Baermann obeyed the composer's injunction ("La cadenza sia corta") and gave a brief but brilliant display of virtuosity. Spite of the fact that the audience had listened to almost an entire concert before this work, they were aroused to a pitch of enthusiasm and recall followed recall in a most spontaneous outburst of approbation.

The melodic Schubert closed the concert with that strange compound of blood and thunder, of heavy brasses and tender song-themes,—the overture to "Rosemunde." This was splendidly performed, and its strong contrasts were made without the slightest lapse from perfect ensemble. The irreverent auditor could not be impressed with the fact that one of the most important themes was first cousin to "Way down upon the Suwannee River," but that only showed that folksong has a kinship all the world over, and that Foster's work is to be classed with the genuine inspirations in this school. Next Saturday we shall have an entire symphony founded upon such cis-Atlantic themes, for Dvorak's new work, idealizing our typical music, is to receive its first performance in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[60]

...ER

...December 29, 1893.

...Ninth Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade, No. 7 (Haffner).....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, Beethoven
Overture, Rosamund.....Schubert
Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

It can be seen at a glance what a fatiguing demand this programme made upon the attention of the listener, both as regards its length and the monotony of its material. The Beethoven symphony, in its author's first period, reminds one constantly of the immortal Mozart, and it was unnecessary to play the five movements of the Mozart Serenade immediately following in order to impress this characteristic similarity upon the audience. Neither is the "Serenade" a work of sufficient importance to warrant putting it upon such a programme. It of course is charming in its simplicity, and would, if properly contrasted, be of educational value to the student in the classics of orchestral writing.

Then came the concerto of Beethoven, a specimen of the author's advanced period, replete with the unrivalled genius of its immortal composer. If Mr. Paur sought to display the first and last period of the great master's composition, the symphony and the concerto would have served well in accomplishing his desire. If he wished to make plain how much the symphony resembled Mozart and also how far removed from the characteristics of his eminent predecessor was the music of Beethoven's concerto, then again Mr. Paur was successful in the framing of his programme.

But in these days it is unnecessary to dwell so practically in an exposition of such historical facts, of which the student, even, is well aware through the ample means at his disposal, in the piano arrangements of the works of both these classic composers.

Neither is it necessary that Mr. Paur should demonstrate these facts with his orchestra, an organization whose function should be more than that of an adjunct in a conservatory course of education.

If it was not for the reasons given that the audience was dosed with monotony of the first and second numbers on the programme, then it would seem as if the ability of Mr. Paur to arrange programmes successfully must be doubted. To the connossieur, nothing could be more stupid than this programme of Saturday evening. In the days of the Harvard orchestra, 25 years ago, it would have dragged on the attention of its audience.

As far as the performance of these works was concerned, it is gratifying to say, that the orchestra has not, since Mr. Gericke retired, played with so much expression and precision, with so much regard for the dynamic demands of the score and with so little roughness as on this occasion. The firm and earnest endeavors of Mr. Paur brought out the characteristics, of each work to a great degree and it only needed a little more freedom in the swing of the playing and a more acute definition in the matter of tone graduation to have made the playing extremely excellent.

The passages for violin solo in the Mozart piece were played by Mr. Kneisel in his usual highly finished and artistic manner.

The event of the evening was the reappearance in these concerts of Mr. Carl Baermann, the eminent pianist of this city. It is as long ago as the first year that Nikisch encumbered the conductor's position since Mr. Baermann has appeared in any programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not since the playing of the Beethoven concerto in G by the renowned Anton Rubinstein in 1872 has such a highly artistic and eminently noble rendering of this work been heard in our concerts as was vouchsafed by Mr. Baermann on this occasion. Mr. Baermann is justly celebrated for his remarkably fine interpretation of this great master, but in every respect he surpassed all former efforts in the masterly manner in which he brought forth the beauties of this marvellous composition. It was gratifying to observe this fine musician and accomplished performer devoid of all affectation and engrossed only in a true and conscientious revelation of the composer's genius, and we must thank Mr. Paur for his selection of such a genuine artist.

There was an evident sympathy between the performer and the conductor as regards a conception of the composer's intentions, and it is seldom that so complete a unit is experienced as existed between the soloist and the accompaniment. Mr. Paur deserves great praise for the skilful manner in which he conducted the accompaniment.

Next Saturday evening, Dvorak's latest orchestral work just produced for the first time at a Philharmonic concert in New York will be given in Boston for the first time. It is entitled "American Symphony." The overture "1812" by Tschaikowsky will also be played for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and he will be heard in the concerto for violin by Beethoven. This will be a programme of great interest.

THE AMERICAN SYMPHONY

Dvorak's fifth symphony, "From the New World," has already proved its power, not alone by the praise which it has won, but also by the warm discussion which it has stimulated. Conductor Paur has gratified the wishes of his audience by making this work a feature of next Saturday's programme at his concert, and affording Boston an opportunity to judge for herself.

It is objected to Dvorak's theory by some, that the highest music, like the highest art generally, rises above the limits of nationality. Without entering into this question, it is sufficient to note that the objection, even if true, does not lessen the positive merits of Dvorak's work. It does not detract from the worth of the Dutch paintings on exhibition now at our Art Museum that they reflect almost as strongly the industry, literalism and ...ly details of the Dutch people, ... the personal qualities ...

It may be said by others that the national element in art is unconscious, and cannot be consciously infused, as Dvorak has endeavored to infuse it. This criticism has more force than the other; yet, every renaissance, or awakening of a nation to its true life, has been begun by artists who were inflamed with conscious patriotism. Every country and every art has had its Dvorak at one time or another.

Several critics have been disturbed that our national symphony should be founded upon negro and Indian melodies. It will not, however, be the first time that music has gone back to the early legends of a country for inspiration. Negro and Indian are both of the soil, and perhaps as closely related to our life as the Knights of the Round Table to the life of Tennyson's England.

Others again point out that Dvorak is a Bohemian. This is in a musical sense his good fortune. We must confess that Plymouth Rock is a sterile mother of composers. Mother England herself is rated by Rubinstein as the least musical of the nations. There is hardly a living composer, vocalist or virtuoso, of the highest order who is of English stock. Such eminent composers as the English have bear un-English names,—Sullivan, Cowen, McFarren, McCunn, with others plainly Hebrew or Continental. What we in America hope to do is to impress upon the foreigners who come here the grand English love of order and liberty, and to take in return from each of the races the best that it has to give,—from the German his depth of sentiment, from the Italian his passion and manual cunning, from the Slav his wild musical mood.

Those who would reject Dvorak's American symphony, because its author is a Bohemian, must reject "Yankee Doodle" itself, and nine-tenths of its patriotic successors. Deeper reflection will convince them that Dvorak is a man of genius who has given American music an impetus such as it has received from no other source.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major, Opus 21.
Mozart: Serenade No. 7, in D major ("Haffner").
(Violin obbligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, Opus 58.
(Cadenzas by Mr. Baermann.)
Schubert: Overture to "Rosamunde," Opus 26.
Mr. Carl Baerman was the pianist.

A programme that made one think of the late John S. Dwight! A little over-long withal, but then so delightful. Beethoven's first symphony was admirably played. How Mozartish the work is in many points! The character of the themes, the construction, the very instrumentation, all recall Mozart, which is by no means common with Beethoven, by the way, for, if he in his earlier manner remind one of anybody else, it is generally of Haydn.

The five movements from Mozart's "Haffner" serenade—the whole work comprises eight—are full of beauty and were splendidly given. Mr. Kneisel's playing of the solo violin part, with occasional dainty cadenzas interpolated by himself (?) at just the right points, was simply exquisite. One might almost say that, for magical beauty of tone in double-stopping, he seeks his fellow. It was good to find the audience enjoying this music as they did; the public palate has not yet become so jaded by indulgence in "decadent" instrumentation and highly spiced harmonies that it cannot take delight in pure, natural, wholesome beauty.

Nine, not always short, movements already, and the whole great G major concerto still to come! It was almost too much of a good thing. Mr. Baermann played the wonderful work very beautifully indeed. At moments one felt a touch of nervousness in him, that prompted him to forge ahead, as if trying to leave the orchestra behind, but as a whole his playing was admirable in thorough soundness of conception and clearness of execution. In the poetic Andante con moto it rose to a very high pitch of expressive beauty. It is not often that one hears this greatest of all concertos so satisfyingly played. Mr. Baermann's cadenzas struck us as excellent at every point; brilliant without triviality, musically conceived and carried out; yet in no wise smelling of the lamp; in a word, just what cadenzas to a great classic work should be.

The ever lovely "Rosamunde" overture brought the concert to a delightful close. It is not uninteresting to trace the influence of Rossini, for whom Schubert had at one time a sincere admiration, in this light, brilliant and taking overture. We doubt if many other instances can be found of a great German composer writing an overture in this easy-going and and rather trivial Italian form—three themes developed at some length, with their subsidiaries, for a first part, and then repeated in another key for a third part, without any intervening working-out, and then a flashy coda to end off with! But for the absence of the Rossinian "crescendo" on the third theme—which, by the way, Beethoven had anticipated sixteen years before in his overture to "Leonore," No. 1—Rossini himself might have written it. It was capitally played.

The next programme is—Dvorak, "American" symphony (MS.); Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major, opus 61; Tschaikowsky, overture, "1812," opus 49. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1893.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symyhony, No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade No. 7 ("Hafner").....Mozart
Concerto for piano, G major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert

Once on a time there lived in Salzburg a man named Sigmund Hafner. He was a wholesale merchant and a burgomaster. He was fond of music, and when there were festivals in his house he summoned the musicians of the town. This "worthy and public spirited" citizen had a daughter, known as Elizabeth, who, after the manner of her sex, fell in love, and with a certain Mr. Spaeth.

In Germany a betrothment is a serious matter, as fickle-minded Americans have found to their surprise and cost. Some say that for the betrothment of Miss Hafner the great Mozart wrote the serenade played here last evening. Others say that the serenade was composed for the joyous celebration of her marriage. For a later festal gathering in the house of Hafner, Mozart wrote a symphony in D major, a work well worth hearing to-day.

Now the word serenade in Mozart's time was loosely applied to evening music. The lover who sang beneath a balcony, and turned about only to see the pale face of a rival with drawn sword or dagger sang a serenade. Serenades were played or sung on Venetian canals. Serenades accompanied the clinking of glasses and the low laughter of coquettes. Serenades tickled the vanity of illustrious visitors, whose fine plumage glittered in the light of torches. And Elisabeth Hafner looked at her lover and pondered her fate while the musicians played the serenade of Mozart.

There are eight movements in this particular serenade; and they were not all played last evening. The first allegro might have given the pitch to rejoicing or to the play of knife and fork. The andante, with the charming violin obbligato, was for tenderer moments, moments of confidences, vows and promises. And the other numbers were for merriment and pledging of toasts.

It is delightful music this serenade of Mozart; old-fashioned, quaint, at times formal, at times full of a gracious and courtly tenderness unknown in these days of nervous depression or exaltation. And it was played by orchestra and Mr. Kneisel delightfully.

There are some who only recognize one Beethoven, the strange giant of the mysterious latter musical years. They look askew at the young Beethoven. They do not find the lion. But it is a pleasure to see the cub at play.

In the First symphony of Beethoven, there is no marked departure from the symphony of the time. Perhaps in the menuetto there are suggestions of the future scherzo; but there is nothing revolutionary in the symphony. There are the voices of Haydn and of Mozart; but although we recognize them—see, for instance, how Figaro enters in the final—they somehow speak with an accent that seems a little foreign.

But the Beethoven of the G major concerto is another man. In the concerto there is but one voice, and that is the voice of Beethoven.

Mr. Carl Baermann gave an admirable performance of the solo part. It was pure, without exaggeration, without caprice, without the slightest symptom of the feverish desire for personal display. The concerto, with Mr. Baermann at the piano, was a homogeneous work. There was no apparent rivalry between orchestra and piano. The hearer thought of Beethoven, and not of the pianist, and after all this is the highest praise. But after the last chord sounded through the hall there was spontaneous and grateful thought of the pianist who had assisted so artistically in giving unalloyed pleasure, and he was applauded most heartily.

Such concerts as that of last evening are at times a musical delight. It is well, it is indeed necessary that modern works of every school and nationality should receive prompt and due attention. But it is also well to escape from the hot air of the modern Palace of Art and meditate calmly and serenely in the temple of the ancient masters. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were great composers before Brahms and Wagner.

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE LEAST ANSWER. HE IS DISHONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

WORCESTER.

FRIDAY, DEC. 29, 1893.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Admirable Performance of Brahms' Work—Mrs. Emil Paur, Soloist.

The size of the audience that listened to the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall last night was no particular indication that Worcester is a "musical city." The promptness with which it applauded the symphony, however, was sure proof that the people knew good music and good playing when they heard them combined. Such unequivocal approbation of Brahms is rather phenomenal in a provincial city. The full program was:

Johannes Brahms.....Symphony No. 1. E minor, op. 68.
Franz Schubert.....Wanderer," Grand fantasia in C, op. 15.
(Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra by F. Liszt.
Soloist, Mrs. Emil Paur.
Camille Saint-Saens.....Rouet d'Omphale,"
Hector Berlioz..Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony was wonderfully clear and beautiful. Under such careful interpretation the music seemed as perspicuous as Beethoven—one can hardly say Haydn even in this case. Since Schumann proclaimed Brahms as the long-awaited giant in music, and since Von Bulow said, "At last we have a tenth symphony," there have been sporadic revolts against this ponderous genius, yet it is even now about all one's musical reputation is worth to doubt Brahms openly. The heretical tendency is strongly implanted, however, and it must be confessed, though with appropriate apology, that the meaning of Brahms' first symphony was never conclusively expressed to some of us till Mr. Paur made it plain. There are many who would describe Brahms' music as Pope, or Dr. Johnson or somebody else described Chaucer's Canterbury Tales: so much labor and pains are required to get at the beauty of the poetry that there is little pleasure in it.

Mrs. Paur, who made her Worcester debut last night, is a good, but certainly not a great, pianist. She has acquired her husband's art of clear phrasing, his refinement, his painstaking care and his accuracy, but her style is not characterized by largeness and breadth, or her execution by power, or by especial delicacy. Enthusiasm and "temperament" cannot be her boast. Hers is the music box style of playing, that would not be criticised by a music master, but would fail to move an audience. Curiously enough, the orchestral arrangement of the "Wanderer fantasy" is quite as much Chopin as Liszt. The arranger seems to have made it prosaic rather than flashy. Mrs. Paur was recalled after her performance, but did not play again.

Saint Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" is not the sort of music in which Mr. Paur appears to best advantage. His method deprives it both of continuity and of lightness. The grace and prettiness that Mr. Nikish used to put into it were wanting. That is not to say that there was no pleasure in the work, for there was much. Saint Saens wrote it. The orchestra played the Berlioz overture with much dash, a sharp eye for the clock and an open ear for their approaching railway train. This concert was longer than the first and might have been shortened to advantage. But the brilliancy of "Benvenuto Cellini" brought out enthusiastic applause, and it may be said that the response of the audience was spontaneous throughout the evening.

The next concert will be given Tuesday evening, Jan. 30.

[61]

TON DAILY TRAVELLER

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1893.

The Ninth Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade, No. 7 (Haffner).....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major. Beethoven
Overture, Rosamund.....Schubert
Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

It can be seen at a glance what a fatiguing demand this programme made upon the attention of the listener, both as regards its length and the monotony of its material. The Beethoven symphony, in its author's first period, reminds one constantly of the immortal Mozart, and it was unnecessary to play the five movements of the Mozart Serenade immediately following in order to impress this characteristic similarity upon the audience. Neither is the "Serenade" a work of sufficient importance to warrant putting it upon such a programme. It of course is charming in its simplicity, and would, if properly contrasted, be of educational value to the student in the classics of orchestral writing.

Then came the concerto of Beethoven, a specimen of the author's advanced period, replete with the unrivalled genius of its immortal composer. If Mr. Paur sought to display the first and last period of the great master's composition, the symphony and the concerto would have served well in accomplishing his desire. If he wished to make plain how much the symphony resembled Mozart and also how far removed from the characteristics of his eminent predecessor was the music of Beethoven's concerto, then again Mr. Paur was successful in the framing of his programme.

But in these days it is unnecessary to dwell so practically in an exposition of such historical facts, of which the student, even, is well aware through the ample means at his disposal, in the piano arrangements of the works of both these classic composers.

Neither is it necessary that Mr. Paur should demonstrate these facts with his orchestra, an organization whose function should be more than that of an adjunct in a conservatory course of education.

If it was not for the reasons given that the audience was dosed with monotony of the first and second numbers on the programme, then it would seem as if the ability of Mr. Paur to arrange programmes successfully must be doubted. To the connossieur, nothing could be more stupid than this programme of Saturday evening. In the days of the Harvard orchestra, 25 years ago, it would have dragged on the attention of its audience.

As far as the performance of these works was concerned, it is gratifying to say, that the orchestra has not, since Mr. Gericke retired, played with so much expression and precision, with so much regard for the dynamic demands of the score and with so little roughness as on this occasion. The firm and earnest endeavors of Mr. Paur brought out the characteristics, of each work to a great degree and it only needed a little more freedom in the swing of the playing and a more acute definition in the matter of tone graduation to have made the playing extremely excellent.

The passages for violin solo in the Mozart piece were played by Mr. Kneisel in his usual highly finished and artistic manner.

The event of the evening was the reappearance in these concerts of Mr. Carl Baermann, the eminent pianist of this city. It is as long ago as the first year that Nikisch encumbered the conductor's position since Mr. Baermann has appeared in any programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not since the playing of the Beethoven concerto in G by the renowned Anton Rubinstein in 1872 has such a highly artistic and eminently noble rendering of this work been heard in our concerts as was vouchsafed by Mr. Baermann on this occasion. Mr. Baermann is justly celebrated for his remarkably fine interpretation of this great master, but in every respect he surpassed all former efforts in the masterly manner in which he brought forth the beauties of this marvellous composition. It was gratifying to observe this fine musician and accomplished performer devoid of all affectation and engrossed only in a true and conscientious revelation of the composer's genius, and we must thank Mr. Paur for his selection of such a genuine artist.

There was an evident sympathy between the performer and the conductor as regards a conception of the composer's intentions, and it is seldom that so complete a unit is experienced as existed between the soloist and the accompaniment. Mr. Paur deserves great praise for the skilful manner in which he conducted the accompaniment.

Next Saturday evening, Dvorak's latest orchestral work just produced for the first time at a Philharmonic concert in New York will be given in Boston for the first time. It is entitled "American Symphony." The overture "1812" by Tschaikowsky will also be played for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and he will be heard in the concerto for violin by Beethoven. This will be a programme of great interest.

THE AMERICAN SYMPHONY

Dvorak's fifth symphony, "From the New World," has already proved its power, not alone by the praise which it has won, but also by the warm discussion which it has stimulated. Conductor Paur has gratified the wishes of his audience by making this work a feature of next Saturday's programme at his concert, and affording Boston an opportunity to judge for herself.

It is objected to Dvorak's theory by some, that the highest music, like the highest art generally, rises above the limits of nationality. Without entering into this question, it is sufficient to note that the objection, even if true, does not lessen the positive merits of Dvorak's work. It does not detract from the worth of the Dutch paintings on exhibition now at our Art Museum that they reflect almost as surely the industry, literalism and fidelity in details of the Dutch people, as they reflect the personal qualities

It may be said by others that the national element in art is unconscious, and cannot be consciously infused, as Dvorak has endeavored to infuse it. This criticism has more force than the other; yet, every renaissance, or awakening of a nation to its true life, has been begun by artists who were inflamed with conscious patriotism. Every country and every art has had its Dvorak at one time or another.

Several critics have been disturbed that our national symphony should be founded upon negro and Indian melodies. It will not, however, be the first time that music has gone back to the early legends of a country for inspiration. Negro and Indian are both of the soil, and perhaps as closely related to our life as the Knights of the Round Table to the life of Tennyson's England.

Others again point out that Dvorak is a Bohemian. This is in a musical sense his good fortune. We must confess that Plymouth Rock is a sterile mother of composers. Mother England herself is rated by Rubinstein as the least musical of the nations. There is hardly a living composer, vocalist or virtuoso, of the highest order who is of English stock. Such eminent composers as the English have bear un-English names,—Sullivan, Ccwen, McFarren, McCunn, with others plainly Hebrew or Continental. What we in America hope to do is to impress upon the foreigners who come here the grand English love of order and liberty, and to take in return from each of the races the best that it has to give,—from the German his depth of sentiment, from the Italian his passion and manual cunning, from the Slav his wild musical mood.

Those who would reject Dvorak's American symphony, because its author is a Bohemian, must reject "Yankee Doodle" itself, and nine-tenths of its patriotic successors. Deeper reflection will convince them that Dvorak is a man of genius who has given American music an impetus such as it has received from no other source.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1893.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major, Opus 21.
Mozart: Serenade No. 7, in D major ("Haffner").
(Violin obbligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, Opus 58.
(Cadenzas by Mr. Baermann.)
Schubert: Overture to "Rosamunde," Opus 26.
Mr. Carl Baerman was the pianist.

A programme that made one think of the late John S. Dwight! A little over-long withal, but then so delightful. Beethoven's first symphony was admirably played. How Mozartish the work is in many points! The character of the themes, the construction, the very instrumentation, all recall Mozart, which is by no means common with Beethoven, by the way, for, if he in his earlier manner remind one of anybody else, it is generally of Haydn.

The five movements from Mozart's "Haffner" serenade—the whole work comprises eight—are full of beauty and were splendidly given. Mr. Kneisel's playing of the solo violin part, with occasional dainty cadenzas interpolated by himself (?) at just the right points, was simply exquisite. One might almost say that, for magical beauty of tone in double-stopping, he seeks his fellow. It was good to find the audience enjoying this music as they did; the public palate has not yet become so jaded by indulgence in "decadent" instrumentation and highly spiced harmonies that it cannot take delight in pure, natural, wholesome beauty.

Nine, not always short, movements already, and the whole great G major concerto still to come! It was almost too much of a good thing. Mr. Baermann played the wonderful work very beautifully indeed. At moments one felt a touch of nervousness in him, that prompted him to forge ahead, as if trying to leave the orchestra behind, but as a whole his playing was admirable in thorough soundness of conception and clearness of execution. In the poetic Andante con moto it rose to a very high pitch of expressive beauty. It is not often that one hears this greatest of all concertos so satisfyingly played. Mr. Baermann's cadenzas struck us as excellent at every point; brilliant without triviality, musically conceived and carried out, yet in no wise smelling of the lamp; in a word, just what cadenzas to a great classic work should be.

The ever lovely "Rosamunde" overture brought the concert to a delightful close. It is not uninteresting to trace the influence of Rossini, for whom Schubert had at one time a sincere admiration, in this light, brilliant and taking overture. We doubt if many other instances can be found of a great German composer writing an overture in this easy-going and and rather trivial Italian form—three themes developed at some length, with their subsidiaries, for a first part, and then repeated in another key for a third part, without any intervening working-out, and then a flashy coda to end off with! But for the absence of the Rossinian "crescendo" on the third theme—which, by the way, Beethoven had anticipated sixteen years before in his overture to "Leonore," No. 1—Rossini himself might have written it. It was capitally played.

The next programme is—Dvorák, "American" symphony (MS.); Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major, opus 61; Tschaikowsky, overture, "1812," opus 49. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1893.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symyhony, No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade No. 7 ("Hafner").....Mozart
Concerto for piano, G major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert

Once on a time there lived in Salzburg a man named Sigmund Hafner. He was a wholesale merchant and a burgomaster. He was fond of music, and when there were festivals in his house he summoned the musicians of the town. This "worthy and public spirited" citizen had a daughter, known as Elizabeth, who, after the manner of her sex, fell in love, and with a certain Mr. Spaeth.

In Germany a betrothment is a serious matter, as fickle-minded Americans have found to their surprise and cost. Some say that for the betrothment of Miss Hafner the great Mozart wrote the serenade played here last evening. Others say that the serenade was composed for the joyous celebration of her marriage. For a later festal gathering in the house of Hafner, Mozart wrote a symphony in D major, a work well worth hearing to-day.

Now the word serenade in Mozart's time was loosely applied to evening music. The lover who sang beneath a balcony, and turned about only to see the pale face of a rival with drawn sword or dagger sang a serenade. Serenades were played or sung on Venetian canals. Serenades accompanied the clinking of glasses and the low laughter of coquettes. Serenades tickled the vanity of illustrious visitors, whose fine plumage glittered in the light of torches. And Elisabeth Hafner looked at her lover and pondered her fate while the musicians played the serenade of Mozart.

There are eight movements in this particular serenade; and they were not all played last evening. The first allegro might have given the pitch to rejoicing or to the play of knife and fork. The andante, with the charming violin obbligato, was for tenderer moments, moments of confidences, vows and promises. And the other numbers were for merriment and pledging of toasts.

It is delightful music this serenade of Mozart; old-fashioned, quaint, at times formal, at times full of a gracious and courtly tenderness unknown in these days of nervous depression or exaltation. And it was played by orchestra and Mr. Kneisel delightfully.

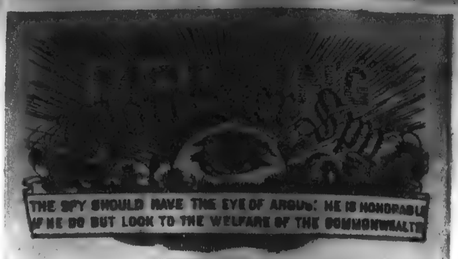
There are some who only recognize one Beethoven, the strange giant of the mysterious latter musical years. They look askew at the young Beethoven. They do not find the lion. But it is a pleasure to see the cub at play.

In the First symphony of Beethoven, there is no marked departure from the symphony of the time. Perhaps in the menuetto there are suggestions of the future scherzo; but there is nothing revolutionary in the symphony. There are the voices of Haydn and of Mozart; but although we recognize them—see, for instance, how Figaro enters in the final—they somehow speak with an accent that seems a little foreign.

But the Beethoven of the G major concerto is another man. In the concerto there is but one voice, and that is the voice of Beethoven.

Mr. Carl Baermann gave an admirable performance of the solo part. It was pure, without exaggeration, without caprice, without the slightest symptom of the feverish desire for personal display. The concerto, with Mr. Baermann at the piano, was a homogeneous work. There was no apparent rivalry between orchestra and piano. The hearer thought of Beethoven, and not of the pianist, and after all this is the highest praise. But after the last chord sounded through the hall there was spontaneous and grateful thought of the pianist who had assisted so artistically in giving unalloyed pleasure, and he was applauded most heartily.

Such concerts as that of last evening are at times a musical delight. It is well, it is indeed necessary that modern works of every school and nationality should receive prompt and due attention. But it is also well to escape from the hot air of the modern Palace of Art and meditate calmly and serenely in the temple of the ancient masters. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were great composers before Brahms and Wagner.



WORCESTER.

FRIDAY, Dec. 29, 1893.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Admirable Performance of Brahms' Work—Mrs. Emil Paur, Soloist.

The size of the audience that listened to the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall last night was no particular indication that Worcester is a "musical city." The promptness with which it applauded the symphony, however, was sure proof that the people knew good music and good playing when they heard them combined. Such unequivocal approbation of Brahms is rather phenomenal in a provincial city. The full program was:

Johannes Brahms.....Symphony No. 1
E minor, op. 68.
Franz Schubert......"Wanderer,"
Grand fantasia in C, op. 15.
(Symphonically rearranged for piano and orchestra by F. Liszt.
Soloist, Mrs. Emil Paur.
Camille Saint-Saens....."Rouet d'Omphale,"
Hector Berlioz..Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony was wonderfully clear and beautiful. Under such careful interpretation the music seemed as perspicuous as Beethoven—one can hardly say Haydn even in this case. Since Schumann proclaimed Brahms as the long-awaited giant in music, and since Von Bulow said, "At last we have a tenth symphony," there have been sporadic revolts against this ponderous genius, yet it is even now about all one's musical reputation is worth to doubt Brahms openly. The heretical tendency is strongly implanted, however, and it must be confessed, though with appropriate apology, that the meaning of Brahms' first symphony was never conclusively expressed to some of us till Mr. Paur made it plain. There are many who would describe Brahms' music as Pope, or Dr. Johnson or somebody else described Chaucer's Canterbury Tales: so much labor and pains are required to get at the beauty of the poetry that there is little pleasure in it.

Mrs. Paur, who made her Worcester debut last night, is a good, but certainly not a great, pianist. She has acquired her husband's art of clear phrasing, his refinement, his painstaking care and his accuracy, but her style is not characterized by largeness and breadth, or her execution by power, or by especial delicacy. Enthusiasm and "temperament" cannot be her boast. Hers is the music box style of playing, that would not be criticised by a music master, but would fail to move an audience. Curiously enough, the orchestral arrangement of the "Wanderer fantasy" is quite as much Chopin as Liszt. The arranger seems to have made it prosaic rather than flashy. Mrs. Paur was recalled after her performance, but did not play again.

Saint Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" is not the sort of music in which Mr. Paur appears to best advantage. His method deprives it both of continuity and of lightness. The grace and prettiness that Mr. Nikish used to put into it were wanting. That is not to say that there was no pleasure in the work, for there was much. Saint Saens wrote it. The orchestra played the Berlioz overture with much dash, a sharp eye for the clock and an open ear for their approaching railway train. This concert was longer than the first and might have been shortened to advantage. But the brilliancy of "Benvenuto Cellini" brought out enthusiastic applause, and it may be said that the response of the audience was spontaneous throughout the evening.

The next concert will be given Tuesday evening, Jan. 30.

[61]

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 28, 1893.

BOSTON.

Mr. Paur gave a capital programme at the "Symphonies" this week.

The leader was familiar with his subject, for the works performed were those that first made him a popular leader abroad.

That some of his listeners were tired before the concert ended, goes without saying, but it was the fatigue caused by intense, absorbed attention to a thoroughly interesting concert.

First, we had the Beethoven symphony (No. 1, In C major, Op. 21). Clearly in the writer's best manner, as regards maturity of style and largeness of development. And how wonderfully he grew from work to work after this time!

One feels a little like quoting Berlioz's words, but with an apology for temerity. The composition is by turn, clear, lively, sometimes lacking accent, cold, even trivial—as for instance in the final rondo. Still Beethoven's peculiar charm, his unfailing sense of beauty are displayed throughout.

Such keen discrimination as is possessed by an experienced orchestra must always influence the interpretation of the most subtle effects, and no one can reasonably expect the players to enjoy or admire this symphony as much as his later works; still there is evident a repose, a confidence in such great creations, that lends to the ensemble a distinct charm. Mr. Paur deserves unqualified praise for his reading, and there was an absence of any striving after sensational effects, that made one respect this excellent musician most heartily.

Next on the programme came Serenade No. 7, in D major (Halfner Serenade), by Mozart. This work, which in the original reads: "Serenade, No. 7, for two violins, viola, bass, two oboes (two flutes), two bassoons, two horns and two trumpets," was composed at Salzburg for the wedding of Elizabeth Haffner, July 21, 1776; in eight movements—the fifth, sixth and seventh of which were omitted at this concert.

Such works were often composed for special occasions, such as balls, suppers, weddings, private concerts and birth-days, and sometimes they were intended as serenades, to be performed in the open air. It is probable that they were not often played continuously, and were not strictly concert music; so it stands to reason that such lengthy compositions are not heard at their best under present conditions. This serenade by Mozart is perhaps the most deservedly popular of all such works of the time at which it was written. The violin obligato gives it an added element of grace and popularity.

The playing of the orchestra was here again all that could be desired, and Mr. Kneizel's obligato was exquisitely done. His tone was warm and his phrasing never once lost that delicacy and finish without which Mozart would suffer more than many another composer.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and contributed concerto for pianoforte, No, 4, in G. Major, Op. 58, and cadenzas of his own.

His playing, though showing the thorough and conscientious artist, loses in effect through his over-precise, stilted manner. He has been much criticised for his playing of Beethoven, but I find far more to admire than to condemn—with the one exception I have named. My choice, were I permitted to have one, would be, more of Mr. Baermann's precision and less of the license and vulgar display of many another artist. His cadenzas struck me as remarkably happy in color, and expressive of the work they were designed to embellish.

An excellent performance of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, in C major, Op. 28, ended this noteworthy concert.

BALTIMORE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has paid its second visit to Baltimore, but I am afraid there was more of a feeling of disappointment after the second concert than after the first. Firstly, the programme was altogether modern, Rubenstein, Brahms and Smetana, only one classical composition, the Beethoven violin concerto, and that only in part. Secondly, the orchestra did not seem in sympathy with its conductor; that feeling of one heart, one soul, that extends its charm even over the listeners, was lacking, and however finished and careful the phrasing may have been, the rending was purely subjective; it was Paur's heavy, unmagnetic personality that pervaded the entire Rubinstein symphony, which under Rubinstein's baton is transformed into a composition full of grace, spirit and animation.

Franz Kneisel played the first movement of the Beethoven concerto exquisitely. His tone is not strong, but it is wonderfully sweet, and his technique is flawless; a more perfect cantabile could not be imagined. Our enjoyment would have been complete had he played the entire concerto, and not only one movement.

Worcester Telegram

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1893.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY.

Emil Paur and His Wife Add to Their Laurels.

The second concert by the Boston symphony orchestra was given last night, in Mechanics hall, and it is somewhat of a reflection on Worcester's musical taste that the event should have been patronized by a rather meager audience. The people who were present were in no respect lacking in appreciation or enthusiasm, but the slim attendance belied the boast that the educative influences of recent years have brought Worcester to be considered an intensely musical city.

The Boston symphony orchestra has few rivals in all America, and there is scarcely a body of instruments in the country its superior. It has steadily improved, too, year by year, until, under its present conductor, Emil Paur, it has reached a point of perfection never before attained. Last night's concert deepened the impression that Mr. Paur is able to get a great deal more out of his forces than any leader who preceded him. He has the faculty of compelling his men to produce the best that is in them. Nothing escapes his eye. It sweeps every corner of the stage. And even the twitch of his finger, or the movement of an eyelash, will mellow an expression, tone down a cadence, inspire the timid with confidence—all done so quietly and unostentatiously that the influence of the master is only felt, not seen.

Prominence is given to Mr. Paur's individuality at these symphony concerts, because the man and his methods are outstanding features of the orchestra wherever they appear. He has effected a sort of a revolution among the instruments since he took hold of them, and this is noticed especially in the increased earnestness, vigor and precision with which the musicians attack their work.

The program at the concert last night was an extremely interesting one, traveling as it did, over such a widely different range of composers as Brahms, Schubert, Saint-Saens and Berlioz. Brahms' symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68, was the great work of the composer's life time. If Brahms had never penned another note, the symphony with its four movements would have ranked him forever among the classics. Its performance by the orchestra last evening soared above criticism except the criticism of adulation.

The musical taste of the audience was, however, better pleased by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's spinning wheel" in A major, op. 31, the dainty movements of which were presented with exquisite delicacy and refinement. Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," was altogether in a different strain. It was full of surprising but none the less delightful climaxes, all of which were led up to and surmounted in a masterly, confident way by the orchestra. Nor must the delightful and sympathetic way in which the themes between these climaxes were treated be lost sight of, while the finale was a perfect whirlwind of glorious melody, that provoked the most enthusiastic applause.

An extremely interesting feature of the concert was Mrs. Paur's appearance as piano soloist. She chose for her introduction to a Worcester audience Schubert's fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), op 15, symphonically rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt, and she received a very cordial greeting as she stepped to the keyboard. Her performance, distinguished as it was by delicacy of touch, clean, clever execution, with lots of latent power, was received with such uproarious applause that the lady had to return to the platform and bow her acknowledgment.

The third concert in the series will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, January 30th.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: "American" symphony, Dvorak; Concerto for violin, Beethoven; Overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky. There was a large audience, and the chief interest was in the new symphony. We may state at the outset that never has the orchestra acquitted itself more brilliantly than it did on this occasion; and we may add that since Mr. Paur's advent here, never did he give such convincing evidence of his skill and power as a conductor as he vouchsafed at this concert. He made it perfectly clear that he is the right man in the right place, and though we may quarrel with him, now and then, for a certain over-elaborations in his readings of the older masters, there can be no question that he has his orchestra under complete control, and that it has never played better than it has under his direction. Under no previous conductor has it achieved finer results than attended its performances last night, and decidedly no such splendid orchestral playing has been given by the organization, for at least three years, as was heard on this occasion. Technically, the orchestra is up to the very highest point it has reached, and Mr. Paur should receive full credit for the certainty and the rapidity with which he has restored and improved its efficiency. The symphony is a genial work, abundant in graceful melody; is perfectly clear on a first hearing, and is, on the whole, the most interesting of its composer's works in kind. That it is American in any sense, or that it would be suspected as typifying anything American, musical or otherwise, without its suggestive title, we do not believe. In fact, though there is less of the Bohemian color in this music that there is in Dvorak's other compositions, its character is, nevertheless, indicative of the composer's nationality. It is understood that he saturated himself with the songs of the Southern negroes, and that his themes in this work are founded on them; but there is nothing in the symphony that evidences this. Now and then there is a fragment of rhythm that recalls a bit of some long-forgotten "Christy melody," but on the whole it has a thoroughly old-world flavor. The opening adagio is very beautiful, very impressive and is lovely in its orchestral color, but it is genuine Dvorak in conception and treatment. The allegro that follows is fascinating in its gay flow, its brightness, the grace of its themes, but it has nothing that is essentially American in color. In fact, it is not possible that it should have, for we have no music that can be called distinctively American; nothing that is to be singled out as national in style, no peculiar turn that can be recognized as smacking of the soil in the sense that we can say that this or that tune in English, or French, or Italian, or German, or Scandanavian; nothing that carries the mark of its nationality on it as the mark is borne by a Scotch or an Irish tune. It is clear then that Mr. Dvorak's symphony must be judged from a purely musical standpoint and without reference to a national color that it cannot possess. The slow movement is founded on a broad and charming theme, and is full of poetic feeling. It is somewhat over long, and here and there are some dry and labored moments, but its interest is admirably sustained to the end. The scherzo is, from beginning to close, Dvorak, pure and simple! It is frolicsome, bizarre in harmonies and orchestral effects, and fairly astonishing in its vivacity; but is is redolent of Bohemia. The finale is a marvel of ingenuity, as far as construction is concerned; its fire is overwhelming; and as it approaches its close the composer rises to an exciting power that has not been surpassed, if equalled, by any modern musician. Its passion is immense; but it is Scalvonic passion, not without a touch of genuine Wagnerism. Its only suggestion of America being a remote and exceedingly vague suggestion of "Yankee Doodle," which, after all, is no more nor less than a perversion of an English tune known as "Kitty Fisher's Hornpipe." Of the workmanship of the symphony too much cannot be said in the way of admiration. The work, which was received with great admiration, is delightful in its tunefulness, its frankness, its freedom from unmeaning pedantry, its effect of spontaneity and freshness, its healthy tone. Its orchestration throughout is fascinating in its richness, its brilliancy and its well ordered variety of effect. That it will become one of the composer's most popular works seems inevitable; but it will be because of its musical worth and not because it does or does not typify anything American. Some day or other the American symphony will doubtless be written, but when that feat is accomplished it is not likely that it will be by a foreigner thoroughly impregnated with the folk-song of his native land, no heed how much a master of his art he may be. The Tschaikowsky Overture is scarcely worth discussing seriously. In Russia, it doubtless may seem a fitting and a stirring tribute to the triumph of that country over France; but, listened to without any sentiment of patriotism, it is a barbarous jargon of noise; an apotheosis of drum banging, and a glorification of musical sensationalism generally. The ear-deafening close of the work is almost comical in its blatant earthquakiness of effect. However, the audience went fairly wild over it. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who gave an exceedingly finished and elegant, if not a very virile, performance of the violin concerto. He was applauded with great enthusiasm, and was three times recalled. The programme for the next concert is to be devoted entirely to Wagner, with Madame Materna as the soloist.

"1812"

Dr. Dvorak has honored the Kneisel Quartet by presenting them a manuscript quartet in F-major, which will have its first public performance at the concert, to-morrow evening, in Chickering Hall. The other numbers of the programme are the Piano Quartet in G-minor, Brahms; Quintet in C-major, op. 29, Beethoven. The Quartet will have the assistance of Mr. Busoni and Mr. Zach.

THE [illegible] OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Remarkable Programme Given Last Evening.

There have been some patrons of the Symphony concerts who have mildly protested against the selections made by Conductor Paur, asserting that he was rather prosaic in his ideas.

If such fault-finders were present last evening, they would have realized how unfounded were their accusations, for the programme was one the like of which has not been given at a Symphony concert in years.

And the effect on the audience was equally remarkable. Some idea may be formed when it is said that the listeners so far forgot their customary dignity at the close of the last number as to stand in their seats and lend their voices to the general applause.

The programme consisted of Dvorak's latest symphony, "From the New World;" Tschaikowsky's overture "1812," both of which pieces were heard for the first time in this city, and Beethoven's concerto for the violin in D major.

The recent production of Dvorak's work in New York was doubtless heard by many who were at the concert last evening. The composition has created widespread comment in musical circles, for it is claimed to be the first step in the formation of a new American school.

When Dr. Dvorak first came to America to take charge of the National Conservatory of Music in New York, he made the bold statement that the future music of this country must be founded on the negro melodies, which he claimed were the product of the American soil.

He believed that there was ample foundation in the varied themes of negro folk songs for the development of serious and worthy compositions, and to demonstrate this fact he proceeded to compose a symphony on these lines, resulting in the work which was heard last evening.

To many the idea of a negro melody is based upon the songs heard during the past two generations, sung by the so-called negro minstrels, sometimes termed "the burnt cork fraternity." But this is not the negro melody to which Dr. Dvorak referred. He went much deeper.

He took the songs of the pure Southern negro, the South American negro and the Spanish creole, and from them evolved a work which, if it may not please the classically musical ear, is certainly most unique.

His symphony is written in four movements, and is scored for the full modern orchestra. The first movement opens boldly and immediately enters upon the first theme, which is a rather weird air, taken up by the different instruments and developed over and over, until it becomes a trifle monotonous.

It is a theme which lingers in the memory and has a familiar sound, especially to those who have ever visited the South and listened to the religious incantations of the negroes. The kettle drum is conspicuous, frequently brought in as a tom-tom, and the whole is ultimately elaborated.

The larghetto began with the clarinet, which was soon followed by the muted strings; the second phrase taken by the flute and supported by the strings, returning at last to the first theme of the movement. Here, too, the kettle drum figured prominently, the air being in a slow, mournful strain of a barbaric, religious nature.

The third movement was almost rollicking and of the Spanish type, suggesting castanets and tambourines with more touches from the kettle drum and also the triangle.

The last movement was a sort of recapitulation of the whole symphony and was elaborately worked out, one phrase suggesting a cake walk to the sacreligious. The termination was peculiar and almost abrupt.

The composition was highly interesting from its uniqueness, but it is doubtful if it will come to be recognized as a standard work or that it will encourage further writing in this direction. At no time was the music lofty or inspiring, and, beyond its oddity and the cleverness of the development, there was little to commend it.

Franz Kneisel was the soloist in the Beethoven concerto, and rendered the intricate piece with rare skill. He played with great expression, and his execution in the cadenzas was wonderful.

The overture "1812" took the audience completely by surprise. The work commemorates the repulse of Napoleon in his attempt to invade Russia in 1812, and is a descriptive composition.

It is scored for a full orchestra, bells, cannon and a brass band, the two latter features being omitted, although the clanging bells were heard.

The overture opens with a stately Russian hymn carried for some length, only to introduce a quieter passage, which becomes more vigorous, until it breaks into a climax, ending in an odd movement which has the sound of a Russian folk song.

A martial theme is then developed in which are heard fragments of the Marseillaise, representing the advance of the French. A more subdued movement sets in, only to be followed by the full orchestra in a perfect roar, in which the Marseillaise is again heard, and with a crash the Russian hymn of the opening is again resumed and the overture closes with the folk song, played in full force by the entire orchestra, bells and brass drums.

The effect of these musical pyrotechnics on the audience was startling, and the spectators at once showed how little they were accustomed to that sort of thing.

The enthusiasm seemed to inspire the members of the orchestra, for the whole programme was most ably rendered and given with unusual spirit and force. It is sincerely to be hoped that both the Dvorak symphony and the "1812" overture will be heard again this season.

The rehearsal and concert the coming week will be a Wagner programme, and the soloist will be Mme. Materna.

[62]

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 28, 1893.

BOSTON.

Mr. Paur gave a capital programme at the "Symphonies" this week.

The leader was familiar with his subject, for the works performed were those that first made him a popular leader abroad.

That some of his listeners were tired before the concert ended, goes without saying, but it was the fatigue caused by intense, absorbed attention to a thoroughly interesting concert.

First, we had the Beethoven symphony (No. 1, In C major, Op. 21). Clearly in the writer's best manner, as regards maturity of style and largeness of development. And how wonderfully he grew from work to work after this time!

One feels a little like quoting Berlioz's words, but with an apology for temerity. The composition is by turn, clear, lively, sometimes lacking accent, cold, even trivial—as for instance in the final rondo. Still Beethoven's peculiar charm, his unfailing sense of beauty are displayed throughout.

Such keen discrimination as is possessed by an experienced orchestra must always influence the interpretation of the most subtle effects, and no one can reasonably expect the players to enjoy or admire this symphony as much as his later works; still there is evident a repose, a confidence in such great creations, that lends to the ensemble a distinct charm. Mr. Paur deserves unqualified praise for his reading, and there was an absence of any striving after sensational effects, that made one respect this excellent musician most heartily.

Next on the programme came Serenade No. 7, in D major (Halfner Serenade), by Mozart. This work, which in the original reads: "Serenade, No. 7, for two violins, viola, bass, two oboes (two flutes), two bassoons, two horns and two trumpets," was composed at Salzburg for the wedding of Elizabeth Haffner, July 21, 1776; in eight movements—the fifth, sixth and seventh of which were omitted at this concert.

Such works were often composed for special occasions, such as balls, suppers, weddings, private concerts and birth-days, and sometimes they were intended as serenades, to be performed in the open air. It is probable that they were not often played continuously, and were not strictly concert music; so it stands to reason that such lengthy compositions are not heard at their best under present conditions. This serenade by Mozart is perhaps the most deservedly popular of all such works of the time at which it was written. The violin obligato gives it an added element of grace and popularity.

The playing of the orchestra was here again all that could be desired, and Mr. Kneizel's obligato was exquisitely done. His tone was warm and his phrasing never once lost that delicacy and finish without which Mozart would suffer more than many another composer.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist, and contributed concerto for pianoforte, No, 4, in G. Major, Op. 58, and cadenzas of his own.

His playing, though showing the thorough and conscientious artist, loses in effect through his over-precise, stilted manner. He has been much criticised for his playing of Beethoven, but I find far more to admire than to condemn—with the one exception I have named. My choice, were I permitted to have one, would be, more of Mr. Baermann's precision and less of the license and vulgar display of many another artist. His cadenzas struck me as remarkably happy in color, and expressive of the work they were designed to embellish.

An excellent performance of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture, in C major, Op. 28, ended this noteworthy concert.

BALTIMORE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has paid its second visit to Baltimore, but I am afraid there was more of a feeling of disappointment after the second concert than after the first. Firstly, the programme was altogether modern, Rubenstein, Brahms and Smetana, only one classical composition, the Beethoven violin concerto, and that only in part. Secondly, the orchestra did not seem in sympathy with its conductor; that feeling of one heart, one soul, that extends its charm even over the listeners, was lacking, and however finished and careful the phrasing may have been, the rending was purely subjective; it was Paur's heavy, unmagnetic personality that pervaded the entire Rubinstein symphony, which under Rubinstein's baton is transformed into a composition full of grace, spirit and animation.

Franz Kneisel played the first movement of the Beethoven concerto exquisitely. His tone is not strong, but it is wonderfully sweet, and his technique is flawless; a more perfect cantabile could not be imagined. Our enjoyment would have been complete had he played the entire concerto, and not only one movement.

Worcester Telegram

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1893.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY.

Emil Paur and His Wife Add to Their Laurels.

The second concert by the Boston symphony orchestra was given last night, in Mechanics hall, and it is somewhat of a reflection on Worcester's musical taste that the event should have been patronized by a rather meager audience. The people who were present were in no respect lacking in appreciation or enthusiasm, but the slim attendance belied the boast that the educative influences of recent years have brought Worcester to be considered an intensely musical city.

The Boston symphony orchestra has few rivals in all America, and there is scarcely a body of instruments in the country its superior. It has steadily improved, too, year by year, until, under its present conductor, Emil Paur, it has reached a point of perfection never before attained. Last night's concert deepened the impression that Mr. Paur is able to get a great deal more out of his forces than any leader who preceded him. He has the faculty of compelling his men to produce the best that is in them. Nothing escapes his eye. It sweeps every corner of the stage. And even the twitch of his finger, or the movement of an eyelash, will mellow an expression, tone down a cadence, inspire the timid with confidence—all done so quietly and unostentatiously that the influence of the master is only felt, not seen.

Prominence is given to Mr. Paur's individuality at these symphony concerts, because the man and his methods are outstanding features of the orchestra wherever they appear. He has effected a sort of a revolution among the instruments since he took hold of them, and this is noticed especially in the increased earnestness, vigor and precision with which the musicians attack their work.

The program at the concert last night was an extremely interesting one, traveling as it did, over such a widely different range of composers as Brahms, Schubert, Saint-Saens and Berlioz. Brahms' symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68, was the great work of the composer's life time. If Brahms had never penned another note, the symphony with its four movements would have ranked him forever among the classics. Its performance by the orchestra last evening soared above criticism except the criticism of adulation.

The musical taste of the audience was, however, better pleased by Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's spinning wheel" in A major, op. 31, the dainty movements of which were presented with exquisite delicacy and refinement. Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," was altogether in a different strain. It was full of surprising but none the less delightful climaxes, all of which were led up to and surmounted in a masterly, confident way by the orchestra. Nor must the delightful and sympathetic way in which the themes between these climaxes were treated be lost sight of, while the finale was a perfect whirlwind of glorious melody, that provoked the most enthusiastic applause.

An extremely interesting feature of the concert was Mrs. Paur's appearance as piano soloist. She chose for her introduction to a Worcester audience Schubert's fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), op 15, symphonically rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Liszt, and she received a very cordial greeting as she stepped to the keyboard. Her performance, distinguished as it was by delicacy of touch, clean, clever execution, with lots of latent power, was received with such uproarious applause that the lady had to return to the platform and bow her acknowledgment.

The third concert in the series will be given in Mechanics hall on Tuesday evening, January 30th.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: "American" symphony, Dvorak; Concerto for violin, Beethoven; Overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky. There was a large audience, and the chief interest was in the new symphony. We may state at the outset that never has the orchestra acquitted itself more brilliantly than it did on this occasion; and we may add that since Mr. Paur's advent here, never did he give such convincing evidence of his skill and power as a conductor as he vouchsafed at this concert. He made it perfectly clear that he is the right man in the right place, and though we may quarrel with him, now and then, for a certain over-elaborations in his readings of the older masters, there can be no question that he has his orchestra under complete control, and that it has never played better than it has under his direction. Under no previous conductor has it achieved finer results than attended its performances last night, and decidedly no such splendid orchestral playing has been given by the organization, for at least three years, as was heard on this occasion. Technically, the orchestra is up to the very highest point it has reached, and Mr. Paur should receive full credit for the certainty and the rapidity with which he has restored and improved its efficiency. The symphony is a genial work, abundant in graceful melody; is perfectly clear on a first hearing, and is, on the whole, the most interesting of its composer's works in kind. That it is American in any sense, or that it would be suspected as typifying anything American, musical or otherwise, without its suggestive title, we do not believe. In fact, though there is less of the Bohemian color in this music that there is in Dvorak's other compositions, its character is, nevertheless, indicative of the composer's nationality. It is understood that he saturated himself with the songs of the Southern negroes, and that his themes in this work are founded on them; but there is nothing in the symphony that evidences this. Now and then there is a fragment of rhythm that recalls a bit of some long-forgotten "Christy melody," but on the whole it has a thoroughly old-world flavor. The opening adagio is very beautiful, very impressive and is lovely in its orchestral color, but it is genuine Dvorak in conception and treatment. The allegro that follows is fascinating in its gay flow, its brightness, the grace of its themes, but it has nothing that is essentially American in color. In fact, it is not possible that it should have, for we have no music that can be called distinctively American; nothing that is to be singled out as national in style, no peculiar turn that can be recognized as smacking of the soil in the sense that we can say that this or that tune in English, or French, or Italian, or German, or Scandanavian; nothing that carries the mark of its nationality on it as the mark is borne by a Scotch or an Irish tune. It is clear then that Mr. Dvorak's symphony must be judged from a purely musical standpoint and without reference to a national color that it cannot possess. The slow movement is founded on a broad and charming theme, and is full of poetic feeling. It is somewhat over long, and here and there are some dry and labored moments, but its interest is admirably sustained to the end. The scherzo is, from beginning to close, Dvorak, pure and simple! It is frolicsome, bizarre in harmonics and orchestral effects, and fairly astonishing in its vivacity; but is is redolent of Bohemia. The finale is a marvel of ingenuity, as far as construction is concerned; its fire is overwhelming; and as it approaches its close the composer rises to an exciting power that has not been surpassed, if equalled, by any modern musician. Its passion is immense; but it is Scalvonic passion, not without a touch of genuine Wagnerism, its only suggestion of America being a remote and exceedingly vague suggestion of "Yankee Doodle," which, after all, is no more nor less than a perversion of an English tune known as "Kitty Fisher's Hornpipe." Of the workmanship of the symphony too much cannot be said in the way of admiration. The work, which was received with great admiration, is, delightful in its tunefulness, its frankness, its freedom from unmeaning pedantry, its effect of spontaneity and freshness, its healthy tone. Its orchestration throughout is fascinating in its richness, its brilliancy and its well ordered variety of effect. That it will become one of the composer's most popular works seems inevitable; but it will be because of its musical worth and not because it does or does not typify anything American. Some day or other the American symphony will doubtless be written, but when that feat is accomplished it is not likely that it will be by a foreigner thoroughly impregnated with the folk-song of his native land, no heed how much a master of his art he may be. The Tschaikowsky Overture is scarcely worth discussing seriously. In Russia, it doubtless may seem a fitting and a stirring tribute to the triumph of that country over France; but, listened to without any sentiment of patriotism, it is a barbarous jargon of noise; an apotheosis of drum banging, and a glorification of musical sensationalism generally. The ear-deafening close of the work is almost comical in its blatant earthquakiness of effect. However, the audience went fairly wild over it. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who gave an exceedingly finished and elegant, if not a very virile, performance of the violin concerto. He was applauded with great enthusiasm, and was three times recalled. The programme for the next concert is to be devoted entirely to Wagner, with Madame Materna as the soloist.

"1812"

Dr. Dvorak has honored the Kneisel Quartet by presenting them a manuscript quartet in F-major, which will have its first public performance at the concert, to-morrow evening, in Chickering Hall. The other numbers of the programme are the Piano Quartet in G-minor, Brahms; Quintet in C-major, op. 29, Beethoven. The Quartet will have the assistance of Mr. Busoni and Mr. Zach.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1893.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Remarkable Programme Given Last Evening.

There have been some patrons of the Symphony concerts who have mildly protested against the selections made by Conductor Paur, asserting that he was rather prosaic in his ideas.

If such fault-finders were present last evening, they would have realized how unfounded were their accusations, for the programme was one the like of which has not been given at a Symphony concert in years.

And the effect on the audience was equally remarkable. Some idea may be formed when it is said that the listeners so far forgot their customary dignity at the close of the last number as to stand in their seats and lend their voices to the general applause.

The programme consisted of Dvorak's latest symphony, "From the New World;" Tschaikowsky's overture "1812," both of which pieces were heard for the first time in this city, and Beethoven's concerto for the violin in D major.

The recent production of Dvorak's work in New York was doubtless heard by many who were at the concert last evening. The composition has created widespread comment in musical circles, for it is claimed to be the first step in the formation of a new American school.

When Dr. Dvorak first came to America to take charge of the National Conservatory of Music in New York, he made the bold statement that the future music of this country must be founded on the negro melodies, which he claimed were the product of the American soil.

He believed that there was ample foundation in the varied themes of negro folk songs for the development of serious and worthy compositions, and to demonstrate this fact he proceeded to compose a symphony on these lines, resulting in the work which was heard last evening.

To many the idea of a negro melody is based upon the songs heard during the past two generations, sung by the so-called negro minstrels, sometimes termed "the burnt cork fraternity." But this is not the negro melody to which Dr. Dvorak referred. He went much deeper.

He took the songs of the pure Southern negro, the South American negro and the Spanish creole, and from them evolved a work which, if it may not please the classically musical ear, is certainly most unique.

His symphony is written in four movements, and is scored for the full modern orchestra. The first movement opens boldly and immediately enters upon the first theme, which is a rather weird air, taken up by the different instruments and developed over and over, until it becomes a trifle monotonous.

It is a theme which lingers in the memory and has a familiar sound, especially to those who have ever visited the South and listened to the religious incantations of the negroes. The kettle drum is conspicuous, frequently brought in as a tom-tom, and the whole is ultimately elaborated.

The larghetto began with the clarinet, which was soon followed by the muted strings; the second phrase taken by the flute and supported by the strings, returning at last to the first theme of the movement. Here, too, the kettle drum figured prominently, the air being in a slow, mournful strain of a barbaric, religious nature.

The third movement was almost rollicking and of the Spanish type, suggesting castanets and tambourines with more touches from the kettle drum and also the triangle.

The last movement was a sort of recapitulation of the whole symphony and was elaborately worked out, one phrase suggesting a cake walk to the sacreligious. The termination was peculiar and almost abrupt.

The composition was highly interesting from its uniqueness, but it is doubtful if it will come to be recognized as a standard work or that it will encourage further writing in this direction. At no time was the music lofty or inspiring, and, beyond its oddity and the cleverness of the development, there was little to commend it.

Franz Kneisel was the soloist in the Beethoven concerto, and rendered the intricate piece with rare skill. He played with great expression, and his execution in the cadenzas was wonderful.

The overture "1812" took the audience completely by surprise. The work commemorates the repulse of Napoleon in his attempt to invade Russia in 1812, and is a descriptive composition.

It is scored for a full orchestra, bells, cannon and a brass band, the two latter features being omitted, although the clanging bells were heard.

The overture opens with a stately Russian hymn carried for some length, only to introduce a quieter passage, which becomes more vigorous, until it breaks into a climax, ending in an odd movement which has the sound of a Russian folk song.

A martial theme is then developed in which are heard fragments of the Marseillaise, representing the advance of the French. A more subdued movement sets in, only to be followed by the full orchestra in a perfect roar, in which the Marseillaise is again heard, and with a crash the Russian hymn of the opening is again resumed and the overture closes with the folk song, played in full force by the entire orchestra, bells and brass drums.

The effect of these musical pyrotechnics on the audience was startling, and the spectators at once showed how little they were accustomed to that sort of thing.

The enthusiasm seemed to inspire the members of the orchestra, for the whole programme was most ably rendered and given with unusual spirit and force. It is sincerely to be hoped that both the Dvorak symphony and the "1812" overture will be heard again this season.

The rehearsal and concert the coming week will be a Wagner programme, and the soloist will be Mme. Materna.

[62]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1893.

The Tenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, E minor (MSS).....Dvorak
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Overture "1812".....Tschaikowsky

The question is not: Where did Dvorak find the thematic material for this new symphony? The question is this: What did Dvorak do with the material after he found or invented it? It is immaterial whether this symphony "From the New World" is American, Bohemian or Celtic. The question is this: Is the music good or bad?

***

Dvorak has here written a pleasing work, a work that abounds in melody, that shows the ingenuity of the trained musician, that is brilliant in color. It is a work that will undoubtedly be popular, and deservedly popular.

He has succeeded in the main task and he has thus won glory enough.

***

But what is all this wild talk about the invention at last of "American" music?

Here is an excellent Bohemian composer. He is imported by the patroness of a music school, and at considerable expense. His dwelling in our country is undoubtedly, in a certain sense, an honor to us. He suddenly makes the discovery that "American" music must be built on negro and Indian airs. He writes this symphony to prove his theory and found "American" music.

But let us ask a few questions.

If this symphony were played without any advance and explanatory notice in any European city, would a German, or Italian, or Russian, or Scot, or Frenchman say at once, "Why, this is American music!"

Would he not find any and all music but American?

Would he not find Scandinavian hints, Hungarian rhythm, Bohemian thought, Scotch melody: would he not find tributes to all nations; would he not admire the workmanship and leave the concert hall without a thought of negro, Indian or native born white citizen of the United States?

***

The rhythm of the first phrase of the first movement is partly suggestive of the Southern steamboat and the plantation; but the rhythm is also partly European. The larghetto is full of Scotch and Scandinavian suggestion. The scherzo is anything you please; but, this may be said, as an exhibition of American characteristics real or alleged, as a musical exhibition of dash, "smartness," lack of reverence, and general devil-me-care, it is not to be named in the same breath with Mr. Chadwick's symphonic scherzo. As for the finale, that, too, is what-you-will; there is a hint at "Yankee Doodle," but the temporary use of a transplanted tune does not make an "American" symphony.

Nor can you expect a Bohemian composer to throw off suddenly his nationality and forget it when he writes.

***

But there is much that is beautiful in this same symphony. First of all, it is cheerful and agreeable music. There is no touch of pessimism. There is no struggle with the Infinite. The composer has the simple faith of a healthy child. There is the spirit of Nature. There is a thought of woods and fields. Simple and pleasing thoughts are expressed intelligibly. At times the thoughts are clad gorgeously in instrumental colors; but the beauty of the thoughts does not suffer thereby, nor is it puffed up or distorted. After one hearing, the slow movement seems to me the gem of the work.

***

The overture of Tschaikowsky abounds in "alarums within and without." The plaintive church hymn is at first frightened by the triumphant Marseillaise, but the French conquer only for a moment. Cossacks scour the plain. There is the Russian General with the terrible name. There is the fire; there is the snow. The Marseillaise is heard no more. There is the exultation of a delivered nation. Such music as this overture of Tschaikowsky is perhaps panoramic, or even cycloramic. It would not do as a weekly dose. But it is a good thing to hear such music once in a while, to have the pulse stirred, to feel the consciousness of the raging animal that is in the body of even the most smug and exemplary citizen, although he may not know it.

***

Mr. Kneisel played his part in the concerto by Beethoven with infinite care and taste. The fine characteristics of his performance have always received full praise in this city. While it is only justice to this admirable violinist to praise, at length, his accuracy, his usually faultless intonation, his elegance and general finish, it may also be said that his temperament is such that he does not appear to complete advantage in such a work as the Beethoven concerto, which demands a player of more heroic mold.

***

The playing of the orchestra was excellent. Mr. Paur conducted with authority, sympathy and skill. The program was too long. The second and third movements, or at least the third movement of the concerto, might well have been omitted.

PHILIP HALE.

Sonnabend, den 23. Dezember 1893.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester hat mit dem dritten Konzert neue Triumphe gefeiert. Als eine Klavierspielerin erster Klasse präsentirte sich Frau Paur durch die treffliche Wiedergabe von Schubert's Fantasie in C-dur. Ueberaus klare Phrasirung und innige Auffassung sind die Hauptvorzüge ihres Spiels. Herr Emil Paur dirigirte.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DEC. 31,

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

First Performance in Boston of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony—Other Harmonic Happenings.

Last night's symphony concert audience had the pleasure of listening to the first performance in this city of Antonin Dvorak's symphony "The New World." Much interest has been taken in this work, as it is the first important composition by Dvorak since he has become a resident of this country, and one which it was promised would prove the foundation for a school of music to be distinctly characteristic of American folk songs.

Mr Dvorak came to this country about a year and a half ago, and it was shortly after his arrival here that he announced his intention of writing the symphony heard yesterday. It was generally understood that he intended to construct his "New World Symphony" out of negro and Indian melodies on the supposition that this is the only style of music native to the new world. A good many people had believed, and probably do still believe, that there is no folk music in America, that what passes for such is an imported article, and in no sense characteristic of the section of the country or the class of people it is supposed to represent.

Mr Dvorak maintained that there was American folk music, if not that of the whole people, yet expressive of certain distinct phases of American life, climate, domestic conditions and historical events. From this folk music he believed that the American school of music must draw its inspiration, so began his task of writing an American symphony.

It seems to have been a delusion to suppose that Mr Dvorak intended to build his symphony on melodies such as "Down on the Swanee River" and "Yankee Doodle," which are popularly accepted as the nearest approach to American folk songs. He meant to go further back than the birth of these songs, in other words, to the original music of the new world.

With full knowledge of these intentions on the part of Mr Dvorak yesterday's audience gave rapt attention to the performance of the symphony and waited expectantly for the appearance of melodies characteristic of America. It is fair to presume that these expectations were not generally fulfilled.

Indeed, to be honest, it must be said that were it not for the title one would not be inclined to suppose that this symphony was any more characteristic of America than of France, Germany, Ireland or the South Sea islands.

"But the "New World" symphony is a magnificent composition. Whether or not it is American in character it is certainly the grandest symphony yet written in this country. Its performance was a genuine delight, and the audience expressed its pleasure in a manner that was cordial far beyond custom.

The symphony is in four movements and written for the ordinary orchestra. It is a brilliant work from first to last and is full of melody and variety. The orchestral scoring is superb. Mr Dvorak has long been acknowledged a master of orchestration but he has done nothing better than his latest work.

The first movement, adagio, is suggestive of tremendous energy and vivacity; at times it is tragic and might very properly be considered as characteristic of the first savages of America or any other country.

The second, a slow movement, was received with the greatest favor. It is, indeed, an exquisite composition. The statement has been made that this movement of the symphony was written as the expression of certain moods found in American poetry and definitely embodied in Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

The scherzo is written in a forceful and effective manner, and is notable for its originality in treatment. The final movement is a grand climax of a splendid work.

An excellent performance was given the symphony under Mr Paur's direction.

The Dvorak symphony was not, however, the only interesting feature of last night's concert. Beethoven's grand concerto for violin was admirably played by Mr Franz Kneisel. It is generally acknoledged that Mr Kneisel is entitled to the first rank among resident Boston violinists. His playing yesterday established his position yet more firmly. His greeting was demonstratively cordial, and there were half a dozen recalls when he had concluded the performance of the very difficult concerto.

The final number played by the orchestra was Tschaikowsky's overture, and the melodious work received satisfactory interpretation.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Prelude o "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg;" Vorstpiel und "Liebestod" (prelude and "Love-death"), from "Tristan und Isolde;" Siegfred idyl; a Faust overture; Siegfried's funeral march, from "Goetterdaemmerung;" Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung." Soloist, Mme Amalia Materna."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1893.

Dvorak's "American" symphony, first heard in public by the Philharmonic audience of New York, about a fortnight ago, had its second formal presentation at the Symphony concert last night. Since its author expressed his opinion that fit subjects for symphonic treatment might be found on this side of the Atlantic, curiosity and discussion have been busy,—now inquiring what he could possibly have meant, and now asserting that he must have meant this, that or the other. Of course the idea most frequently attributed to him was that either the "hoe-downs" and "spirituals" of the Southern negro or the mild, mellifluous melodies of Stephen Foster must supply the themes. So imagination expanded itself upon his own probable utilization of such material, while contempt elevated its nose at the thought of such trivialities and platitudes serving as the bases for even a modern and unclassical symphonic development. Nobody seems to have thought of a symbolic, aesthetic, poetic and psychical composition, designed to suggest to appreciative perception the broad moods and deep impressions induced in a sensitive and perhaps rhapsodical nature by the sight of a vast continent, a strange conglomeration of manifold human elements, a brief, eventful history, and a swift, vehement development whose chief tendencies and whose ultimate goal cannot yet be so much as divined.

This is what Dvorak presents us in the four movements of his superb and beautiful symphony. He has wrought it out with a fervor which can be felt and is manifested no less in tenderness than in might. He has clung close to the tradition and the form of the classic period and while his bold and diversified use of full instrumental means, his skill in scholastic contrasts and his artful evolutions and blendings of chief subjects and of subsidiary episodes will gratify and content the musician, the average auditor will find his thoughts simple and distinct and his exposition of them so lucid and natural that they are never lost in the mazes of phrase or obscured by the invention of counterpoint and technical figuration.

The symphony comes with no clue to its composer's feeling and intention and it will necessarily represent many things to its many listeners. Upon one point, however, will all agree—that its unity of spirit and its growth toward a logical and powerful conclusion are remarkable and delightful. We may have our fancies with the rest of the public, and they shape themselves roughly thus, as they needs must after a single hearing: The first movement, opening with a short but potent and insistent adagio, and passing thence into the wild, emphatic accent which the folk songs and the popular dances of so many undeveloped nations show, suggests the free, urgent, irregular and vigorous life of primitive peoples, with whom energy, courage and a narrow range were qualified by some rhythmic sense and some imaginative fancy. The exquisitely placid larghetto, which will make itself at home at once in every susceptible being, suggests the vast and almost void expanse of nature—smooth, wide, still lakes; rivers calm in their strong flow; savannahs and prairies lying lone and silent; forests and mountains motionless and grave; in a word a whole land waiting for its possessor. The scherzo is instinct with a lively vitality which might imply the curiosity, the surprise and the pleasure of the discoverer, while the half-martial character of its trio could stand for pride and hope in the assumption of ownership, as the quaint beat of an under theme would intimate that the native denizen is still an element to be considered. The final allegro is immensely active and abundantly opulent in confidence, aspiration and determination, as if representative of great achievement and constant ambition.

The musical unity of the work is patent, as has been said, and the kind of feeling set in the first theme, with its clear cut phraseology, is maintained to the close, not only in the temper, but in the turns of expression. Yet this state of mind is not monotonous and its digressions, diversions and episodes are many and make themselves apparent now in devices of orchestration and now in secondary thoughts and side issues, as when one recognizes a bit of "Yankee Doodle" threading itself into the the inner tissues of the last movement.

There was another new work on the programme—Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, which signifies the attempt of Napoleon to conquer his way to the heart of Russia and his defeat in that herculean but impossible attempt. The sturdy, unconquerable, ponderous Russia is represented by the large, steady and solid introduction; then comes the conflict of France, as suggested in the Marseillaise against the hordes of Russian troops and the whirling, withering tempests of the turbulent writer; and finally over the broken fragments of the French song rises in amazing strength and splendor of triumph the Russian music which was heard at first so reserved and calm. Every possible orchestral instrument is used in this climax, and the composer even wanted cannon to help in the stupendous clangor.

The performance of these two works was splendid at all points. In the larghetto of the symphony Mr. Paur obtained piantissimi of which even Mr. Gericke might have been proud, while in the overture he evoked a tonality that lacked little of raising the roof.

Between these Mr. Kneisel played Beethoven's violin concerto to perfection in tone, style and detail of execution, and he had his full share of the enthusiastic and spontaneous applause which the whole programme elicited.

Next week's programme will be all Wagner, comprising the usual orchestral selections from the "Meistersinger," "Tristan" and the "Gotterdammerung," together with the "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyl." Mme. Materna will sing in the "Tristan" love music, and add Brunnhilde's lament over Siegfried.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[63]

VOL. LXIV. NO. 153.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Franz Kneisel.

Director Emil Pauer is to be sincerely thanked for his action in giving so early a hearing in this city of Dr. Dvorak's new symphony "Z Noveho Sveta" ("From the New World") which is still in manuscript, and had its first hearing only two weeks ago at the New York Philharmonic concert. It is not often that a work arouses so much criticism as this has on account of the pronounced views expressed by the composer soon after his arrival in America, to occupy his present position at the head of the National conservatory. It will be remembered that in a newspaper interview (which, it may be well to say in passing, correctly represented his views) Dr. Dvorak at that time expressed his opinion that the American folk songs had been singularly neglected by the composers in this country, and that in these native melodies could be found subjects worthy of symphonic treatment.

A great many writers have undertaken to explain what Dr. Dvorak meant in expressing these opinions, but no one has given such a satisfactory explanation as he himself has done in the symphony heard last evening.

It is doubtful if many musicians or music lovers in the North appreciate the native ability of the southern colored people for originating such melodies as form the basis of the folk songs of the northern nations of Europe. Those who visited Richmond and the large southern cities shortly after the war had the best opportunity of becoming acquainted with this peculiar faculty of the native southern darkey. In the large tobacco factories of these cities at that time could be found representatives of nearly all the southern states, and their custom of weaving together the tunes, with which they were familiar in their old southern homes, afforded to Northern visitors an unusual opportunity of becoming acquainted with the real negro music of the South.

In one of the big shops of Richmond at that time there existed a gang of some 20 darkies who had gained almost a national reputation for their skill in constructing these composite songs. Each one contributed to them and by constantly repeating them for their own gratification and that of their visitors they acquired a repertoire which gave this particular shop an enviable reputation throughout the South.

Dr. Dvorak has been singularly successful in portions of his symphony in catching the spirit of this class of southern melodies, and the first and second movements, an adagio and larghetto, are particularly suggestive of the music the northern visitors used to hear in their trips to Richmond. These two movements are by all odds the most interesting portions of the work—the scherzo and the final allegro being less interesting and having fewer of the characteristics which are naturally to be expected in such a symphony.

As a whole, however, the new work commands the warmest praise, and the fashion in which Dvorak has thrown down the gauntlet to the modern school of writers, and substituted tunes for harmonies, is a subject for sincere congratulation.

The work is of heroic proportions, and the masterly fashion in which the composer has treated his subjects cannot fail to impress any audience the world over. The beautiful themes which are made to reappear with such fascinating skill in the opening movement are well worthy the ornamental treatment given them, and there can be but one opinion regarding this portion of the work, and that one the highest praise for its ideas and construction.

The larghetto will attain the greater popularity doubtless on account of the singular beauty of the song upon which it is based, the melody being one easily memorized and recalled with rare satisfaction. In the marvellously ingenious orchestral combinations of this movement are shown the master's hand in the most unmistakable fashion and the weird character of the song gives a still further source of enjoyment to the hearer.

The scherzo is more in the familiar style of the composer than any other movement, and although it lacks the new idea of the preceding portions of the work, is vastly enjoyable. In the final movement the opening is so broadly dramatic that the expectation is raised to a pitch that is not fully justified by the remainder of the movement, and, by contrast, this is the least satisfactory portion of the symphony.

Mr. Paur gave the work his best efforts, and no composer could ask for better treatment than that which "From the New World" symphony got on this occasion. The audience were keenly alive to both the merits of the work and its performance, and gave evidence of their approval by as enthusiastic applause as has been bestowed upon any of the season's performances.

Following the symphony came the appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist in Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, opus 61. Familiar though this concerto is, and coming in such strong contrast with the new symphony, there was much to enjoy and heartily appreciate in the treatment given it by Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra on this occasion. When the soloist stepped to his place beside the leader's desk he was not left in doubt as to his popularity with the Symphony audiences, for the reception given him was one of which any artist might be proud. His playing was characterized by the same purity of tone and exquisite delicacy, he has at all times been noted for, and his merits were again rapturously applauded as he completed his task.

It was left for the famous overture by Tschaikowsky, "1812," to show what the new conductor is capable of in the class of compositions to which this belongs. There was a good deal of noise, but it was musical noise, and the effects were so grandly worked out by the men under Mr. Paur's baton that the audience was wrought to the highest pitch of excitement, and it only needed for the conductor to give them the signal to have had them join en masse in the "Marseillaise," which forms the basis for the grand climax of the composition. The instrumentation calls for about everything known in orchestral or military band combination. The ordinary instruments of strings, wind and percussion are re-enforced by triangles, bells, cannon, and probably musketry, and the amount of noise in the finale is limited only by the physical ability of the musicians engaged in its performance. Possibly the late lamented P. S. Gilmore could have done more with this show piece than Mr. Paur; but the audience were evidently satisfied with the effects produced in its performance, and not a little fun was caused by observing the vim with which the back row of the orchestra engaged in their duties. The gentleman who was made responsible for the cannon exercise to be congratulated more than [illegible]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1893.

The Tenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, E minor (MSS).....Dvorak
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Overture "1812".....Tschaikowsky

The question is not: Where did Dvorak find the thematic material for this new symphony?

The question is this: What did Dvorak do with the material after he found or invented it?

It is immaterial whether this symphony "From the New World" is American, Bohemian or Celtic. The question is this: Is the music good or bad?

***

Dvorak has here written a pleasing work, a work that abounds in melody, that shows the ingenuity of the trained musician, that is brilliant in color. It is a work that will undoubtedly be popular, and deservedly popular.

He has succeeded in the main task and he has thus won glory enough.

***

But what is all this wild talk about the invention at last of "American" music?

Here is an excellent Bohemian composer. He is imported by the patroness of a music school, and at considerable expense. His dwelling in our country is undoubtedly, in a certain sense, an honor to us. He suddenly makes the discovery that "American" music must be built on negro and Indian airs. He writes this symphony to prove his theory and found "American" music.

But let us ask a few questions.

If this symphony were played without any advance and explanatory notice in any European city, would a German, or Italian, or Russian, or Scot, or Frenchman say at once, "Why, this is American music!"

Would he not find any and all music but American?

Would he not find Scandinavian hints, Hungarian rhythm, Bohemian thought, Scotch melody; would he not find tributes to all nations; would he not admire the workmanship and leave the concert hall without a thought of negro, Indian or native born white citizen of the United States?

***

The rhythm of the first phrase of the first movement is partly suggestive of the Southern steamboat and the plantation; but the rhythm is also partly European. The larghetto is full of Scotch and Scandinavian suggestion. The scherzo is anything you please; but, this may be said, as an exhibition of American characteristics real or alleged, as a musical exhibition of dash, "smartness," lack of reverence, and general devil-me-care, it is not to be named in the same breath with Mr. Chadwick's symphonic scherzo. As for the finale, that, too, is what-you-will; there is a hint at "Yankee Doodle," but the temporary use of a transplanted tune does not make an "American" symphony.

Nor can you expect a Bohemian composer to throw off suddenly his nationality and forget it when he writes.

***

But there is much that is beautiful in this same symphony. First of all, it is cheerful and agreeable music. There is no touch of pessimism. There is no struggle with the Infinite. The composer has the simple faith of a healthy child. There is the spirit of Nature. There is a thought of woods and fields. Simple and pleasing thoughts are expressed intelligibly. At times the thoughts are clad gorgeously in instrumental colors; but the beauty of the thoughts does not suffer thereby, nor is it puffed up or distorted. After one hearing, the slow movement seems to me the gem of the work.

***

The overture of Tschaikowsky abounds in "alarums within and without." The plaintive church hymn is at first frightened by the triumphant Marseillaise, but the French conquer only for a moment. Cossacks scour the plain. There is the Russian General with the terrible name. There is the fire; there is the snow. The Marseillaise is heard no more. There is the exultation of a delivered nation. Such music as this overture of Tschaikowsky is perhaps panoramic, or even cycloramic. It would not do as a weekly dose. But it is a good thing to hear such music once in a while, to have the pulse stirred, to feel the consciousness of the raging animal that is in the body of even the most smug and exemplary citizen, although he may not know it.

***

Mr. Kneisel played his part in the concerto by Beethoven with infinite care and taste. The fine characteristics of his performance have always received full praise in this city. While it is only justice to this admirable violinist to praise, at length, his accuracy, his usually faultless intonation, his elegance and general finish, it may also be said that his temperament is such that he does not appear to complete advantage in such a work as the Beethoven concerto, which demands a player of more heroic mold.

***

The playing of the orchestra was excellent. Mr. Paur conducted with authority, sympathy and skill. The program was too long. The second and third movements, or at least the third movement of the concerto, might well have been omitted.

PHILIP HALE.

Sonnabend, den 23. Dezember 1893.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester hat mit dem dritten Konzert neue Triumphe gefeiert. Als eine Klavierspielerin erster Klasse präsentirte sich Frau Paur durch die treffliche Wiedergabe von Schubert's Fantasie in C-dur. Ueberaus klare Phrasirung und innige Auffassung sind die Hauptvorzüge ihres Spiels. Herr Emil Paur dirigirte.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 31, 1893.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

First Performance in Boston of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony—Other Harmonic Happenings.

Last night's symphony concert audience had the pleasure of listening to the first performance in this city of Antonin Dvorak's symphony "The New World." Much interest has been taken in this work, as it is the first important composition by Dvorak since he has become a resident of this country, and one which it was promised would prove the foundation for a school of music to be distinctly characteristic of American folk songs.

Mr Dvorak came to this country about a year and a half ago, and it was shortly after his arrival here that he announced his intention of writing the symphony heard yesterday. It was generally understood that he intended to construct his "New World Symphony" out of negro and Indian melodies on the supposition that this is the only style of music native to the new world. A good many people had believed, and probably do still believe, that there is no folk music in America, that what passes for such is an imported article, and in no sense characteristic of the section of the country or the class of people it is supposed to represent.

Mr Dvorak maintained that there was American folk music, if not that of the whole people, yet expressive of certain distinct phases of American life, climate, domestic conditions and historical events. From this folk music he believed that the American school of music must draw its inspiration, so began his task of writing an American symphony.

It seems to have been a delusion to suppose that Mr Dvorak intended to build his symphony on melodies such as "Down on the Swanee River" and "Yankee Doodle," which are popularly accepted as the nearest approach to American folk songs. He meant to go further back than the birth of these songs, in other words, to the original music of the new world.

With full knowledge of these intentions on the part of Mr Dvorak yesterday's audience gave rapt attention to the performance of the symphony and waited expectantly for the appearance of melodies characteristic of America. It is fair to presume that these expectations were not generally fulfilled.

Indeed, to be honest, it must be said that were it not for the title one would not be inclined to suppose that this symphony was any more characteristic of America than of France, Germany, Ireland or the South Sea islands.

"But the "New World" symphony is a magnificent composition. Whether or not it is American in character it is certainly the grandest symphony yet written in this country. Its performance was a genuine delight, and the audience expressed its pleasure in a manner that was cordial far beyond custom.

The symphony is in four movements and written for the ordinary orchestra. It is a brilliant work from first to last and is full of melody and variety. The orchestral scoring is superb. Mr Dvorak has long been acknowledged a master of orchestration but he has done nothing better than his latest work.

The first movement, adagio, is suggestive of tremendous energy and vivacity, at times it is tragic and might very properly be considered as characteristic of the first savages of America or any other country.

The second, a slow movement, was received with the greatest favor. It is, indeed, an exquisite composition. The statement has been made that this movement of the symphony was written as the expression of certain moods found in American poetry and definitely embodied in Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

The scherzo is written in a forceful and effective manner, and is notable for its originality in treatment. The final movement is a grand climax of a splendid work.

An excellent performance was given the symphony under Mr Paur's direction.

The Dvorak symphony was not, however, the only interesting feature of last night's concert. Beethoven's grand concerto for violin was admirably played by Mr Franz Kneisel. It is generally acknoledged that Mr Kneisel is entitled to the first rank among resident Boston violinists. His playing yesterday established his position yet more firmly. His greeting was demonstratively cordial, and there were half a dozen recalls when he had concluded the performance of the very difficult concerto.

The final number played by the orchestra was Tschaikowsky's overture, and the melodious work received satisfactory interpretation.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Prelude o "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg;" Vorstpiel und "Liebestod" (prelude and "Love-death"), from "Tristan und Isolde;" Siegfred idyl; a Faust overture; Siegfried's funeral march, from "Goetterdaemmerung;" Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung." Soloist, Mme Amalia Materna.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1893.

Dvorak's "American" symphony, first heard in public by the Philharmonic audience of New York, about a fortnight ago, had its second formal presentation at the Symphony concert last night. Since its author expressed his opinion that fit subjects for symphonic treatment might be found on this side of the Atlantic, curiosity and discussion have been busy,—now inquiring what he could possibly have meant, and now asserting that he must have meant this, that or the other. Of course the idea most frequently attributed to him was that either the "hoe-downs" and "spirituals" of the Southern negro or the mild, mellifluous melodies of Stephen Foster must supply the themes. So imagination expanded itself upon his own probable utilization of such material, while contempt elevated its nose at the thought of such trivialities and platitudes serving as the bases for even a modern and unclassical symphonic development. Nobody seems to have thought of a symbolic, aesthetic, poetic and psychical composition, designed to suggest to appreciative perception the broad moods and deep impressions induced in a sensitive and perhaps rhapsodical nature by the sight of a vast continent, a strange conglomeration of manifold human elements, a brief, eventful history, and a swift, vehement development whose chief tendencies and whose ultimate goal cannot yet be so much as divined.

This is what Dvorak presents us in the four movements of his superb and beautiful symphony. He has wrought it out with a fervor which can be felt and is manifested no less in tenderness than in might. He has clung close to the tradition and the form of the classic period and while his bold and diversified use of full instrumental means, his skill in scholastic contrasts and his artful evolutions and blendings of chief subjects and of subsidiary episodes will gratify and content the musician, the average auditor will find his thoughts simple and distinct and his exposition of them so lucid and natural that they are never lost in the mazes of phrase or obscured by the invention of counterpoint and technical figuration.

The symphony comes with no clue to its composer's feeling and intention and it will necessarily represent many things to its many listeners. Upon one point, however, will all agree—that its unity of spirit and its growth toward a logical and powerful conclusion are remarkable and delightful. We may have our fancies with the rest of the public, and they shape themselves roughly thus, as they needs must after a single hearing: The first movement, opening with a short but potent and insistent adagio, and passing thence into the wild, emphatic accent which the folk songs and the popular dances of so many undeveloped nations show, suggests the free, urgent, irregular and vigorous life of primitive peoples, with whom energy, courage and a narrow range were qualified by some rhythmic sense and some imaginative fancy. The exquisitely placid larghetto, which will make itself at home at once in every susceptible being, suggests the vast and almost void expanse of nature—smooth, wide, still lakes; rivers calm in their strong flow; savannahs and prairies lying lone and silent; forests and mountains motionless and grave; in a word a whole land waiting for its possessor. The scherzo is instinct with a lively vitality which might imply the curiosity, the surprise and the pleasure of the discoverer, while the half-martial character of its trio could stand for pride and hope in the assumption of ownership, as the quaint beat of an under theme would intimate that the native denizen is still an element to be considered. The final allegro is immensely active and abundantly opulent in confidence, aspiration and determination, as if representative of great achievement and constant ambition.

The musical unity of the work is patent, as has been said, and the kind of feeling set in the first theme, with its clear cut phraseology, is maintained to the close, not only in the temper, but in the turns of expression. Yet this state of mind is not monotonous and its digressions, diversions and episodes are many and make themselves apparent now in devices of orchestration and now in secondary thoughts and side issues, as when one recognizes a bit of "Yankee Doodle" threading itself into the the inner tissues of the last movement.

There was another new work on the programme—Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, which signifies the attempt of Napoleon to conquer his way to the heart of Russia and his defeat in that herculean but impossible attempt. The sturdy, unconquerable, ponderous Russia is represented by the large, steady and solid introduction; then comes the conflict of France, as suggested in the Marseillaise against the hordes of Russian troops and the whirling, withering tempests of the turbulent writer; and finally over the broken fragments of the French song rises in amazing strength and splendor of triumph the Russian music which was heard at first so reserved and calm. Every possible orchestral instrument is used in this climax, and the composer even wanted cannon to help in the stupendous clangor.

The performance of these two works was splendid at all points. In the larghetto of the symphony Mr. Paur obtained pianissimi of which even Mr. Gericke might have been proud, while in the overture he evoked a tonality that lacked little of raising the roof.

Between these Mr. Kneisel played Beethoven's violin concerto to perfection in tone, style and detail of execution, and he had his full share of the enthusiastic and spontaneous applause which the whole programme elicited.

Next week's programme will be all Wagner, comprising the usual orchestral selections from the "Meistersinger," "Tristan" and the "Gotterdammerung," together with the "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyl." Mme. Materna will sing in the "Tristan" love music, and add Brunnhilde's lament over Siegfried.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV. NO. 183.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1893.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Franz Kneisel.

Director Emil Pauer is to be sincerely thanked for his action in giving so early a hearing in this city of Dr. Dvorak's new symphony "Z Noveho Sveta" ("From the New World") which is still in manuscript, and had its first hearing only two weeks ago at the New York Philharmonic concert. It is not often that a work arouses so much criticism as this has on account of the pronounced views expressed by the composer soon after his arrival in America, to occupy his present position at the head of the National conservatory. It will be remembered that in a newspaper interview (which, it may be well to say in passing, correctly represented his views) Dr. Dvorak at that time expressed his opinion that the American folk songs had been singularly neglected by the composers in this country, and that in these native melodies could be found subjects worthy of symphonic treatment.

A great many writers have undertaken to explain what Dr. Dvorak meant in expressing these opinions, but no one has given such a satisfactory explanation as he himself has done in the symphony heard last evening.

It is doubtful if many musicians or music lovers in the North appreciate the native ability of the southern colored people for originating such melodies as form the basis of the folk songs of the northern nations of Europe. Those who visited Richmond and the large southern cities shortly after the war had the best opportunity of becoming acquainted with this peculiar faculty of the native southern darkey. In the large tobacco factories of these cities at that time could be found representatives of nearly all the southern states, and their custom of weaving together the tunes, with which they were familiar in their old southern homes, afforded to Northern visitors an unusual opportunity of becoming acquainted with the real negro music of the South.

In one of the big shops of Richmond at that time there existed a gang of some 20 darkies who had gained almost a national reputation for their skill in constructing these composite songs. Each one contributed to them and by constantly repeating them for their own gratification and that of their visitors they acquired a repertoire which gave this particular shop an enviable reputation throughout the South.

Dr. Dvorak has been singularly successful in portions of his symphony in catching the spirit of this class of southern melodies, and the first and second movements, an adagio and larghetto, are particularly suggestive of the music the northern visitors used to hear in their trips to Richmond. These two movements are by all odds the most interesting portions of the work—the scherzo and the final allegro being less interesting and having fewer of the characteristics which are naturally to be expected in such a symphony.

As a whole, however, the new work commands the warmest praise, and the fashion in which Dvorak has thrown down the gauntlet to the modern school of writers, and substituted tunes for harmonies, is a subject for sincere congratulation.

The work is of heroic proportions, and the masterly fashion in which the composer has treated his subjects cannot fail to impress any audience the world over. The beautiful themes which are made to reappear with such fascinating skill in the opening movement are well worthy the ornamental treatment given them, and there can be but one opinion regarding this portion of the work, and that one the highest praise for its ideas and construction.

The larghetto will attain the greater popularity doubtless on account of the singular beauty of the song upon which it is based, the melody being one easily memorized and recalled with rare satisfaction. In the marvellously ingenious orchestral combinations of this movement are shown the master's hand in the most unmistakable fashion and the weird character of the song gives a still further source of enjoyment to the hearer.

The scherzo is more in the familiar style of the composer than any other movement, and although it lacks the new idea of the preceding portions of the work, it is vastly enjoyable. In the final movement the opening is so broadly dramatic that the expectation is raised to a pitch that is not fully justified by the remainder of the movement, and, by contrast, this is the least satisfactory portion of the symphony.

Mr. Paur gave the work his best efforts, and no composer could ask for better treatment than that which "From the New World" symphony got on this occasion. The audience were keenly alive to both the merits of the work and its performance, and gave evidence of their approval by as enthusiastic applause as has been bestowed upon any of the season's performances.

Following the symphony came the appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist in Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, opus 61. Familiar though this concerto is, and coming in such strong contrast with the new symphony, there was much to enjoy and heartily appreciate in the treatment given it by Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra on this occasion. When the soloist stepped to his place beside the leader's desk he was not left in doubt as to his popularity with the Symphony audiences, for the reception given him was one of which any artist might be proud. His playing was characterized by the same purity of tone and exquisite delicacy, he has at all times been noted for, and his merits were again rapturously applauded as he completed his task.

It was left for the famous overture by Tschaikowsky, "1812," to show what the new conductor is capable of in the class of compositions to which this belongs. There was a good deal of noise, but it was musical noise, and the effects were so grandly worked out by the men under Mr. Paur's baton that the audience was wrought to the highest pitch of excitement, and it only needed for the conductor to give them the signal to have had them join en masse in the "Marseillaise," which forms the basis for the grand climax of the composition. The instrumentation calls for about everything known in orchestral or military band combination. The ordinary instruments of strings, wind and percussion are re-enforced by triangles, bells, cannon, and probably musketry, and the amount of noise in the finale is limited only by the physical ability of the musicians engaged in its performance. Possibly the late lamented P. S. Gilmore could have done more with this show piece than Mr. Paur; but the audience were evidently satisfied with the effects produced in its performance, and not a little fun was caused by observing the vim with which the back row of the orchestra engaged in their duties. The gentleman who was made responsible for the cannon effects is to be congratulated upon the strength of his drumhead and upon his own excellent physical condition.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Materna will be the soloist, and the programme will be made up of Wagnerian [illegible]

[63]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday, although of inordinate length, had points of especial interest which prevented anything like tedium setting in. For the first time since music began, a great composer, one of the modern masters, has taken up our folk-song and built a classical work upon this new foundation. The first presentation of such a work was sufficient to make the occasion historical, and to dignify the concert beyond any of its predecessors. One may acknowledge this without conceding absolute success to the work itself. Brilliant as music, the new symphony by Dvorak, founded on native themes, does not achieve a distinct nationality. It is not more clearly American than Bohemian or Russian. The formation of certain passages upon a scale with a flat seventh is more European than American, for if such scales exist here they come from a remote antiquity in other climes.

The work began with a strange mixture of kettledrum explosions and brooding. When the chief theme was ushered in, however, it proved to have something of the lilt of the plantation, and suggested that accentuation of hand and foot which belongs to Afro-American melody. Yet, for the matter of that, the same characteristic can be traced as far back as scriptural music, and the singing of the psalms in ancient Jerusalem was not widely different from the free improvisation and emphatic rhythm of a Southern camp-meeting, a fact which can easily be proved by references to "clapping of hands" in the Old Testament, by Egyptian pictures of contemporary date, and by a study of the character of the poems as they have come down to us.

Nevertheless we may be permitted to call this lilt and rhythm "American" since it is a characteristic of part of our Southern folk-song.

The development of the phrase which contained the gist of this theme was remarkable and its varied orchestral coloring was full of interest. This first movement seemed, at a single hearing, the finest part of the work, and it was the only portion which gave to the reviewer the impression of being typical.

The slow movement which came next was given over to vagueness and dreamy melancholy. The tone-color was well-chosen, and a tender theme for English horn and a delicate use of woodwind effects made a picture of much beauty, which however, was not of any especial nationality, although a bold episode of lively character and with a drone bass, made some attempt at local color.

The Scherzo was a disappointment, for here at least one might have expected the folk-dance, the break-down, or some flavor of plantation life, just as Mendelssohn threw the Gaelic spirit into the Scherzo of his Scotch symphony. Instead of this one had a reminiscence of the figure with which Beethoven began the Scherzo of his Ninth Symphony, a March-like trio of strong contrast and intrinsic beauty, but very much more of Dvorak and his genius than of America.

The finale presented a bold theme full of dash and brio with dissonances that were still more courageous at the coda. That Europe will play this symphony as a contribution to music from a new quarter, may be confidently predicted, but if transatlantic critics accept it as a portrayal of the spirit of American folk-song they will go far astray. Yet the attempt made in this work will be worth something in the development of our musical resources, and others will dig where Dvorak has done surface mining.

Now followed Beethoven's violin concerto, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist. It was a most satisfactory performance, absolutely free from flaw or fault. That Mr. Kneisel does not give all the breadth that the composition (at least the titanic first movement) can bear, may be conceded;—neither does Sarasate. In intonation, in absolute surety in the midst of the greatest difficulties, in musicianly intelligence in making every point in line with the composer's intention, the performance was a great one, and in the matter of power of tone, too, the artist seems to be advancing. Mr. Kneisel was received with great enthusiasm by the audience and recalls in profusion followed the conclusion of the work. It might have been as well to have ended the composition with the first movement. Spite of the beautiful touches in parts of the second movement, the concerto is overshadowed by the grandeur of its beginning, and the finale lags superfluous upon the stage. Not even the genius of Beethoven could animate the dry bones of this old rondo form, and the strength of the development of the allegro only emphasizes the triviality of the end. This same work was Mr. Kneisel's visiting card when he first came to Boston, and at that time criticism was most anxious to find a flaw in the armor, for he had replaced a long-established concert master of much riper years; it found no weak spot then,—it finds none now.

At this point Mr. Paur "cried 'Havock' and let slip the dogs of war"; at least he gave a composition which it is difficult to review seriously. It was as unfair to bring Tschaikowsky to memory by his "1812" overture as it would have been to commemorate Beethoven with his battle symphony ("The Battle of Vittoria"), and such a racket has not been heard in Music Hall, not even in the days of the cat shows.

The "Marseillaise" attacked an innocent Russian folk-theme, and the result was terrible. The two themes coalesced very much as the Kilkenny cats did, or as the blue paper does with the white in a seidlitz powder. Auditors clung to their seats in excited enthusiasm as the Russian trombones and the French bass drums met; amidst the tumult one could see the brave conductor standing undaunted in the centre of the contending forces; then came the clangor of bells; the writer does not know whether they were the triumphant tones of festival chimes, or whether a general alarm had been turned in from the fire at Moscow, but they were out of tune in either case. Finally the work culminated with a varied assortment of thunderbolts, and now the ear doctors of Boston are with Mr. Paur, to a man.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Kneisel Quartette Concert.

This evening at Chickering Hall the Kneisel Quartette will give the first public performance of Dvorak's Quartette in F major. Mr. F. Busoni will play the piano in Brahm's Quartette in G minor and Mr. Max Zach 2nd viola in Beethoven's Quintette in C major. This will undoubtedly be one of the most interesting concerts of the season.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
DAILY TRAVELLER. TWO CENTS
MONDAY, JANUARY 1, 1894.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY.

First Time of Dvorak's Misnamed "American Symphony."

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, presenting the following programme:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Concerto for violin, in D major, (Cadenzas by Joachim).....Beethoven
Overture, "1812," in E flat major.....Tschaikowsky.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The great interest of this occasion centred in the performance for the first time in these concerts of Dvorak's latest symphony which has been advertised extensively, but misleadingly, as an "American Symphony."

The idea of writing this work was probably brought to the mind of Dvorak through a suggestion of Mr. James G. Huneker, the eminent critic of the New York Musical Courier, to which suggestion Dvorak listened attentively and evidently with interest in the idea advanced. Dvorak then studied some of the characteristic melodies of the American negro, and possibly some Indian phrases, and out of this musical digest evolved the themes that appear in this symphony. These themes are presented in the form of simple folk-song, being striking in character and adaptable to a symphonic treatment. That any of these themes are nationally American cannot be claimed, for with a slight stretch of the imagination they could be accepted by most any nationality of the Old World, being quite as oriental as occidental in their flavor.

There is a strong resemblance in the first and principal theme of the opening movement of the symphony, to the nigger tunes sung to the twanging accompaniment of the banjo and the tap of the heel, by the older minstrel composers, the "Alleghanians," the "Christy Minstrels," etc., but otherwise there is nothing that can be recognized as a familiar air of the American people. The slight burlesque on Yankee Doodle in the violas that occurs in the final movement will not serve in modifying this statement in the least.

This symphony was first played at the second concert of the New York Symphony Society under the direction of Mr. Seidl, Dec. 16, being heard of course at the rehearsal of the afternoon previous. On this occasion it was extensively boomed in the New York Tribune in an elaborate article from the pen of Mr. Krehbiel, as well as through a most extraordinary panegyric by Mr. Steinberg in the New York Herald. The latter was something ridiculous in its conclusion.

It matters little what the claims may be of those who see in the composition of this symphony the foundation of an American school of symphonic writing, for time will prove the folly of such conclusions, but it is with gratification that every critical listener recognized in Dvorak's work a composition of fine proportions. Whatever may have stimulated this eminent composer, it is sufficient that his inspiration has never brought forth more spontaneous results.

If it possesses little or nothing that is distinctively American in color, it is none the less an intensely interesting and charming work. The adagio and the scherzo, which are without a suggestion of anything American in their conception, are movements of characteristic value in their respective modes. The depth of poetical feeling that marks the adagio, and the vivacity, the brilliancy and the unique instrumental effects that characterize the scherzo are the outcome of the genius of Dvorak unbridled by any attempt at the delineation of any national music.

There is a fine display of ingenuity in the working out of the last movement; so also has the composer displayed his masterly hand in the first movement. Best of all in this symphony, however, is the simplicity and clearness of the themes and the elaboration also. The polyphony is never obscure; it is easily followed. Neither does it lose in value musically because of this clearness. It is a reproach upon the mysticism and cacophony of many of our modern writers. When one remembers this clearness, as well as the variety and piquancy of the rhythms, the beautiful color of the instrumentation, and the fine contrasts in the dynamic expression, it is easy to bespeak for this work a popularity that will become world wide.

Perhaps of greater importance to us locally was the manner in which the orchestra performed this composition. It settled at once any doubt as to the capabilities of Mr. Paur as a conductor worthy of the position so successfully sustained by Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Paur was alert to every demand of this remarkable symphony, and holding his orchestra in a firm grasp revealed thereby every nuance of the composition. That inflexible and careful carving of the phrases that has caused some to complain when criticizing Mr. Paur's renderings was entirely absent on this occasion, and the music had its rhythmic swing uninterrupted. Also there was a surprising advance in the matter of gradation of tone.

Such splendid results as were made manifest in the playing of this work must have satisfied the cravings of the most exacting of critics. If this is the standard that is to be maintained throughout, then will the patrons of these concerts rejoice and praise the good fortune that has sent us so able a conductor as Mr. Paur. How gratifying it is for the critic to acknowledge such masterly conducting.

When Mr. Kneisel appeared to play his solo he was welcomed so warmly that he was obliged to bow many times before the applause ended. Then followed a most finished and technically accurate performance of the Beethoven concerto. There is always a classical purity to whatever Mr. Kneisel presents in his artistic efforts. His taste is exquisite. He was recalled several times at the end of the concerto. Mr. Paur conducted the accompaniment with great discretion; a difficult task indeed.

The Tschaikowsky overture was replete with the characteristics of its eminent composer. The invasion of Russia and the repulse of the French were depicted in this composer's well known realistic manner. The ending was without doubt the most tremendous noise ever heard within the walls of the Music Hall. When one says that it took six players to "man" the percussion instruments, and that not one bass drum but two were brought to bear in the moment of rejoicing, to which was added a chime of bells, nothing more could be asked to intensify the din, unless the whole audience had joined in hurrahs! and a climax gained by the explosion of a dynamite bomb, could it have been accomplished without other effects than its terrific detonation. I have always declared that nothing pleased the symphony audience so much as a tremendous noise (Nikisch proved that time and time again), so on Saturday evening at the termination of Tschaikowsky's din this cultured aggregation burst forth with shouts and uproarious applause. It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur will not too frequently encourage this latent tendency upon the part of his audience, that merely sleeps to be awakened at a trumpet call or the sound of the stirring drum. Next Saturday evening the programme will be made up of Wagner selections. Mrs. Materna will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 1, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorák: Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," Opus 95 (MS.)
Beethoven: Concerto for violin, in D major, Opus 61. (Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Tschaikowsky: Overture, "1812," in E-flat major, Opus 49.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

The new Dvorák symphony has already made no little noise in the world. Not very long ago the following announcement appeared in, we now forget what paper:

It appears that Dr. Antonín Dvorák, the famous Bohemian composer, has reached the conclusion that the future music of America must be founded upon what are called the Negro melodies, and that these must be the basis of any serious and original school of composition to be developed in the United States. He says that these are the folk-songs of America, and that all great musicians borrow from the songs of the common people. He further states that in the Negro melodies he discovers all that is needed for a great and noble school of music.

In this symphony Dr. Dvorák has taken a pioneer step in the direction indicated in the above quotation; a great deal of the thematic material of the work is either taken directly from negro music, or written in clever imitation thereof. Before considering the symphony itself,—which a single hearing gives but little opportunity for doing to much purpose,—let us first consider the general principle Dr. Dvorák has been anxious to establish in regard to an American school of composition. Certainly the question is an interesting one.

That all schools of composition whatsoever are to be recognized as the result of a process of of evolution from one or the other of two primordial musical facts, hardly anyone will be inclined to deny today, for it is generally established as true. These primordial musical facts are the old, ritual Ambrosian or Gregorian chaunt, and the popular folk-song. Leaving the old church chaunt out of the discussion, as not touching the case in hand, we have the folk-song (which includes what might be called the folk-dance) as the germ from which by far the greater part of modern music, especially instrumental music, has been evolved. And judging from experience and by analogy, it seems more than probable that, if any specially characteristic and individual school of composition is to grow up in a country which does not as yet possess one, it must be evolved in the same way from a similar germ. With this principle itself we cannot quarrel, for it seems inevitable. But let us see for a moment, looking at the matter equally from the point of view of experience and analogy, what its practical application seems likely to involve.

Let us not go too far back in the history of the art of music; it will be enough to consider modern schools of composition, going at most no farther back than Haydn's and Mozart's day in Germany and perhaps not quite so far in other countries. We can count today about six different schools of composition, each one of which can lay just claim to possessing certain sharply marked national characteristics: the German, Italian, French, Magyar, Slavic and Scandinavian schools. If anyone miss the English or Anglo-Saxon school from this list, let its absence be explained by the fact that England and the Anglo Saxon race in general have not as yet done anything in the higher and more developed musical forms in which any specially national or racial traits are to be recognized; the English school, if such school there be, has in no wise differentiated itself from the rest of the world. Again, if anyone is inclined to subdivide the Slavic school into the Russian, Polish and Czech, he is quite at liberty to do so; but these three sub-schools present marks of affinity amply sufficient to make it fair to lump them together under the general head of Slavic.

Now, in studying these six schools, as they are represented in modern music, we can hardly avoid taking one step further in classification, based on certain distinctive characteristics in the use made of "national" material by each of them, and in this very "national" material itself. From this point of view, we find these six schools fall naturally into one or the other of two larger and more comprehensive classes, or orders; the German, Italian, and Magyar, French into one; the Slavic, and Scandinavian into the other. Let this larger classification of ours not be misunderstood. No doubt there are certain points in which the present Slavic and Scandinavian schools exhibit a stronger affinity with the German than either the Italian or French does; but this does not affect our classification one whit; it is based on quite a different principle. We base it principally on a certain marked difference in character to be described in the "national" or "folk-song" material of which the music of these several schools is respectively built up.

Comparing the general run of German, French and Italian folk-songs, on the one hand, with the generality of Slavic, and Scandinavian folk-songs, on the other, we find that the former belong in one respect to a different class from the latter. The general melodic and rhythmic character of the German, Italian and French songs stamps them as examples of a higher stage in musical evolution. They are for the most part based on the modern tonal (major or minor) scales, which scales represent in themselves a higher stage of evolution than the old Church modes or the incomplete, quasi-barbaric scales on which much of the Slavic and Scandinavian folk-music is based. Be it remembered also that the whole development of modern harmony is inseparably connected with the evolution of the modern tonal scales; and that all melodies based on "barbaric" scales prove to be in the end rather recalcitrant subjects for harmonizing. In harmonizing such melodies, one must either employ normal, tonal harmony, which effaces much of their specific character, or else have recourse to a sort of abnormal, more or less barbarous harmony, which only gives additional prominence to what was already barbaric and rude in the melodies themselves. The folk-song raw material on which German, French and Italian music is based was, in a sense, already "civilized" in itself; the folk-song material on which characteristically Slavic and Scandinavian music is based was and is essentially of a more or less barbaric quality, and thus less amenable to "civilized" treatment.

No doubt many German composers, notably Beethoven, have often taken such "outlandish" themes for musical treatment; but notice that Beethoven in almost every case so treated them that they lost almost all of their native "outlandish" flavor; that he "civilized" them, so to speak, before using them. The Russian themes he used at times do not sound in the least characteristically Russian, as he uses them. Now, it is hopeless to found a characteristic national school of composition on characteristic national folk-songs, if the whole distinctively characteristic flavor of such songs is to be eliminated in the process of musical development; the school can be recognizable as distinctively national and characteristic only in so far as it preserves the special flavor of the material it works with. And if this material is barbaric, the music made from it must be to a greater or less extent barbaric too.

And this is just what we find nowadays in the higher forms of Russian, Czech, or Scandinavian music, in the works of men like Tschaikowsky, Rimski-Korsakoff, Smetana, Dvorák, Grieg and Svendsen. In so far as it is characteristically Slavic or Scandinavian, in so far as it preserves its specifically "national" flavor, it is essentially barbaric and outlandish. You may talk as much as you please about its strongly marked character, piquancy, zest and "melancholy expression." One may reply—as we do most heartily—that its piquancy and zest are in nine cases out of ten sheer musical ugliness, its strongly marked character that of stunted and half-developed musical growth, and that "tender melancholy" is but a poetic-sounding name which the morbidly inclined are fond of applying to what the more healthy and eupeptic among us prosaically call "blue devils." To our mind, the great bane of the present Slavic and Scandinavian schools is and has been the attempt to make civilized music by civilized methods out of essentially barbaric material. The result has in general been a mere apotheosis of ugliness, distorted forms, and barbarous expression. We gladly admit exceptions; but this seems to us to be the general rule.

And, to arrive at last at our point, our American Negro music has every element of barbarism to be found in the Slavic or Scandinavian folk-songs; it is essentially barbarous music. What is more, it sounds terribly like any other barbarous music. If no one had known that Dr. Dvorák's symphony last Saturday evening was based on Negro material, we think that every man jack of us would have swallowed it unhesitatingly as characteristically Czech. Upon the whole, few of us are at all familiar with Negro music; perhaps the Negro melodies ought to be our folk-songs, but the uncomfortable fact is that they are not; they sound as strange and unaccustomed in our ears as the Czech or Russian melodies do; our intimate musical associations lie elsewhere. How many people in the Music Hall, think you, thought the Dvorák symphony "sounded like home"? Very few, we imagine!

It has been objected that all the music of the higher sort hitherto written in America has been but a reflection of Leipzig, Munich or Paris. This is true enough. But what if we start fresh on a negro basis, according to Dr. Dvorák's plan? Is this basis really original and individual enough to prevent our music seeming like a mere reflection of Moscow and Prag? Of the two alternatives we prefer the former. If we are to have a mere copy in either case, let us at least have a copy of a civilized model! To our mind this whole "negro" scheme seems terribly like going wilfully out of the way in search of originality; and the pursuit of originality is very like what the philosophers tell us the pursuit of happiness is: a hunt in which the fox is never killed.

Of Dr. Dvorák's symphony itself we could form no very definite idea; the first movement was interesting in its development, and to a certain extent pleasing, at a first hearing; but we should much like to hear the work once or twice again before saying anything of the rest of it.

Tschaikowsky's "1812" created more furore than we have seen in the Music Hall for a great while; it was literally cheered to the echo. It is a work which, in spite of its outrageousness—perhaps because of it—takes hold of you strongly and irresistibly. We hardly believe that so much noise was ever heard in the Music Hall before; before this overture the united German bands sink into insignificance, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" seems a mere bit of muted-string "Träumerei." And we did not have quite the whole of the score, either; the two insignificant items of a whole brass band and a park of artillery were omitted. But what was left was loud enough. The work is immensely exciting and stirring, and does not owe this quality to its volume of tone merely; it is recognizably in the symphonic form and worked out with a very sure hand; its themes, one and all, are rather insignificant in themselves, but they tell for what they were meant to. Since the B-flat minor pianoforte concerto we have heard nothing by Tschaikowsky we have liked so much.

Mr. Kneisel played the great Beethoven concerto simply gloriously. Saving that the final rondo might have gone with a little more dash and force of accent, we cannot see how his rendering of the great work could have been improved. It was great playing at every point.

The next programme is made up wholly of works by Richard Wagner and is as follows: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg:" prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan und Isolde," Siegfried-Idyll, "Eine Faust-Ouvertüre," last scene from "Götterdämmerung." Mme. Amalia Materna will be the singer.

...DEN EVENING RECORD.
...SDAY, JANUARY 1

AN AMERICAN SYMPHONY.

The concert of Saturday, although of intimate length, had points of especial interest which prevented anything like ...ilium setting in. For the first time since music began, a great composer, one of the modern masters, has taken up our folk-song and built a classical work upon this new foundation. The first presentation of such a work was sufficient to make the occasion historical, and to dignify the concert beyond any of its predecessors. One may acknowledge this without conceding absolute success to the work itself. Brilliant as music, the new symphony by Dvorak, founded on native themes, does not achieve a distinct nationality. It is not more clearly American than Bohemian or Russian. The formation of certain passages upon a scale with a flat seventh is more European than American; for if such scales exist here they come from a remote antiquity in other climes.

The work began with a strange mixture of kettledrum explosions and brooding. When the chief theme was ushered in, however, it proved to have something of the lilt of the plantation, and suggested that accentuation of hand and foot which belongs to Afro-American melody. Yet, for the matter of that, the same characteristic can be traced as far back as scriptural music, and the singing of the psalms in ancient Jerusalem was not widely different from the free improvisation and emphatic rhythm of a Southern camp-meeting, a fact which can easily be pro d by references to "clapping of hands" in t.e Old Testament, by Egyptian pictures of contemporary date, and by a study of the character of the poems as they have come down to us.

Nevertheless we may be permitted to call this lilt and rhythm "American" since it is a characteristic of part of our Southern folk-song.

Lastly Mr. Paur "cried 'Havock and let slip the dogs of war"; at least he gave a composition which it is difficult to review seriously. It was as unfair to bring Tschaikowsky to memory by his "1812" overture as it would have been to commemorate Beethoven with his battle symphony ("The Battle of Vittoria"), and such a racket has not been heard in Music Hall, not even in the days of the cat shows.

The "Marseillaise" attacked an innocent Russian folk-theme, and the result was terrible. The two themes coalesced very much as the Kilkenny cats did, or as the blue paper does with the white in a seidlitz powder. Auditors clung to their seats in excited enthusiasm as the Russian trombones and the French bass drums met; amidst the tumult one could see the brave conductor standing undaunted in the centre of the contending forces; then came the clangor of bells; the writer does not know whether they were the triumphant tones of festival chimes, or whether a general alarm had been turned in from the fire at Moscow, but they were out of tune in either case. Finally the work culminated with a varied assortment of thunderbolts, and now the ear doctors of Boston are with Mr. Paur, to a man.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The American symphony is a string quartette! Paradoxical as this may sound it is certainly true that Dvorak's Quartette in F, played for the first time at the Kneisel concert of last night, is far more redolent of the plantation than the master's symphony, performed last Saturday. The chief theme of the first movement was typical negro music, and it was placed in juxtaposition with other equally strong and characteristic Southern melodies. The development was masterly and did not obscure the popular flavor of the movement. The slow, second movement had a peculiarly mournful chief theme, and here violin and viola carried on some beautiful solo work. The shading and general ensemble in this was noteworthy even for the Kneisel quartette; the composition could not have been in better hands for its first performance.

The intermezzo, which came next, was less pronouncedly American, and was as much too short as the preceding movement had been too long. In the finale everything again spoke of native influence; there were plantation effects galore, and had there been a banjo introduced it would scarcely have shocked the auditor, for "walk-round," "breakdown" and every other species of Southern revelry seemed present. The composition is emphatically interesting, and although its second movement is rather given to over-repetition, its first and last movements are beautiful, at least to American ears. It is barely possible that the Southern flavor is accidental, but it is difficult to think so.

Now followed Brahms piano quartette in G minor, a composition that is to be ranked even with Schumann's great work in this form (op. 47). It brought that great artist, Feruccio Busoni, to the piano. Glorious work he certainly did throughout the entire composition, but not a whole string orchestra could have balanced against him when once his enthusiasm broke loose. It was piano, piano and again piano (but very forte) and the three string players filled in the chinks as best they could. Yet when there were delicate passages, as in the muted work of the intermezzo, or the rippling cadences with pizzicato support of the Gypsy finale, the audience heard some of the finest Brahm's performance that has ever taken place in Boston, and the close was brilliant in the highest degree. The mysterious effects of the first movement were also superb,—there were spectres abroad in that strange, weird development. The difficulties of tempo were entirely overcome; every passage was as sure as if syncopations and artificial groupings did not exist. But the balance of power was lost as completely as it is in the European political field.

The concert ended with Beethoven's quintette in C, with Mr. Zach, as second viola, added to the forces, a worthy ending of a great concert. Every part of it was interesting, but the Kneisel quartette should not endeavor to outvie the symphony programmes in the matter of length.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The fourth concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening was attended by a large and interested audience. The programme was Dvorak's quartet in F major, Brahms's piano quartet in G minor, and Beethoven's quintet in C major, with Mr. Busoni assisting at the piano and Mr. Zach the second viola. The first public performance of Dvorak's quartet was received with critical attention. It strongly savors of negro melodies in its thematic construction and is of a light order, with no particular depth or breadth. It is not a composition that is likely to win popular favor to a great degree and will rely more on the fame of its brilliant composer than on its own intrinsic worth. The playing of the quartet was, as usual, almost perfect. The cello work of Mr. Schroeder was delightful. Brahms's piano quartet, Mr. Busoni assisting, was played with splendid artistic feeling and expression. The first two movements were inclined to be dry and prosy. The fourth movement, Rondo a la Zingarese, was read in a brilliant manner, Mr. Busoni playing with pleasing and intelligent expression. Beethoven's quintet in C major, with Mr. Zach second viola, was listened to with intelligent appreciation. The concert attracted many of the celebrities of the social and musical world. The next concert will be Jan. 22.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 2.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The audience present at the fourth of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet, at Chickering Hall last evening, enjoyed a rare treat in chamber music, the programme including Dr. Dvorak's new string quartet, the quartet for piano and strings in G minor, op. 25, by Brahms, and the quintet for strings in C major, op. 29, by Beethoven.

The Dvorak quartet, still in manuscript, had its first public performance on this occasion and proved a worthy companion to the larger work from the same composer heard at the symphony concert on Saturday.

Like the symphony "From the New World," it is the product of Dvorak's most recent efforts, and reflects the influence which his study of American subjects has had upon him. Its themes are simple, but vastly pleasing melodies, and with the varied treatment given them they take on a constantly interesting character. The melodies are distinctly those of southern life, and they are made worthy of their use by the skill with which they are ornamented and elaborated. The quartet is a very pleasing addition to the organization's repertoire, and can but gain great favor as played by Mr. Kneisel and his associates.

A masterly performance of the Brahms quartet was given, with Mr. F. Busoni at the piano, and although at times the pianist made his instrument unduly prominent in the ensemble, he gave rare enjoyment by his otherwise, at all times, thoroughly artistic playing. An excellent performance of the familiar Beethoven quintet was given, with Mr. Zach as assisting viola player. The fifth concert will be given on the 22d inst.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1894.

Tenth Symphony Concert: Novelties in Boston.

Nobody has any right to "speak diminutive" of Kelly's Macbeth music after hearing Tschaikowsky's Solemn (?) Overture from The Holy War, commemorating the defeat of Napoleon in his Russian invasion of 1812. It is indeed exciting to hear the Marseillaise chased and routed by the Russian theme, amid a fanfare of bells and booms. Grandly played! Who dare call Director Paur humdrum after this?

Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D, with cadenzas by Joachim, Hellmesberger, and the soloist, won for Mr. Kneisel an ovation thoroughly deserved.

But the great novelty of the day was Dvorak's Manuscript Symphony in E minor, No. 8, bearing "From the New World" as its title. Very enjoyable in its graceful treatment of themes partially familiar; but is it fair to call this an American Symphony? Negro melodies, made up of nobody knows what historic elements, are not really so American as the chants of the aboriginal Indians. To be sure slavery brought Africans hither, and their music with them, and this music has been modified by camp meetings, French blood, and other influences; but is it specially American? The composer's suggestion, that negro melodies would work well into symphonic forms, was at first understood as referring to such popular tunes as Susanna, Ole Virginny, Dearest Mae and so on, and there was a disposition to sneer at this notion, partly because these modern songs were written for negroes, not by them. Why laugh? Some of those melodies were borrowed from German symphonies, like Katy Darling, which comes from Mendelssohn. Then there are the so-called Spitituals, sung on the plantation, such as "Lord, Make Me More Patient!" and these might be mulled into classic mould, as indeed every strain can be; but this would not make them American. Dvorak's Symphony is delightful to hear, but it represents an infinitesimal fragment of imported America. Like the eminent composer himself, it is from the Old World rather than the New. A musician behind me whispered that he was mad clean through over the thought that such music, however fetching, should be accepted abroad as distinctively native to our shores.

Beethoven's First Symphony was indeed lovely under Paur's interpretation, at our ninth symphony concert. Then came Mozart's Hoffner Serenade, five of its light movements, with fine obligato passages by Mr. Kneisel; and Carl Baermann's velvety touch was most conspicuous in the Beethoven Concerto, No. 4, in G.; but the most refreshing number of the over-long concert was Schubert's Rosamunde Overture, like a spring morning. The cadenzas in the concerto were of Mr. Baermann's own arranging.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

This was the program of the fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartette given last evening in Chickering Hall:

Quartette, F major, op. 96 (MS).....Dvorak
(First public performance.)
Piano quartette, G minor, op. 25.....Brahms
(Piano, Mr. Busoni.)
Quintette, C major, op. 29.....Beethoven
(2d Viola, Mr. Zach.)

It is said that this new quartette was composed by Dvorak between June 12 and 23, 1893. I believe that Spillville, Iowa, saw its birth, as well as the birth of a quintette for strings that has not yet appeared here. The symphony played Saturday night in Music Hall was written in the spring of the same year. The symphony, the quartette and the quintette are said to be built out of "American" material, and by some enthusiasts they are thought to be at least a starting point for the great American music of the future.

Now let us, in considering briefly the quartette, leave "Americanism" out of the question. Let us look only at the music itself. The question raised by certain claims made earnestly and sincerely in New York may be discussed in next Sunday's Journal.

This new quartette is, on the whole, a delightful and refreshing work. It is spontaneous, that is, with the exception of the scherzo, which seems to me comparatively sought-out and labored. Whatever the "national character" of the themes may be, the development is natural, healthy, simple, in a word, musical. There is no morbidness. There is no self-analysis or analysis of the universe and other things in this charming composition. The first movement is particularly frank in its expression. The slow movement abounds in romantic simplicity. The last movement is jolly without affectation. Here is music that reminds one of Gounod's remark on the ultra-modern school. There is a return to eighteenth century musical honesty and simplicity. The themes are characteristic—but not necessarily or inevitably characteristic of negro temperament, which seems now in certain quarters to be regarded as synonymous with American temperament. The negroes encountered by Mr. Dvorak have a singular habit of whistling Scotch and Bohemian tunes. The only reproach that might be perhaps justly made against this quartette, is that a too frequent use of the pentatonic scale might weary after several hearings, although at first it may be attractive.

***

It was a great pleasure to hear Mr. Busoni again. He is a pianist of remarkable, if limited, talent. His technique is peculiarly, and at times aggressively, brilliant. He dazzles, he dominates, he compels admiration, and, alas! he stuns. Not only is he a robust performer, but, to borrow a word from the new inspiration of Dvorak's muse, Mr. Busoni is frequently "robustious." Last evening he showed his peculiar qualities to full advantage. He played with overwhelming dash and power. A scale was the crack of a whip. A chord was like the crash of a boulder. But Mr. Busoni forgot occasionally the size of the hall, the fact that the piano cover was raised and that catgut cannot vie with the strings of a grand piano when they are smitten by fingers of steel.

The playing of the members of the quartette was admirable throughout.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, JAN. 2, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

First Public Performance of the Dvorak F Major Quartet.

The Kneisel quartet concerts are always long, and last night's consumed even more time than usual. It was 10 o'clock before the last number was finished; by that time many of the audience had left the hall.

And yet it was one of the most interesting concerts ever given in Chickering hall. First on the program was the Dvorak quartet in F major, which has never before been played in public, and only once anywhere. It was given a private performance in New York recently, and the composer was so pleased with the playing of the Kneisels that he gave them the manuscript which they used last night.

This composition is the result of the coming of Dvorak to this country. It was written last summer, and is supposed to be distinctly American. There is certainly in it much that is strikingly original, and the melodious parts strongly recall the type of southern negro music which the composer says he had in mind when he wrote the quartet. The whole is tuneful and taking. Last night the playing of the performers was exceptionally good, and the listeners were stirred to a high pitch of enthusiasm. It is safe to say that the Dvorak quartet is a success.

The other numbers on the program were the Brahms piano quartet in G minor, with Mr Busoni at the piano, and the Beethoven quintet in C major, in which Mr Zach played the second viola. Both were superbly performed, and Mr Busoni was given a handsome recall after his performance.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place in Chickering Hall last evening. The following programme was given:

Quartet in F major, op. 96, (M.S.).....Dvorak
P ano quartet in G minor, op. 25.....Brahms
Quintet in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven
Mr. F. Busoni was the pianist.

The quartet of Dvorak is one of the three compositions written during the past season by its eminent composer with the idea of presenting themes characteristic of the music of the Southern negro. Where there was little of this element displayed in the symphony played last Saturday evening there is quite a variety to be found in the quartet given in the above programme. Not only was the melody of the negro represented, but also many of the dance rhythms. These were all developed in that clear but masterly manner that has particularly marked the latest writings of Dvorak. This quartet was pungent with the flavor of these Southern airs and dances and held the attention of the audience to the end. One can see how monotonous this material might become in the hands of a less talented composer. It is to be hoped that mediocrity will not deluge our programmes in consequence of this innovation upon the part of the eminent Bohemian who has sought thus to display his genius. The quartet was played in the highest style identical with the artistic efforts of the Kneisel Quartet. It was enthusiastically applauded.

Mr. Busoni assisted in the Brahms quartet in his usually artistic manner. His playing last evening was marked by a hard and brilliant touch, and at times it was overpowering, leaving little opportunity for the three strong players to be heard. The concert closed with a most delightful rendering of the C major Quintet of Beethoven, making on the whole a rather long programme. Mr. ach, second violin, assisted in this latter piece. The next concert will take place, Jan. 22.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ferruccio Busoni and Mr. Max Zach, gave their fourth concert in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Dvorák: Quartet in F major, Opus 96 (MS.) (First time.)
Brahms: Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, Opus 25.
Beethoven: Quintet in C major, Opus 29.

The new Dvorák quartet, written like the eighth symphony, on "Negro-American" material, is a charming work at a first hearing. Of its true value one can hardly form much of an idea before hearing it oftener and studying it better; but the first impression it makes is certainly pleasing. It was admirably played.

Mr. Busoni played grandly in the great Brahms quartet, with noble fire, profoundness of conception, and that dazzling brilliancy of technique which is peculiarly his own; unfortunately also with an overpowering weight of tone often wholly out of proportion with the string parts. With this single exception, it was great playing. The ever beautiful Beethoven quintet, one of those earlier works of the master that, with all their Haydn and Mozart reminiscences, show his individuality of feeling unveiled by conventionality of expression, was exquisitely given and made the most delightful effect.

[65]

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
MONDAY, JANUARY 1

AN AMERICAN SYMPHONY.

The concert of Saturday, although of inordinate length, had points of especial interest which prevented anything like tedium setting in. For the first time since music began, a great composer, one of the modern masters, has taken up our folk-song and built a classical work upon this new foundation. The first presentation of such a work was sufficient to make the occasion historical, and to dignify the concert beyond any of its predecessors. One may acknowledge this without conceding absolute success to the work itself. Brilliant as music, the new symphony by Dvorak, founded on native themes, does not achieve a distinct nationality. It is not more clearly American than Bohemian or Russian. The formation of certain passages upon a scale with a flat seventh is more European than American, for if such scales exist here they come from a remote antiquity in other climes.

The work began with a strange mixture of kettledrum explosions and brooding. When the chief theme was ushered in, however, it proved to have something of the lilt of the plantation, and suggested that accentuation of hand and foot which belongs to Afro-American melody. Yet, for the matter of that, the same characteristic can be traced as far back as scriptural music, and the singing of the psalms in ancient Jerusalem was not widely different from the free improvisation and emphatic rhythm of a Southern camp-meeting, a fact which can easily be pro d by references to "clapping of hands" in e Old Testament, by Egyptian pictures of contemporary date, and by a study of the character of the poems as they have come down to us.

Nevertheless we may be permitted to call this lilt and rhythm "American" since it is a characteristic of part of our Southern folk-song.

Lastly Mr. Paur "cried 'Havock and let slip the dogs of war"; at least he gave a composition which it is difficult to review seriously. It was as unfair to bring Tschaikowsky to memory by his "1812" overture as it would have been to commemorate Beethoven with his battle symphony ("The Battle of Vittoria"), and such a racket has not been heard in Music Hall, not even in the days of the cat shows.

The "Marseillaise" attacked an innocent Russian folk-theme, and the result was terrible. The two themes coalesced very much as the Kilkenny cats did, or as the blue paper does with the white in a seidlitz powder. Auditors clung to their seats in excited enthusiasm as the Russian trombones and the French bass drums met; amidst the tumult one could see the brave conductor standing undaunted in the centre of the contending forces; then came the clangor of bells; the writer does not know whether they were the triumphant tones of festival chimes, or whether a general alarm had been turned in from the fire at Moscow, but they were out of tune in either case. Finally the work culminated with a varied assortment of thunderbolts, and now the ear doctors of Boston are with Mr. Paur, to a man.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

This was the program of the fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartette given last evening in Chickering Hall:

Quartette, F major, op. 96 (MS).....Dvorak
(First public performance.)
Piano quartette, G minor, op. 25.....Brahms
(Piano, Mr. Busoni.)
Quintette, C major, op. 29.....Beethoven
(2d Viola, Mr. Zach.)

It is said that this new quartette was composed by Dvorak between June 12 and 23, 1893. I believe that Spillville, Iowa, saw its birth, as well as the birth of a quintette for strings that has not yet appeared here. The symphony played Saturday night in Music Hall was written in the spring of the same year. The symphony, the quartette and the quintette are said to be built out of "American" material, and by some enthusiasts they are thought to be at least a starting point for the great American music of the future.

Now let us, in considering briefly the quartette, leave "Americanism" out of the question. Let us look only at the music itself. The question raised by certain claims made earnestly and sincerely in New York may be discussed in next Sunday's Journal.

This new quartette is, on the whole, a delightful and refreshing work. It is spontaneous, that is, with the exception of the scherzo, which seems to me comparatively sought-out and labored. Whatever the "national character" of the themes may be, the development is natural, healthy, simple, in a word, musical. There is no morbidness. There is no self-analysis or analysis of the universe and other things in this charming composition. The first movement is particularly frank in its expression. The slow movement abounds in romantic simplicity. The last movement is jolly without affectation. Here is music that reminds one of Gounod's remark on the ultra-modern school. There is a return to eighteenth century musical honesty and simplicity. The themes are characteristic—but not necessarily or inevitably characteristic of negro temperament, which seems now in certain quarters to be regarded as synonymous with American temperament. The negroes encountered by Mr. Dvorak have a singular habit of whistling Scotch and Bohemian tunes. The only reproach that might be perhaps justly made against this quartette, is that a too frequent use of the pentatonic scale might weary after several hearings, although at first it may be attractive.

***

It was a great pleasure to hear Mr. Busoni again. He is a pianist of remarkable, if limited, talent. His technique is peculiarly, and at times aggressively, brilliant. He dazzles, he dominates, he compels admiration, and, alas! he stuns. Not only is he a robust performer, but, to borrow a word from the new inspiration of Dvorak's muse, Mr. Busoni is frequently "robustious." Last evening he showed his peculiar qualities to full advantage. He played with overwhelming dash and power. A scale was the crack of a whip. A chord was like the crash of a boulder. But Mr. Busoni forgot occasionally the size of the hall, the fact that the piano cover was raised and that catgut cannot vie with the strings of a grand piano when they are smitten by fingers of steel.

The playing of the members of the quartette was admirable throughout.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The American symphony is a string quartette! Paradoxical as this may sound it is certainly true that Dvorak's Quartette in F, played for the first time at the Kneisel concert of last night, is far more redolent of the plantation than the master's symphony, performed last Saturday. The chief theme of the first movement was typical negro music, and it was placed in juxtaposition with other equally strong and characteristic Southern melodies. The development was masterly and did not obscure the popular flavor of the movement. The slow, second movement had a peculiarly mournful chief theme, and here violin and viola carried on some beautiful solo work. The shading and general ensemble in this was noteworthy even for the Kneisel quartette; the composition could not have been in better hands for its first performance.

The intermezzo, which came next, was less pronouncedly American, and was as much too short as the preceding movement had been too long. In the finale everything again spoke of native influence; there were plantation effects galore, and had there been a banjo introduced it would scarcely have shocked the auditor, for "walk-round," "breakdown" and every other species of Southern revelry seemed present. The composition is emphatically interesting, and although its second movement is rather given to over-repetition, its first and last movements are beautiful, at least to American ears. It is barely possible that the Southern flavor is accidental, but it is difficult to think so.

Now followed Brahms piano quartette in G minor, a composition that is to be ranked even with Schumaunn's great work in this form (op. 47). It brought that great artist, Ferucclo Busoni, to the piano. Glorious work he certainly did throughout the entire composition, but not a whole string orchestra could have balanced against him when once his enthusiasm broke loose. It was piano, piano and again piano (but very forte) and the three string players filled in the chinks as best they could. Yet when there were delicate passages, as in the muted work of the intermezzo, or the rippling cadences with pizzicato support of the Gypsy finale, the audience heard some of the finest Brahm's performance that has ever taken place in Boston, and the close was brilliant in the highest degree. The mysterious effects of the first movement were also superb,—there were spectres abroad in that strange, weird development. The difficulties of tempo were entirely overcome; every passage was as sure as if syncopations and artificial groupings did not exist. But the balance of power was lost as completely as it is in the European political field.

The concert ended with Beethoven's quintette in C, with Mr. Zach, as second viola, added to the forces, a worthy ending of a great concert. Every part of it was interesting, but the Kneisel quartette should not endeavor to outvie the symphony programmes in the matter of length.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, JAN. 2, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

First Public Performance of the Dvorak F Major Quartet.

The Kneisel quartet concerts are always long, and last night's consumed even more time than usual. It was 10 o'clock before the last number was finished; by that time many of the audience had left the hall.

And yet it was one of the most interesting concerts ever given in Chickering hall. First on the program was the Dvorak quartet in F major, which has never before been played in public, and only once anywhere. It was given a private performance in New York recently, and the composer was so pleased with the playing of the Kneisels that he gave them the manuscript which they used last night.

This composition is the result of the coming of Dvorak to this country. It was written last summer, and is supposed to be distinctly American. There is certainly in it much that is strikingly original, and the melodious parts strongly recall the type of southern negro music which the composer says he had in mind when he wrote the quartet. The whole is tuneful and taking. Last night the playing of the performers was exceptionally good, and the listeners were stirred to a high pitch of enthusiasm. It is safe to say that the Dvorak quartet is a success.

The other numbers on the program were the Brahms piano quartet in G minor, with Mr Busoni at the piano, and the Beethoven quintet in C major, in which Mr Zach played the second viola. Both were superbly performed, and Mr Busoni was given a handsome recall after his performance.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ferruccio Busoni and Mr. Max Zach, gave their fourth concert in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Dvorák: Quartet in F major, Opus 96 (MS.) (First time.)
Brahms: Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, Opus 25.
Beethoven: Quintet in C major, Opus 29.

The new Dvorák quartet, written like the eighth symphony, on "Negro-American" material, is a charming work at a first hearing. Of its true value one can hardly form much of an idea before hearing it oftener and studying it better; but the first impression it makes is certainly pleasing. It was admirably played.

Mr. Busoni played grandly in the great Brahms quartet, with noble fire, profoundness of conception, and that dazzling brilliancy of technique which is peculiarly his own; unfortunately also with an overpowering weight of tone often wholly out of proportion with the string parts. With this single exception, it was great playing. The ever beautiful Beethoven quintet, one of those earlier works of the master that, with all their Haydn and Mozart reminiscences, show his individuality of feeling unveiled by conventionality of expression, was exquisitely given and made the most delightful effect.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 2, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The fourth concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening was attended by a large and interested audience. The programme was Dvorak's quartet in F major, Brahms's piano quartet in G minor, and Beethoven's quintet in C major, with Mr. Busoni assisting at the piano and Mr. Zach the second viola. The first public performance of Dvorak's quartet was received with critical attention. It strongly savors of negro melodies in its thematic construction and is of a light order, with no particular depth or breadth. It is not a composition that is likely to win popular favor to a great degree and will rely more on the fame of its brilliant composer than on its own intrinsic worth. The playing of the quartet was, as usual, almost perfect. The cello work of Mr. Schroeder was delightful. Brahms's piano quartet, Mr. Busoni assisting, was played with splendid artistic feeling and expression. The first two movements were inclined to be dry and prosy. The fourth movement, Rondo a la Zingarese, was read in a brilliant manner, Mr. Busoni playing with pleasing and intelligent expression. Beethoven's quintet in C major, with Mr. Zach second viola, was listened to with intelligent appreciation. The concert attracted many of the celebrities of the social and musical world. The next concert will be Jan. 22.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 2.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The audience present at the fourth of the season's concerts by the Kneisel quartet, at Chickering Hall last evening, enjoyed a rare treat in chamber music, the programme including Dr. Dvorak's new string quartet, the quartet for piano and strings in G minor, op. 25, by Brahms, and the quintet for strings in C major, op. 29, by Beethoven.

The Dvorak quartet, still in manuscript, had its first public performance on this occasion and proved a worthy companion to the larger work from the same composer heard at the symphony concert on Saturday.

Like the symphony "From the New World," it is the product of Dvorak's most recent efforts, and reflects the influence which his study of American subjects has had upon him. Its themes are simple, but vastly pleasing melodies, and with the varied treatment given them they take on a constantly interesting character. The melodies are distinctly those of southern life, and they are made worthy of their use by the skill with which they are ornamented and elaborated. The quartet is a very pleasing addition to the organization's repertoire, and can but gain great favor as played by Mr. Kneisel and his associates.

A masterly performance of the Brahms quartet was given, with Mr. F. Busoni at the piano, and although at times the pianist made his instrument unduly prominent in the ensemble, he gave rare enjoyment by his otherwise, at all times, thoroughly artistic playing. An excellent performance of the familiar Beethoven quintet was given, with Mr. Zach as assisting viola player. The fifth concert will be given on the 22d inst.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
TUESDAY, JANUARY 2, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The fourth concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place in Chickering Hall last evening. The following programme was given:

Quartet in F major, op. 96, (M.S.).....Dvorak
Piano quartet in G minor, op. 25.....Brahms
Quintet in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven
Mr. F. Busoni was the pianist.

The quartet of Dvorak is one of the three compositions written during the past season by its eminent composer with the idea of presenting themes characteristic of the music of the Southern negro. Where there was little of this element displayed in the symphony played last Saturday evening there is quite a variety to be found in the quartet given in the above programme. Not only was the melody of the negro represented, but also many of the dance rhythms. These were all developed in that clear but masterly manner that has particularly marked the latest writings of Dvorak. This quartet was pungent with the flavor of these Southern airs and dances and held the attention of the audience to the end. One can see how monotonous this material might become in the hands of a less talented composer. It is to be hoped that mediocrity will not deluge our programmes in consequence of this innovation upon the part of the eminent Bohemian who has sought thus to display his genius. The quartet was played in the highest style identical with the artistic efforts of the Kneisel Quartet. It was enthusiastically applauded.

Mr. Busoni assisted in the Brahms quartet in his usually artistic manner. His playing last evening was marked by a hard and brilliant touch, and at times it was overpowering, leaving little opportunity for the three strong players to be heard. The concert closed with a most delightful rendering of the C major Quintet of Beethoven, making on the whole a rather long programme. Mr. ach, second violin, assisted in this latter piece. The next concert will take place, Jan. 22.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1894.

Tenth Symphony Concert: Novelties in Boston.

Nobody has any right to "speak diminutive" of Kelly's Macbeth music after hearing Tschaikowsky's Solemn (?) Overture from The Holy War, commemorating the defeat of Napoleon in his Russian invasion of 1812. It is indeed exciting to hear the Marseillaise chased and routed by the Russian theme, amid a fanfare of bells and booms. Grandly played! Who dare call Director Paur humdrum after this?

Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D, with cadenzas by Joachim, Hellmesberger, and the soloist, won for Mr. Kneisel an ovation thoroughly deserved.

But the great novelty of the day was Dvorak's Manuscript Symphony in E minor, No. 8, bearing "From the New World" as its title. Very enjoyable in its graceful treatment of themes partially familiar; but is it fair to call this an American Symphony? Negro melodies, made up of nobody knows what historic elements, are not really so American as the chants of the aboriginal Indians. To be sure slavery brought Africans hither, and their music with them, and this music has been modified by camp meetings, French blood, and other influences; but is it specially American? The composer's suggestion, that negro melodies would work well into symphonic forms, was at first understood as referring to such popular tunes as Susanna, Ole Virginny, Dearest Mae and so on, and there was a disposition to sneer at this notion, partly because these modern songs were written for negroes, not by them. Why laugh? Some of those melodies were borrowed from German symphonies, like Katy Darling, which comes from Mendelssohn. Then there are the so-called Spitituals, sung on the plantation, such as "Lord, Make Me More Patient!" and these might be mulled into classic mould, as indeed every strain can be; but this would not make them American. Dvorak's Symphony is delightful to hear, but it represents an infinitesimal fragment of imported America. Like the eminent composer himself, it is from the Old World rather than the New. A musician behind me whispered that he was mad clean through over the thought that such music, however fetching, should be accepted abroad as distinctively native to our shores.

Beethoven's First Symphony was indeed lovely under Paur's interpretation, at our ninth symphony concert. Then came Mozart's Hoffner Serenade, five of its light movements, with fine obligato passages by Mr. Kneisel; and Carl Baermann's velvety touch was most conspicuous in the Beethoven Concerto, No. 4, in G.; but the most refreshing number of the over-long concert was Schubert's Rosamunde Overture, like a spring morning. The cadenzas in the concerto were of Mr. Baermann's own arranging.

[65]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1894.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows :

Symphony, No. 5, E minor (MSS).....Dvorák
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

I confess that I was not excited over the news that Dvorák's "American" symphony would be played at the tenth Symphony concert in Music Hall until I accidentally came across a copy of the New York "Herald" of the 17th ult. I there learned that the importation of Dvorák was chiefly "to persuade the composer to attempt a bold exploration into the musical material of America and lay the foundations for a national school of composition."

And what did Mr. Dvorák do?

* * *

According to the New York "Herald" the said Mr. Dvorák began to study native music after his arrival in New York. Unfortunately for the future historian we are not told how he studied it, or whether he disguised himself in his exploration so that the music would not become suspicious, frightened, and then escape. It would be a pleasure to read of his wanderings in the jungles of the Bowery and in the deserts of Central Park. It would be interesting to know precisely his first thought on seeing the Harlem goat, an animal now rare. The composer is a modest man, and he has not even hinted at his perilous trips on the Elevated Railway or the Belt Line.

After I read of these adventures and of the intrepidity of the trip to Spillville, Ia., I was curious to hear the symphony, this symphony founded on "negro and Indian tunes," i. e., American tunes.

Then I read in other newspapers statements about Dvorák and this symphony, which convinced me that the work could only be appreciated properly by an audience composed exclusively of intelligent negroes and combed and washed Indians.

* * *

But, bless your soul, Dvorák has written delightful music, music that can be enjoyed by men and women, and children of any or every land, and without indulging himself in musical Americanisms.

I am told that a phrase of four measures announced by the horn in the first allegro is "American." It is "American," because it has a rhythmical construction "characteristic of the music which has a popular charm in this country;" and this rhythmical construction is what? Why, the Scot's snap, "a device common in Scottish music," and "it is found in Hungarian music too." Therefore it is American.

The phrase, this American phrase, "is built on the pentatonic, or five-note scale, which omits the fourth and seventh tones of our ordinary diatonic series." Now, this scale is Scotch, Irish, Chinese, "for the old music of these peoples and many others is marked by this peculiarity." Therefore it is American.

Then the subsidiary melody "gives a somewhat Oriental tinge to the movement." Therefore it is American.

The next specimen of Americanism is in the larghetto, "Dr. Dvorák's proclamation of the mood which he found in the song of Hiawatha's wooing, as set forth in Longfellow's poem." Hiawatha was an Indian. Therefore the symphony is American.

* * *

If this symphony were played without any advance and explanatory notice in any European city, would a German, or Italian, or Russian, or Scot, or Frenchman say at once, "Why, this is American music!"

Would he not find any and all music but American?

Would he not find Scandinavian hints, Hungarian rhythm, Bohemian thought, Scotch melody and Oriental feeling; would he not find tributes to all nations; would he not admire the workmanship and leave the concert hall without a thought of negro, Indian or native born white citizen of the United States?

The rhythm of the first phrase of the first movement is perhaps suggestive of the Southern steamboat and the plantation; but the rhythm is also partly European. The larghetto is full of Scotch and Scandinavian suggestion. The scherzo is anything you please; but: this may be said as an exhibition of American characteristics real or alleged, as a musical exhibition of dash, "smartness," lack of reverence and general devil-me-care, it is not to be named in the same breath with Mr. Chadwick's symphonic scherzo. As for the finale, that, too, is what-you-will; there is a hint at "Yankee Doodle," but the temporary use of a transplanted tune does not make an "American" symphony.

Nor can you expect a Bohemian composer to throw off suddenly his nationality and forget it when he writes.

* * *

But there is much that is beautiful in this same symphony. First of all, it is cheerful and agreeable music. There is no touch of pessimism. There is no struggle with the Infinite. The composer has the simple faith of a healthy child. There is the spirit of Nature. There is a thought of woods and fields. Simple and pleasing thoughts are expressed intelligibly. At times the thoughts are clad gorgeously in instrumental colors, but the beauty of the thoughts does not suffer thereby, nor is it puffed up or distorted.

* * *

The overture of Tschaikowsky abounds in "alarums within and without." The plaintive church hymn is at first frightened by the triumphant "Marseillaise;" but the French conquer only for a moment. Cossacks scour the plain. There is the Russian general with the terrible name. There is the fire; there is the snow. The "Marseillaise" is heard no more. There is the exultation of a delivered nation. Such music as this overture of Tschaikowsky is perhaps panoramic, or even cycloramic. It would not do as a weekly dose. But it is a good thing to hear such music once in a while, to have the pulse stirred, to feel the consciousness of the raging animal that is in the body of even the most smug and exemplary citizen, although he may not know it.

*

Mr. Kneisel played his part in the concerto by Beethoven with infinite care and taste. The fine characteristics of his performance have always received full praise in this city. While it is only justice to this admirable violinist to praise at length his accuracy, his usually faultless intonation, his elegance and general finish, it may also be said that his temperament is such that he does not appear to complete advantage in such a work as the Beethoven concerto, which demands a player of more heroic mold.

* * *

Whether the performance of the symphony was in accordance with wishes indicated or suggested by the composer I know not, as I had no opportunity of seeing the score. Mr. Paur certainly took the greatest of pains in the bringing out of the work. He was diligent in rehearsal. In the concert he seemed to be unusually flexible in directing. The performance of the orchestra was excellent throughout the concert. The concert itself was too long. The second and the third movements of the concerto might well have been omitted.

* * *

This is the program of the Kneisel concert in Chickering Hall to-morrow evening: Dvorák's quartet, F major (MS.); Brahms' piano quartet, G major; Beethoven's C major quintet, op. 29. The Dvorák quartet will be played for the first time in public. Mr. Busoni will be the pianist. Mr. Zach will play the second viola.

This is the program of the Symphony concert at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening: Brahms' C minor symphony; air, "Alceste," Gluck; overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; air, "Oberon," Weber; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky. Mrs. Amalia Materna will sing.

The program of the Symphony rehearsal and concert in Music Hall this week will be as follows. All the works are by Wagner:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg;" "Vorspiel" und "Liebestod" ("Prelude and Love-death"), from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Siegfried Idyl;" a "Faust" overture; "Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Götterdämmerung;" "Brünhilde's" dying speech. Mrs. Amalia Materna will sing.

AND the Boston "Transcript" is prepared to state to its readers that Mr. Emil Paur's contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra runs bona fide for a term of five years? We shall refer to this subject at the end of Mr. Paur's first term.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 7.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was devoted wholly to Wagner, as follows: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde"; the Siegfried Idyl; the "Faust" overture; Siegfried's Funeral March and Brünnhilde's lament over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung." This is a very large dose of Wagner for one evening, but there were doubtless many in the audience who enjoyed every bar of it. However, to others, who were not enthusiastic worshippers of Wagner, it proved somewhat cloying, not to say wearisome. All the selections had been heard frequently at these concerts, and Mr. Krehbiel kindly came on from New York, on several occasions, to explain to us the meaning of several of them, in order that we might be enabled to palpitate with the right emotion, anent them. It might have added interest to the occasion if he could have been induced to enlighten us regarding them at this concert, but the chances are that he would have found serious objections, owing to the fact that a hearing of the Dvorak American Symphony caused him so much discomfort that he cryptogramically pronounced the orchestra to be "N. G." There is nothing new to be said about the music. Of the performances we feel justified in writing in the warmest terms of commendation. Mr. Paur's readings were masterly throughout, and the playing of the orchestra was faultless. The "Meistersinger" overture had never been given here with the perfect clearness that attended its interpretation by Mr. Paur, last night. The Idyl was also beautifully read and played. The soloist was Mme. Materna, who sang the Liebestod from "Tristran," and Brunnhilde's lament. She acquitted herself with all necessary robustness of style, and doubtless with thorough fidelity to the composer's intentions. She certainly declaimed with great dramatic fervor. For singing, pure and simple, the music affords slight opportunity; and it must be said that the voice part in the score has little meaning or interest without its proper stage surroundings. In fact, it has little meaning under any conditions. The words are of the chief importance, and these can only seldom be heard through the din of the orchestra. Madame Materna's voice sounded worn in its middle notes, and her high notes alone were effective. These she shouted forth with penetrating effect, and doubtless achieved all that could be achieved under the circumstances. She was applauded with furious enthusiasm, which proves that musical noise is not without appreciation. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, B-minor, Bach; Scotch Symphony, Mendelssohn; Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

Settled on the Music Hall Site.

West Chester park and Huntington avenue will be the location of the new Music Hall. That point was definitely settled at the meeting of the stockholders of the new association, which was held at 50 State street, yesterday. The corporation assumed the loan raised to pay for the land, and all other obligations. The lot measures 150 feet on the avenue and has a depth of 225 feet. The price was $170,000, which was borrowed for five years at 4½ per cent. The model of the interior of the hall, which has been prepared by McKim, Mead & White, will be displayed in the new Public Library building, to the stockholders, this week. The model is twelve feet square and fourteen feet high, and gives an excellent idea of the building which their architects would like to be commissioned to erect.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1894.

The symphony programme last night was wholly Wagnerian and wholly satisfactory from the opening "Meistersinger Prelude" to the grandly dramatic "Brunnhilde's dying speech" in the concluding number, from the Gotterdammerung. The selections are all too well known to call for analysis or criticism. To criticize Wagner, indeed, seems today almost sacrilegious, standing as he does, a god among composers. To the performance of his work only words of praise can be given, viewing it "by and large." The new conductor is rapidly acquiring the perfect control of his men which is necessary to a fluent and coherent translation of great musical thought, and the orchestra already shows the strong influence of a strong leadership. Few preformances since Mr. Gericke's reign have been so distinctly animated by a dominating virility as that of the "Funeral Music," for instance. The brasses were occasionally a bit energetic and there were intermittent roughnesses in the double basses, in the Prelude from the Meistersingers, but they were not strongly marked defects, and the vigorous direction of Mr. Paur quickly made itself felt. Madame Materna, the famous Wagnerian soprano, reappeared in Boston at this and the Friday concert, for the first times in several years, and was received with a warmth of welcome that deepened into enthusiasm after her noble rendering of the Isolde music (the Love-death). Her voice retains its breadth and richness and her dramatic feeling conveys every shade of sentiment in that most exquisite love song which shows Wagner to have been as true a poet as musician. In the Brunnhilde music her singing was superbly dramatic, thrillingly intense; but here the orchestra may be gravely criticised for forgetting the singer at times and playing with an unrestrained fervor in which only the voice of a steam calliope could hold its own. Indeed this was the one serious blemish of the performance.

It is interesting to watch the conductor as he sways his potent baton. Every nerve is tense with feeling, every fibre thrills with the music spell. No cool, impassive man is here, with calm, intellectual deliberation, seeking "effects," but a musician with brain, soul and body all on fire with the music and intent only on uttering what it says to him. Mr. Paur is evidently a rarely gifted director and with the superb body of musicians under his control there is no limit to the musical possibilities of the next few years.

RENÉ S. PARKS.

NEW MUSIC AT THE KNEISEL—A WAGNER NIGHT AT THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

Always notable among the concerts of the season are those given by the Kneisel Quartet, and the fourth on Monday night was almost pre-eminently fine. The first number, perhaps, claimed a somewhat special attention, as it was the first public performance of a quartet by Dvorak, and played from the MS. The great Hungarian composer seems to have emancipated himself with almost startling rapidity from the atmosphere of his native land, for in this quartet (in F. major) he writes in a spirit more truly American than any American composer. It is not idle to speak of an "American spirit" in music, although some so conceive it; certainly the work presented by the Kneisel Quartet breathes of southern air, of northern vigor. It is all in impalpable suggestion, it is true, but the feeling is unmistakable. The quality throughout is delightful—frank, musical in the highest degree, simple with the simplicity that is consummate art. The first movement might be considered a trifle over-developed by a carping critic, but let us take the gifts the gods provide—and is truly of such—and be devoutly thankful.

The artistic work of the players cannot be too highly commended. The shading throughout was exquisite and on this much of the beauty of the second movement depended.

The second number on the programme was the Brahms piano quartet in G minor, opus 25, with Mr. Ferrucio Busoni as pianist. It is a marvelous composition and take it all in all, was performed superbly. Mr. Busoni is not at his best, however, in ensemble work of this character. His intensity at times overpowers the strings and sweeps away regard for the unities of the work. He is a great artist; his technique is perfect; his interpretations always intellectual, but he lacks or has not yet fully developed the sense of proportion in which some other great players excel—our own. Mr. Baermann, for instance, whose poise is always as perfect as his technique.

The third and closing number was Beethoven's Quintet in C major, op. 29, to which that always delightful player, Mr. Zach, contributed the additional force. It was a fitting ending to an exceptionally lovely concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 7.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1894.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mme. Materna.

Conductor Emil Paur evidently pleased himself, and certainly gratified his patrons of the symphony concerts, last evening, by presenting them with a programme exclusively confined to excerpts from the Wagner music-dramas.

Whatever opinions may be held as to the desirability of concert performances of such programmes, there can be but one opinion in regard to such interpretations of the several numbers as were given by Conductor Paur last evening. His readings showed a thorough familiarity with the Wagnerian repertoire, and were characterized by a dramatic treatment of the several selections eminently in keeping with their characteristics. Without striving for sensational effects, he gave to all the selections a life and freshness that showed him to be a master in the treatment of this school of music.

The prelude to the "Meistersingers," which made the opening number of the programme was magnificently played, its ever varying movements being brought out with splendid strength and dramatic feeling. The "Siegfried" idyl was given with a beauty and delicacy that has rarely been equalled in former performances, and the "Faust" overture had a broadly dramatic reading which was very satisfying. Conductor Paur was equally successful in the great funeral march from "Gotterdammerung," which completed the list of strictly instrumental selections, and was played with magnificent effect.

Mme. Amalia Materna was the soloist of the evening being heard in "Isolde's Love Death" and Brunnhilde's "Dying Speech." This great artist has been absent from Boston for many years, and it was very gratifying to find that time had dealt very gently with her vocal abilities. She will be recalled as one of the principal singers in the German opera seasons of some years ago, and also as the prima donna of the notable Wagner festivals which created such a sensation throughoutthe country some 10 years ago. She is a great dramatic artist, and her treatment of such numbers as those in which she was heard last evening may well be taken as a standard. The severe tests put to the singer were met with splendid success by Mme. Materna, and she contended with the orchestra in a way to arouse the greatest respect for her physical endurance. Her reception upon her entrance showed that her earlier triumphs were still fresh in the minds of many of the audience, and she was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause which followed each of her numbers.

As a whole Mr. Paur is to be heartily congratulated upon the success of his first Wagnerian programme. It is to be hoped, however, that he will not assume that such programmes are desired often by the patrons of these concerts.

The usual concert and rehearsal will be omitted next week, and on the evening of the 20th inst. the programme will consist of Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3 in A minor, and the "King Lear" overture, Berlioz.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 7, 1894.

Wagner Music Sung and Played at the Symphony—Benefit Concerts Tonight—Other Events.

The program of yesterday's symphony concert, the 11th of this season, was composed entirely of selections from the writings of Richard Wagner, as follows; Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," in C major; prelude and "Isolde's Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde;" a Siegfried idyl, in E major; a Faust overture, in D minor; Siegfried's Funeral march, from "Gotterdammerung," act 3, scene 2; Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung," act 3, scene 3.

The soloist was Mme Amalia Materna, a singer who has often won praises here in the past for admirable interpretation of Wagner music.

The audience was one of the largest of the season at the Friday afternoon rehearsal as well as at last night's concert. It is notable that the attendance is always increased when a vocal soloist is to be heard, which would indicate that the exceeding popularity of director Paur would be even greater were he to more frequently have vocalists upon his programs.

The playing of the orchestra yesterday was so generally excellent that it is unnecessary to single out any one selection for special praise. Each was played with superb effect; no more forcible, intelligent or sympathetic reading of Wagner's writings has ever been given by this orchestra. It is very gratifying to note that the Boston symphony orchestra's past standard of excellence has not only been maintained, but has actually improved under Mr Paur's direction.

Yesterday's program may have seemed rather heavy to many in the audience, and it could have been wished that some of the German master's earlier and more melodious compositions had been included in the selections, but everybody must have enjoyed the work of orchestra and soloist.

Mme Materna's robust personality and resonant voice is well adapted to interpreting the weighty music with which Wagner has laden his dramas. Very few singers would be able to hold their own against the volume of tone brought forth by the heartiest efforts of 60 symphony orchestra players. That Mme Materna's voice could be heard above all was evidence of the splendid vigor of her vocal organs. Her voice is of excellent quality, a clear soprano of good range and remarkable power. In the recitative passages the words were clearly enunciated and sung with much dramatic effect.

There will be no public rehearsal or concert this week. For the concert on Jan 20 the program will be: Suite in B minor, Bach; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn; overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 8, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

A Wagner programme, with a famous Wagnerian singer, was sufficient to crowd Music Hall at the concert of Saturday. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" began the programme. It received a good reading, Mr. Paur being exactly in his element in preserving the clearness of the polyphonic strands of the intricate web; not a sub-theme or a motif was lost, although there was something of rigidity in the presentation of them. Those who imagine that Wagner is formless can study this prelude to advantage, for in its way it is as logical as any overture, and even the violations of contrapuntal laws find extenuation in coherent leading of the voices.

The death scene from "Tristan and Isolde" brought Madame Materna back to our concert platform after a long lapse of years. It is pleasant to be able to say that time has dealt gently with the singer. A trifle of explosive force instead of sustained power, a slight inequality in middle register, that is all that the severest critic is able to animadvert upon, and against this one must balance a perfect understanding of the music, an artistic intelligence of highest rank and years of earnest service to art rather than to mammon. The ensemble was excellent, and the surety of the singer led to a sense of security on the part of the audience that added not a little to the enjoyment of the number. The heartiest enthusiasm followed the conclusion of the work, and Mme. Materna was recalled with most spontaneous applause. The orchestra did excellently, both in this and the prelude leading up to it.

The "Siegfried Idyl," which followed, proves two points definitely—firstly, Wagner was able to present his ideas with a small orchestra when necessary. The intertwining of the two phrases, "Siegfried, treasure of the world," and the "Peace-theme," is a great effect, although produced by simple means and slight orchestral resources. Secondly, one finds in this a complete refutation of Rowbotham's statement that Wagner did not actually believe in his own theories, for here, in a work intended only for the family circle, a composition celebrating his wife and son, we find all the essential theories put in practice. The Germans have playfully called this work "Treppenmusik" ("stairway-music") because it was first performed on the stairway leading to Madame Wagner's chamber in Villa Triebschen near Luzerne. That the sense of the work may be fully comprehended a translation of Wagner's poem, which he gave to his wife just before the performance, (which took place on her birthday) is appended:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim.
In the dark hour of conflict they upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming;
Siegfried, must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be?
Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free.

Within its cadence I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee,
And all the harmonies I now am bringing,
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

There has never been a better performance of the "Faust Overture" than was given upon this occasion. Probably no subject in poetry has been set to music so frequently as the great poem by Goethe, and the diverse treatments could scarcely be described in a volume. Gounod's and Wagner's treatments of the theme mark the extreme limits, and are in a degree opposites. Gounod discarded all the philosophical part of the work, and made the love episode with Gretchen the central point of his endeavor, so that in Germany his opera is not unjustly called "Margarethe;" Wagner renounced the feminine element altogether and gave a philosophical tone-picture of Faust, the self-tormenting, the yearner after the infinite. Begun in the dark days of Wagner's early Parisian experiences, in 1840, one can readily imagine that the poet's line,

"Forego thou must, thou must forego,"

would speak with especial force to his imagination, and this would seem to give the keynote to the imagination better than the motto which Wagner attached to it when he rewrote the work in Zurich fifteen years later. This motto is:—

Der Gott der mir in Busen wohnt,
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen;
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen,
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst

The last lines

And so I live on, weary of my breath,
Yet life I hate, and wish and long for Death,

are, however, palpably present even from the first remarkable phrase upon the contrabasses and tuba.

The Siegfried funeral march is not so definitely a march as a Bardic recital of history. The orchestra tells the story of Siegfried's life and death. Chopin's funeral march may be the noblest specimen of its school upon the piano, Beethoven's heroic symphony may present what Coleridge called "A funeral march in purple," but this Wagnerian reproduction of ancient heroic recital overtops all the mortuary music ever written, in fitness to the situation, in grandeur of conception, in sublimity of working-out. Every leit-motif was given with clearness, so that the tale lost nothing in the telling.

Every number of the programme was well chosen, so that Wagner was heard in many different moods, and no effect of monotony was produced. No better ending to the concert could have been found than the finale to the "Goetterdaemmerung." What a bold departure from old usage it is in itself! No chorus standing around with perfunctory expressions of stereotyped woe, no grouping of the chief singers for a tour de forces, but the expression of mortal sorrow from a woman that do 2d inconme 3s—....b 6s: 6 last.

RAILROADS.
Phila&Erf 6s, Dub div—114½b ....s: 115 last.
New York&NE 1st 7s—108½b 112s: 109 last. do 1st 6s—103½b 104s: 104 last.
do 2d 6s—89½b 90s: 88 last.
NewEng Telephone 6s—....b 104½s: 104½ last.
Ored&LakeCh con 6s—....b 103s: 104 last.
OregonShortLine 6s—77½b ....s: 84 last.
RutlandR 1st 6s—....b ....s: 109½ last.
do 2d 5s—98½b 100s: 99¾ last.
Union Pac 2-year notes—....b 90s: 90¾ last.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1894.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Prelude to "The Master of Singer of Nuremberg"
Prelude and "Isold's Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"
A Siegfried Idyl
A Faust overture
Siegfried's funeral march, from "Gotterdammerung"
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung"
} Wagner.

These pieces have been played and sung on many occasions and there is no need now of extended criticism. The Wagner of theory would not have allowed such excerpts from his works. The Wagner of practice, no doubt, would have joined heartily in the applause. It may be said that the "Siegfried Idyl" was the feature of last evening's program, and it was played superbly.

In the prelude to the "Master Singers" and in the "Faust overture" the brass was blatant. The string orchestra throughout the evening was most excellent. If the "Faust" overture was omitted, the program would have given greater satisfaction.

Mrs. Materna was not heard in the excerpt from "Tristan and Isolde." She seemed to recognize her inability to cope with the orchestra in this number. In the scene from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" she was more effective; but the weakness of her middle register in this speech was so noticeable that it precluded full enjoyment.

CORNER OF PARK AND AVENUE.

Site of New Music Hall Settled at Last by Stockholders.

The question of the site of the new Music Hall has been finally determined.

Saturday a meeting of the stockholders was held in the office of Harvard College at 50 State Street, and it was voted to purchase the lot of land on the corner of West Chester Park and Huntington Avenue.

This is the same lot that was secured last year by four of the stockholders, who offered the property to the corporation for $170,000, the same amount which they paid for. At a meeting Saturday it was decided to accept the offer.

The lot contains about 33,986 square feet, with a frontage of 150 feet on the avenue and 225 feet on the park.

This does not necessarily mean that the work of preparing plans for a building will be commenced right away or even in the near future, as it is impossible to tell when any move toward that end will be made.

No plans have been solicited by the Directors, but a suggestion for an interior has been made by McKim, Mead & White of New York in the form of a plaster model, and the Directors are to place it on exhibition at the Public Library on Monday morning, where they hope the public will see it and criticise it fully.

The model which is to be exhibited at the new Public Library building is only of the interior, and is entirely different from anything in New England. The nearest approach to it is Sanders Theatre at Harvard, and here the similarity is only very general, in detail the idea suggested for the Music Hall being very unlike this theatre.

There are to be no galleries, but the seats are arranged in the form of a big horseshoe and form one great bank. They are so constructed that under the rear ones others can be put in, but the space under these seats it is intended to use mainly for standing room.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1894.

Last evening was a Wagner night at the Symphony concert in Music Hall. All the numbers were from compositions of the famous German, and the soloist was Mme. Amalia Materna. The first selection was the prelude to "The Meistersinger," which was interesting from the artistic and somewhat novel reading of Mr. Paur.

The "Siegfried Idyl," a "Faust" overture, "Siegfried's Funeral March" were the other numbers given by the orchestra, all of which were played with skill and displayed a new phase of Mr. Paur's conducting.

Mme. Materna sang the prelude and "Love, Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Brunhilde's dying speech from "Gotterdammerung." The eminent singer has been heard in both selections in this city, and it can only be said that she shows no deterioration from her past efforts. She easily stands at the head of exponents of Wagner in soprano roles, and her fine voice was given full scope.

The selection from "Tristan and Isolde" was less familiar than the other, but it was equally well received, and the audience showed its hearty appreciation.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 19 and 20, will consist of Bach's suite in B minor for string orchestra and flutes; Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, and Berlioz's overture "King Lear."

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4 1894

THE SPENCER SUN

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was a somewhat larger audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of their second concert in Worcester last week than on the first night, and we were glad to see so large a party from Spencer. The program being rather more severely classical than that of the first concert, may possibly have given less pleasure to the ordinary concert goer. Yet even a Brahms symphony, difficult of comprehension though it may be, when played as it was last Thursday evening, cannot fail to be exceedingly interesting, and, doubtless, to some present, delightful. All were on the qui vive for the second number on the program, which introduced to the audience the soloist of the evening, Mrs. Emil Pauer, wife of the conductor, whose first appearance in Worcester had been looked forward to with much interest.

Although Mrs. Pauer may not have realized the expectations of some of her hearers, there was certainly much to enjoy in her rendering of Schubert's "Wanderer fantasis." If not a great player, she is, without doubt, a most excellent pianist. The Saint Saens "Spinning Wheel" was a most delightful number and evidently thoroughly appreciated by the audience, judging by the applause it called forth. The program closed with the Benvenuto Cellini Overture by Berlioz, which was given by the orchestra with brilliant effect. The next concert will be given Tuesday evening, January 30.

[67]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 7.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1893.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mme. Materna.

Conductor Emil Paur evidently pleased himself, and certainly gratified his patrons of the symphony concerts, last evening, by presenting them with a programme exclusively confined to excerpts from the Wagner music-dramas.

Whatever opinions may be held as to the desirability of concert performances of such programmes, there can be but one opinion in regard to such interpretations of the several numbers as were given by Conductor Paur last evening. His readings showed a thorough familiarity with the Wagnerian repertoire, and were characterized by a dramatic treatment of the several selections eminently in keeping with their characteristics. Without striving for sensational effects, he gave to all the selections a life and freshness that showed him to be a master in the treatment of this school of music.

The prelude to the "Meistersingers," which made the opening number of the programme was magnificently played, its ever varying movements being brought out with splendid strength and dramatic feeling. The "Siegfried" idyl was given with a beauty and delicacy that has rarely been equalled in former performances, and the "Faust" overture had a broadly dramatic reading which was very satisfying. Conductor Paur was equally successful in the great funeral march from "Gotterdammerrung," which completed the list of strictly instrumental selections, and was played with magnificent effect.

Mme. Amalia Materna was the soloist of the evening being heard in "Isolde's Love Death" and Brunnhilde's "Dying Speech." This great artist has been absent from Boston for many years, and it was very gratifying to find that time had dealt very gently with her vocal abilities. She will be recalled as one of the principal singers in the German opera seasons of some years ago, and also as the prima donna of the notable Wagner festivals which created such a sensation throughoutthe country some 10 years ago. She is a great dramatic artist, and her treatment of such numbers as those in which she was heard last evening may well be taken as a standard. The severe tests put to the singer were met with splendid success by Mme. Materna, and she contended with the orchestra in a way to arouse the greatest respect for her physical endurance. Her reception upon her entrance showed that her earlier triumphs were still fresh in the minds of many of the audience, and she was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause which followed each of her numbers.

As a whole Mr. Paur is to be heartily congratulated upon the success of his first Wagnerian programme. It is to be hoped, however, that he will not assume that such programmes are desired often by the patrons of these concerts.

The usual concert and rehearsal will be omitted next week, and on the evening of the 20th inst. the programme will consist of Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3 in A minor, and the "King Lear" overture, Berlioz.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 7, 1894.

Wagner Music Sung and Played at the Symphony—Benefit Concerts Tonight—Other Events.

The program of yesterday's symphony concert, the 11th of this season, was composed entirely of selections from the writings of Richard Wagner, as follows; Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," in C major; prelude and "Isolde's Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde;" a Siegfried idyl, in E major; a Faust overture, in D minor; Siegfried's Funeral march, from "Gotterdammerung," act 3, scene 2; Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung," act 3, scene 3.

The soloist was Mme Amalia Materna, a singer who has often won praises here in the past for admirable interpretation of Wagner music.

The audience was one of the largest of the season at the Friday afternoon rehearsal as well as at last night's concert. It is notable that the attendance is always increased when a vocal soloist is to be heard, which would indicate that the exceeding popularity of director Paur would be even greater were he to more frequently have vocalists upon his programs.

The playing of the orchestra yesterday was so generally excellent that it is unnecessary to single out any one selection for special praise. Each was played with superb effect; no more forcible, intelligent or sympathetic reading of Wagner's writings has ever been given by this orchestra. It is very gratifying to note that the Boston symphony orchestra's past standard of excellence has not only been maintained, but has actually improved under Mr Paur's direction.

Yesterday's program may have seemed rather heavy to many in the audience, and it could have been wished that some of the German master's earlier and more melodious compositions had been included in the selections, but everybody must have enjoyed the work of orchestra and soloist.

Mme Materna's robust personality and resonant voice is well adapted to interpreting the weighty music with which Wagner has laden his dramas. Very few singers would be able to hold their own against the volume of tone brought forth by the heartiest efforts of 60 symphony orchestra players. That Mme Materna's voice could be heard above all was evidence of the splendid vigor of her vocal organs. Her voice is of excellent quality, a clear soprano of good range and remarkable power. In the recitative passages the words were clearly enunciated and sung with much dramatic effect.

There will be no public rehearsal or concert this week. For the concert on Jan 20 the program will be: Suite in B minor, Bach; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn; overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 8, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

A Wagner programme, with a famous Wagnerian singer, was sufficient to crowd Music Hall at the concert of Saturday. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" began the programme. It received a good reading, Mr. Paur being exactly in his element in preserving the clearness of the polyphonic strands of the intricate web; not a subtheme or a motif was lost, although there was something of rigidity in the presentation of them. Those who imagine that Wagner is formless can study this prelude to advantage, for in its way it is as logical as any overture, and even the violations of contrapuntal laws find extenuation in coherent leading of the voices.

The death scene from "Tristan and Isolde" brought Madame Materna back to our concert platform after a long lapse of years. It is pleasant to be able to say that time has dealt gently with the singer. A trifle of explosive force instead of sustained power, a slight inequality in middle register, that is all that the severest critic is able to animadvert upon, and against this one must balance a perfect understanding of the music, an artistic intelligence of highest rank and years of earnest service, to art rather than to mammon. The ensemble was excellent, and the surety of the singer led to a sense of security on the part of the audience that added not a little to the enjoyment of the number. The heartiest enthusiasm followed the conclusion of the work, and Mme. Materna was recalled with most spontaneous applause. The orchestra did excellently, both in this and the prelude leading up to it.

The "Siegfried Idyl," which followed, proves two points definitely—firstly, Wagner was able to present his ideas with a small orchestra when necessary. The intertwining of the two phrases, "Siegfried, treasure of the world," and the "Peace-theme," is a great effect, although produced by simple means and slight orchestral resources. Secondly, one finds in this a complete refutation of Rowbotham's statement that Wagner did not actually believe in his own theories, for here, in a work intended only for the family circle, a composition celebrating his wife and son, we find all the essential theories put in practice. The Germans have playfully called this work "Treppenmusik" ("stairway-music") because it was first performed on the stairway leading to Madame Wagner's chamber in Villa Triebschen near Luzerne. That the sense of the work may be fully comprehended a translation of Wagner's poem, which he gave to his wife just before the performance, (which took place on her birthday) is appended:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim.
In the dark hour of conflict they upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming;
Siegfried, must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be?
Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free.

Within its cadence I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee,
And all the harmonies I now am bringing,
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

There has never been a better performance of the "Faust Overture" than was given upon this occasion. Probably no subject in poetry has been set to music so frequently as the great poem by Goethe, and the diverse treatments could scarcely be described in a volume. Gounod's and Wagner's treatments of the theme mark the extreme limits, and are in a degree opposites. Gounod discarded all the philosophical part of the work, and made the love episode with Gretchen the central point of his endeavor, so that in Germany his opera is not unjustly called "Margarethe;" Wagner renounced the feminine element altogether and gave a philosophical tone-picture of Faust, the self-tormenting, the yearner after the infinite. Begun in the dark days of Wagner's early Parisian experiences, in 1840, one can readily imagine that the poet's line,

"Forego thou must, thou must forego,"

would speak with especial force to his imagination, and this would seem to give the keynote to the imagination better than the motto which Wagner attached to it when he rewrote the work in Zurich fifteen years later. This motto is:—

Der Gott der mir in Busen wohnt,
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen;
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen,
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst

The last lines

And so I live on, weary of my breath,
Yet life I hate, and wish and long for Death,

are, however, palpably present even from the first remarkable phrase upon the contrabasses and tuba.

The Siegfried funeral march is not so definitely a march as a Bardic recital of history. The orchestra tells the story of Siegfried's life and death. Chopin's funeral march may be the noblest specimen of its school upon the piano, Beethoven's heroic symphony may present what Coleridge called "A funeral march in purple," but this Wagnerian reproduction of ancient heroic recital overtops all the mortuary music ever written, in fitness to the situation, in grandeur of conception, in sublimity of working-out. Every leit-motif was given with clearness, so that the tale lost nothing in the telling.

Every number of the programme was well chosen, so that Wagner was heard in many different moods, and no effect of monotony was produced. No better ending to the concert could have been found than the finale to the "Goetterdaemmerung." What a bold departure from old usage it is in itself! No chorus standing around with perfunctory expressions of stereotyped woe, no grouping of the chief singers for a tour de force, but the expression of mortal sorrow from a woman that had been immortal, a climax of grief without weakness. The writer recalls a performance of this finale by this same artist at Villa Wahnfried on the day after the first performance of "The Mastersingers" in Bayreuth; Mottl was at the piano, Stavenhagen, Lamoureux, Prince Alexander of Hesse, and a whole host of the Wagnerian inner circle were among the auditors; then and there Materna made that number her own by right of conquest, almost by right of discovery, for she brought a heroism into it that one could not realize from the score. At the concert of Saturday there was something of this heroism, much was achieved, and yet more suggested, and it was a worthy tribute to a veteran in Wagner's music, the lingering of the audience after the last number of the programme, to recall the singer (and the conductor, too) again and again.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1894.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Prelude to "The Master of Singer of Nuremberg"
Prelude and "Isold's Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"
A Siegfried Idyl
A Faust overture
Siegfried's funeral march, from "Gotterdammerung"
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung"
} Wagner.

These pieces have been played and sung on many occasions and there is no need now of extended criticism. The Wagner of theory would not have allowed such excerpts from his works. The Wagner of practice, no doubt, would have joined heartily in the applause. It may be said that the "Siegfried Idyl" was the feature of last evening's program, and it was played superbly.

In the prelude to the "Master Singers" and in the "Faust overture" the brass was blatant. The string orchestra throughout the evening was most excellent. If the "Faust" overture was omitted, the program would have given greater satisfaction.

Mrs. Materna was not heard in the excerpt from "Tristan and Isolde." She seemed to recognize her inability to cope with the orchestra in this number. In the scene from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" she was more effective; but the weakness of her middle register in this speech was so noticeable that it precluded full enjoyment.

CORNER OF PARK AND AVENUE.

Site of New Music Hall Settled at Last by Stockholders.

The question of the site of the new Music Hall has been finally determined.

Saturday a meeting of the stockholders was held in the office of Harvard College at 50 State Street, and it was voted to purchase the lot of land on the corner of West Chester Park and Huntington Avenue.

This is the same lot that was secured last year by four of the stockholders, who offered the property to the corporation for $170,000, the same amount which they paid for. At a meeting Saturday it was decided to accept the offer.

The lot contains about 33,986 square feet, with a frontage of 150 feet on the avenue and 225 feet on the park.

This does not necessarily mean that the work of preparing plans for a building will be commenced right away or even in the near future, as it is impossible to tell when any move toward that end will be made.

No plans have been solicited by the Directors, but a suggestion for an interior has been made by McKim, Mead & White of New York in the form of a plaster model, and the Directors are to place it on exhibition at the Public Library on Monday morning, where they hope the public will see it and criticise it fully.

The model which is to be exhibited at the new Public Library building is only of the interior, and is entirely different from anything in New England. The nearest approach to it is Sanders Theatre at Harvard, and here the similarity is only very general, in detail the idea suggested for the Music Hall being very unlike this theatre.

There are to be no galleries, but the seats are arranged in the form of a big horseshoe and form one great bank. They are so constructed that under the rear ones others can be put in, but the space under these seats it is intended to use mainly for standing room.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 7, 1894.

Last evening was a Wagner night at the Symphony concert in Music Hall. All the numbers were from compositions of the famous German, and the soloist was Mme. Amalia Materna. The first selection was the prelude to "The Meistersinger," which was interesting from the artistic and somewhat novel reading of Mr. Paur.

The "Siegfried Idyl," a "Faust" overture, "Siegfried's Funeral March" were the other numbers given by the orchestra, all of which were played with skill and displayed a new phase of Mr. Paur's conducting.

Mme. Materna sang the prelude and "Love, Death" from "Tristan and Isolde" and Brunhilde's dying speech from "Gotterdammerung." The eminent singer has been heard in both selections in this city, and it can only be said that she shows no deterioration from her past efforts. She easily stands at the head of exponents of Wagner in soprano roles, and her fine voice was given full scope.

The selection from "Tristan and Isolde" was less familiar than the other, but it was equally well received, and the audience showed its hearty appreciation.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 19 and 20, will consist of Bach's suite in B minor for string orchestra and flutes; Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, and Berlioz's overture "King Lear."

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4 1894

THE SPENCER SUN

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was a somewhat larger audience which greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the occasion of their second concert in Worcester last week than on the first night, and we were glad to see so large a party from Spencer. The program being rather more severely classical than that of the first concert, may possibly have given less pleasure to the ordinary concert goer. Yet even a Brahms symphony, difficult of comprehension though it may be, when played as it was last Thursday evening, cannot fail to be exceedingly interesting, and, doubtless, to some present, delightful. All were on the qui vive for the second number on the program, which introduced to the audience the soloist of the evening, Mrs. Emil Pauer, wife of the conductor, whose first appearance in Worcester had been looked forward to with much interest.

Although Mrs. Pauer may not have realized the expectations of some of her hearers, there was certainly much to enjoy in her rendering of Schubert's "Wanderer fantasis." If not a great player, she is, without doubt, a most excellent pianist. The Saint Saens "Spinning Wheel" was a most delightful number and evidently thoroughly appreciated by the audience, judging by the applause it called forth. The program closed with the Benvenuto Cellini Overture by Berlioz, which was given by the orchestra with brilliant effect. The next concert will be given Tuesday evening, January 30.

---

[67]

McKIM'S MUSIC HALL.

Model of the Interior at the New Library.

A Classic Design of the Greek Order.

An Amphitheatre Replaces the Customary Galleries.

Seats Allowed for Twenty-five Hundred Persons.

An ingenious arrangement by which the visitor who wishes to examine at the new Public Library the model for the suggested building for the proposed Boston Music Hall is enabled to pop up, in the fashion of a colossal Mephistopheles, through a trap in the floor, and thus to survey from the middle of the parquette the whole interior, makes it possible for the least imaginative observer to obtain a very satisfactory and complete notion of the McKim, Mead & White project. It is beyond the possibility of a doubt, today, that if this project is accepted Boston will shortly possess one of the most beautiful structures devoted to music in the world. Every line, every proportion, and every detail, so far as the details have been determined, attests the creation of a masterpiece of architecture worthy to be the shrine of the best music. There is not a discordant note. To the eyes of the artist in form, there is in the noble and simple purity of this design a source of exquisite and durable pleasure, as fine in its kind as the emotions of the musician who listens to the composition of the greatest master. The same terms express the qualities to be felt in it that might be employed by the musician in describing the sources of his pleasure. Great art of any kind has this striking kinship with the sister arts. At the base of it dwells logic, honesty and good sense; it makes no show of itself; it does not divorce use from ornament; it grows out of what is needed; and no art combines so solidly these simple qualities as the art of architecture. The interior of the new Music Hall will be a symphony in form. The eyes will there be fed as well as the ears.

The style of the hall is the most unadulterated Greek which can be conceived, so far as the proportions and general aspect of the amphitheatre are concerned, and the details admirably consort with the classical shape of the whole. There is to be a great chance for decoration in the way of statuary and reliefs and mural painting, but of course that will not be settled at present. It is also too early now to tell what the color scheme of the interior is to be. The proportions are the essential thing.

The model shows only the interior, and makes no effort to indicate what the exterior will be like. The shape of the interior will be clearly exhibited by the outside, however, and it is safe to say that it will have the unmistakable character of an important music hall, as seen from the street. Moreover, the architectural treatment of the details as well as of the masses outside will echo the treatment of the interior in its general features, with its pilasters, its panels, its niches, its reliefs, etc. The outlines of the façade apparently will all be curved. It should afford a superb opportunity for extensive sculptural decorations. The hall will be set back a considerable distance from the street, and the main entrance is to receive the thoughtful attention its importance demands. Although the structural lines may be severe, the effect cannot be judged before the entire conception is visible in its completed state. The same remark should apply to the interior. No one would think of making a final estimate of the character of a picture or of a statue before completion; and it would be very desirable to see something of the same reserve manifested with respect to a building.

The model will attract a great deal of attention this week. It was made in New York from plans drawn in the office of McKim, Mead & White, and stands between the pillars in the big, bright catalogue room, once amusingly described as a "dark crypt" by some one in a mood for fault-finding in print.

It is the plan of the interior of the new Music Hall which is to be seen; the exterior of the model is draped with white cloth, and, except for the general contour, is not ready to be judged by amateurs in architecture. But for these and for musical people, the public of Modern Athens, which dearly likes to discuss a new thing, the interior of the Music Hall (which may one day stand on the second right-hand corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park as the citizen goes up the avenue out of town) is now to be seen by cards of admission to be obtained from Mr. C. E. Cotting of 9 Tremont street. Mr. G. E. Wolters represents McKim, Mead & White at the exhibition.

As said above, the visitor stands below and putting head and shoulders through an opening where the floor of the parquet will be, looks about with his eyes near the level of the figure of Orpheus at the back of the stage or practically with the view of the observer standing on the floor of the pit in the finished house. The model is all in white, of plaster and of wood, to represent the iron construction (like that in the new Bates Hall) covered with decorative fibrous plaster which the completed building will have.

The great circular amphitheatre will seat 3500 people. The plans show that the scale is for an interior 150 feet from the grand entrance to the back of the stage, 143 feet from side to side, and with a height of 83 feet from the lowest part of the parquette to the highest point of the domed ceiling. Several unusual and original features immediately strike the eyes and mind of the observer. The tier-on-tier arrangement of the stage, with the double sounding-board above, forming a sort of vast, imperceptible funnel, is first. The stage has room for about 120 musicians or 350 chorus. The four stairways with small entrances in the amphitheatre come up from the corridor and offer direct access to all of the upper part of the house from a large ambulatory or circular corridor on the street floor below. There are no rows on rows of galleries with entrances above as in opera houses already built in Europe or America; but the people come up from below into the body of the house. The house is divided into the pit, the chief ampitheatre, the baignoir beneath the ampitheatre, where spectators are unseen by those above, as in the new Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and two room-like extensions at the top and back of the amphitheatre, each thirty-six by twenty-one feet; these are above the great stairways on either side of the main entrance, and will form an important part of the exterior significance of the building as well as contributing to the impressive grace of the interior. There are two large and two small stage boxes. The domed ceiling is decorated with small square sunken panels, adding to the acoustic advantage. The provision for a great organ all around the apse is a matter of course. The plan is based upon the Greek theatres (again our Modern Athens!) and cannot be compared with other examples of music hall architecture for many reasons. The important difference of the four stairways wider at the foot in the corridors than at the top in the amphitheatre, and the fact that there is literally no

CONTINUED ON PAGE FIVE.

THE AUDITORIUM.

places in the house where people cannot both see and hear will be appreciated. Many places in the Paris Opera House, to say nothing of many houses nearer home, lack these first necessities of a music hall. There are also two very large cloakrooms opening upon the ambulatory. Certainly the æsthetic beauty of the interior shown by this model, with its possibilities of sculptural adornment and decorative design, is undeniable.

A DEMAND FOR A COMPETITION IN DESIGNS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In your issue of Saturday an article on the model for the new Music Hall about to be exhibited, announces that the subscribers to that building need not accept the scheme thus offered by Messrs. McKim, Mead & White of New York. The question naturally arises, How shall the subscribers make known their opinions and desires? The committee appointed to receive funds and select a site for the Music Hall have committed themselves to these New York architects. Though they may not yet have commited the subscribers, and though, as your article says, the latter may still be free to desire other plans and other architects, what can they do about it?

There are many subscribers who do not think it fair for their trusted and competent architects to be thus ignored in favor of any architects. This new building is to be built by direct individual contributions, and it is not fair to deprive these individuals of an opportunity to express their opinions and wishes as to how plans and architects should be selected. It seems as if an effort was being made by the only committee the subscribers have appointed —and that for another specied purpose—to forestall discussion by getting plans so far and so expensively developed that there will be hesitation about demanding more thorough consideration of the subject.

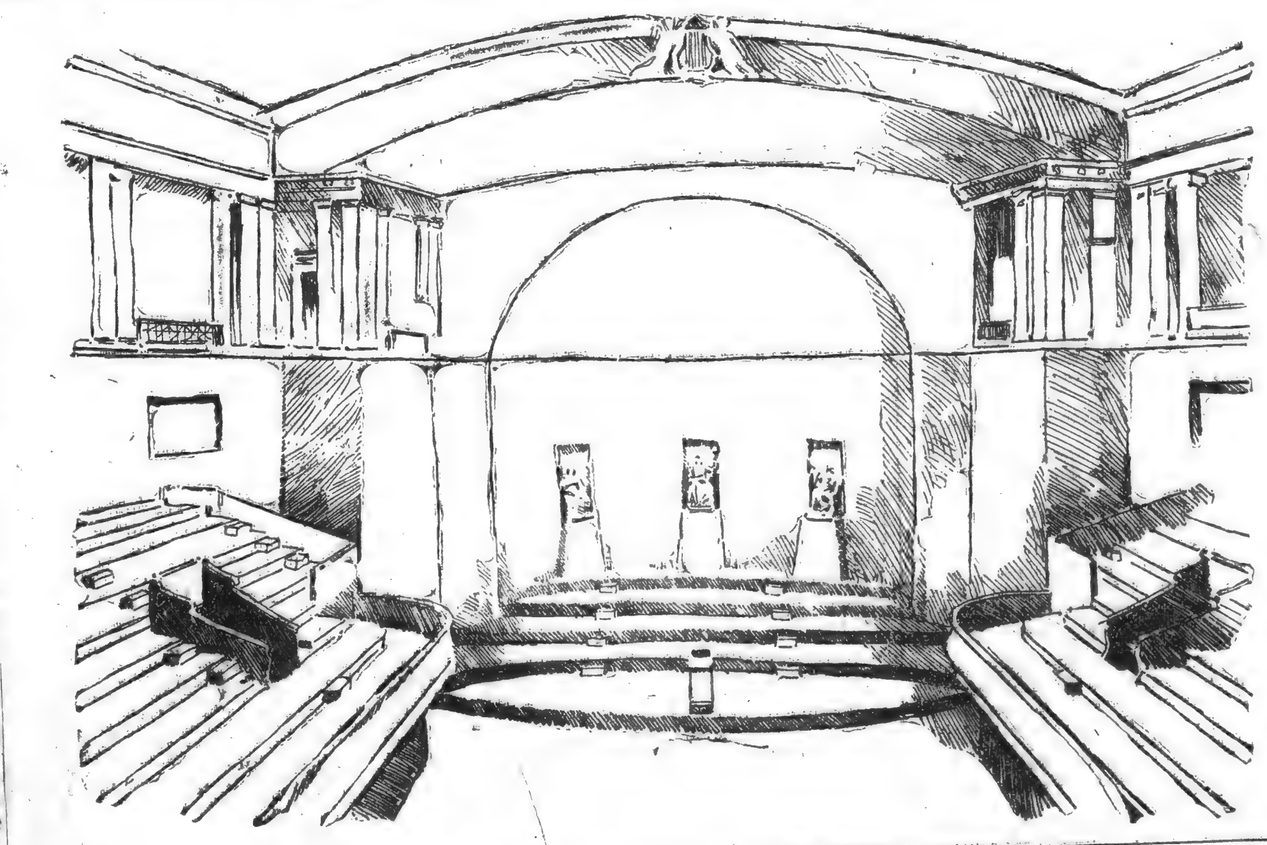
There is no doubt it will save time and trouble to at once acclaim and adopt the present model, but also there can be no doubt that a well conducted competition would reveal a great variety of excellent schemes, with chances in favor of some one being better than that now about to be shown. At all events many valuable ideas would surely be brought forward, which could be incorporated in the accepted design. Competitions in designs take time and trouble, but in this case there is no hurry with the present Music Hall site for the present; and surely a committee representing such a vast subscription fund should not recoil before the pains needed to get the best result.

Competitions have often been unsatisfactory in the past from want of care in framing their rules and provisions, but there is now a better understanding of the subject, and the recent ones have been acknowledged successes—such as that of the Cathedral of St. John, New York, and that just decided for the New York City Hall. These have produced results which assure the best solution of the problem being hit upon. Now, Boston and the subscribers to the Music Hall will not be satisfied till they know they have sifted this difficult problem through many minds and have found, not a fair solution, but the best of all.

The committee who represent the subscribers are so eminently respectable that one hesitates to criticise their action, but they are mistaking the temper of Boston in thus conspicuously passing over our own architects, who have time and again wrested competitions away from this same New York firm. Boston architects should have an opportunity to present plans for what should be a typical Boston monument and if they fail to hold their own, it will be time enough to call for outside assistance—though there can be no objection for architects from other cities competing. It must not be forgotten that Boston architects presented the best plans for the great Carnegie Music Hall at Pittsburgh last year, and won the first prize not only from Messrs. McKim, Mead & White, but from a host of the best architects from all over the country.

FAIR PLAY.

Jan. 7, 1894



THE STAGE.

[68]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was made up wholly of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, and was as follows:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."
A Siegfried Idyl.
"Eine Faust-Ouvertüre."
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 2.
Brünnhilde's dying speeeh over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung, Act III., Scene 3.
Mme. Amalia Materna was the singer.

All these selections are pretty familiar here, having been frequently heard at concerts and, with the exception of the scene from "Tristan," at least once or twice on the stage. Curiously enough, they are all examples of Wagner's third manner; the "Faust-Ouvertüre," to be sure, was first written in 1840, thus dating from the "Rienzi" period; but it was remodelled from beginning to end in 1855, about a year before the completion of the music of "Die Walküre," so that, in its present shape, it fairly belongs to the composer's third manner. The programme was very well arranged, saving that it was a little long; we think the "Faust-Ouvertüre" might well have been left out: it, as well as the two succeeding numbers, is essentially tragic in character, and thus helped to make the second half of the concert rather grimly serious.

The orchestra played admirably almost throughout, falling short of perfect finish in execution only in parts of the closing scene from "Götterdämmerung." In one place in the "Siegfried Funeral March" the absence of two of the required tubas made some havoc with the phrase, but the want of them was in general not seriously felt. We have a suspicion, however, that some of the wind parts in both the selections from "Götterdämmerung" were not strictly in accordance with the original score, but belonged to a condensed concert version for smaller orchestra; but in this we may be wrong.

Mr. Paur's reading of the several numbers, barring an occasional tendency to over-slowness, was admirable. We have seldom heard the "Meistersinger" prelude go so well, and the "Siegfried Idyl" was given to perfection. Mme. Materna, whom one was heartily glad to welcome back here once more, sang wonderfully. Her voice has lost very little, if any, of its commanding beauty of quality, and in the matter of perfect accuracy of intonation her singing left nothing to be desired. But above all this her warmth, depth and beauty of feeling and dramatic force of expression were what gave her performance its superb character. In the matter of correct tradition, derived from the fountain head itself, she is still impeccable; her absolute mastery over and sympathy with Wagner's idea, and her rich, receptive artistic nature enable her fully to incarnate and realize this idea; her singing of the scenes from "Tristan" and "Götterdämmerung" is not only mustergiltig (model-worthy), but instinct with the finest dramatic power. We cannot remember any one artist's creating such a furore at one of our symphony concerts as she did last Saturday evening. The audience symply went wild with enthusiasm, and had the best of reasons therefor. The next programme is: Bach, suite in B minor for strings and flutes; Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"); Berlioz, overture to "Le Roi Léar."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1894.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY.

A Wagner Programme with Mme. Materna as Soloist.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. Mrs. Amalia Materna was the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg," C major.
Vorspell und "Liebestod" (Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde." Isolde; Mme. Materna.
Siegfried Idyl.
A Faust Overture.
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Gotterdammerung," Act III., scene 2.
Brunnhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body, from "Gotterdammerung." Act III., scene 3.
Brunhilde: Mme. Materna.

A Wagner programme is almost always sure to attract a large audience and on this occasion the hall was filled to overflowing with an interested gathering of listeners that remained intact until the end of this quite lengthy programme. The playing of the orchestra was of the first quality, and Mr. Paur really achieved a triumph. It was plainly evident that he was familiar with the scores, and to his credit it must be said that Wagner has never before been so satisfactorily presented in Boston. There was a gratifying degree of repose at the proper moments in Conductor Paur's interpretation of the selections chosen that intensified the effect of the performance when the highly dramatic passages appeared.

The playing of the "Siegfried idyl" was indescribably beautiful. Better playing has seldom been heard from this superb orchestra. One can praise equally the entire performance.

Mr. Paur's conception of Wagner is remarkably comprehensive, and at the same time so wonderfully happy in the working out of the detail, so delicate, and so sensitively refined in all the nuances of the composition, that it renders the coarse interpretation we have had from such noise dispensing and inferior conductors as Seidl and Nikisch appear as a satire on the intentions of this great master of modern musical forms. Seidl and Nikisch can both sit at the feet of Conductor Paur and learn much to their advantage.

Mrs. Materna encompassed the spirit and intention of the author, and delineated to the best of her vocal ability the demands of the situation. It was an inspired effort upon her part, and if it failed of effect always it was because no human voice is capable of effectively meeting such extraordinary demands. This is one of the incongruities of the Wagner musicdrama.

The audience did not appear to appreciate the marvelious manner in which Mr. Paur revealed either the beauties of the "Siegfried Idyl" or the fanciful ideas of "A Faust Overture." Perhaps, after the four years that its taste has been vitiated by the coarse and vulgar interpretation of every class of music that came from the baton of Mr. Paur's immediate predecessor, it is not to be wondered that it failed to recognize the highly artistic and refined efforts of Mr. Paur in his masterly presentation of the pieces named.

But the tremendous effect gained with the ending of the last number upon the programme brought the audience to its feet and it indulged in the most enthusiastic applause.

This was the cause of Mrs. Materna returning many times to bow, but finally someone with a lusty shout called for Paur! Paur! Then modestly appeared the hero of the occasion to receive a most tumultuous applause, with shouts of bravo! bravo!

This praise was modestly received by Conductor Paur. And how genuinely modest is this man—how simple, how frank and how earnest! That sort of an appearance of hangdog affectation that Nikisch often showed is entirely foreign to such a nature as Conductor Paur possesses.

Mr. Paur deserved every bit of the praise that was accorded him on this occasion, and more besides. It must be said that his success with the programme was greater than even his most ardent admirers had expected.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. On Saturday evening, Jan. 20, the following programme will be performed: Suite in B minor, for string orchestra and flutes, Bach; Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Mendelsshon, and overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1894.

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Its Model Shows a Beautiful Structure.

It Is a Delight to the Eye of the Architect,

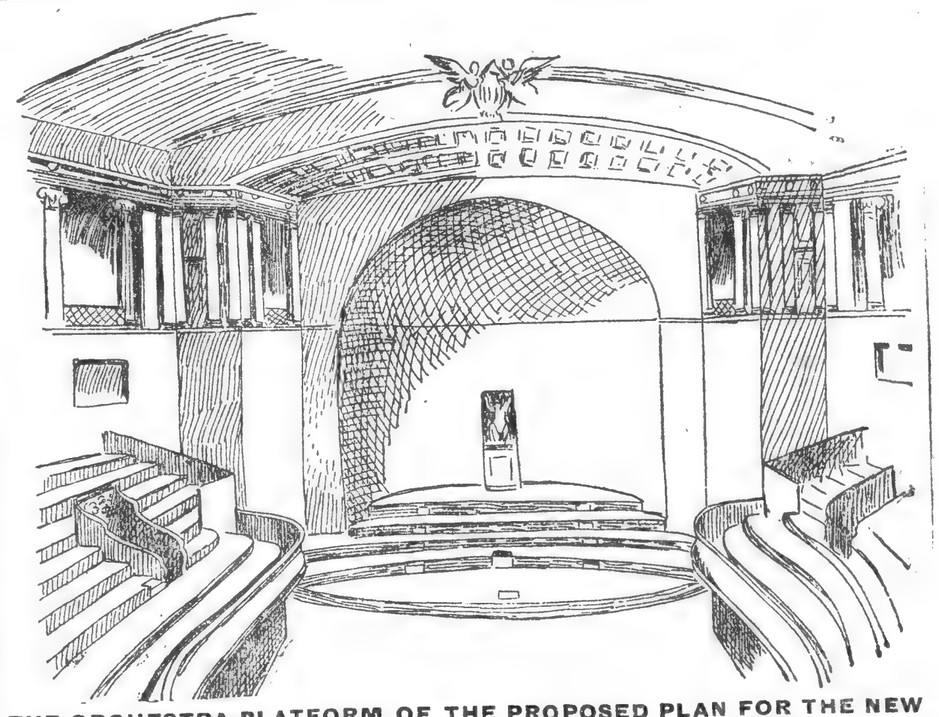
And a Wonder and Pleasure to the Layman.

The Hall Is Fashioned After the Old Greek Theatre.

On Monday the model of the new Music Hall was exhibited to the directors of the enterprise and to members of the press at the new Public Library building.

The future home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as projected and designed, is a most beautiful structure, a delight to the eye of the architect and equally a wonder and pleasure to the sight of the layman. Even the most inexperienced can appreciate in some degree the beauties and magnificence of the structure.

The model is erected in the catalogue room of the library building, and occupies the space between two of the pillars. It represents the interior of the hall only, and is about 12 feet square by perhaps 14 feet in height.



THE ORCHESTRA PLATFORM OF THE PROPOSED PLAN FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL, OFFERED BY McKIM, MEAD AND WHITE.

Mr. Gustave E. Walters, the supervising architect of the Library, who represents Messrs. McKim, Mead & White, the architects of the new hall, was ready to explain it in all its details. He pointed out its beauties and conveniences and was generally a mine of information.

As has been already mentioned no thought has been taken for the exterior design of the hall. That will be something to be decided upon later. It will probably be a cubical structure, about 100 feet in all its dimensions, with a tower on each of the four corners. It is with the interior, as designed by architect Chas. F. McKim, that we have to deal.

Like the Greek Theatre.

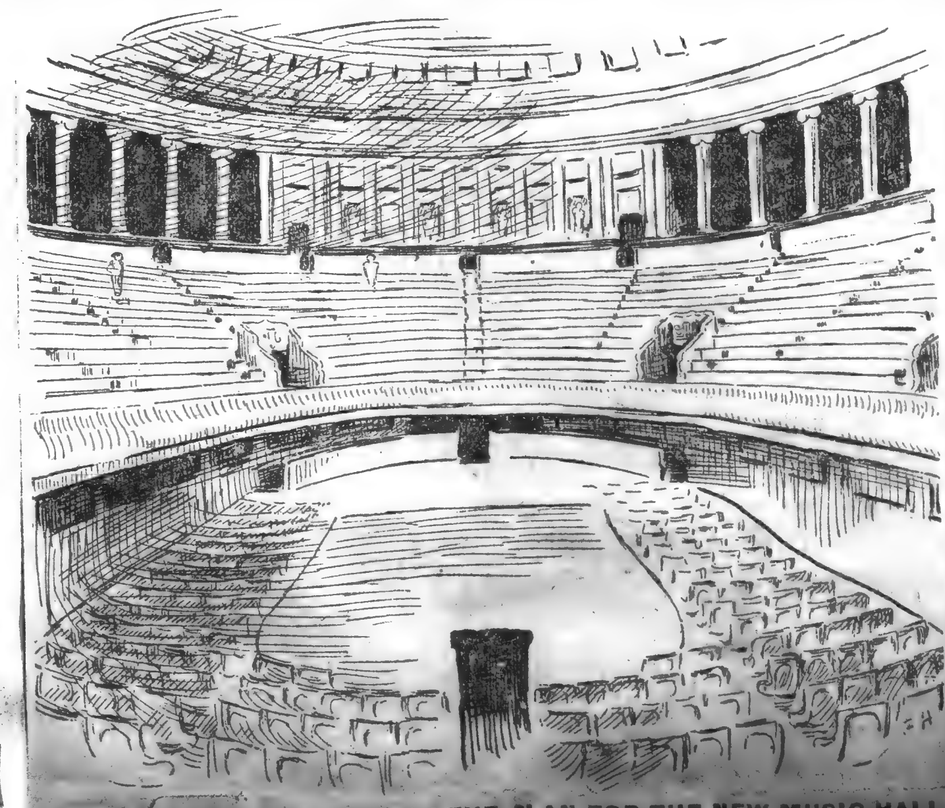
The hall is patterned on the Greek theatre, and there is no such thing as an angle or with solid brick walls, iron beams, brick arches and fibrous plaster on the ceiling. All the lighting, ventilating and other appliances will, of course, be of the best sort.

The hall was designed by Mr. McKim, who made a special trip to Europe last summer and inspected every music hall of importance on the Continent. In this, his production, he thinks that he has combined the best features of all and eliminated much that is faulty and unsatisfactory. It most resembles the Music Halls of Vienna and Liepsic, which are considered to be among the finest in existence.

The design meets with the enthusiastic approval of the committee in charge and will be accepted without doubt. Many details, including all the exterior, the ornamentation and the like have not even been thought of, and there is a great deal yet to be done before the hall stands complete.

Even were work to be begun at once, Mr. Wolters thinks that it would be impossible to complete it in time for next season's concerts, but it can be easily finished by 1895.

The illustrations which the Journal presents to-day are from photographs taken from the model and are the first to appear in any newspaper.



VIEW OF THE AUDITORIUM OF THE PLAN FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

...hanging balcony in the house. Its ...eat shape is not so much that of the ...e shoe as of the toy magnet with which ...ry boy is familiar.

The centre of the floor is occupied by what in the old theatres was called the "pit," corresponding to the "orchestra" in the mo... Rising from this, on all sides, in sweeping ...philheatrical series, are the great ... seats. Their wide, easy curves, ... pillars which support the gal... the hollow, domelike ... ample scale upon which ... gives a classic air to th... interior.

And from it all the stairways, entries and exits, cloakrooms, smoking and toilette-rooms are reached.

The Pit.

Directly in front of the main doors is the entrance to the "pit" through a wide and convenient doorway of its own, emerging under the amphitheatre in a gracefully moulded arch. On either hand are side galleries leading to the "baignoirs," which are spaces containing a limited number of seats stowed away underneath the amphitheatre and behind the chairs in the pit. This same arrangement exists in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York and is generally recognized. The baignoir is for the accommodation of people who come to a performance who are not in full dress, who are obliged to leave early, or who for other reasons do not wish to occupy conspicuous places.

At intervals along the ambulatory arise four flights of stairs, by which access is given to those levels of the amphitheatre, which are about half way between the top and bottom. It will not be necessary to ascend to the very top, and then come down again in order for one to reach one's seat. To attain the very highest seats there are four other stairways. This makes every part of the auditorium accessible with extreme ease, and in case of a panic or other emergency the hall could be emptied without the slightest danger, in a very few minutes.

The Cloak Rooms.

The cloak rooms are immense. They occupy nearly all the space under the amphitheatre as far as the baignoirs, and one has more room in it than all the dressing rooms of the Boston Theatre combined. Turning once more to the stage an examination of the structure shows that there is virtually a system of double sounding boards. First the stage is closed by a segmental arch and half dome and beyond this the proscenium arch is not flat but opens like the mouth of a trumpet. All the vibrations of sound are thrown as from the mouth of the trumpet directly at the audience.

Yet another point of interest is the arrangement of the lights. They will be so placed as not to interfere in the slightest degree with the view of the stage. There will be one strong light directly overhead in the dome of the ceiling. But its elevation will be so great as not to interfere. All the other lights will be placed along the gallery, which runs at the back of the amphitheatre, and which is supported by graceful Ionic pillars, and where are niches filled with chaste statuary.

The gross dimensions of the interior of the building are 150 feet in length, 143 feet in breadth and 83 feet from the floor to the highest point of the ceiling. It will be made as nearly fireproof as human ingenuity and experience can devise

[69]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 9.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1894.

SEATS FOR 2500 PERSONS.

Description of Boston's New Music Hall.

Its Model Now on Exhibition in the New Public Library—Structure of Entirely Original Design—To Contain Many Novel Features—Will Not Be Completed Before Oct. 1.

The plans of Boston's new Music Hall, which is to be erected on the northwest corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester park, has taken form under the skilled hands of Charles F. McKim of McKim, Mead & White, architects, and the plaster model of the auditorium was placed on exhibition yesterday in the new Public Library. Invitation cards had been issued only to the stockholders and to the members of the press.

The model, sheeted like a statue awaiting its unveiling, occupied the centre of one of the eastern rooms of the library, and gave no particular idea as to the achitectural features of its exterior. Indeed, the architects disown any attempt to give more than an idea of what its interior will be.

The model is constructed on the scale of one inch to the foot, and the interior measurements are 12 feet square by 7 feet high. The building, when completed, is to be 150 feet long from wall to wall. 143 feet broad and 83 feet from the floor to the highest point of the domed ceiling. The stage will accomodate 120 orchestral performers and a chorus of 350 voices. There will be seats in the auditorium for 2500 people.

The main entrance will be on St. Stephen street, and the visitors will be ushered into a wide and commodious lobby, from which of the main lobby, to the gentlemen's smoking rooms and lavatory, and on the left side of the lobby to the ladies' parlors and retiring rooms.

LOOKING FROM THE STAGE TOWARD THE AUDITORIUM.

There is a smaller lobby and two entrances on the West Chester park side of the building, so that Means of Easy Exit Are Afforded.

A peculiarity of the stairways which lead to the galleries is that their opening into the theatre are at their narrowest parts; that is, they widen as one descends, the circular form of the building making this construction convenient.

The general form of the hall is that of a Greek theatre, and all the details are worked out on classical models. There is nothing like it in Boston, nor, indeed, anything precisely like it in this country. It was designed by Mr. McKim, after a careful examination of the best music halls in Europe, and approaches as nearly the new theatres at Vienna and Leipsic as any existing structures.

The first thing that strikes the visitor is its resemblance in general outline to the two doors open directly into the amphitheatre, while from either hand a wide ambulatory leads entirely around the theatre to the stage. This is one of the unique features of the hall. It is 18 feet wide, and entirely closed, except for the doors which lead from it. There are eight stairways which lead from the ambulatory to the galleries, four opening nearly on a level with the lower tiers of seats, and four others leading directly to the upper corridor, which runs around the entire gallery, and, of course, commands a full view of the hall, looking toward the stage. From this same wide ambulatory there are doors leading, on the right hand to the theatre is provided on either side with large coat rooms, however, there will be few, if any, outer garments or hats worn by the audience; so that this provision, convenient as it is, would not be so urgently demanded as it is now in the theatres and halls of this city.

THE STAGE.

SIDE GALLERY AND BOXES ON WEST CHESTER PARK.

The walls of the theatre will be of remarkable beauty, being carried around from one side of the stage to the other by a row of ionic pilasters, broken at the right and left of the rear entrance to the upper corridor by a row of ionic columns, back of which is a recess with seats for any overflow that cannot find accommodation in the galleries.

The theatre will be lighted entirely from the centre of the ceiling, and from a row of lamps around the upper corridor. Thus the light will fall directly on the heads of the people, or will be thrown toward the stage, thus avoiding the unpleasant glare which is so annoying to the patrons of the present Music Hall, whatever attempts are made to soften the light.

The organ will be built within the circle back of the orchestra. The hollow conformation of the walls of the stage will give the acoustic effect of a double sounding board, opening outward somewhat and being further assisted by the breaks in the proscenium arches. On either side of the stage are commodious rooms for the musicians.

Like the Mouth of a Trumpet,

The building throughout will be as nearly fireproof as it is possible to make it. The walls will be solid, the floors constructed of iron supported by brick arches, the ceiling of iron and fibrous plaster, and the entire interior finished in stucco work.

The present design contemplates an appropriate statue, allegorical in nature, in the rear of the stage, and a line of statues in niches around the hall.

Under the galleries and back of the seats in the amphitheatre will be the "baignoirs," or accommodations, for people who, for any reason, wish to attend in street attire, who are unable to remain through the whole performance, or who wish to drop in to hear a special part of the programme. A new hall in New York has this feature, and it has proved wonderfully popular. In fact, these seats are filled at nearly every performance. It affords people a chance to see and to hear; to come and to go at their own convenience without the trouble of making an elaborate toilet, or of annoying those who come prepared to sit out the whole programme.

The building will probably not be ready for occupancy until some time after October, 1894. How soon after that date its doors will be opened and Boston lovers of music permitted to realize all the pleasure which they now receive only in anticipation will depend upon the vigor and promptness with which those who have charge of placing the contract for construction prosecute their duties. It may be stated that the location of the building on the lot will be such as to allow a space of 55 feet on the Huntington avenue side, which can be utilized for stores, and made a means of considerable revenue.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1894.

A TEMPLE OF MUSIC.

Such Is Planned for the New Music Hall.

THE MODEL EXHIBITED.

It Contains All the Best and None of the Bad Features of the World's Musical Structures.

In the catalogue room of the new Public Library on Copley square stands a most beautiful and ingenious model of the interior of the suggested building for the new Music Hall, after the design of Mr. McKim of the firm of celebrated New York architects. It is exhibited by G. E. Wolters, who is now supervising the work of this firm at the library. Admission is by card, issued only to stockholders and to the press.

This model is made on a scale of one inch to a foot, and is about twelve feet square and seven feet in height. Outwardly it is swathed in white cloth, for no endeavor has as yet been made to fix upon the exact outside form and decorations. If no sweeping modifications are made, the exterior will probably present a succession of curves such as would be produced by a sweeping ellipse (drawn within an oblong, which would represent the shape of the plot upon which it is to stand), the corners being filled out by intersecting circular towers.

The model is raised above the floor five feet, so observers may walk beneath it, and by putting their heads up through an opening in the orchestra flooring, survey the whole. Steps also lead up on the outside of the model, upon which one may mount and peer through the doll-house-like doors into the interior.

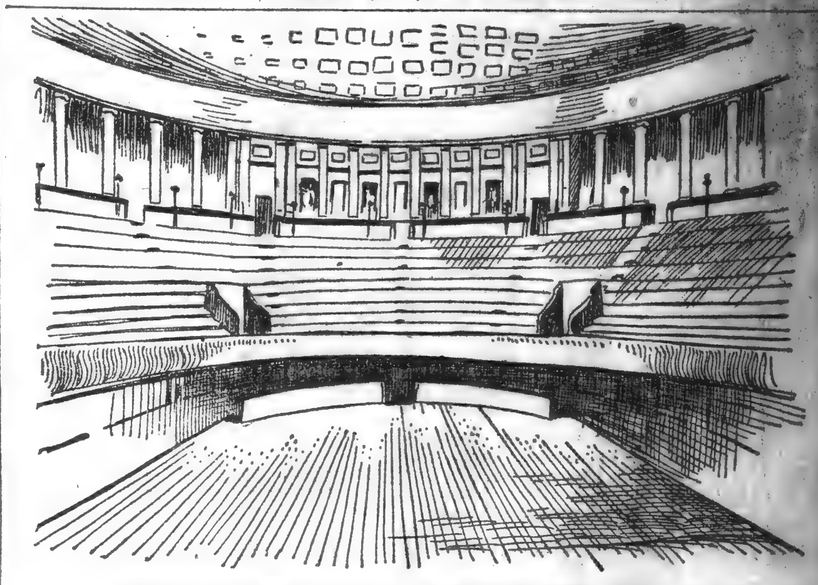
The inside of the wood and plaster model was dazzlingly white, and the whole, lit by electricity from the dome, looked like a restored Greek theatre of purest marble.

In the centre of the oval structure is the main entrance, opening into a spacious lobby. Under the raised tier of seats and close to the outer and elliptical wall runs the "ambulatory," a lofty arch passage to be eighteen feet wide. This opens to the right and left from the main lobby and completely encircles the "pit." The towers are the ends of the "ambulatory," those near the lobby opening on the ground floor to be for the ladies' parlor and retiring rooms, the other for gentlemen's smoking room and lavatory.

The main entrance to the pit is straight off the foyer. The "baignoirs" are spaces containing a limited number of seats under the overhang of the balcony, and from which persons may look out over the "pit" through wide openings. The seats are for the accommodation of people who are not in full dress, who are obliged to leave early, or who for other reasons do not wish to occupy conspicuous places.

The floor of the orchestra rises gradually toward the rear from the musicians' platform. There are provisions for four and perhaps more private boxes, while at the rear, the upper stories of the two circular towers are taken into the auditorium, separated only by graceful Ionic columns, affording extra seating capacity.

The dimensions of the proposed temple to music are 150 feet from the entrance to the back of the stage recess, 143 feet from side to side, and 83 feet to the highest point of the domed ceiling. The stage is composed of a semi-circular recess with a half dome, above which are two flaring proscenium arches, the whole forming a vast, almost imperceptible funnel or concave sound reflector. It measures 72 feet wide and 30 deep, and the floor rises in concentric amphitheatric tiers towards the rear. There is room for an orchestra of 120 and a chorus of 350. The centre of the concavity is proposed to be filled with an organ, the pipes curving round to fit the recess.



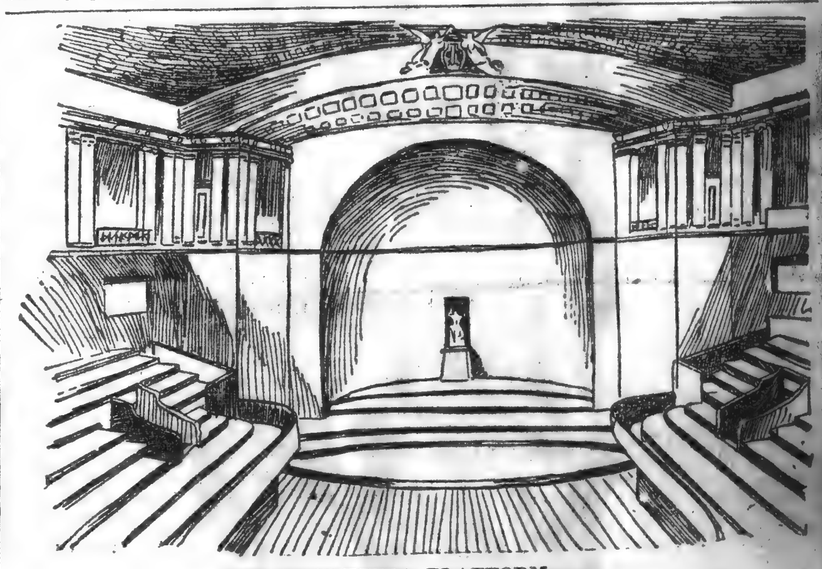
INTERIOR VIEW OF THE PROPOSED NEW MUSIC HALL.

The vast hall will be entirely shut in from the outside world. Not a window opens into it, not a sound can penetrate. Light other than from the skylight will be electric, and ventilation artificial, but perfect. The building will be as near fireproof as mortal can devise.

Acoustically, the proposed building is claimed to be perfect. Mr. McKim last summer visited all the famous music halls of Europe to discover and avoid any defects which they might have.

This building will seat 2500 people. The inner walls are decorated with beautiful pilasters, niches and statues—all in miniature, but the scheme of decoration and many other things still remain for consideration and elaboration.

It is proposed to place the new Music Hall upon the plot of ground bounded by Huntington avenue, West Chester park and St. Stephen street—on the same block upon which the Children's Hospital is situated. The main entrance will be on St. Stephen street, the side extend along West Chester park, then an alley of fifteen feet in width will be laid off, back of the stage, and then the remaining strip forty feet in width and running along Huntington avenue will be built up as stores. Two entrances will probably be cut from the West Chester park side into the "ambulatory."



THE ORCHESTRA PLATFORM.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1894.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Model of the Handsome Structure Placed on Exhibition.

BUILDING OF CHASTE BEAUTY.

Description of the Interior of the Hall—How the Stage is Arranged.

Yesterday the model of the new Music Hall was exhibited at the new Public Library building. As projected and designed it is a most beautiful structure. The model represents the interior of the hall only, and is about 12 feet square by 14 feet in height. Only members of the press and directors were admitted to inspect the new model, and even then a ticket was necessary to gain admittance. If the design is followed Boston will possess the most suitable and beautiful structure devoted to music in the world.

The designer of the new hall was Mr. C. F. McKim of McKim, Mead & White, the well-known New York architects.

Mr. McKim made a special trip to Europe last summer, and inspected every music hall of importance on the continent. Upon his return home, plans were drawn, and the model placed on exhibition yesterday, is the result of those plans.

The style of the new Music Hall is unadulterated Greek. There is to be a great chance for decoration in the way of statuary and reliefs and mural painting.

It mostly resembles the music halls of Vienna and Leipsic, which are considered to be among the finest in existence. In his production Mr. McKim believes that he has combined the best features of these famous music halls, and produced a model that is satisfactory.

The seating capacity of the hall is 2500. The gross dimensions of the interior of the building are 150 feet in length, 143 feet in breadth and 83 feet from the floor to the highest point of the ceiling. It will be made as nearly fireproof as human ingenuity and experience can devise, with solid brick walls, iron beams, brick arches and fibrous plaster on the ceiling. At the lighting, ventilating and other appliances will be of the best sort.

The general shape of the hall is that of the toy magnet, with which every boy is or ought to be familiar. The spectators' seats occupy the central and curved portions, the musicians' stage being placed across the two ends. The seats all focus on the platform, which affords an uninterrupted view of the stage.

The centre of the floor is occupied by what in the old theatres was called the "pit," corresponding to the "orchestra" in the modern. Rising from this on all sides in sweeping, amphitheatrical series are the great body of the seats. Their wide, easy curves, with the Ionic pillars which support the gallery at the rear, the hollow, domelike ceiling and the ample scale upon which everything is designed gives a classic air to the impressive interior.

The stage is semi-circular, occupies almost the entire width of the building, and has a double break, which insures most perfect acoustic properties. It is 72 feet wide and 30 feet deep in the centre, and rises in concentric, broad steps from the front. It will seat 120 members of the orchestra and 350 singers.

Passing through the main entrance, one comes at once into a stately, curving "Ambulatory," as it is described in the architect's plans. It is a corridor which follows the curve of the raised seats passing underneath them and terminating in two large lobbies on either side, nearly opposite the extremities of the stage. The ambulatory is 18 feet wide, and from it all the stairways, entries and exits, cloakrooms, smoking and toilet rooms are reached; when completed it will be ornamented with statuary and carving.

Every part of the auditorium is accessible with extreme ease, and in case of a panic or other emergency the hall could be emptied without the slightest danger in a very few minutes.

The cloak rooms are immense. It is evidently the intention of the managers of the new hall to encourage the evening dress idea as it never has been before at concerts.

No man will be encouraged to hang his ulster over the back of his seat and hold his hat between his knees throughout the performance.

An examination of the stage shows that it is virtually a system of double sounding boards. It is closed by a segmental arch and half dome, and beyond this the proscenium arch is not flat but opens like the mouth of a trumpet.

All the vibrations of sound are thrown as from the mouth of the trumpet directly at the audience.

Yet another point of interest is the arrangement of the lights. They will be so placed as not to interfere in the slightest degree with the view of the stage.

There will be one strong light directly overhead in the dome of the ceiling. All the other lights will be placed along the gallery, which runs at the back of the amphitheatre, and is supported by graceful Ionic pillars.

The lot selected for the site is the westerly corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park. The left side of the hall is to be parallel with West Chester Park, with the main entrance on Falmouth street and side entrances on West Chester Park. The price paid for the land was $170,000. The lot has already been described in the Traveller.

The hall will be set back a considerable distance from the street, and the main entrance is to receive the thoughtful attention its importance demands. Although the structural lines may be severe, the effect cannot be judged before the entire conception is visible in its completed state.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 9, 1894.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

The Model at the Public Library Satisfies All Critics—If Accepted, Boston Will Have Most Beautiful Hall in the World.

The model of the proposed new music hall was exhibited yesterday morning to the directors of the enterprise and members of the press at the new Public Library building, and it is not too much to say that if the design is followed Boston will possess the most efficient and beautiful structure devoted to music in the world. It seems to meet with the enthusiastic approval of the committee in charge.

The hall was designed by C. F. McKim, who made a special trip to Europe last summer and inspected every music hall of importance on the Continent. In this production he thinks that he has combined the best features of all and eliminated much that is faulty and unsatisfactory. It most resembles the music halls of Vienna and Leipsic, which are considered to be among the finest in existence.

The entire seating capacity is 2500. The gross dimensions of the interior of the building are 150 feet in length, 143 feet in breadth and 83 feet from the floor to the highest point of the ceiling. It will be made as nearly fireproof as human ingenuity and experience can devise with solid brick walls, iron beams, brick arches and fibrous plaster on the ceiling. All the lighting, ventilating and other appliances will be of the best sort.

The hall is patterned on the Greek theatre, and there is no such thing as an angle or overhanging balcony in the house. Its general shape is that of the toy magnet with which every boy is familiar, the seats for the spectators occupying the central and curved portions, and the musicians' stage being placed across the two ends. All the seats focus on the platform, and the view of each and every spectator will be uninterrupted.

The centre of the floor is occupied by what in the old theatres was called the "pit," corresponding to the "orchestra" in the modern. Rising from this on all sides in sweeping, amphitheatrical series, are the great body of the seats. Their wide, easy curves, with the Ionic pillars which support the gallery at the rear, the hollow, domelike ceiling and the ample scale upon which everything is designed gives a classic air to the impressive interior.

The stage is semi-circular, occupies almost the entire width of the building, and has a double break, which insures most perfect acoustic properties. It is 72 feet wide and 30 feet deep in the centre, and rises in concentric, broad steps from the front. It will seat 120 members of the orchestra and 350 singers.

Passing through the main entrance, one comes at once into a stately, curving "Ambulatory," as it is described in the architect's plans. It is a corridor which follows the curve of the raised seats, passing underneath them and terminating in two large lobbies on either side, nearly opposite the extremities of the stage. The ambulatory is 18 feet wide, and from it all the stairways, entries and exits, cloakrooms, smoking and toilet rooms are reached, when completed it will be ornamented with statuary and carving.

Every part of the auditorium is accessible with extreme ease, and in case of a panic or other emergency the hall could be emptied without the slightest danger, in a very few minutes.

The cloak rooms are immense. It is evidently the intention of the managers of the new hall to encourage the evening dress idea as it never has been before at concerts. No man will be encouraged to hang his ulster over the back of his seat and hold his hat between his knees throughout the performance.

An examination of the stage shows that it is virtually a system of double sounding boards. It is closed by a segmental arch and half dome and beyond this the proscenium arch is not flat but opens like the mouth of a trumpet. All the vibrations of sound are thrown as from the mouth of the trumpet directly at the audience.

Yet another point of interest is the arrangement of the lights. They will be so placed as not to interfere in the slightest degree with the view of the stage. There will be one strong light directly overhead in the dome of the ceiling. All the other lights will be placed along the gallery, which runs at the back of the amphitheatre, and is supported by graceful Ionic pillars.

If work on the new structure were to begin at once, the building would probably be completed for the concert season of 1895. The lot selected for the site is the westerly corner of Huntington ave. and West Chester Park. The left side of the hall is to be parallel with West Chester Park, with the main entrance on Falmouth st. and side entrances on West Chester Park.

TON DAILY GLOBE—TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 1894.

PROPOSED MUSIC HALL.

Model Shows a Number of Novel Features.

On the Whole it Commands Admiration From the Public.

Views and a Detailed Description of the Possible Structure.

There are a number of new features in the suggestion for the new music hall which will be erected sometime on the corner of West Chester pk and Huntington av, but the interior is modelled after the old Grecian amphitheater in general plan.

A large plaster cast of the interior of a music hall was made by McKim, Mead & White of New York and submitted to the members of the committee of the stockholders of the corporation organized to build one in Boston, as a suggestion for their consideration.

The model was expressed to Boston and placed in one of the smaller rooms in the new public library building for the inspection of the stockholders.

No attempt is made to outline the exterior, as that can easily be adapted to the interior.

The cast is a very large one, being 12 feet square and 14 feet high, and is raised so that the visitor enters underneath, and putting his head through a trap door in the parquet floor becomes practically in the center of the hall, while short flights of stairs lead to points of vantage in the upper part of the auditorium and boxes, so that views of the interior are obtained from all parts of the hall.

Built upon the plan of a Grecian amphitheater the auditorium when filled is bound to make a most brilliant show, and it seems to be particularly effectively designed for acoustic excellence.

The stage, 72 by 30 feet, rounds out in the rear with a swelling paneled ceiling, forming a recess for the organ, and from the edge of the organ space the stage flooring takes on a gentle decline, forming a platform capable of accommodating 120 musicians or a chorus of 250 voices. A statue of Apollo is designed to occupy a niche in the center of the stage wall.

In the same manner the ceiling is made gradually higher, the walls diverge to the point at which the auditorium walls begin to round, the idea being to form a large sounding board of the walls and ceiling.

This is one of the obviously excellent features of the plan as it makes everything subordinate to the purposes of the hall and yet makes a grand architectural effect, which will be more pronounced with a large brilliantly dressed audience filling all of the seats.

There is a pit which, commencing on almost a level with the front of the platform, rises with a gentle ascent to the rear, where the single entrance to the lower part of the house is located. This center doorway is almost concealed from view from the stage by the rear elevation of the last rows of seats.

Above this rises the balcony, horseshoe in form, like a huge bank, constituting really the most desirable part of the hall. It has a much larger seating capacity than the pit.

Entrance to and exit from this balcony is facilitated by four sets of stairways built in among the seats well down front, which removes the necessity of those holding checks for the front seats from mounting the stairs to the rear of the balcony and then walking clear down the aisles to the front rows.

This balcony has a curve and rise beautifully consistent with the lines of the platform and gracefully carries out the sounding board idea.

The balcony balustrade furnishes opportunities for decoration that will undoubtedly be taken advantage of if the plan is ever elaborated upon.

Around the upper end of the balcony, running from where the walls diverge at the termination of the platform, is a narrow open corridor which can be used for standing room while on either side of the center in the rear of the amphitheater are two galleries with raised tiers of seats, the front of which are on a line with the rear wall, the galleries themselves projecting out beyond it.

Four tall ionic columns are placed across this opening, and the remaining wall is paneled with occasional niches, which, when filled with statues, will make an imposing rear.

The architects have introduced a line of gaslight pillars around the upper edge on the balcony.

The designers have adopted the "baignoir" idea, which has been found to be so appreciated in the new Metropolitan opera house in New York, that is, placing seats under the front amphitheater and on a level with the parquet all around the horseshoe, where occupants can see and hear well, but will not be seen by the rest of the audience.

This is intended for the many who wish to run in hastily from business to attend some concert and have not time to dress as they would wish to in order to occupy a place in the pit or amphitheater.

All of the seats are so carefully focussed that there is not a poor one in the house, and all have the appearance of being concentrated near the stage.

There are only eight boxes and are all on a level with the amphitheater and directly over the orchestra platform.

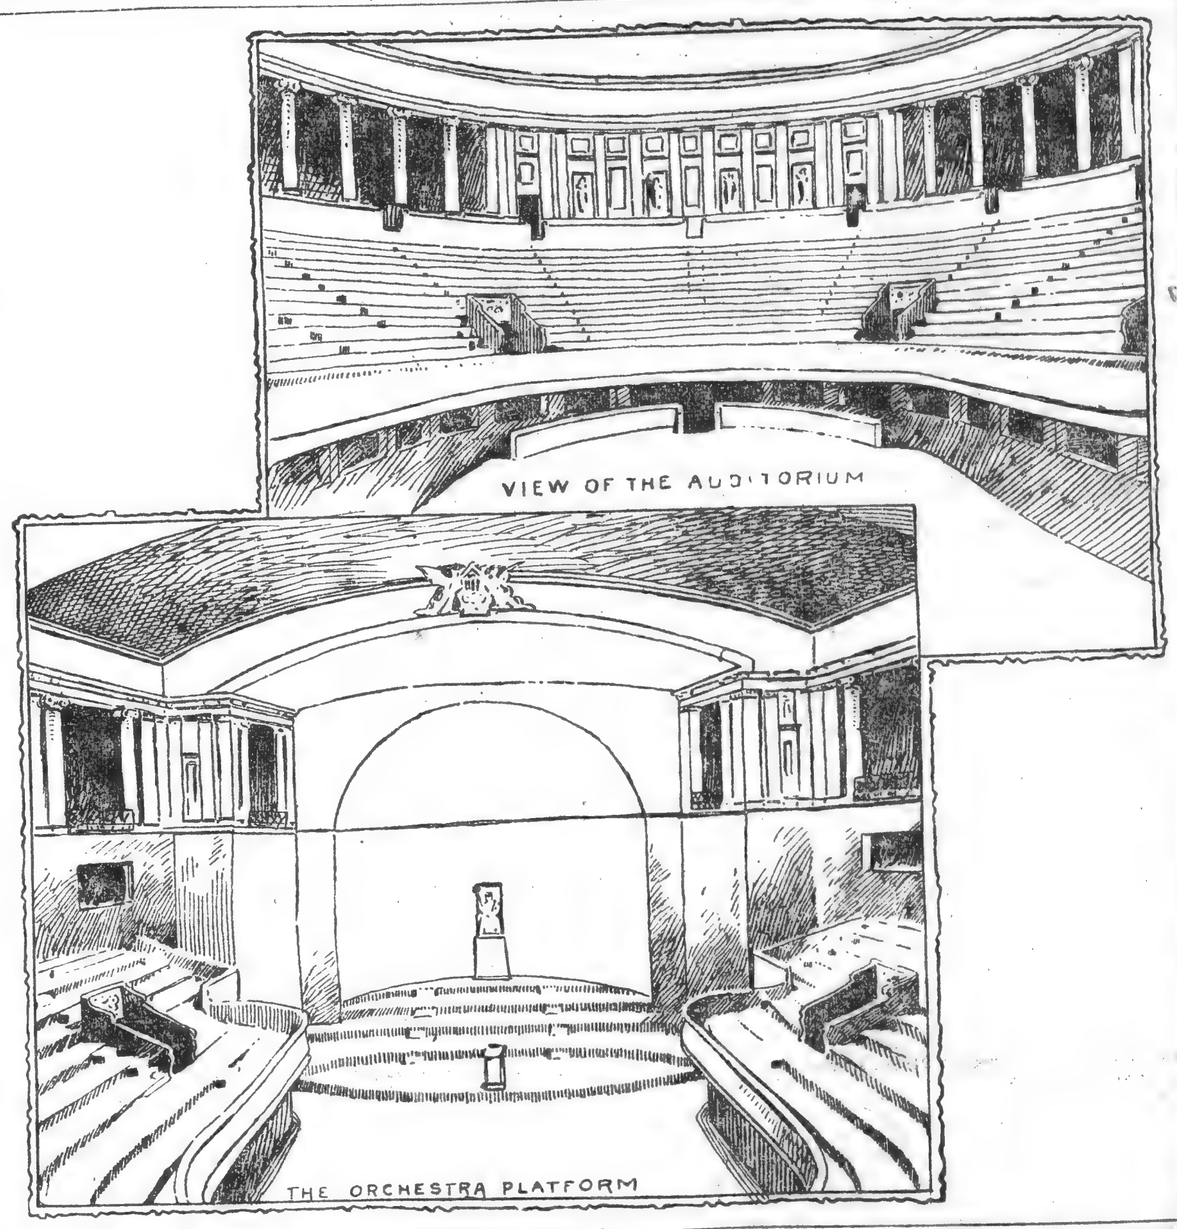
The two uppermost ones on either side are the desirable ones, being large, with columns rising at the sides and commanding the finest view of any point in the interior. The ceiling is domed, with small panels and some little decorative work has been attempted in the model, suggesting the possibilities when worked out in elaborate detail.

The light comes entirely from two windows in the side walls near the platform and the center of the ceiling, which is one large skylight.

In the rear of the auditorium a wide corridor is designed to run around the three sides of the building where the cloakrooms are located and from which all the staircases lead.

A hall built similar to this model will seat 2500 people, and G. E. Wolters, the agent of the architects, who courteously explains the model to visitors, says that in making this estimate they arranged the seats at a distance from those in front sufficient to ensure plenty of room and comfort to every occupant in the house.

Upon entering the building through the main door, according to this plan, there is a corridor following the long curve of the amphitheater seats, which passes underneath them and terminates in the lobbies, substantially at either end of the stage. It is proposed to make this 18 feet wide, as all of the cloakrooms and stairways are directed from it. Here there will be an opportunity for statues, wall decoration and elaborate ornamentation, which will make it a brilliant promenade.



A new idea in stairway construction is brought out in this model. In all of the staircases the walls diverge from the corridor, so that while the crowd may be jammed at the head of the stairs, yet with every step towards the corridor it will obtain more room.

The cloak rooms are large and are intended to be adequate to receive the outer garments of every attendant, no matter how large an audience there may be.

The architects, Mr Wolters said, have no estimates as to the cost of a building of this kind, as that depends entirely upon the amount allowed by the company, as the construction will be subordinate to the available funds. Yet the building will undoubtedly be of fire proof material, with iron beams, brick arches and everything necessary to make it of first-class construction. Although it is all conjecture, as no plans have been drawn, the building will probably be some 150 feet long, 143 feet broad and 83 feet from floor to ceiling.

The hall was designed by Mr McKim, who made a special trip to Europe last summer and inspected every music hall of importance on the continent. In this, his production, he thinks that he has combined the best features of all and eliminated much that is faulty and unsatisfactory. It most resembles the music halls of Vienna and Liepsic, which are considered to be the finest in existence.

Boston's new music hall may or may not be of this design, as it may not satisfy the committee or stockholders, yet the people who viewed the model yesterday expressed themselves enthusiastically as favoring it. If it were decided to accept this design and build, the structure could be completed in time for the concerts of 1895.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1894.

BOSTON, January 7, 1894.

THE program of the Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, the 1st, was as follows:

Quartet in F major, op. 96. (MS.).....Dvorák
Allegro ma non troppo.
Lento.
Molto vivace.
Finale. (Vivace.)
(First public performance.)
Piano quartet in G minor, op. 25.....Brahms
Piano, Mr. Busoni.
Quintet in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven
Second viola, Mr. Zach.

There was naturally curiosity to hear the new "American" quartet, that had its birth in the now classic town of Iowa, known as Spillville. The music is cheerful and delightful, tuneful and spontaneous. Even the recollection of it brings to the mind the saw of Athenæus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness, produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy." Only the scherzo seems to me to bear the evident marks of labor; the rest of the quartet seems as though Dvorák had spoken easily and freely that which was in his mind. The music is as frank and honest as a quartet by Haydn. Such a work does not need a long and illustrated analysis; there is no riddle to solve, no parable to explain.

As to its alleged "Americanism," Mr. Louis C. Elson remarks epigrammatically "The American Symphony is a string quartet!" and he then adds "Paradoxical as this may sound, it is certainly true that Dvorák's quartet in F is far more redolent of the plantation than the master's symphony performed last Saturday." There are others who suspect or are sure they see a negro in Dr. Dvorák's woodpile. But the negroes on Dvorák's plantation have a singular habit of whistling Scotch, Scandinavian and Bohemian tunes.

Mr. Busoni played with prodigious energy and fire. His performance was a technical masterpiece. The other players in the Brahms' piano quartet, Messrs. Kneisel, Svecenski and Schroder, were heard occasionally, it is true, but as a rule the pianist had everything his own way. Admirable pianist! Equally admirable for endurance was the piano.

The Kneisel Quartet played with the finish and the taste that characterize always its performances.

* * *

I observe with pain that Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of your town, uncorked a large bottle of indignation and poured it on our orchestra, leader and newspaper men. For in the New York "Tribune" of the 1st inst. he spoke thus of Mr. Paur:

Mr. Paur had evidently taken ample pains in studying it with his band, but he misconceived the tempo of every movement so completely that the work was robbed of half its charm. It reminded one of the dinner at which everything was cold except the ice cream. Every movement was played with great moderation, except the larghetto, which was played much too fast. The temptation is strong to say that Mr. Paur, a newcomer in America, unconsciously gave a certificate of national character to the work in showing so convincingly his inability to grasp its spirt.

According to Mr. Krehbiel, "the newspaper critics in their reviews are unanimous in praising the beauty of the music, and denying its right to be called American." But Mr. Krehbiel wrote this article before he read the review in the "Advertiser" (Mr. Louis C. Elson), and the review in the "Transcript" (Mr. William Apthorp). These two papers have no Sunday edition. I do not dispute the meaning of Mr. Krehbiel's statement, but he should be more accurate. Mr. Elson, if I am not mistaken, was inclined to find folk-song in this symphony if possible, for, as you know, he is interested deeply in national music, but he wrote as follows in the "Advertiser," of January 1.

Brilliant as music, the new symphony by Dvorák, founded on native themes, does not achieve a distinct nationality. It is not more clearly American than Bohemian or Russian. The formation of certain passages upon a scale with a flat seventh is more European than American, for if such scales exist here they come from a remote antiquity in other climes.

The work began with a strange mixture of kettledrum explosions and brooding. When the chief theme was ushered in, however, it proved to have something of the lilt of the plantation, and suggested that accentuation of hand and foot which belongs to Afro-American melody. Yet, for the matter of that, the same characteristic can be traced as far back as scriptural music, and the singing of the psalms in ancient Jerusalem was not widely different from the free improvisation and emphatic rhythm of a Southern camp meeting, a fact which can easily be proved by references to "clapping of hands" in the Old Testament, by Egyptian pictures of contemporary date, and by a study of the character of the poems as they have come down to us.

Nevertheless we may be permitted to call this lilt and rhythm "American," since it is a characteristic of part of our Southern folk-song.

The development of the phrase which contained the gist of this theme was remarkable and its varied orchestral coloring was full of interest. This first movement seemed, at a single hearing, the finest part of the work, and it was the only portion which gave to the reviewer the impression of being typical.

The slow movement which came next was given over to vagueness and dreamy melancholy. The tone color was well chosen, and a tender theme for English horn and a delicate use of woodwind effects made a picture of much beauty, which, however, was not of any especial nationalty, although a bold episode of lively character and with a drone bass made some attempt at local color.

The scherzo was a disappointment, for here at least one might have expected the folk-dance, the break-down, or some flavor of plantation life, just as Mendelssohn threw the Gaelic spirit into the scherzo of his Scotch symphony. Instead of this one had a reminiscence of the figure with which Beethoven began the scherzo of his Ninth symphony, a march-like trio of strong contrast and intrinsic beauty, but very much more of Dvorák and his genius than of America.

The finale presented a bold theme full of dash and bric with dissonances that were still more courageous as the coda. That Europe will play this symphony as a contribution to music from a new quarter, may be confidently predicted, but if transatlantic critics accept it as a portrayal of the spirit of American folk-song they will go far astray. Yet the attempt made in this work will be worth something in the development of our musical resources, and others will dig where Dvorák has done surface mining.

Mr. Apthorp's excellent article in the "Transcript" is long and it does not lend itself easily to quotation. It should be read in full. The article is practically a protest against "the barbaric" in music.

* * *

Then Mr. Krehbiel welcomed the fact that "the reviewers and musicians" would have an opportunity "to continue their studies in musical nationalism at the Kneisel Quartet of the 1st.

* * *

He seems disquieted because there are "doubting Thomases of Boston." The inference is plain.

If we are doubting Thomases, of course Dvorák is the Messiah, and I suppose Mr. Krehbiel is playing the part of John the Baptist, the forerunner.

Mr. Krehbiel spoke of me by name in his article, and said: "Mr. Philip Hale thinks it wondrous amusing that anything should be called American which has attributes or elements that are also found among the peoples of the Old World. Much of this kind of talk is mere quibbling. Mr. Hale does not deny that Dr. Dvorák's melodies reflect the characteristics of the songs of the negroes in the South, and that the symphony is beautifully and consistently made. If so why should it not be called American? Those songs, though they contain intervallic and rhythmic peculiarities of African origin, are the product of American institutions; of the social, political and geographical environment within which the black slave was placed here; of the influences to which he was subjected here; of the joys and sorrows which fell to his lot here."

I admit that I wrote in the "Journal" of December 31 a eulogistic notice of the symphony. I still think, even in spite of Mr. Krehbiel's negro discoveries, that the symphony contains much that is beautiful. But just where and just when did I ever write that "Dr. Dvorák's melodies reflect the characteristics of the songs of the negroes in the South?" Did I not state expressly that in my opinion the symphony was anything but negro-American; although at the same time I acknowledged that the rhythm of the first motive of the first movement was in a measure suggestive of "the Souhern steamboat and plantation?" And I added in the same sentence that the rhythm was European.

* * *

Reduced to its quintessence, Mr. Krehbiel's argument might be put as follows: Certain rhythmic and tonal characteristics of the folk music of certain European countries are found (or alleged to be found) in genuine negro music; therefore such rhythmic and tonal characteristics are American.

But first, did the negroes bring from Africa this "national music?"

Second, did they invent it after they came here?

Or is not Mr. B. E. Woolf correct in saying in the "Gazette" of to-day: "For these so-called negro songs are simply distortions of tunes that they have heard sung or played in the families of their masters."

Nor do I believe as does Mr. Krehbiel apparently, that folk-songs are created by a folk. I believe that an individual is the creator, and that Böhme was also right when he said: "The people's poet never composes his words without a tune; he may invent it; he may use one that is in existence; or he may use snatches of known melodies."

* * *

Mr. Krehbiel came to Boston, via Spillville, with pieces of Dvorák in his carpet bag. We were all glad to see him, and we should have had unalloyed pleasure if Mr. Paur had not insisted on playing the new symphony. It was not our fault if Mr. Paur "misconceived the tempo of every movement so completely." No one of us had any opportunity of even looking at the sacred score, until it was placed reverently on Mr. Paur's desk; for the manuscript had been intrusted solely to the conductor, and he was faithful to his trust. Mr. Krehbiel has had opportunities. He has summered and wintered with the score, and no doubt been through it with a dark lantern. But is Mr. Krehbiel now cock-sure that Mr. Paur really mangled the symphony with his stick? Would the work have appeared so fresh and beautiful if the pace of the movements was so hideously wrong? I confess that I do not see any just reason for such violent rhetoric on the part of Mr. Krehbiel.

* * *

But enough of this subject. I have made some interesting discoveries in the musical history of Guinea, the fons et origo of Mr. Krehbiel's Americans, but I fear that some of them are not adapted to tea-table conversation or any New England fireside.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"...
Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"...
A "Siegfried" idyl...
A "Faust" overture...
"Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Götterdämmerung"...
"Brünhilde's" dying speech over "Siegfried's" body, from "Götterdämmerung"..... Wagner

I regret that I was unable to be present. May I take the liberty of quoting Mr. Woolf's review in the "Gazette" of to-day? You will find it mighty entertaining reading, even if you object to the sly thrusts at Wagner. I think that even Mr. Finck would smile at this:

This is a very large dose of Wagner for one evening, but there were doubtless many in the audience who enjoyed every bar of it. However, to others who were not enthusiastic worshippers of Wagner it proved somewhat cloying, not to say wearisome. All the selections had been heard frequently at these concerts, and Mr. Krehbiel kindly came on from New York on several occasions to explain to us the meaning of several of them, in order that we might be enabled to palpitate with the right emotion anent them. It might have added interest to the occasion if he could have been induced to enlighten us regarding them at this concert, but the chances are that he would have found serious objections, owing to the fact that a hearing of the Dvorák American Symphony caused him so much discomfort that he cryptogramically pronounced the orchestra to be "N. G." There is nothing new to be said about the music. Of the performances we feel justified in writing in the warmest terms of commendation. Mr. Paur's readings were masterly throughout, and the playing of the orchestra was faultless. The "Meistersinger" overture had never been given here with the perfect clearness that attended its interpretation by Mr. Paur last night. "The Idyl" was also beautifully read and played. The soloist was Mrs. Materna, who sang the "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and "Brünhilde's" lament. She acquitted herself with all necessary robustness of style, and doubtless with thorough fidelity to the composer's intentions. She certainly declaimed with great dramatic fervor. For singing, pure and simple, the music affords slight opportunity, and it must be said that the voice part in the score has little meaning or interest without its proper stage surroundings. In fact, it has little meaning under any conditions. The words are of the chief importance, and these can only seldom be heard through the din of the orchestra. Mrs. Materna's voice sounded worn in its middle notes, and her high notes alone were effective. These she shouted forth with penetrating effect, and doubtless achieved all that could be achieved under the circumstances. She was applauded with furious enthusiasm, which proves that musical noise is not without appreciation. The program for the next concert is Suite, B minor, Bach; Scotch Symphony, Mendelssohn; overture, "King Lear," Berlioz."

PHILIP HALE.

The Washington Post

PUBLICATION OFFICE.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Society packed Metzerott Hall to the last row in the gallery yesterday evening, the occasion being the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The performance was of the usual high standard of this organization. The opening selection, Brahm's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, was given with the artistic finish, spirit, and feeling that was expected, the rendition of the Allegro in the second division being especially fine. The soloist of the organization, Mme. Amalia Materna, possesses a voice, the power of which has apparently no limits. She filled the hall with a volume of sound as if it were an ordinary drawing-room, and could be heard clear and distinct above the full orchestra in every note of every trill, even in the lower and softer tones. Gluck's aria from "Alceste" was her first number. She was recalled four times, but contented herself and disconcerted the audience by bowing her acknowledgments.

The serenade of Volkman, a violoncello solo, given by Mr. Alwin Schroeder, was an exquisite thing, a classic in simplicity, yet fullness of feeling, and rendered both in the solo and accompanying parts with extreme delicacy of execution and conception.

Mme. Amalia Materna sang Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and again elicited applause for her wonderful power and execution. The closing number, the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, was given with the same characteristic skill and brilliancy as distinguished the remainder of the selections.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1894.

Concert by the Great Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House, was begun with Brahm's first symphony—the composer's finest orchestral work. From the beginning it gives evidence of the long study bestowed upon it by the author, and everywhere bears the stamp of the genius of one of the most profound and original composers of modern days. In his departure from the style of the older writers in distributing his parts, in handling the themes; in his combinations, transitions in time, in harmony and in innovations of one sort or another, Brahm exhibits boldness and peculiarities that give the listener pause, but there is nothing weak or commonplace in what he produces. To the average listener parts of the symphony may possibly be obscure; but, as played yesterday afternoon, it could not but command the closest attention, even of those who make no pretension of telling the world all Brahm had in mind when he wrote this symphony.

So many of the strings are grouped together and the distribution of the music for the wind instruments is such that, in an orchestra of the size and training of Mr. Paur's, the effect of this difficult but scholarly and thoroughly profound work was in the highest degree impressive. The audience hardly warmed up to its excellence until the first allegro was reached, but, after the playing of that movement and the elaborate andante, they were prepared to enjoy in the adagio the remarkably beautiful and original melody played by the horn, followed by the flute and the strings, perhaps the most attractive and touching bit of writing to the general hearer in the whole symphony. The stirring hymn to joy and what follows wind up a remarkably striking work. It would be ticklish business for the average orchestra to attempt to play this symphony, but Mr. Paur's artists handled it in fine style.

Madame Materna, who was heard here six or seven years ago with Scaria and Winkelmann—a trio who have sung Wagner's operas with so much success for years, sang an air from Gluck's "Alceste," and the well-known air, "Ocean," from Weber's "Oberon." When one considers how much and what great work she has done in Wagner's masterpieces, singing against orchestras containing so many wind instruments, the wonder is that her voice could be what is is. Yesterday she was almost, if not quite, the Materna of other days. Her voice has that peculiar, broad, thrilling, impressive dramatic quality necessary to interpret to the hearer the thought in the words the music carries. Materna is one of the foremost of dramatic sopranos—voices that are very rare. She has satisfied Wagner and his students, and she pleased her audience so much yesterday that she was repeatedly called back to the footlights. Her diamonds were remarkable in size and beauty.

The only other selection was Volkmann's serenade for strings (No. 3), an exquisitely beautiful composition, which was delightfully played. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo parts like the accomplished musician he is.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Materna and the Boston Orchestra Under Paur's Leadership.

Director Paur and his musicians are getting to know each other well, and the result of their better acquaintance was shown in the improved work of the orchestra at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House.

The concert opened with the C minor symphony of Brahms, truly an auspicious beginning. After listening to the powerful movements of this first symphony of the composer one can hardly describe it in too enthusiastic terms, for it is undoubtedly one of the strongest of modern works of the kind. In it Brahms illustrates with wonderful emphasis his conception of music in its noblest form, unallied with any other art and created merely for its own sake. It is abstract and profound, wholly apart from the slightest tendency toward programme music. It is the kind of music that seems broader and deeper at each new hearing, the kind which has fresh delights in store with the study of its scores passage by passage. It is rich in tone-color, varied and striking in orchestration, and shows throughout the touch of a masterhand in the development of it original themes.

Mme. Amalia Materna, the famous Wagnerian soprano, was the vocal soloist. Her name is closely associated with the Bayreuth festivals, at which she presented some of the most exacting of the Wagnerian opera roles, and she was a favorite singer with the composer himself. Mme. Materna's career, which includes many triumphs in German opera in New York, is not of short duration, and, knowing that the singer had reached and passed her prime, the audience hardly expected to hear so clear, strong and well-preserved a voice as that which rang through the theatre. Rich in quality, with a large compass and with great dramatic force, her voice has just the needed elements for the sucessful production of the operatic works of the German school. Her numbers were well selected, including a splendid aria from Gluck's "Alceste" and the familiar "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," both of which brought out the full scope and breadth of her voice.

Volkmann's serenade for strings, in D minor, Larghetto non troppo, was delightfully given, for the orchestra is superbly equipped in its strings. The solo part was well rendered by Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, and the number was received with enthusiasm. The overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" closed an interesting concert.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Great Orchestra Heard in a Wagner Programme at the Academy.

The Wagner devotees were out in full force last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, and filled the Academy of Music to overflowing. The immense audience was a credit to Philadelphia, it being composed of the most critical element of the local musical public, and it evidently enjoyed the classical beauties of the Wagnerian school and rendered and bestowed much applause where such was merited. The lovers of "the music of the future" came prepared for a rare treat, and the very highest expectations were realized. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, made up the programme from some of the heaviest works of Wagner, and eschewed all attempt of catering to the popular taste, for which he is entitled to much praise. That his extremely scholarly achievements are appreciated by the proper parties is shown by the fact that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, has recently signed a five years' contract with Mr. Paur.

This conductor looks upon a symphony orchestra from the proper standpoint, that of giving the public the very best works of the greatest masters of the classical school. He leaves it to other organizations to render popular selections, and in this he is perfectly right. Strauss and the Austrian Band and others of their order are better adapted for popular concert work, while his great music corps is supremely fitted for the very highest order of music.

The "piece de resistance" was the "Siegfried Idyll," which Mr. Paur gave with a poetic beauty seldom heard here before. The birds were almost visible and flitting about. An entrancing effect was produced by the manner in which the finale gradually faded away. In "A Faust Overture" all the beautiful climaxes were clearly brought out and given with a Satanic irony which was very effective. "Seigfried's Funeral March," from "Gotterdaemmerung," was full of anguish and despair, and the true spirit intended by Wagner prevailed throughout.

The opening number was the "Prelude" to "Die Meistersinger," which was beautifully played. The brass section had an additional charm, there being an absence of the glaring effect generally given in the selection. It was sufficiently strong, although subdued and mellow, and blended charmingly with the balance of the orchestra. Mr. Paur brought out all the beautiful filigre embellishments of the string and wood wind and kept the fortissimo under control so that nothing was drowned out. The "Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," was intelligently interpreted and played with admirable coloring and phazing.

As "Isolde" in this number Mme. Amalia Materna demonstrated that she still is the greatest of all Wagnerian sopranos. Her voice to-day contains that same grandeur and excellent quality that won for her eminence at Bayreuth and throughout the musical world. She is a living contradiction of the theory of many that Wagner music is ruinous to the voice, for even at the present time she retains much freshness of voice and numerous superior vocal qualifications, despite the fact that she is considerably beyond the age of the first half of a century. In the last selection on the programme "Brunhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body," from "Gotterdaemmerung," she displayed the same fire and dramatic force as in days gone by and which won for her much fame.

[72]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1894.

BOSTON, January 7, 1894.

THE program of the Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Chickering Hall, Monday evening, the 1st, was as follows:

Quartet in F major, op. 96. (MS.).....Dvorák
Allegro ma non troppo.
Lento.
Molto vivace.
Finale. (Vivace.)
(First public performance.)

Piano quartet in G minor, op. 25.....Brahms
Piano, Mr. Busoni.

Quintet in C major, op. 29.....Beethoven
Second viola, Mr. Zach.

There was naturally curiosity to hear the new "American" quartet, that had its birth in the now classic town of Iowa, known as Spillville. The music is cheerful and delightful, tuneful and spontaneous. Even the recollection of it brings to the mind the saw of Athenæus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness, produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy." Only the scherzo seems to me to bear the evident marks of labor; the rest of the quartet seems as though Dvorák had spoken easily and freely that which was in his mind. The music is as frank and honest as a quartet by Haydn. Such a work does not need a long and illustrated analysis; there is no riddle to solve, no parable to explain.

As to its alleged "Americanism." Mr. Louis C. Elson remarks epigrammatically "The American Symphony is a string quartet!" and he then adds "Paradoxical as this may sound, it is certainly true that Dvorák's quartet in F is far more redolent of the plantation than the master's symphony performed last Saturday." There are others who suspect or are sure they see a negro in Dr. Dvorák's woodpile. But the negroes on Dvorák's plantation have a singular habit of whistling Scotch, Scandinavian and Bohemian tunes.

Mr. Busoni played with prodigious energy and fire. His performance was a technical masterpiece. The other players in the Brahms' piano quartet, Messrs. Kneisel, Svecenski and Schroder, were heard occasionally, it is true, but as a rule the pianist had everything his own way. Admirable pianist! Equally admirable for endurance was the piano.

The Kneisel Quartet played with the finish and the taste that characterize always its performances.

* * *

I observe with pain that Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of your town, uncorked a large bottle of indignation and poured it on our orchestra, leader and newspaper men. For in the New York "Tribune" of the 1st inst. he spoke thus of Mr. Paur:

Mr. Paur had evidently taken ample pains in studying it with his band, but he misconceived the tempo of every movement so completely that the work was robbed of half its charm. It reminded one of the dinner at which everything was cold except the ice cream. Every movement was played with great moderation, except the larghetto, which was played much too fast. The temptation is strong to say that Mr. Paur, a newcomer in America, unconsciously gave a certificate of national character to the work in showing so convincingly his inability to grasp its spirit.

According to Mr. Krehbiel, "the newspaper critics in their reviews are unanimous in praising the beauty of the music, and denying its right to be called American." But Mr. Krehbiel wrote this article before he read the review in the "Advertiser" (Mr. Louis C. Elson), and the review in the "Transcript" (Mr. William Apthorp). These two papers have no Sunday edition. I do not dispute the meaning of Mr. Krehbiel's statement, but he should be more accurate. Mr. Elson, if I am not mistaken, was inclined to find folk-song in this symphony if possible, for, as you know, he is interested deeply in national music, but he wrote as follows in the "Advertiser," of January 1.

Brilliant as music, the new symphony by Dvorák, founded on native themes, does not achieve a distinct nationality. It is not more clearly American than Bohemian or Russian. The formation of certain passages upon a scale with a flat seventh is more European than American, for if such scales exist here they come from a remote antiquity in other climes.

The work began with a strange mixture of kettledrum explosions and brooding. When the chief theme was ushered in, however, it proved to have something of the lilt of the plantation, and suggested that accentuation of hand and foot which belongs to Afro-American melody. Yet, for the matter of that, the same characteristic can be traced as far back as scriptural music, and the singing of the psalms in ancient Jerusalem was not widely different from the free improvisation and emphatic rhythm of a Southern camp meeting, a fact which can easily be proved by references to "clapping of hands" in the Old Testament, by Egyptian pictures of contemporary date, and by a study of the character of the poems as they have come down to us.

Nevertheless we may be permitted to call this lilt and rhythm "American," since it is a characteristic of part of our Southern folk-song.

The development of the phrase which contained the gist of this theme was remarkable and its varied orchestral coloring was full of interest. This first movement seemed, at a single hearing, the finest part of the work, and it was the only portion which gave to the reviewer the impression of being typical.

The slow movement which came next was given over to vagueness and dreamy melancholy. The tone color was well chosen, and a tender theme for English horn and a delicate use of woodwind effects made a picture of much beauty, which, however, was not of any especial nationality, although a bold episode of lively character and with a drone bass made some attempt at local color.

The scherzo was a disappointment, for here at least one might have expected the folk-dance, the break-down, or some flavor of plantation life, just as Mendelssohn threw the Gaelic spirit into the scherzo of his Scotch symphony. Instead of this one had a reminiscence of the figure with which Beethoven began the scherzo of his Ninth symphony, a march-like trio of strong contrast and intrinsic beauty, but very much more of Dvorák and his genius than of America.

The finale presented a bold theme full of dash and brio with dissonances that were still more courageous at the coda. That Europe will play this symphony as a contribution to music from a new quarter, may be confidently predicted, but if transatlantic critics accept it as a portrayal of the spirit of American folk-song they will go far astray. Yet the attempt made in this work will be worth something in the development of our musical resources, and others will dig where Dvorák has done surface mining.

Mr. Apthorp's excellent article in the "Transcript" is long and it does not lend itself easily to quotation. It should be read in full. The article is practically a protest against "the barbaric" in music.

* * *

Then Mr. Krehbiel welcomed the fact that "the reviewers and musicians" would have an opportunity "to continue their studies in musical nationalism at the Kneisel Quartet of the 1st.

* * *

He seems disquieted because there are "doubting Thomases of Boston." The inference is plain.

If we are doubting Thomases, of course Dvorák is the Messiah, and I suppose Mr. Krehbiel is playing the part of John the Baptist, the forerunner.

Mr. Krehbiel spoke of me by name in his article, and said: "Mr. Philip Hale thinks it wondrous amusing that anything should be called American which has attributes or elements that are also found among the peoples of the Old World. Much of this kind of talk is mere quibbling. Mr. Hale does not deny that Dr. Dvorák's melodies reflect the characteristics of the songs of the negroes in the South, and that the symphony is beautifully and consistently made. If so why should it not be called American? Those songs, though they contain intervallic and rhythmic peculiarities of African origin, are the product of American institutions; of the social, political and geographical environment within which the black slave was placed here; of the influences to which he was subjected here; of the joys and sorrows which fell to his lot here."

I admit that I wrote in the "Journal" of December 31 a eulogistic notice of the symphony. I still think, even in spite of Mr. Krehbiel's negro discoveries, that the symphony contains much that is beautiful. But just where and just when did I ever write that "Dr. Dvorák's melodies reflect the characteristics of the songs of the negroes in the South?" Did I not state expressly that in my opinion the symphony was anything but negro-American; although at the same time I acknowledged that the rhythm of the first motive of the first movement was in a measure suggestive of "the Souhern steamboat and plantation?" And I added in the same sentence that the rhythm was European.

* * *

Reduced to its quintessence, Mr. Krehbiel's argument might be put as follows: Certain rhythmic and tonal characteristics of the folk music of certain European countries are found (or alleged to be found) in genuine negro music; therefore such rhythmic and tonal characteristics are American.

But first, did the negroes bring from Africa this "national music?"

Second, did they invent it after they came here?

Or is not Mr. B. E. Woolf correct in saying in the "Gazette" of to-day: "For these so-called negro songs are simply distortions of tunes that they have heard sung or played in the families of their masters."

Nor do I believe as does Mr. Krehbiel apparently, that folk-songs are created by a folk. I believe that an individual is the creator, and that Böhme was also right when he said: "The people's poet never composes his words without a tune; he may invent it; he may use one that is in existence; or he may use snatches of known melodies."

* * *

Mr. Krehbiel came to Boston, via Spillville, with pieces of Dvorák in his carpet bag. We were all glad to see him, and we should have had unalloyed pleasure if Mr. Paur had not insisted on playing the new symphony. It was not our fault if Mr. Paur "misconceived the tempo of every movement so completely." No one of us had any opportunity of even looking at the sacred score, until it was placed reverently on Mr. Paur's desk; for the manuscript had been intrusted solely to the conductor, and he was faithful to his trust. Mr. Krehbiel has had opportunities. He has summered and wintered with the score, and no doubt been through it with a dark lantern. But is Mr. Krehbiel now cock-sure that Mr. Paur really mangled the symphony with his stick? Would the work have appeared so fresh and beautiful if the pace of the movements was so hideously wrong? I confess that I do not see any just reason for such violent rhetoric on the part of Mr. Krehbiel.

* * *

But enough of this subject. I have made some interesting discoveries in the musical history of Guinea, the fons et origo of Mr. Krehbiel's Americans, but I fear that some of them are not adapted to tea-table conversation or any New England fireside.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg"...
Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"...
A "Siegfried" idyl...
A "Faust" overture...
"Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Götterdämmerung"...
"Brünhilde's" dying speech over "Siegfried's" body, from "Götterdämmerung"...
.....Wagner

I regret that I was unable to be present. May I take the liberty of quoting Mr. Woolf's review in the "Gazette" of to-day? You will find it mighty entertaining reading, even if you object to the sly thrusts at Wagner. I think that even Mr. Finck would smile at this:

This is a very large dose of Wagner for one evening, but there were doubtless many in the audience who enjoyed every bar of it. However, to others who were not enthusiastic worshippers of Wagner it proved somewhat cloying, not to say wearisome. All the selections had been heard frequently at these concerts, and Mr. Krehbiel kindly came on from New York on several occasions to explain to us the meaning of several of them, in order that we might be enabled to palpitate with the right emotion anent them. It might have added interest to the occasion if he could have been induced to enlighten us regarding them at this concert, but the chances are that he would have found serious objections, owing to the fact that a hearing of the Dvorák American Symphony caused him so much discomfort that he cryptogramically pronounced the orchestra to be "N. G." There is nothing new to be said about the music. Of the performances we feel justified in writing in the warmest terms of commendation. Mr. Paur's readings were masterly throughout, and the playing of the orchestra was faultless. The "Meistersinger" overture had never been given here with the perfect clearness that attended its interpretation by Mr. Paur last night. "The Idyl" was also beautifully read and played. The soloist was Mrs. Materna, who sang the "Liebestod" from "Tristan" and "Brünhilde's" lament. She acquitted herself with all necessary robustness of style, and doubtless with thorough fidelity to the composer's intentions. She certainly declaimed with great dramatic fervor. For singing, pure and simple, the music affords slight opportunity, and it must be said that the voice part in the score has little meaning or interest without its proper stage surroundings. In fact, it has little meaning under any conditions. The words are of the chief importance, and these can only seldom be heard through the din of the orchestra. Mrs. Materna's voice sounded worn in its middle notes, and her high notes alone were effective. These she shouted forth with penetrating effect, and doubtless achieved all that could be achieved under the circumstances. She was applauded with furious enthusiasm, which proves that musical noise is not without appreciation. The program for the next concert is Suite, B minor, Bach; Scotch Symphony, Mendelssohn; overture, "King Lear," Berlioz."

PHILIP HALE.

The Washington Post

PUBLICATION OFFICE.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Society packed Metzerott Hall to the last row in the gallery yesterday evening, the occasion being the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The performance was of the usual high standard of this organization. The opening selection, Brahm's symphony No. 1 in C minor, was given with the artistic finish, spirit, and feeling that was expected, the rendition of the Allegro in the second division being especially fine. The soloist of the organization, Mme. Amalia Materna, possesses a voice, the power of which has apparently no limits. She filled the hall with a volume of sound as if it were an ordinary drawing-room, and could be heard clear and distinct above the full orchestra in every note of every trill, even in the lower and softer tones. Gluck's aria from "Alceste" was her first number. She was recalled four times, but contented herself and disconcerted the audience by bowing her acknowledgments.

The serenade of Volkman, a violoncello solo, given by Mr. Alwin Schroeder, was an exquisite thing, a classic in simplicity, yet fullness of feeling, and rendered both in the solo and accompanying parts with extreme delicacy of execution and conception.

Mme. Amalia Materna sang Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and again elicited applause for her wonderful power and execution. The closing number, the overture to "Euryanthe," by Weber, was given with the same characteristic skill and brilliancy as distinguished the remainder of the selections.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1894.

Concert by the Great Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House, was begun with Brahm's first symphony—the composer's finest orchestral work. From the beginning it gives evidence of the long study bestowed upon it by the author, and everywhere bears the stamp of the genius of one of the most profound and original composers of modern days. In his departure from the style of the older writers in distributing his parts, in handling the themes; in his combinations, transitions in time, in harmony and in innovations of one sort or another, Brahm exhibits boldness and peculiarities that give the listener pause, but there is nothing weak or commonplace in what he produces. To the average listener parts of the symphony may possibly be obscure; but, as played yesterday afternoon, it could not but command the closest attention, even of those who make no pretension of telling the world all Brahm had in mind when he wrote this symphony.

So many of the strings are grouped together and the distribution of the music for the wind instruments is such that, in an orchestra of the size and training of Mr. Paur's, the effect of this difficult but scholarly and thoroughly profound work was in the highest degree impressive. The audience hardly warmed up to its excellence until the first allegro was reached, but, after the playing of that movement and the elaborate andante, they were prepared to enjoy in the adagio the remarkably beautiful and original melody played by the horn, followed by the flute and the strings, perhaps the most attractive and touching bit of writing to the general hearer in the whole symphony. The stirring hymn to joy and what follows wind up a remarkably striking work. It would be ticklish business for the average orchestra to attempt to play this symphony, but Mr. Paur's artists handled it in fine style.

Madame Materna, who was heard here six or seven years ago with Scaria and Winkelmann—a trio who have sung Wagner's operas with so much success for years, sang an air from Gluck's "Alceste," and the well-known air, "Ocean," from Weber's "Oberon." When one considers how much and what great work she has done in Wagner's masterpieces, singing against orchestras containing so many wind instruments, the wonder is that her voice could be what is is. Yesterday she was almost, if not quite, the Materna of other days. Her voice has that peculiar, broad, thrilling, impressive dramatic quality necessary to interpret to the hearer the thought in the words the music carries. Materna is one of the foremost of dramatic sopranos—voices that are very rare. She has satisfied Wagner and his students, and she pleased her audience so much yesterday that she was repeatedly called back to the footlights. Her diamonds were remarkable in size and beauty.

The only other selection was Volkmann's serenade for strings (No. 3), an exquisitely beautiful composition, which was delightfully played. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the leading 'cellist of the orchestra, played the solo parts like the accomplished musician he is.

THE SUN

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, JAN

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Materna and the Boston Orchestra Under Paur's Leadership.

Director Paur and his musicians are getting to know each other well, and the result of their better acquaintance was shown in the improved work of the orchestra at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House.

The concert opened with the C minor symphony of Brahms, truly an auspicious beginning. After listening to the powerful movements of this first symphony of the composer one can hardly describe it in too enthusiastic terms, for it is undoubtedly one of the strongest of modern works of the kind. In it Brahms illustrates with wonderful emphasis his conception of music in its noblest form, unallied with any other art and created merely for its own sake. It is abstract and profound, wholly apart from the slightest tendency toward programme music. It is the kind of music that seems broader and deeper at each new hearing, the kind which has fresh delights in store with the study of its scores passage by passage. It is rich in tone-color, varied and striking in orchestration, and shows throughout the touch of a masterhand in the development of it original themes.

Mme. Amalia Materna, the famous Wagnerian soprano, was the vocal soloist. Her name is closely associated with the Bayreuth festivals, at which she presented some of the most exacting of the Wagnerian opera roles, and she was a favorite singer with the composer himself. Mme. Materna's career, which includes many triumphs in German opera in New York, is not of short duration, and, knowing that the singer had reached and passed her prime, the audience hardly expected to hear so clear, strong and well-preserved a voice as that which rang through the theatre. Rich in quality, with a large compass and with great dramatic force, her voice has just the needed elements for the sucessful production of the operatic works of the German school. Her numbers were well selected, including a splendid aria from Gluck's "Alceste" and the familiar "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," both of which brought out the full scope and breadth of her voice.

Volkmann's serenade for strings, in D minor, Larghetto non troppo, was delightfully given, for the orchestra is superbly equipped in its strings. The solo part was well rendered by Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, and the number was received with enthusiasm. The overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" closed an interesting concert.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Great Orchestra Heard in a Wagner Programme at the Academy.

The Wagner devotees were out in full force last evening at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, and filled the Academy of Music to overflowing. The immense audience was a credit to Philadelphia, it being composed of the most critical element of the local musical public, and it evidently enjoyed the classical beauties of the Wagnerian school and rendered and bestowed much applause where such was merited. The lovers of "the music of the future" came prepared for a rare treat, and the very highest expectations were realized. Mr. Emil Paur, the conducter, made up the programme from some of the heaviest works of Wagner, and eschewed all attempt of catering to the popular taste, for which he is entitled to much praise. That his extremely scholarly achievements are appreciated by the proper parties is shown by the fact that Mr. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, has recently signed a five years' contract with Mr. Paur.

This conductor looks upon a symphony orchestra from the proper standpoint, that of giving the public the very best works of the greatest masters of the classical school. He leaves it to other organizations to render popular selections, and in this he is perfectly right. Strauss and the Austrian Band and others of their order are better adapted for popular concert work, while his great music corps is supremely fitted for the very highest order of music.

The "piece de resistance" was the "Siegfried Idyll," which Mr. Paur gave with a poetic beauty seldom heard here before. The birds were almost visible and flitting about. An entrancing effect was produced by the manner in which the finale gradually faded away. In "A Faust Overture" all the beautiful climaxes were clearly brought out and given with a Satanic irony which was very effective. "Seigfried's Funeral March," from "Gotterdaemmerung," was full of anguish and despair, and the true spirit intended by Wagner prevailed throughout.

The opening number was the "Prelude" to "Die Meistersinger," which was beautifully played. The brass section had an additional charm, there being an absence of the glaring effect generally given in the selection. It was sufficiently strong, although subdued and mellow, and blended charmingly with the balance of the orchestra. Mr. Paur brought out all the beautiful filigre embellishments of the string and wood wind and kept the fortissimo under control so that nothing was drowned out. The "Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," was intelligently interpreted and played with admirable coloring and phazing.

As "Isolde" in this number Mme. Amalia Materna demonstrated that she still is the greatest of all Wagnerian sopranos. Her voice to-day contains that same grandeur and excellent quality that won for her eminence at Bayreuth and throughout the musical world. She is a living contradiction of the theory of many that Wagner music is ruinous to the voice, for even at the present time she retains much freshness of voice and numerous superior vocal qualifications, despite the fact that she is considerably beyond the age of the first half of a century. In the last selection on the programme "Brunhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body," from "Gotterdæmmerung," she displayed the same fire and dramatic force as in days gone by and which won for her much fame.

[72]

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, January 11, 1894.

A NIGHT OF WAGNER.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the season last night at the Academy of Music. The programme presented was devoted entirely to selections from the works of Wagner. This allowed the new leader, Emil Paur, to appear to better advantage than heretofore, for he is, undoubtedly, a close and enthusiastic student of Wagnerian intricacies. His familiarity with the scores is remarkable, and he is in earnest and sincere touch with the true purpose and meaning of the German master's ideas. The programme was certainly arranged with judicious taste. It began with a selection from Wagner's only exploit in musical comedy, "Die Meistersinger," and ended with a Bruennhilde number from "Goetterdaemmerung." The larger part of the entertainment, however, was surrendered to illustrations of the poetical moments of the composer; interpretation was given to those compositions in which real beauty was more conspicuous than the technical construction. Leader Paur certainly displayed judgment on this particular point; as the skillful work of his orchestra is more readily noted in modulated passages. In these, shading, phrasing and color are accorded their true value and receive the appreciation due them.

But in those tremendous outbursts from string, brass, wood and skin which mark Wagner's dramatic creations it is really difficult to determine whether it is accuracy of interpretation or energy of mouth and hand that is the most important feature of its sonorous turbulence. For instance, the most delightful portion of last night's concert was undoubtedly the exquisite modulation, the shifting shades of delicate expression, which marked the superb performance of the "Siegfried Idyl." In this selection the players followed the direction of the leader with admirable precision and correctness, and responding quickly to every call made upon them. It was a singularly beautiful rendition, and will long linger in the memory of those who were fortunate enough to hear it.

The Wagnerian soprano, Amalia Materna, was the soloist of the occasion, and her forceful dramatic style, sonorous voice and broad, sweeping methods came into impressive assertion in Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body—the third scene of the third act of "Goetterdaemmerung." She was also heard to advantage in a similar number from the opera of "Tristan und Isolde." Madame Materna, however, was not by any means as strongly effective as she is when upon the operatic stage. "A Faust Overture" was another notable contribution in which the instrumentalists were excellent, while the many difficulties of the arrangement from "Die Meistersinger" were conquered with a striking effect that won great applause from the large audience present. The concert may be accepted as a sincere attempt to interpret and set forth the higher beauties of Wagner. To show the conscientious care and effort that entered into the task, it may be mentioned that the tubas used in one of the "Goetterdaemmerung" scenes were exact counterparts of those instruments employed in the famous Wagnerian performances in Bayreuth.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Thursday, Jan. 11, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Concert.

One may argue for or against Richard Wagner and his works ad infinitum, but there is at least one thing about the "music of the future" that calls for no discussion—namely, that it can conjure up a large audience in Philadelphia. A glance into the auditorium of the Academy last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of the current series, was sufficient to indicate that Wagner is by no means without honor here, for a house that filled almost every seat in the parquet, parquet circle and balcony, and was well represented in the upper tiers, gathered to listen to a strictly Wagnerian programme. Mr. Paur showed to advantage as a conductor, as he was evidently con amore with the spirit of the great composer thus exploited, and the superb orchestra was in admirable form. There were doubtless some in the audience who might have better enjoyed a trifle less Wagner and a wee bit of some other master, albeit that this may seem like rank heresy to some devotees, but the programme was certainly judiciously chosen and impressive. Beginning with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," it included the lovely "Siegfried" Idyl and a "Faust" overture, together with the Siegfried Funeral March from "Goetterdaemmerung." All these numbers were given effectively and with that perfection of detail for which the Boston Orchestra is now so deservedly famous. Madame Materna, who is always at home in a concert of this kind, was heard in the Liebstod, from "Tristan und Isolde," and Bruennhilde's dying speech in the "Goetterdaemmerung," both of which, it need hardly be added, she sang with true artistic perception and dramatic force.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1894.

A NIGHT WITH WAGNER.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Delightful Concert at the Academy of Music.

Whatever difference of opinion there may have been up to last night over Herr Paur's qualifications as a conductor, there can be none hereafter as to his ability to interpret Wagner's music. The Wagnerian program was delightful throughout, and the concert was one of the most delightful ever given in this city. The program:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

"Vorspiel und Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."

Isolde: Mme. Materna.

Siegfried Idyl.

A Faust Overture.

"Siegfried's Funeral March."

Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung."

Bruennhilde: Mme. Materna.

Though Herr Paur disclaims, being a purely Wagnerite and considers himself an all-round musician, it is plain that his sympathies are with the music of the future. While his manner of conducting is still inexplicable to the audience it is intelligible to the musicians, for the orchestra never played more perfectly. To give a whole evening of one composer, and particularly Wagner, is a little risky, but the program was so arranged as to give a wide variety and there was no room for complaint, but rather commendation.

In the prelude to Die Meistersinger the conductor gave the musicians full scope, and the volume was adequate while the tone was rich and stately. It was played with more breadth than we are accustomed to hear it. The Siegfried Idyl brought out those qualities of the orchestra made famous by Mr. Nikisch. The latter conductor never handled his men with greater delicacy, while he lacked the quiet but peculiar emphasis which Paur gives to the various themes and stray phrases that run through the work. The Siegfried funeral march has never been played with equal satisfaction here. For the first time in this city were introduced the four Bayreuth-horns designed by Wagner for this work alone in order to addto the barbaric quality of the music and yet preserve the uniformity of tone color. Small as such a matter might seem to the uninitiated, the effect last night was marvelous. This masterpiece of this character of music—and one of Wagner's greatest creations—was given with a completeness and a masterly comprehension that left nothing to be desired.

Madame Materna, the soloist of the evening, made a most favorable impression. In her prime one of the best, if not the very best singer of Wagnerian roles, she still preserves the rich quality of her tones, though passing years have necessarily reduced her register and affected the volume. Nevertheless she is to-day a great artist. There are few persons who could to-day sing the Bruennhilde speech as she sang it last night. Though at times she was a little overweighted by the orchestra, she sang with great expression and true dramatic fire.

Barring a few passages it was as delightful as one could desire. Her methods are simply delightful and her comprehension of the music so adequate that she made what is so often a failure by incompetency the feature of the program and gave many in the audience entirely new conceptions of Wagner's dramatic music. No composer has suffered so much from murderers and particularly murderesses. The accompaniment was admirable. The Liebested was well sung, though naturally of less interest than the last number. The concert was one that will raise Paur very much in the estimation of the music-loving public. He showered the poetry and dramatic qualities of Wagner's music without that tedium of which so many persons complain.

The Times

EIGHT PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 11, 1894.

PAUR CONDUCTS WAGNER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Academy of Music.

Last night the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was devoted entirely to Wagner, and with the attraction of Materna as the soloist, there was a very large house, drawn also no doubt by the desire to hear Herr Paur conduct, for the orchestra has not been heard before under him in Wagner in this city. The programme was brief and strong—the Vorspiel from the "Meistersinger," the Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde," the Siegfried Idyl, the Faust overture, the Funeral March from "Goetterdaemmerung" and the Immolation of Bruennhilde from the same opera. Perhaps the Tannhaeuser March or the Walkuerenritt might have been substituted for the Faust overture with advantage, but, on the whole, no Wagnerian could have complained of the selections. It may be said at once that not only was Materna at her best in the closing number, but in this selection Herr Paur's conducting was of the very highest order, which had hardly been the case until then. In the previous numbers, especially the Idyl and the overture, the work of the orchestra had seemed labored, and in the funeral march the brasses did not appear to be managed with the best effect. Here, too, the cymbals and triangles were somewhat noisy. But these defects were probably more manifest through the very strict attention paid to Herr Paur's leading, and for the same reason the slow tempo and cultured handling of the Tristan Vorspiel and the gentleness of the Siegfried Idyl were more quickly seized upon. In the magnificent music of the close of the Goetterdaemmerung, however, the conductor achieved a veritable triumph; and while a hundred memories were evoked by the ever fresh and powerful voice of the great singer, and by her incomparable delivery, it was felt that the great rush of the final tragedy had never been better expressed here. This music is of the essence of the sublime, and will always be a test of the highest qualities of imagination in a conductor, over and above his musical capacities, and it is mere justice to Herr Paur to admit the genius with which last night he led his splendid orchestra in a number in which, to be frank, it was hardly expected that we should again hear the equal, for different qualities of Seidl and Thomas. But the fact that his leading was adequate to the tremendous ideas involved in the work can only be noted in the simple statement to this effect. The scope of the finale is too vast for elaboration upon the meaning of the feat. In these remarks the splendid assistance of Materna is of course intended to be kept in mind. Not for some time has she sung so superbly as she did last evening.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Heard in a Wagnerian Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of one of those crowded audiences which nowadays it never fails to attract. Its programme upon this occasion was selected exclusively from the compositions of Richard Wagner, and it is quite likely that many of the habitues of these concerts anticipated its performance with some misgivings. For one thing Wagner's music is so essentially dramatic that played in the concert hall, without the intended environment of scenery and action, it naturally loses a large part of its significance and impressiveness, while for the rest, programmes arranged from the works of a single composer are apt through a lack of variety to become tedious, without regard to the character of the music itself. There was accordingly good cause for feeling dubious as to the result of Mr. Paur's experiment, but the simple truth of the matter is that last night's concert was by far the finest of the season, and that it necessitates a revision of all previous estimates of Mr. Emil Paur's rank as a conductor. He is the greatest Wagnerian conductor in the country, excepting none. Over and over again last night he produced effects which could only have been produced by a conductor of the very highestorder of ability and one having a special aptitude for and mature experience in the execution of the work in hand. It is not only that he rendered clear the bewildering complexities of Wagner's excessively intricate and arduous score, that he elucidated its meaning, maintained its balance, exhibited all its inner workings, and gave each element of the whole its true value and proportion, so that the entire scheme was rendered apparent and intelligible, and what is often left obscure or passed unnoticed by became of recognizable interest and importance. He did all that, but what is more, and of greater consequence, he entered with earnest sympathy and full appreciation into the mood, the sentiment, the purpose, the dominant idea of the composer, and never failed, whether amid the sweet simplicity of the "Siegfried Idyll," the ineffable ecstacies and poignant heart-pangs of Isolde's "Liebestod," or the majestic terrors of the "Gotterdamerung" funeral march, to apprehend and eloquently to express his meaning. It cannot be said that he was more successful in one movement than in another, for he succeeded perfectly in all; but certainly the climax of the concert was the "Gotterdamerung" music, which the writer, in a somewhat extended experience, has never heard played with such extraordinary impressiveness. Of course, Mr. Paur had a great orchestra at his command, an orchestra which last evening included the four tubas called for by the score, but in this country never furnished; but the greater the army the more difficult the task of the general, and it was through Mr. Paur's leadership that the splendid effects realized were accomplished. The soloist was that noble artist Mme. Materna, of whose broad declamatory singing it is enough to say that it was worthy of the occasion.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was but one unfamiliar piece of music on the programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall last night, but the entertainment was exceedingly interesting throughout. It began with Brahms's first symphony, which was followed by the great soprano air from Beethoven's "Fidelio." Then came the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," and after that another vocal number, the very effective but somewhat trite scena from Massenet's "Herodiade," beginning "Celui dont la parole." To conclude we had the novelty, an overture entitled "1812," by Tschaikowsky. The singer was Mme. Nordica, who sang conscientiously and well, though she did not disclose all the dramatic contents of the two pieces which fell to her lot. The symphony and overture were played better than anything given by the orchestra in New-York this season, which means, of course, that from every point of view the performance was thoroughly admirable. Whether or not the overture is entitled to a place in the scheme of a high-class concert is a question not easily answered. It is a piece of "occasional" music with a political tendency. Obviously it was written to humor the patriotic fulfilment of the Czar's people. It is intended to depict the discomfiture of Bonaparte in the Moscow campaign, and if it could be accompanied by a picture of the retreat of the French army it would serve its purpose admirably. It is a free fight between a Russian folk-tune and the "Marseillaise," accompanied by the ringing of church bells and the tweeting of cannon. But there is a great deal of ingenuity in the composition, and it works up a thoroughly exciting climax which, unfortunately, smacks so much of the circus that in spite of the diversion which it provides, one cannot accept without a mental reservation touching its propriety.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1894.

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "1812" OVERTURE.

How Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in Carnegie Hall, would have delighted Jullien, Rivière, Gilmore and other conductors of that ilk! The crackle of musketry, the booming of cannons, the cries of wounded were everywhere. There were scraps of "Marseillaise," of what sounded like a Turkish dance, besides a suspicious reminiscence of the "College Hornpipe." Church bells played an important part in the work. There was a passage in the 'cellos and violas which only needed to be introduced by the familiar "I will now endeavor to give you an imitation of a church organ," for every one to know what was meant. In fact, it only needed a little red fire and a few rockets to make one think it was midsummer at Manhattan Beach!

Brahms' C minor symphony—curious contrast—opened the concert. The orchestra was not up to its usual mark last night. Probably the members dreaded that melodramatic overture. Anyhow, notwithstanding the rich quality of tone in the strings, particularly in the finale, the performance was by no means first class. The attacks were rather ragged—like Herr Paur's conducting. That the orchestra manages to play together at all to his undecided signals is perhaps the greatest proof of the individual excellence of the members. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture I have heard better played by provincial orchestras.

Mme. Lillian Nordica sang the "Invocation to Hope," from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and Massenet's "Il est doux," from "L'Herodiade." She is always an excellent artist, though she has of late developed a tendency to abuse the chest register. This was particularly shown in her first number, where she tried to be dramatic—and failed.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1894.

A MUSICAL SHOCK.

Effect of a New Overture, Entitled "1812," at a Boston Symphony Concert.

The audience in Music Hall last night was given both poles of the musical art, and one could have hardly doubted that if th elate P. S. Gilmore had been present, his heart would have been gladdened by the performance of a new—to us—overture by Peter Schaikowsky, called "1812."

Coming as it did at the end of a programme consisting of Brahms, Beethoven, Weber and Massenet, and fathered by such a distinguished name, it really produced a shock, and just what it was intended to do. A piece d'occasion, and written for some great Russian state solemnity, it would have sounded better in the middle of the steppes.

The finale, with its bells, its cannon and its fizz-bang, suggested the entry of the New Year on lower Broadway. And yet, at the outset, it contained some lovely writing, but as festival music, or music written for state occasions, it cannot be compared to Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," Rubinstein's "Russia," nor even Litolff's "Robespierre" overture. Even Herr Paur smiled when he ended, while his men looked exhausted.

Brahm's beautiful C minor Symphony was the best played thing of the evening. We have had it already this season, at a Damrosch concert. The middle movement was well done. Not so well, however, was read the "Euryanthe" overture. It was stiff and creaked at the joints, and rhythmically it was weak-kneed.

Lillian Nordica was the singer. She delivered Beethoven's great "Fidelio aria," "Abschenlichen," intelligently and spiritedly, and afterward Massenet's charming aria from Herodiade, "Il est doux." She looked charming, and was recalled three or four times after the latter number. Materna sat in a box and applauded.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 12, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Much Variety Given at Music Hall.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening. The programme consisted of the following numbers: Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Brahms; recitative and aria, "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," Beethoven; overture "Euryanthe," Weber; recitative and aria, "Celui dont la parole," from "Herodiade," Massenet, and overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky. The vocalist was Mme. Lilian Nordica of the opera. There was certainly no lack of variety in a programme which embraced music of the classic and romantic German schools, of the French school of modern opera, and of the latest Russian school. Nevertheless there was nothing new in the list, and therefore nothing which calls for extended comment.

The Tschaikowsky overture, to be sure, is unfamiliar, and it is likely to remain so. It is one of the famous composer's occasional works, written to please the Czar and to celebrate some political festival. It obviously refers to the unfortunate incursion of Napoleon which culminated in the celebrated retreat from Moscow. The music is intended to depict the struggle of Russia against the French invader, and the national hymns of the two nations are used ingeniously in combination with an instrumental delineation of warfare, accentuated by cannon shots, which, last night, were imitated by the bass drum. There are some very beautiful passages in the composition, but the finale is cheap, noisy, and vulgar. The work was performed with great vigor under the direction of Emil Paur.

Mme. Nordica sang both her arias commendably, though she was less successful in the Beethoven number than in that by Massenet. Mr. Paur's reading of the Brahms symphony was good, and the orchestra played the whole work beautifully, excelling in the lovely slow movements.

---

[73]

[illegible] EVENING, JANUARY 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A magnificent performance of a magnificent programme was heard at the Academy of Music yesterday. It was that of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the bill was wholly of Wagner music. A new leader for this music has been found. It is Mr. Paur. His ability in this distinct range is absolute and admirable. It was a surprise and the audience was delighted—at least it had reason to be, for the conduct of a rehearsal audience is never a test as to what is really thought of the music that it hears. Mr. Paur is so much a conservative in his readings and methods that it was supposed he would give a safe, conventional reading of the Wagner pieces. Such fire and command were not looked for. It was imagined that a Beethoven leader was to essay Wagner. Now it is found that a Wagner leader has been playing Beethoven. The concert was inspiring, magnificent. Everything was vivid, ample and enthusiastic. Yet the leader himself never had more self control than he showed yesterday. It is even hopeful that he will be able to avoid some of his mannerisms in the near future, such as stamping his foot and using over emphasis in the beat. The quality of repose is all that is necessary to make him an ideal conductor, and he managed to hint at this in the most passionate, tragic, stormiest music that ever was written. For some reason, unexplained, the programme was shorn of the "Faust" overture, which had been promised and which was given with the other numbers at the concert in Boston last Saturday. The lack of this makes the bill too short, for its actual running time is only an hour and twenty minutes. Rarely, however, is time so pregnant of great things as that same period, for the programme illustrates Wagner in all his moods, especially his soaring ones, and orchestral playing is at its highest development here. It is more than doubtful if Wagner himself heard the "Meistersinger" overture played as it was played yesterday afternoon, for liberal as his patron, the King of Bavaria, was, he did not supply him with such an orchestra as Banker Higginson of Boston has supplied his town with. It is as near perfection as we imperfect mortals may hope to hear. In this overture Mr. Paur made no divergence from the established order, but he brought a volume and nobility of tone out of the instruments that thrilled one. The shadings were delightful. If there was any doubt that Mr. Paur was an artist it is dissipated. He is one of the greatest of them all. In that torrent of tone that makes the "Meistersinger" overture everything was ordered and kept its place; it was all that the direction of the composer intended it to be, broad, massive and robust. One could see the pompous march of the master singers and hear the echo, as through cathedral aisles, of the "King David" choral. There is nothing funny in the opera and to laugh at its prelude is like laughing at the planet Mars. Some things the imagination of the audience treats better than the stage people can treat it, and in the overture, what is the sense of trying to make ones self believe that the theme caroled by the wood wind is Beckmesser's failure, when it is so like the chiming of bells that there rises before the vision a sight of gray old Nuremberg, with walls half hidden in flowering orchards, quaint towers and roofs piercing a soft sky of spring and this peal of bells sounding joyously across the meadows and clanging down the narrow streets, where people in bright costume take the air. This is one of the advantages of pure music—orchestral music—that you are tied down to no text and confined to no petty personal displays, but may rise on the wings of melody to whatsoever height the fancy listeth, and nothing serves the part of private Pegasus so well as Wagner. The prelude and finale to "Tristan and Isolde" introduced Mrs. Materna, who sang the death song admirably in spite of a little reediness in the middle register of her voice. Her high notes have acquired no harshness and are as ringing and dramatic in their effect and use as ever. Her subsidence into a component part of the orchestra is most gratifying, for the voice here becomes as an instrument—a tone color, to be employed in its right place, like the horn or the flute, and eighty or ninety men are not to stand in abeyance while she sings scales. Truly, this is the music of the future. Here the orchestra was even weightier than in the "Meistersinger" piece, and the great crescendo in the prelude had the sweep of an avalanche. Not even in "Siegfried's Death," which came later, was the dramatic effect so movingly and gloriously exhibited; yet, if the funeral music were new it would be worth a voyage to Europe to hear it played as it was yesterday. The "Siegfried Idyl" was charmingly rendered, sunny and sweet. The time here was at one or two points a little slow and the ending a shade too loud. In the close of the "Twilight of the Gods," with its tremendous review of the leading motives of the trilogy, its death and immolation, its ruin of flood and fire raging through earth and sky, the fall of heaven and the rise of men, chaos was come again, but it was sublime. Never has instrumental coloring produced such effects. The lonely tones of the stopped horns—the cry of the Rhine daughters sounding through the dusk—is like a voice of fate. Wagner is Greek in his tragedy but he is Gothic and overmastering in his musical forms. To-night the music will be repeated, and perhaps the "Faust" overture will be played according to original announcement, to properly fill out the bill.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BROOKLYN.

Mr. Paur and his musicians from Boston, aided by Mme. Materna, gave a concert of Wagner's music in Brooklyn yesterday afternoon, and will repeat it this evening. The programme embraced the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the death music and finale from "Die Götterdammerung." In the last selection Mme. Materna is still without a peer, and she sang in her whole-hearted manner, plainly feeling the inspiration which vitalized the work of the orchestra.

DR. DVORAK'S AMERICAN MUSIC.

The third concert of chamber music by the Kneisel Quartet, which took place last night in the cosey room in the Music Hall set apart for such occasions, was devoted wholly to compositions by Antonin Dvorak. A quartet, quintet and sextet, all for strings, were played, the first two being the compositions, already described in this journal, which were written last summer in Iowa, and under the influence of American surroundings. The popular interest in these works was attested by the largely increased attendance at the concert. For the first time at a chamber concert the room was filled and the gallery called into requisition. A most amiable spirit of anticipation was observable, too, in the conduct of the auditors, and the obvious desire to enjoy the new music was amply gratified. After every movement of the quartet and quintet the applause was loud, long and enthusiastic, and the composer, who sat among the listeners, was several times called to his feet and compelled to bow his acknowledgment of the hearty tribute paid to his genius. The whole concert was a season of keen delight, and the lovers of the highest form of absolute music were gratified beyond measure at the evidences of its pleasure-giving potency.

Mr. Kneisel's plan of consorting the new compositions with an earlier one (the sextet is Dr. Dvorak's, Opus 48), served an excellent purpose, especially for those who were anxious to discover wherein the characteristic elements of the American music lay. In the sextet Dr. Dvorak is a Bohemian. Two of its movements are cast in national forms. The slow movement is a Dumka, that is, a Bohemian elegy; the joocse number is a Furiant, a wild Czechish dance. Moreover, the majority of the melodies bear the Bohemian character. The quartet and quintet have nothing in common with the sextet, save some peculiarities of Dr. Dvorak's style. Most of their melodies, as we have tried to show, smack of the tunes which appeal to the popular feeling of this country. Not only do they show rhythmic and intervallic peculiarities which are native to the folk-tunes of the South, but there is that in their spirit which differentiates them broadly from the melodies of the sextet. It was interesting and instructive to note these things, and also to discover that with his resort to new material Dr. Dvorak has adopted a different manner. The new compositions are compacter and simpler in form than the older one, and their expression is more direct. If some of their melodies are less distinguished in character than those of the sextet, they are at least more spontaneous, more ingenuous, and their treatment is less labored. Dr. Dvorak's habit of excessive elaboration, a trait which he shares with his admired model, Schubert, does not obtrude itself in these new works. One is even tempted, while listening to his Haydn-like frankness and simplicity, to believe that he has purposely reverted to the style of the father of the string quartet in order that the composers who may undertake to work on the lines which he has marked out may have the clearest model before them. The music is not profound nor heavily weighted with emotion, but it is full of ingenuity, replete with gracious fancy, clear as crystal and inspiriting in its unalloyed happiness. Mr. Kneisel and his associates (Mr. Zach, viola, and Mr. Schulz, violoncello, assisting in the quintet and sextet) played as if the music was a pleasure to them, and enjoyed the finest triumph that has yet fallen to their lot in New-York. The quartet had previously been played in Boston, Hartford and Washington; the quintet had its first public appearance on this occasion.

Baltimore Life

BALTIMORE, MD., JANUARY 13,

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony season '93-'94, Emil Paur, Conductor, which took place at Ford's Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon, was as successful as those heretofore given and was also very largely attended. The soloists were: Mme. Amalia Materna and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mme. Materna scored the same success which she did some five years ago when she made her first appearance in Baltimore; she was repeatedly called before the footlights. Mr. Schroeder, the famous violoncellist, was also heartily welcomed. The next concert takes place Tuesday afternoon, February 6th.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1894.

A Wagner concert was the eleventh Symphony. Materna sang finely those contrasting selections, Isolde's Lovedeath and Brunhilde's lament over Siegfried; but they are tedious outside their operatic setting. The instrumental selections were the Isolde and Mastersinger preludes; the Siegfried death; the Siegfried Idyl, wherewith Wagner honored his wife's birthday, and the advent of the son whom he named after the hero whose fortunes he was then turning into music.

[illegible] JANUARY 13, 1

A Dvorák Chamber Con[illegible]

Although New York has for many years been one of the leading musical centres of the world, as far as performances are concerned, there has hitherto been one feature in which we lagged behind European centres. In reading the musical columns of Viennese, Berlin, and Paris papers one could not but envy the writers and the audiences of which they formed part the privilege of being present at first performances of new works by the greatest living composers. This privilege we had not enjoyed here to any considerable extent heretofore, but since Mrs. Thurber secured Dr. Dvorák for our National Conservatory a pleasant change has occurred, and we are now privileged to be present occasionally at the very first performance of a new work that is destined to be added to the classical masterpieces of our generation.

Such an occasion was the last Philharmonic concert, when Dvorák's American-born symphony had its very first hearing, and such an occasion was again offered at Chamber Music Hall last evening, when two pieces of chamber music, written immediately after that symphony, were produced by the Kneisel Quartet. One of them, a quartet in F major, had been played before in Boston and one or two other places, but the quintet was entirely new to the public. The announcement of a Dvorák programme served to draw a much larger audience than those that usually assemble to hear chamber concerts. The reception of the new pieces, too, was most enthusiastic, and the composer had to rise repeatedly to acknowledge the cordial applause.

The attempt to describe chamber music without the aid of musical illustrations is a hopeless task, and we shall therefore merely indulge in a few general remarks. The opening movement of the quartet breathes a certain plantation atmosphere which at once lets us into the secret that in this chamber music, as in the symphony, Dr. Dvorák has attempted to reproduce some of the spirit of American popular music. He has succeeded so well that in not a few places one feels inclined to say "That's American," although there is only one movement (the finale of the quintet) in which an air so popular here as to deserve the title of national, is definitely suggested. Of the four movements of the quintet the andante—a beautiful song-like melody—seemed to us the most deeply inspired—another illustration of the truth that genius of a high order is always at its best in slow movements. The first movement of the quintet seems less original than the first of the quartet, but in both instances the composer plunges at once in medias res with the air of a man who has something to say. In the final allegro of the quartet there is a friskiness which may be called American and which suggests, too, the animal spirits and merriness of Papa Haydn. The same might be said of the allegro vivo of the quintet. That all the arts of counterpoint and composition are delightfully exemplified in those most mature products of Dvorák's mind, need not be stated, any more than the fact that Mr. Kneisel and his associates played these works, as well as an earlier sextet by the same composer, admirably.

[illegible] EVENING, JANUARY [illegible]

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday at the Academy, furnished a programme composed entirely of Wagner. There were five numbers only, two of these being accompaniments to the singing of Mme. Materna, and the matinee was over at 4:30. In a symphony concert, and particularly one composed exclusively by Wagner, the conductor showed his good sense when he devoted to it no more than one hour and a half, beyond which the musicians are apt to flag and the audience to worry. Up to the last note in yesterday's programme, the listeners were in excellent humor, and were allowed to depart at the very best time—when they were doubtful if they would not like to hear more. Materna was called out after the concert was over, which compliment was the more genuine for the reason that daintily gloved hands did the work—the men to the women in the audience being as one to a hundred. Both Seidl and Paur have learned the value this season of an abbreviated programme. There are very few people who can stand two hours of classical music without a squirm.

In the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the opening number, Mr. Paur and his orchestra made a most favorable impression. Dignified and majestic, the movement progressed with a smoothness and vitality which betokened true sympathy between the new conductor and his men, and a finish in technical performance not unworthy of Nikisch himself. There can be no doubt that Mr. Paur is a thorough musician; that his views are broad and independent; that he is enthusiastic and sincere. That he is always correct in his interpretation is open to question, and he is not particularly magnetic as between himself and his audience, like his predecessor. But he has a beautiful respect for what he conceives to be the intention of the composer, and never does he seek to subordinate the masters of music to his own personality. The Wagner numbers were interpreted in a spirit approaching reverence, and there was little to find fault with in either the reading or effect.

"Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the "Siegfried Idyl," are as far apart as the poles in motive and manner, but the fine and delicate beauty of the one was expressed not less perfectly than the impressive solemnity of the other. The "Goetterdaemmerung" music must be classed among those Wagner compositions which are distinctly abstruse and tremendous, and none but an orchestra of the first rank can make the terrific measure acceptable to an average audience. It speaks well for Mr. Paur's control of his men, and for their own inspiration, that the numbers (one of which included the singing of Materna), were so enjoyable as to call forth considerable feminine enthusiasm, in which the orchestra as well as the vocalist was included. Materna is so wonderfully in harmony with all the Wagnerian music, and her voice is such a living expression of the grief and joy of its heroines, that her singing is always a treat. Her great dramatic soprano is marvelously preserved, and the tones gush forth with a life and feeling which is almost inspiring, even on the colorless stage of a concert.

She sang two numbers—Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," while the orchestra gave the Prelude. The Isolde aria must always be considered one of Materna's very best efforts, though it differs in degree rather than kind from the fierce and furious lament of Bruennhilde. Both songs, when voiced by a grandly built woman, who looks as though she might have lived in that Gothic age of which she sings, reach the innermost depths of the heart, and arouse an answering cry in the breasts of all who have suffered. It is grief of the wildest and most tumultuous kind, but Materna is fully equal to its finest expression. With her thrilling tones upon the air the concert ended.

This evening the programme will be repeated. The next appearance will be on Feb. 9.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 13, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A magnificent performance of a magnificent programme was heard at the Academy of Music yesterday. It was that of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the bill was wholly of Wagner music. A new leader for this music has been found. It is Mr. Paur. His ability in this distinct range is absolute and admirable. It was a surprise and the audience was delighted—at least it had reason to be, for the conduct of a rehearsal audience is never a test as to what is really thought of the music that it hears. Mr. Paur is so much a conservative in his readings and methods that it was supposed he would give a safe, conventional reading of the Wagner pieces. Such fire and command were not looked for. It was imagined that a Beethoven leader was to essay Wagner. Now it is found that a Wagner leader has been playing Beethoven. The concert was inspiring, magnificent. Everything was vivid, ample and enthusiastic. Yet the leader himself never had more self control than he showed yesterday. It is even hopeful that he will be able to avoid some of his mannerisms in the near future, such as stamping his foot and using over emphasis in the beat. The quality of repose is all that is necessary to make him an ideal conductor, and he managed to hint at this in the most passionate, tragic, stormiest music that ever was written. For some reason, unexplained, the programme was shorn of the "Faust" overture, which had been promised and which was given with the other numbers at the concert in Boston last Saturday. The lack of this makes the bill too short, for its actual running time is only an hour and twenty minutes. Rarely, however, is time so pregnant of great things as that same period, for the programme illustrates Wagner in all his moods, especially his soaring ones, and orchestral playing is at its highest development here. It is more than doubtful if Wagner himself heard the "Meistersinger" overture played as it was played yesterday afternoon, for liberal as his patron, the King of Bavaria, was, he did not supply him with such an orchestra as Banker Higginson of Boston has supplied his town with. It is as near perfection as we imperfect mortals may hope to hear. In this overture Mr. Paur made no divergence from the established order, but he brought a volume and nobility of tone out of the instruments that thrilled one. The shadings were delightful. If there was any doubt that Mr. Paur was an artist it is dissipated. He is one of the greatest of them all. In that torrent of tone that makes the "Meistersinger" overture everything was ordered and kept its place; it was all that the direction of the composer intended it to be, broad, massive and robust. One could see the pompous march of the master singers and hear the echo, as through cathedral aisles, of the "King David" choral. There is nothing funny in the opera and to laugh at its prelude is like laughing at the planet Mars. Some things the imagination of the audience treats better than the stage people can treat it, and in the overture, what is the sense of trying to make ones self believe that the theme caroled by the wood wind is Beckmesser's failure, when it is so like the chiming of bells that there rises before the vision a sight of gray old Nuremberg, with walls half hidden in flowering orchards, quaint towers and roofs piercing a soft sky of spring and this peal of bells sounding joyously across the meadows and clanging down the narrow streets, where people in bright costume take the air. This is one of the advantages of pure music—orchestral music—that you are tied down to no text and confined to no petty personal displays, but may rise on the wings of melody to whatsoever height the fancy listeth, and nothing serves the part of private Pegasus so well as Wagner. The prelude and finale to "Tristan and Isolde" introduced Mrs. Materna, who sang the death song admirably in spite of a little reediness in the middle register of her voice. Her high notes have acquired no harshness and are as ringing and dramatic in their effect and use as ever. Her subsidence into a component part of the orchestra is most gratifying, for the voice here becomes as an instrument—a tone color, to be employed in its right place, like the horn or the flute, and eighty or ninety men are not to stand in abeyance while she sings scales. Truly, this is the music of the future. Here the orchestra was even weightier than in the "Meistersinger" piece, and the great crescendo in the prelude had the sweep of an avalanche. Not even in "Siegfried's Death," which came later, was the dramatic effect so movingly and gloriously exhibited; yet, if the funeral music were new it would be worth a voyage to Europe to hear it played as it was yesterday. The "Siegfried Idyl" was charmingly rendered, sunny and sweet. The time here was at one or two points a little slow and the ending a shade too loud. In the close of the "Twilight of the Gods," with its tremendous review of the leading motives of the trilogy, its death and immolation, its ruin of flood and fire raging through earth and sky, the fall of heaven and the rise of men, chaos was come again, but it was sublime. Never has instrumental coloring produced such effects. The lonely tones of the stopped horns—the cry of the Rhine daughters sounding through the dusk—is like a voice of fate. Wagner is Greek in his tragedy but he is Gothic and overmastering in his musical forms. To-night the music will be repeated, and perhaps the "Faust" overture will be played according to original announcement, to properly fill out the bill.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BROOKLYN.

Mr. Paur and his musicians from Boston, aided by Mme. Materna, gave a concert of Wagner's music in Brooklyn yesterday afternoon, and will repeat it this evening. The programme embraced the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the death music and finale from "Die Götterdammerung." In the last selection Mme. Materna is still without a peer, and she sang in her whole-hearted manner, plainly feeling the inspiration which vitalized the work of the orchestra.

DR. DVORAK'S AMERICAN MUSIC.

The third concert of chamber music by the Kneisel Quartet, which took place last night in the cosey room in the Music Hall set apart for such occasions, was devoted wholly to compositions by Antonin Dvorak. A quartet, quintet and sextet, all for strings, were played, the first two being the compositions, already described in this journal, which were written last summer in Iowa, and under the influence of American surroundings. The popular interest in these works was attested by the largely increased attendance at the concert. For the first time at a chamber concert the room was filled and the gallery called into requisition. A most amiable spirit of anticipation was observable, too, in the conduct of the auditors, and the obvious desire to enjoy the new music was amply gratified. After every movement of the quartet and quintet the applause was loud, long and enthusiastic, and the composer, who sat among the listeners, was several times called to his feet and compelled to bow his acknowledgment of the hearty tribute paid to his genius. The whole concert was a season of keen delight, and the lovers of the highest form of absolute music were gratified beyond measure at the evidences of its pleasure-giving potency.

Mr. Kneisel's plan of consorting the new compositions with an earlier one (the sextet is Dr. Dvorak's, Opus 48), served an excellent purpose, especially for those who were anxious to discover wherein the characteristic elements of the American music lay. In the sextet Dr. Dvorak is a Bohemian. Two of its movements are cast in national forms. The slow movement is a Dumka, that is, a Bohemian elegy; the jocose number is a Furiant, a wild Czechish dance. Moreover, the majority of the melodies bear the Bohemian character. The quartet and quintet have nothing in common with the sextet, save some peculiarities of Dr. Dvorak's style. Most of their melodies, as we have tried to show, smack of the tunes which appeal to the popular feeling of this country. Not only do they show rhythmic and intervallic peculiarities which are native to the folk-tunes of the South, but there is that in their spirit which differentiates them broadly from the melodies of the sextet. It was interesting and instructive to note these things, and also to discover that with his resort to new material Dr. Dvorak has adopted a different manner. The new compositions are compacter and simpler in form than the older one, and their expression is more direct. If some of their melodies are less distinguished in character than those of the sextet, they are at least more spontaneous, more ingenuous, and their treatment is less labored. Dr. Dvorak's habit of excessive elaboration, a trait which he shares with his admired model, Schubert, does not obtrude itself in these new works. One is even tempted, while listening to his Haydn-like frankness and simplicity, to believe that he has purposely reverted to the style of the father of the string quartet in order that the composers who may undertake to work on the lines which he has marked out may have the clearest model before them. The music is not profound nor heavily weighted with emotion, but it is full of ingenuity, replete with gracious fancy, clear as crystal and inspiriting in its unalloyed happiness. Mr. Kneisel and his associates (Mr. Zach, viola, and Mr. Schulz, violoncello, assisting in the quintet and sextet) played as if the music was a pleasure to them, and enjoyed the finest triumph that has yet fallen to their lot in New-York. The quartet had previously been played in Boston, Hartford and Washington; the quintet had its first public appearance on this occasion.

Baltimore Life

BALTIMORE, MD., JANUARY 13,

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony season '93-'94, Emil Paur, Conductor, which took place at Ford's Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon, was as successful as those heretofore given and was also very largely attended. The soloists were Mme. Amalia Materna and Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Mme. Materna scored the same success which she did some five years ago when she made her first appearance in Baltimore; she was repeatedly called before the footlights. Mr. Schroeder, the famous violoncellist, was also heartily welcomed. The next concert takes place Tuesday afternoon, February 6th.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1894.

A Wagner concert was the eleventh Symphony. Materna sang finely those contrasting selections, Isolde's Lovedeath and Brunhilde's lament over Siegfried; but they are tedious outside their operatic setting. The instrumental selections were the Isolde and Mastersinger preludes; the Siegfried death; the Siegfried Idyl, wherewith Wagner honored his wife's birthday, and the advent of the son whom he named after the hero whose fortunes he was then turning into music.

POST: NEW YO

JANUARY 13, 189

A Dvorák Chamber Concert.

Although New York has for many years been one of the leading musical centres of the world, as far as performances are concerned, there has hitherto been one feature in which we lagged behind European centres. In reading the musical columns of Viennese, Berlin, and Paris papers one could not but envy the writers and the audiences of which they formed part the privilege of being present at first performances of new works by the greatest living composers. This privilege we had not enjoyed here to any considerable extent heretofore, but since Mrs. Thurber secured Dr. Dvorák for our National Conservatory a pleasant change has occurred, and we are now privileged to be present occasionally at the very first performance of a new work that is destined to be added to the classical masterpieces of our generation.

Such an occasion was the last Philharmonic concert, when Dvorák's American-born symphony had its very first hearing, and such an occasion was again offered at Chamber Music Hall last evening, when two pieces of chamber music, written immediately after that symphony, were produced by the Kneisel Quartet. One of them, a quartet in F major, had been played before in Boston and one or two other places, but the quintet was entirely new to the public. The announcement of a Dvorák programme served to draw a much larger audience than those that usually assemble to hear chamber concerts. The reception of the new pieces, too, was most enthusiastic, and the composer had to rise repeatedly to acknowledge the cordial applause.

The attempt to describe chamber music without the aid of musical illustrations is a hopeless task, and we shall therefore merely indulge in a few general remarks. The opening movement of the quartet breathes a certain plantation atmosphere which at once lets us into the secret that in this chamber music, as in the symphony, Dr. Dvorák has attempted to reproduce some of the spirit of American popular music. He has succeeded so well that in not a few places one feels inclined to say "That's American," although there is only one movement (the finale of the quintet) in which an air so popular here as to deserve the title of national, is definitely suggested. Of the four movements of the quintet the andante—a beautiful song-like melody—seemed to us the most deeply inspired—another illustration of the truth that genius of a high order is always at its best in slow movements. The first movement of the quintet seems less original than the first of the quartet, but in both instances the composer plunges at once in medias res with the air of a man who has something to say. In the final allegro of the quartet there is a friskiness which may be called American and which suggests, too, the animal spirits and merriness of Papa Haydn. The same might be said of the allegro vivo of the quintet. That all the arts of counterpoint and composition are delightfully exemplified in those most mature products of Dvorák's mind, need not be stated, any more than the fact that Mr. Kneisel and his associates played these works, as well as an earlier sextet by the same composer, admirably.

THE STANDARD [illegible]

SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 13, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The third public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday at the Academy, furnished a programme composed entirely of Wagner. There were five numbers only, two of these being accompaniments to the singing of Mme. Materna, and the matinee was over at 4:30. In a symphony concert, and particularly one composed exclusively by Wagner, the conductor showed his good sense when he devoted to it no more than one hour and a half, beyond which the musicians are apt to flag and the audience to worry. Up to the last note in yesterday's programme, the listeners were in excellent humor, and were allowed to depart at the very best time—when they were doubtful if they would not like to hear more. Materna was called out after the concert was over, which compliment was the more genuine for the reason that daintily gloved hands did the work—the men to the women in the audience being as one to a hundred. Both Seidl and Paur have learned the value this season of an abbreviated programme. There are very few people who can stand two hours of classical music without a squirm.

In the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the opening number, Mr. Paur and his orchestra made a most favorable impression. Dignified and majestic, the movement progressed with a smoothness and vitality which betokened true sympathy between the new conductor and his men, and a finish in technical performance not unworthy of Nikisch himself. There can be no doubt that Mr. Paur is a thorough musician; that his views are broad and independent; that he is enthusiastic and sincere. That he is always correct in his interpretation is open to question, and he is not particularly magnetic as between himself and his audience, like his predecessor. But he has a beautiful respect for what he conceives to be the intention of the composer, and never does he seek to subordinate the masters of music to his own personality. The Wagner numbers were interpreted in a spirit approaching reverence, and there was little to find fault with in either the reading or effect.

"Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the "Siegfried Idyl," are as far apart as the poles in motive and manner, but the fine and delicate beauty of the one was expressed not less perfectly than the impressive solemnity of the other. The "Goetterdaemmerung" music must be classed among those Wagner compositions which are distinctly abstruse and tremendous, and none but an orchestra of the first rank can make the terrific measure acceptable to an average audience. It speaks well for Mr. Paur's control of his men, and for their own inspiration, that the numbers (one of which included the singing of Materna), were so enjoyable as to call forth considerable feminine enthusiasm, in which the orchestra as well as the vocalist was included. Materna is so wonderfully in harmony with all the Wagnerian music, and her voice is such a living expression of the grief and joy of its heroines, that her singing is always a treat. Her great dramatic soprano is marvelously preserved, and the tones gush forth with a life and feeling which is almost inspiring, even on the colorless stage of a concert.

She sang two numbers—Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung," and the Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," while the orchestra gave the Prelude. The Isolde aria must always be considered one of Materna's very best efforts, though it differs in degree rather than kind from the fierce and furious lament of Bruennhilde. Both songs, when voiced by a grandly built woman, who looks as though she might have lived in that Gothic age of which she sings, reach the innermost depths of the heart, and arouse an answering cry in the breasts of all who have suffered. It is grief of the wildest and most tumultuous kind, but Materna is fully equal to its finest expression. With her thrilling tones upon the air the concert ended.

This evening the programme will be repeated. The next appearance will be on Feb. 9.

...rnal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1894.

Suggestions for Comfort in the New Music Hall.

Concerning the Wearing of Ear Caps in Concerts.

Rules and Regulations for the Appropriate Applause.

If the description of the interior of the new Music Hall is accurate in detail, music will be heard there in comfort and in safety. Yes, the Hall will be well equipped.

There will be an "ambulatory" where confident amateurs can exchange opinions on the work performed, and where the uncertain can gain opinions.

There will be "baignoires," where everything will be permitted except bathing.

There will be spacious cloak rooms. No longer will every man be his own coat rack. Nor will any excitable person run the risk of smashing his hat in the very ecstacy of his enthusiasm.

The exits are many and easy of access. Escape from a lethal symphony or a stentorian singer will be open to all.

But even the most vigilant architect may overlook a point. It may then be allowed a layman to offer in good faith suggestions.

***

First of all there should be an office for the sale of pink sleep.

It was Sir Arthur Helps who, in "Realmah," first called attention to the compound sleep-stuff of a pink color used by persons who were obliged to attend public meetings.

"It put a man into a pleasing kind of a stupor, in which state he did not care much how time passed or what was said to him, and he could be in this state without betraying himself, for he could hear all that was said, and look sufficiently intelligent, and at the same time enjoy a semi-comatose condition, which made the length of speech a matter of indifference to him."

***

It is not improbable, however, that the supply of this stuff is limited. Sufficient doses would command a high price. Yet there are many who would buy gladly such a refuge. What are they to do if the drug is beyond their reach?

Take the case of our old friend Blivens, well known in the street—a most estimable man, whose name is signed to every call that asks for influence and not for cash. Saturday nights, during the season, you see Blivens in Music Hall. He is on duty. He is the escort of his wife and daughter. Does he hear the music? No. He is not fond of music; but he realizes the necessity of performing a social function, and he is a gallant spouse and father. What is he thinking of when Mr. Paur is picking tunes off the orchestra? Everything; from leather to lumbago, from small-pox to sugar, but never by any chance of the music. And Blivens is only one of several.

In the new hall there should be accommodation for such a patron of art. It is true that Blivens has a room at the Storage Warehouse, which is near the hall; but the room is cheerless; no lights are allowed after sundown; and entrance after 8 P. M. would be well nigh impossible.

There is to be an "ambulatory" in the new Music Hall. Why not a dormitory? Let there be a place for Blivens, where he can snooze or smoke or loafe at will. Let there be a place for Blivens and his kind who are not disposed to buy the sleep-stuff. They should not be allowed to enjoy such a privilege until after the end of the first piece, so that they may be seen in public with wives, sisters, daughters and other female relatives who are fond of music.

The walls of these private rooms should be padded thickly, so that the inmates may not be forced to heed symphony or cantata; nor start at shrill-edged shriek of impassioned singer; nor turn pale at the cannonading by merciless pianist. After the concert is over, Blivens will join his wife and daughter, and, each in mind contented, they will turn homeward.

***

It is true that in the opera houses of Germany the flesh of the pig is sold in various forms, and beer and other liquids are at the disposal of buyers. To follow such a custom, to introduce a bar in the new Music Hall, this is not to be encouraged. You may say that certain music has a tendency to drive one to drink; and your statement is undoubtedly true. But the neighborhood is a sensitive one. There is no bar near the proposed site. There are dwellers in flats, there are little shops, there is unoccupied land. Would it be decent to allow the Muse to descend and find a footing there arm-in-arm with Bacchus.

As a precaution against the said terrible effect of certain music, ear caps might be rented for the evening; or a person might be permitted to bring his own ear caps, of handsome material, with the initials of the owner worked in rich stuff against a dark ground. Blinders that bedeck fashionable horses would serve as a model.

By the way, in ancient Hindu days, he that was fond of music was dubbed Sarva-rasi, which, being interpreted, means "a wild or gay fellow, a sad dog." Such a one was Randhir, who was King in the city Chandrodaya, in the country called Malaya, on the western coast of the land of Bharat. For King Randhir "ate and drank and listened to music, and looked at dancers and made love much more than he studied, reflected, prayed, or conversed with the wise."

***

In the new Hall the applause should be regulated carefully. There should be no claque, not even the fashionable claque that so often today encourages mediocrity and praises that which is bad.

Now, judicious applause is not be discountenanced.

According to Otto Gumprecht, applause has a deep significance when it is genuine, expressed in worthy form and at a suitable time.

The "worthy form" is a matter of the day. The ancient Romans when they were delighted rose solemnly in their seats and waved the flaps of their togas. Such an exhibition in Music Hall would seem ridiculous to the thoughtless; [illegible] worn by our patrons of [illegible] applause taught by Nero to his claque of 5000 robust young fellows from the common people assembled to do him honor when he sang are, unfortunately, forgotten.

It is our custom to applaud by clapping together of hands. Some enthusiast may cry aloud "bravo," especially if the recipient of his vocal bounty be a woman; and he then looks confused, not because he has made a mistake in the gender, but because he has shown for a moment continental emotion.

The manifestation of approval by the stamping of boots, or by the thumping of umbrellas against the floor, or by any ingenious application of fingers to the mouth is not now in favor.

The question is, then, not how shall the applause be manifested; it is, when should applause be given?

It must be acknowledged that the solution of this problem is beset with difficulties. Why should not a Code of Rules and Regulations Concerning Applause be drawn up deliberately by a committee appointed by the Mayor? There is ample time while the hall is a-building.

***

It may not now be impertinent to make a few suggestions concerning applause in the new hall.

Applaud anything by Brahms or Wagner. This is invariably a safe rule to follow. Never mind whether you like the piece or not. If you do not like it, you should at least have the decency to feign admiration.

Applaud all German singers. If they cannot sing, they were born in Germany, and the fact deserves popular appreciation.

Applaud all efforts by local composers, singers, and pianists. Patriotism is the second duty of a concert-goer; devotion to Germany is the first. Patriotism in local music is the conviction that everything done by a Bostonian must be right.

Never applaud unknown composers, players, or singers, unless they have taken the precaution to bring letters of introduction to leaders in society.

It is always safe to applaud vigorously Bach and Beethoven. The applause for Mozart should be an exhibition of moderate rapture, as it is generally understood that he is going out of fashion.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 14.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1894.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS.

Many adverse comments have been made upon the plans prepared for the new Music Hall, to be built by the new corporation at the corner of West Chester park and Huntington avenue.

It is urged that, while the hall may, and possibly is, admirably planned for a hearing of symphony and oratorio concerts, its value for the many other uses to which it must be put is very questionable.

It is urged that to build a hall for such a limited use as will be afforded by these two purposes will shut out a vast number of other affairs which are of equal benefit to the city.

It is admitted that, theoretically, Boston should have a perfect Music Hall, but that, practically, it is desirable to admit of some imperfections in the new hall for musical uses in order that the auditorium may be available for a larger field of usefulness.

Vigorous protests are heard on all sides in regard to the placing of the entrance on St. Stephen's street, which is hardly more than an alleyway as compared with what it should be for the purpose contemplated. It is urged that the new hall should be an architectural ornament to the city, and that its approaches should be in keeping with the standing of Boston as an art and musical centre.

The idea that sufficient money cannot be had to properly build and equip a new building for the public uses to which the old Music Hall has been put is ridiculed by all familiar with the financial enthusiasm of Boston upon any subject when its citizens are properly interested, and the utilizing of the Huntington avenue end of the lot bought for the new hall for business purposes is generally opposed.

The model of the Music Hall that is to be, attracted many visitors to the new Library building last week, and proved a decided eye-opener in regard to the city's musical appreciation. It is a beauty this Music Hall, too handsome, too classic I should say, for this generation who will build it and perhaps sit under its roof in days to come. Shall we be able to live up to such a temple of noble purity, or can we ever come down to ordinary halls after resting on graceful circles amid doric pillars and other delicious Greek things. How can the Heavenly Maid condescend to sing anything but Wagner, how can anything short of a symphony orchestra dare lift a note in such exalted surroundings? I believe in keeping to the highest standard in all arts, but as I screwed one eye into the peephole opening on the interior, and mentally fixed on the location of the seat I wished to occupy in the future, the thought would obtrude itself that most Bostonians were not prepared for a hall of such architectural magnificence. They are not good enough, some of us—yes! but the contrast with the public places hitherto known to them will surely strike in and do them an injury! All the same, it is hoped this is the model to be accepted, and it will not be many months ere it is actually constructed, and the town is wending its way to it o' Saturday nights.

...Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1894.

NEW MUSIC HALL DESIGN,

What is Thought of the Interior Plan as Shown in the Model at the New Public Library — Highly Commended for Its Beauty and Simplicity — Deserves a Better Site than the One on Huntington Avenue.

A number of people showed their interest in the plans for the new Music Hall last week by going to the catalogue room in the new Public Library building to inspect the model of the interior of a music hall, prepared from the design drawn by McKim, Mead & White. Of all the persons who saw the model, not one, it is said, made any adverse criticism, and many expressed themselves as highly pleased with the beauty, simplicity and convenience of the design. The substitution of an amphitheatre for the usual galleries appeared to take everybody by storm. Other details of the plan were also generally commended. One of the most striking facts of the exhibition was the very general and hearty appreciation of the simple beauty of the design shown by the public at large.

This appreciation, it has been suggested, was a direct result of the more general understanding of correct architectural design, brought about by a visit to the World's Fair and the sight of the beauties of the Peristyle, the Court of Honor and the various splendid buildings of the great exhibition.

The acceptable character of the plan seems to be proved by the satisfaction with it which has been so freely expressed. Whether, however, it will be adopted by the New Music Hall Association remains to be seen. The members of the committee are, naturally, reticent on the subject, although it is believed that they are well pleased with the design. One of them said, "We are not committed to this or any other plan. McKim, Mead & White have taken the trouble to submit it to us, and we are considering the matter. We hope that every one interested in the subject will examine the plan and give an opinion upon it. What we want are criticisms upon it from all sources, whether favorable or the reverse; and all suggestions for modifications, changes and improvements will be welcomed and carefully weighed. Now is the time to do this before the actual decision has been made and the work begun."

With regard to the renewed suggestion that a competition ought to be held, a gentleman who is well qualified to speak about the matter said that competitions were not only out of date, but were seldom satisfactory in their results. As to there being any discrimination shown in favor of other than Boston architects, he declared that the record did not justify any such statement. He cited Harvard University as an example. In the last seventeen years, eighteen buildings have been erected at Harvard, the plans for all of which have been drawn by selected architects, no competitions having been held. Of the eleven architects who have been employed, nine were from Boston and only two from New York.

Whether a competition would bring out a finer design for the new Music Hall than the one which has been made by McKim, Mead & White is an open question. The generally favorable opinion of their work could not, perhaps, be better indicated than by giving the views expressed by H. Langdon Warren, the secretary of the Boston Society of Architects, in the course of an interview upon the subject. He said, "The interior for the new Music Hall, as shown by the model that has been on exhibition at the new Public Library, is most appropriate and beautiful. One does not often have the pleasure of seeing a design that can be so unreservedly praised. The scheme adopted is an excellent one, the proportions are delightful, and nearly all the lines are most refined. The restraint and simplicity, the quietness and repose, the propriety and expressiveness of such ornamentation as is used are specially noteworthy. Such a hall would by its beauty add to the enjoyment of music heard there without distracting the attention by obtrusive and over-loaded ornament. I earnestly hope that it will be carried out; but it would be a matter of great and lasting regret if the design is not carried out in permanent material. Plaster and staff should not be thought of; Boston can better afford to wait some years for a Music Hall than to see erected a structure for so important a purpose in any but the most durable and most beautiful material.

"The World's Fair has doubtless educated our people to appreciate such designs as this; but if the temporary materials, which were appropriate enough as the stage setting, the scenery of a passing event like the Chicago exhibition, come to be regarded as suitable for enduring and monumental buildings, the architecture of the fair will have a stronger influence for bad than for good.

"The form of the Greek theatre which has been adopted for the present design is specially suitable for a music hall. When the old opera house at Dresden was burned, its place was taken, during the years occupied in the erection of the present house, by a temporary wooden structure, the auditorium of which had the form of the Greek theatre. I was a frequent attendant at the Dresden Opera House at this time, and I never was in a large hall where music was heard to better advantage. This arrangement has the farther merit of securing nearly equal advantages for seeing and hearing to every seat in the house. In the old wooden Dresden theatre there were no better seats for hearing the music than those at the extreme back of the house, which corresponded to the upper gallery of the usual arrangement.

"The form of the semi-dome over the music platform, in the model shown at the new library, has doubtless been dictated by acoustic considerations. But it gives an unfortunate outline to the proscenium arch, perhaps the most important line in the building, being opposite the eyes of the auditors all the time. It is a misfortune that the arch should be the one ungraceful line of the whole interior. The defect would be easy to remedy: and we may hope that the artists who have produced so beautiful a design will correct the fault before the plan is put in execution.

"It will be a pity if Boston's great Music Hall is not given an exterior in keeping with the beauty and monumental character of this interior; and it will be a pity also if a building of such importance is placed in so inappropriate and remote a site as the one on Huntington avenue. Such a structure should stand where it would be a distinct addition to the beauty of the city, a step toward that monumental and larger-minded Boston which we may hope will some day take the place of the present, mentally and materially, overgrown provincial town."

Deeds for Music Hall Site Recorded.

Papers have been recorded at the Suffolk Registry of Deeds transferring to the new Boston Music Hall Corporation the lot of land on Huntington avenue, West Chester Park and St. Stephen street, that has been selected as a site for the new Music Hall. The lot contains about 32,986 square feet.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1894.

Boston is likely to keep her soubriquet of "The Modern Athens." The severity and simplicity of its public buildings is in keeping with the Greek idea. The latest and most notable of these is now probably to be supplemented by the exhibited design for a new Music Hall which is even more Grecian than anything which has preceded it. Its amphitheater form is essentially Greek in its inception, and while the outside of the building is not shown it may be presumed that it will be in keeping with the interior. It has taken some time to convert the minds of the people to this style of architecture after they had become used to the gingerbread style which has been so much in vogue for the past number of years, but if it has been done at last we may congratulate ourselves upon its accomplishment. In this connection it may be proper to speak of the change proposed in the State House. The proposition to build the old part over to be in keeping with the new seems wholly unnecessary, for the new part should be made in keeping with the old as was the original intention. The State House has historic associations which would never exist in a made over building, and it is time that the people woke up to the idea of keeping our old landmarks and historic spots inviolate. The removal of the JOHN HANCOCK house a number of years ago is now looked upon as being almost a piece of vandalism, and it should be a lesson by which future action should be guided.

The Independent - N.Y. Jan 11, 94

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

AN overfilled musical week was the one ended Saturday. Orchestral concert, opera, pianoforte and song recitals were superabundant. To pay one's money was easier than to take a choice.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience on Thursday evening. The program offered Brahms's First Symphony, a firm and sympathetic performance of which work, inexhaustible in its interest and beauty, once more made a deep impression. A curious orchestral novelty to this city, which Boston has heard several times, the "1812," or "Holy War," Overture of Tschaikovsky (op. 49) was brought forward. It is descriptive music (one might say program-music) with a vengeance! expressing in a kind of allegorical rhapsody the struggle between France and Russia during the Napoleonic Invasion, and amounting to a kind of fin de siècle match to that old parlor classic, "The Battle of the Prague." A Russian folk-melody and the French, "Marseillaise," with some other less distinctive thematic stuff are worked up into a series of astonishing contrasts and climaxes of the dynamic sort, ending in the complete disappearance of the French air and the assertion of the Russian one, with a symphonic fury that is something perfectly amazing. The whole body of the brass and percussion choir and a set of particularly loud chimes are called into—not play but sheer din. Even the "Dies Iræ" of the Requiems by Verdi and Berlioz, even Rubinstein's sea-storms and falling Tower of Babel, lose their proud pre-eminence as musical uproar before Tschaikovsky's typhoon of patriotism and racket. The score, by the by, contains additional parts for a brass band and cannon—but Mr. Paur thought them quite dispensable in the Music Hall, and they certainly were not missed. In spite of so near a kinship to circus music and to being a vulgar if colossal effort ad captandum, the Overture contains some passages of dignity and legitimate musical effect. As a concert-curio it is of the first rank. The audience on this occasion was immensely entertained with it, and applauded it much. The rest of Mr. Paur's program included Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, and two vocal numbers, Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" scena and the Massenet's recitative and air "Celui dont le parole" and "Il est doux—il est bon" from "Hèrodiaed," sung by Mrs. Nordica. Of the beautiful quality of this lady's large voice or the fine method she shows there is never a question; but we fear that nothing (a Bayreuth engagement included) can ever make her a dramatic soprano. Into the Massenet air she threw considerable fervor; but she acquitted herself of the passions of poor Leonora as if she were delivering a Vassar College commencement oration,—and, by the by, she did not appear to know thoroughly either text or music of the familiar selection.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1894.

Suggestions for Comfort in the New Music Hall.

Concerning the Wearing of Ear Caps in Concerts.

Rules and Regulations for the Appropriate Applause.

If the description of the interior of the new Music Hall is accurate in detail, music will be heard there in comfort and in safety. Yes, the Hall will be well equipped.

There will be an "ambulatory" where confident amateurs can exchange opinions on the work performed, and where the uncertain can gain opinions.

There will be "baignoires," where everything will be permitted except bathing.

There will be spacious cloak rooms. No longer will every man be his own coat rack. Nor will any excitable person run the risk of smashing his hat in the very ecstacy of his enthusiasm.

The exits are many and easy of access. Escape from a lethal symphony or a stentorian singer will be open to all.

But even the most vigilant architect may overlook a point. It may then be allowed a layman to offer in good faith suggestions.

***

First of all there should be an office for the sale of pink sleep.

It was Sir Arthur Helps who, in "Realmah," first called attention to the compound sleep-stuff of a pink color used by persons who were obliged to attend public meetings.

"It put a man into a pleasing kind of a stupor, in which state he did not care much how time passed or what was said to him, and he could be in this state without betraying himself, for he could hear all that was said, and look sufficiently intelligent, and at the same time enjoy a semi-comatose condition, which made the length of speech a matter of indifference to him."

***

It is not improbable, however, that the supply of this stuff is limited. Sufficient doses would command a high price. Yet there are many who would buy gladly such a refuge. What are they to do if the drug is beyond their reach?

Take the case of our old friend Blivens, well known in the street—a most estimable man, whose name is signed to every call that asks for influence and not for cash. Saturday nights, during the season, you see Blivens in Music Hall. He is on duty. He is the escort of his wife and daughter. Does he hear the music? No. He is not fond of music; but he realizes the necessity of performing a social function, and he is a gallant spouse and father. What is he thinking of when Mr. Paur is picking tunes off the orchestra? Everything; from leather to lumbago, from small-pox to sugar, but never by any chance of the music. And Blivens is only one of several.

In the new hall there should be accommodation for such a patron of art. It is true that Blivens has a room at the Storage Warehouse, which is near the hall; but the room is cheerless; no lights are allowed after sundown; and entrance after 8 P. M. would be well nigh impossible.

There is to be an "ambulatory" in the new Music Hall. Why not a dormitory? Let there be a place for Blivens, where he can snooze or smoke or loafe at will. Let there be a place for Blivens and his kind who are not disposed to buy the sleep-stuff. They should not be allowed to enjoy such a privilege until after the end of the first piece, so that they may be seen in public with wives, sisters, daughters and other female relatives who are fond of music.

The walls of these private rooms should be padded thickly, so that the inmates may not be forced to heed symphony or cantata; nor start at shrill-edged shriek of impassioned singer; nor turn pale at the cannonading by merciless pianist. After the concert is over, Blivens will join his wife and daughter, and, each in mind contented, they will turn homeward.

***

It is true that in the opera houses of Germany the flesh of the pig is sold in various forms, and beer and other liquids are at the disposal of buyers. To follow such a custom, to introduce a bar in the new Music Hall, this is not to be encouraged. You may say that certain music has a tendency to drive one to drink; and your statement is undoubtedly true. But the neighborhood is a sensitive one. There is no bar near the proposed site. There are dwellers in flats, there are little shops, there is unoccupied land. Would it be decent to allow the Muse to descend and find a footing there arm-in-arm with Bacchus.

As a precaution against the said terrible effect of certain music, ear caps might be rented for the evening; or a person might be permitted to bring his own ear caps, of handsome material, with the initials of the owner worked in rich stuff against a dark ground. Blinders that bedeck fashionable horses would serve as a model.

By the way, in ancient Hindu days, he that was fond of music was dubbed Sarva-rasi, which, being interpreted, means "a wild or gay fellow, a sad dog." Such a one was Randhir, who was King in the city Chandrodaya, in the country called Malaya, on the western coast of the land of Bharat. For King Randhir "ate and drank and listened to music, and looked at dancers and made love much more than he studied, reflected, prayed, or conversed with the wise."

***

In the new Hall the applause should be regulated carefully. There should be no claque, not even the fashionable claque that so often today encourages mediocrity and praises that which is bad.

Now, judicious applause is not be discountenanced.

According to Otto Gumprecht, applause has a deep significance when it is genuine, expressed in worthy form and at a suitable time.

The "worthy form" is a matter of the day. The ancient Romans when they were delighted rose solemly in their seats and waved the flaps of their togas. Such an exhibition in Music Hall would seem ridiculous to the thoughtless; besides, the toga is not worn by our patrons of

The three kinds of applause taught by Nero to his claque of 5000 robust young follows from the common people assembled to do him honor when he sang are, unfortunately, forgotten.

It is our custom to applaud by clapping together of hands. Some enthusiast may cry aloud "bravo," especially if the recipient of his vocal bounty be a woman; and he then looks confused, not because he has made a mistake in the gender, but because he has shown for a moment continental emotion.

The manifestation of approval by the stamping of boots, or by the thumping of umbrellas against the floor, or by any ingenious application of fingers to the mouth is not now in favor.

The question is, then, not how shall the applause be manifested; it is, when should applause be given?

It must be acknowledged that the solution of this problem is beset with difficulties. Why should not a Code of Rules and Regulations Concerning Applause be drawn up deliberately by a committee appointed by the Mayor? There is ample time while the hall is a-building.

***

It may not now be impertinent to make a few suggestions concerning applause in the new hall.

Applaud anything by Brahms or Wagner. This is invariably a safe rule to follow. Never mind whether you like the piece or not. If you do not like it, you should at least have the decency to feign admiration.

Applaud all German singers. If they cannot sing, they were born in Germany, and the fact deserves popular appreciation.

Applaud all efforts by local composers, singers, and pianists. Patriotism is the second duty of a concert-goer; devotion to Germany is the first. Patriotism in local music is the conviction that everything done by a Bostonian must be right.

Never applaud unknown composers, players, or singers, unless they have taken the precaution to bring letters of introduction to leaders in society.

It is always safe to applaud vigorously Bach and Beethoven. The applause for Mozart should be an exhibition of moderate rapture, as it is generally understood that he is going out of fashion.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 14.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1894.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS.

Many adverse comments have been made upon the plans prepared for the new Music Hall, to be built by the new corporation at the corner of West Chester park and Huntington avenue.

It is urged that, while the hall may, and possibly is, admirably planned for a hearing of symphony and oratorio concerts, its value for the many other uses to which it must be put is very questionable.

It is urged that to build a hall for such a limited use as will be afforded by these two purposes will shut out a vast number of other affairs which are of equal benefit to the city.

It is admitted that, theoretically, Boston should have a perfect Music Hall, but that, practically, it is desirable to admit of some imperfections in the new hall for musical uses in order that the auditorium may be available for a larger field of usefulness.

Vigorous protests are heard on all sides in regard to the placing of the entrance on St. Stephen's street, which is hardly more than an alleyway as compared with what it should be for the purpose contemplated. It is urged that the new hall should be an architectural ornament to the city, and that its approaches should be in keeping with the standing of Boston as an art and musical centre.

The idea that sufficient money cannot be had to properly build and equip a new building for the public uses to which the old Music Hall has been put is ridiculed by all familiar with the financial enthusiasm of Boston upon any subject when its citizens are properly interested, and the utilizing of the Huntington avenue end of the lot bought for the new hall for business purposes is generally opposed.

The model of the Music Hall that is to be, attracted many visitors to the new Library building last week, and proved a decided eye-opener in regard to the city's musical appreciation. It is a beauty this Music Hall, too handsome, too classic I should say, for this generation who will build it and perhaps sit under its roof in days to come. Shall we be able to live up to such a temple of noble purity, or can we ever come down to ordinary halls after resting on graceful circles amid doric pillars and other delicious Greek things. How can the Heavenly Maid condescend to sing anything but Wagner, how can anything short of a symphony orchestra dare lift a note in such exalted surroundings? I believe in keeping to the highest standard in all arts, but as I screwed one eye into the peephole opening on the interior, and mentally fixed on the location of the seat I wished to occupy in the future, the thought would obtrude itself that most Bostonians were not prepared for a hall of such architectural magnificence. They are not good enough, some of us—yes! but the contrast with the public places hitherto known to them will surely strike in and do them an injury! All the same, it is hoped this is the model to be accepted, and it will not be many months ere it is actually constructed, and the town is wending its way to it o' Saturday nights.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1894.

NEW MUSIC HALL DESIGN.

What is Thought of the Interior Plan as Shown in the Model at the New Public Library — Highly Commended for Its Beauty and Simplicity — Deserves a Better Site than the One on Huntington Avenue.

A number of people showed their interest in the plans for the new Music Hall last week by going to the catalogue room in the new Public Library building to inspect the model of the interior of a music hall, prepared from the design drawn by McKim, Mead & White. Of all the persons who saw the model, not one, it is said, made any adverse criticism, and many expressed themselves as highly pleased with the beauty, simplicity and convenience of the design. The substitution of an amphitheatre for the usual galleries appeared to take everybody by storm. Other details of the plan were also generally commended. One of the most striking facts of the exhibition was the very general and hearty appreciation of the simple beauty of the design shown by the public at large.

This appreciation, it has been suggested, was a direct result of the more general understanding of correct architectural design, brought about by a visit to the World's Fair and the sight of the beauties of the Peristyle, the Court of Honor and the various splendid buildings of the great exhibition.

The acceptable character of the plan seems to be proved by the satisfaction with it which has been so freely expressed. Whether, however, it will be adopted by the New Music Hall Association remains to be seen. The members of the committee are, naturally, reticent on the subject, although it is believed that they are well pleased with the design. One of them said, "We are not committed to this or any other plan. McKim, Mead & White have taken the trouble to submit it to us, and we are considering the matter. We hope that every one interested in the subject will examine the plan and give an opinion upon it. What we want are criticisms upon it from all sources, whether favorable or the reverse; and all suggestions for modifications, changes and improvements will be welcomed and carefully weighed. Now is the time to do this before the actual decision has been made and the work begun."

With regard to the renewed suggestion that a competition ought to be held, a gentleman who is well qualified to speak about the matter said that competitions were not only out of date, but were seldom satisfactory in their results. As to there being any discrimination shown in favor of other than Boston architects, he declared that the record did not justify any such statement. He cited Harvard University as an example. In the last seventeen years, eighteen buildings have been erected at Harvard, the plans for all of which have been drawn by selected architects, no competitions having been held. Of the eleven architects who have been employed, nine were from Boston and only two from New York.

Whether a competition would bring out a finer design for the new Music Hall than the one which has been made by McKim, Mead & White is an open question. The generally favorable opinion of their work could not, perhaps, be better indicated than by giving the views expressed by H. Langdon Warren, the secretary of the Boston Society of Architects, in the course of an interview upon the subject. He said, "The interior for the new Music Hall, as shown by the model that has been on exhibition at the new Public Library, is most appropriate and beautiful. One does not often have the pleasure of seeing a design that can be so unreservedly praised. The scheme adopted is an excellent one, the proportions are delightful, and nearly all the lines are most refined. The restraint and simplicity, the quietness and repose, the propriety and expressiveness of such ornamentation as is used are specially noteworthy. Such a hall would by its beauty add to the enjoyment of music heard there without distracting the attention by obtrusive and over-loaded ornament. I earnestly hope that it will be carried out; but it would be a matter of great and lasting regret if the design is not carried out in permanent material. Plaster and staff should not be thought of; Boston can better afford to wait some years for a Music Hall than to see erected a structure for so important a purpose in any but the most durable and most beautiful material.

"The World's Fair has doubtless educated our people to appreciate such designs as this; but if the temporary materials, which were appropriate enough as the stage setting, the scenery of a passing event like the Chicago exhibition, come to be regarded as suitable for enduring and monumental buildings, the architecture of the fair will have a stronger influence for bad than for good.

"The form of the Greek theatre which has been adopted for the present design is specially suitable for a music hall. When the old opera house at Dresden was burned, its place was taken, during the years occupied in the erection of the present house, by a temporary wooden structure, the auditorium of which had the form of the Greek theatre. I was a frequent attendant at the Dresden Opera House at this time, and I never was in a large hall where music was heard to better advantage. This arrangement has the farther merit of securing nearly equal advantages for seeing and hearing to every seat in the house. In the old wooden Dresden theatre there were no better seats for hearing the music than those at the extreme back of the house, which corresponded to the upper gallery of the usual arrangement.

"The form of the semi-dome over the music platform, in the model shown at the new library, has doubtless been dictated by acoustic considerations. But it gives an unfortunate outline to the proscenium arch, perhaps the most important line in the building, being opposite the eyes of the auditors all the time. It is a misfortune that the arch should be the one ungraceful line of the whole interior. The defect would be easy to remedy: and we may hope that the artists who have produced so beautiful a design will correct the fault before the plan is put in execution.

"It will be a pity if Boston's great Music Hall is not given an exterior in keeping with the beauty and monumental character of this interior; and it will be a pity also if a building of such importance is placed in so inappropriate and remote a site as the one on Huntington avenue. Such a structure should stand where it would be a distinct addition to the beauty of the city, a step toward that monumental and larger-minded Boston which we may hope will some day take the place of the present, mentally and materially, overgrown provincial town."

Deeds for Music Hall Site Recorded.

Papers have been recorded at the Suffolk Registry of Deeds transferring to the new Boston Music Hall Corporation the lot of land on Huntington avenue, West Chester Park and St. Stephen street, that has been selected as a site for the new Music Hall. The lot contains about 32,986 square feet.

HOME JOURNAL

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1894.

Boston is likely to keep her soubriquet of "The Modern Athens." The severity and simplicity of its public buildings is in keeping with the Greek idea. The latest and most notable of these is now probably to be supplemented by the exhibited design for a new Music Hall which is even more Grecian than anything which has preceded it. Its amphitheater form is essentially Greek in its inception, and while the outside of the building is not shown it may be presumed that it will be in keeping with the interior. It has taken some time to convert the minds of the people to this style of architecture after they had become used to the gingerbread style which has been so much in vogue for the past number of years, but if it has been done at last we may congratulate ourselves upon its accomplishment. In this connection it may be proper to speak of the change proposed in the State House. The proposition to build the old part over to be in keeping with the new seems wholly unnecessary, for the new part should be made in keeping with the old as was the original intention. The State House has historic associations which would never exist in a made over building, and it is time that the people woke up to the idea of keeping our old landmarks and historic spots inviolate. The removal of the JOHN HANCOCK house a number of years ago is now looked upon as being almost a piece of vandalism, and it should be a lesson by which future action should be guided.

The Independent - N.Y. Jan 11, 94

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

AN overfilled musical week was the one ended Saturday. Orchestral concert, opera, pianoforte and song recitals were superabundant. To pay one's money was easier than to take a choice.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra drew a large audience on Thursday evening. The program offered Brahms's First Symphony, a firm and sympathetic performance of which work, inexhaustible in its interest and beauty, once more made a deep impression. A curious orchestral novelty to this city, which Boston has heard several times, the "1812," or "Holy War," Overture of Tschaikovsky (op. 49) was brought forward. It is descriptive music (one might say program-music) with a vengeance! expressing in a kind of allegorical rhapsody the struggle between France and Russia during the Napoleonic Invasion, and amounting to a kind of fin de siècle match to that old parlor classic, "The Battle of the Prague." A Russian folk-melody and the French, "Marseillaise," with some other less distinctive thematic stuff are worked up into a series of astonishing contrasts and climaxes of the dynamic sort, ending in the complete disappearance of the French air and the assertion of the Russian one, with a symphonic fury that is something perfectly amazing. The whole body of the brass and percussion choir and a set of particularly loud chimes are called into—not play but sheer din. Even the "Dies Iræ" of the Requiems by Verdi and Berlioz, even Rubinstein's sea-storms and falling Tower of Babel, lose their proud pre-eminence as musical uproar before Tschaikovsky's typhoon of patriotism and racket. The score, by the by, contains additional parts for a brass band and cannon—but Mr. Paur thought them quite dispensable in the Music Hall, and they certainly were not missed. In spite of so near a kinship to circus music and to being a vulgar if colossal effort ad captandum, the Overture contains some passages of dignity and legitimate musical effect. As a concert-curio it is of the first rank. The audience on this occasion was immensely entertained with it, and applauded it much. The rest of Mr. Paur's program included Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, and two vocal numbers, Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" scena and the Massenet's recitative and air "Celui dont le parole" and "Il est doux—il est bon" from "Hèrodiaed," sung by Mrs. Nordica. Of the beautiful quality of this lady's large voice or the fine method she shows there is never a question; but we fear that nothing (a Bayreuth engagement included) can ever make her a dramatic soprano. Into the Massenet air she threw considerable fervor; but she acquitted herself of the passions of poor Leonore as if she were delivering a Vassar College commencement oration,—and, by the by, she did not appear to know thoroughly either text or music of the familiar selection.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday evening at Music Hall. The audience was large and extremely enthusiastic. Mr. Emil Paur conducted and Lillian Nordica sang. This was the music of the evening:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
- Un poco sostenuto (C minor).
- Allegro (C minor).
- Andante sostenuto (E major).
- Un poco allegretto e grazioso (A flat major).
- L' Istesso tempo (B major).
- Adagio (C minor).
- Allegro non troppo, ma con brio (C major).

Recitative, "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and aria, "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio."....Beethoven
Overture, "Euryanthe"....Weber
Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Herodiade."....Massenet
Overture, "1812," op. 49.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Paur made more of the great work of Brahms than anything he has yet conducted in this city. The andante was read with insight and intellectual passion. As a whole, it was a most satisfactory performance and revealed Mr. Paur as a profound student of Brahms. The Weber overture was not so edifying. It lacked suppleness and contrast, and, above all, warmth. The Tschaikowsky overture, "1812," which, according to the analytic program, is also known as "The Holy War," is well named. It is wholly war with one's auditing apparatus, although cleverly conceived as a whole.

It is a pièce d'occasion, and is intended to celebrate the repulse of Napoleon in Russia. It was once rehearsed by Mr. Damrosch here, but it was given up. Scored for full orchestra, bells and cannon and a full brass band are added, but we were spared the latter grim realities. As it was there was enough noise at the conclusion to suggest a regiment of Cossacks full of vodka yelling on the open steppes. As ceremonial or state music it does not equal Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," Rubinstein's "Russia" or Letolff's "Robespierre."

Lillian Nordica won much applause and several recalls by her earnest work.

The Kneisel Quartet.—This was the program of the third Kneisel Quartet concert in Chamber Music Hall last Friday night:

Quartet in F major, op. 96 (MS.).....Dvorák
- Allegro ma non troppo.
- Lento—Molto vivace.
- Finale (vivace).

(First public performance.)

Quintet in E flat, op. 97 (MS.).....Dvorák
- Allegro non tanto—Allegro vivo.
- Andante—Finale (Allegro giusto).

(First public performance.)
Second viola, Mr. Zach.

Sextet in A major, for two violins, two violas and two 'celli, op. 48.....Dvorák
- Allegro moderato.
- Dumka (Élégie. Poco allegretto).
- Furiant (Presto.).
- Theme with variations.
- (Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino).

Second viola, Mr. Zach.
Second 'cello, Mr. Schulz.

Of the first two works the quintet was the better, the first and second movements being charming. The quartet was rather rough and ready as to construction. Both had themes which were redolent of the South. Of course the sextet outshines the new compositions as a work of art. It is truly Bohemian in thematic texture and it first attracted to its composer the attention of Brahms and Hanslick. The club's playing was delightful, as usual. Dr. Dvorák was present and had to bow his acknowledgments.

Dr. Dvorák is the newest of the old masters. He preserves the sunny, child-like naiveté of Haydn and reminds one of Schubert in his unpremeditated lyric outpourings. He is the optimist of latter day composers.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Infantry Hall last night, and was listened to by an audience of about the usual size. In fact, the Symphony audiences present about the same faces month after month and season after season. A few may go because it is the "correct thing," but for the most part the attendants upon these high-class concerts must of necessity be those who have some knowledge of music, or at least the cultivation and taste requisite to appreciate the art in its highest developments. The following programme was given:

Hermann Goetz.....Symphony in F major, Op. 9
- I. Allegro moderato (F major).
- II. Intermezzo: Allegretto (C major).
- III. Adagio ma non troppo lento (F minor).
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (F major).

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.....Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)
- Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
- VIII. Adagio (D major).
- Allegro assai (D major).
- II. Andante (G major).
- III. Menuetto (G minor).
- Trio (G major).
- IV. Rondo Allegro (G major).

Davidoff.....Concerto for violoncello, in A minor (In one movement.)
Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"

A curious fact to be noticed in connection with this programme is that the three principal composers named upon it all died young, Weber at 40, Mozart and Goetz several years short of that. The symphony in F of Goetz's, which opened the concert last night, contains so much of both genius and originality that one cannot help thinking that had his life been spared he would surely have won himself a high place among the creative minds of music, a belief still further stimulated by the great success of his one opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," composed but two years before his death. The symphony does not follow strictly classical outlines, but rather leans toward the freer treatment of the modern style. But it is full of invention and charming ideas, while the scoring is that of a master hand. It was played in a most delightful manner, and warmly applauded.

The four movements from Mozart's serenade in D also met with demonstrative approval, which was fully justified, both by the exquisite quality of the music itself and the flawless rendering it received, especially on the part of the strings. Mr. Kneisel came in for a share of the applause, as considerable obligato work for solo violin fell to his share, which he performed in his usual skillful and intelligent way.

Mr. Schroeder played Davidoff's fine concerto for violoncello in a most artistic manner, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture made a brilliant finale to the evening's pleasure. Mr. Paur conducted with less demonstration than heretofore, and the orchestra played magnificently from beginning to end. The audience testified liberally their appreciation of the fine work done, nevertheless, some grumbling was heard that the concerts are so strictly instrumental. Not a vocal soloist has been vouchsafed us since the first concert, when Nordica appeared. For the last three concerts the only soloists presented have been Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder of the orchestra and Mrs. Paur as pianist. The latter's performance was but mediocre, and while no one disputes the ability of the orchestra's first violin and 'cello, the feeling seems to be abroad that the management might safely give us a little more variety in the choice of soloists. The attendance seems sufficiently large to warrant the slight additional expense, and to most people the concerts would be more enjoyable with an occasional break in the procession of heavy instrumental numbers.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1894.

MUSIC LOVERS TREATED.

Another Concert by the Symphony Orchestra Proves a Delight.

Pleasure in its most substantial form was what an assemblage lived upon for two hours last night, in Infantry hall, where the Boston Symphony orchestra gave another of its fine concerts. In some phases the event topped any preceding entertainment in the symphony course, and in all phases it was a superb treat.

The program comprised as orchestral numbers Goetz's Symphony in F major, Mozart's Serenade in F and Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." To say that the trio of great compositions was perfectly rendered in every detail would be wholly appropriate in justice to Conductor Paur and his musicians, for more beautifully executed music none could desire.

The soloist was Henry Alwin Schroeder, the chief 'cello expert of the band and probably the chief artist in his particular line in the United States. His selection was Davidoff's Concerto in A minor. Franz Kneisel performed an exquisite violin obligato in the serenade, which started the audience into noisy acknowledgements of his power.

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, JANUARY 17, 1894.

On Thursday evening the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme consisted of Brahm's symphony in C minor, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," and Tschaïkowsky's overture, entitled, "1812," together with two vocal solos by Mme. Nordica. There was really nothing in the concert to call for particular comment, except the "1812" overture. I do not remember to have heard that work before, and I am sure that I don't care to hear it again. I will not admit that any man is a greater admirer of its composer than I am; but I honestly believe that he was indulging in a little musical sarcasm at the expense of the Czar when he wrote it at that monarch's request. The composition is intended to celebrate the retreat of Napoleon from Moscow, and the celebration takes the form of a noisy battle between the National hymns of France and Russia, in which the latter gets the best of it, amid general rejoicings, expressed by thumps on the bass drum, whacks on cymbals and the ringing of bells. It reminds one of Mr. Alfred Jingle's patriotic poem, written in the wine shop.

On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Alberto Jonas, the young Spanish pianist, who recently made a favorable impression at a Symphony Society concert, gave the first of two piano recitals in the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall. The young man displayed a very pretty touch, a good command of tone color, and not a little musical feeling. His playing, however, was generally marred by an exaggerated tempo rubato.

War has broken out between Boston and New York. A very bitter war it is, in which paper bullets of the brain are being hurled savagely. It appears that H. H. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune went over to Boston to hear the first performance of that everlasting American symphony. It appears furthermore that Mr. Krehbiel had the misfortune to be acquainted with the correct tempi of the composition, having learned them from the composer. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not a victim to this same misfortune. When, therefore, Mr. Krehbiel found fault with Mr. Paur he seriously offended all the Boston critics, who, to their own great joy, did not know any more about the symphony than their greatly beloved conductor did. Consequently these Boston critics having praised Mr. Paur's interpretation of the work, were pretty angry when they discovered they had blundered. Therefore they pitched into Mr. Krehbiel with great vigor, taking the ground that his faith in the Americanism of the symphony was absurd. Mr. Krehbiel retorted through the columns of the Tribune, and the result is that Boston is up in arms. Phillip Hale, who is one of the best fellows in the world, seems to be "real mad," and as for Ben Woolf, I can fairly see his sardonic smile gleaming through his words in the Saturday Evening Gazette. I mean to let the public into the secret. These fellows who are giving one another such hits in their papers are the best of friends; and I, who poke fun at them here, love the whole lot of them.

* * *

BALTIMORE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert on Tuesday last. The programme opened with the Brahms C minor symphony. When Paur conducts Brahms he seems to be quite en pays de connaissance, for, without a doubt, it was superbly played. Even the non-admirers of Brahms must admit that the Andante, with its plaintive melody, is beautiful from the first note to the last. In the third movement, Un poco allegretto e grazioso, the grazioso must have been overlooked. The last movement, bursting forth in an exuberance of joy like a pæan of triumph, roused the audience to genuine enthusiasm. Alwin Schroeder's violincello sang the solo in the Volkmann serenade. I say, sang, for when a tone is so rich, so mellow, so velvety, the word play fails to express it. The Euryanthe overture was given in a forcible, brilliant style with the most perfectly marked rhythm; I am afraid the metronome has found a flesh and blood rival in Paur.

Those who had never seen Materna must have been amazed at her colossal stature, which made the orchestra appear like a band of Liliputians. As one young Miss wisely remarked, back of me—"Oh, Tom, she must have a grand voice; just see how big she is!" Her voice must have been grand ten or fifteen years ago; now her high notes have too marked a tremolo, her medium register sounds colorless and her chest tones are forced, still her artistic phrasing, perfect enunciation, and dramatic intensity always render her singing enjoyable. Gluck's "Alceste," and Weber's "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," elicited a spontaneous outburst of applause and repeated recalls.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Infantry Hall last night, and was listened to by an audience of about the usual size. In fact, the Symphony audiences present about the same faces month after month and season after season. A few may go because it is the "correct thing," but for the most part the attendants upon these high-class concerts must of necessity be those who have some knowledge of music, or at least the cultivation and taste requisite to appreciate the art in its highest developments. The following programme was given:

Hermann Goetz.....Symphony in F major, Op. 9
- I. Allegro moderato (F major).
- II. Intermezzo: Allegretto (C major).
- III. Adagio ma non troppo lento (F minor).
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (F major).

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.....Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)
- Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
- VIII. Adagio (D major).
- Allegro assai (D major).
- II. Andante (G major).
- III. Menuetto (G minor).
- Trio (G major).
- IV. Rondo Allegro (G major).

Davidoff.....Concerto for violoncello, in A minor (In one movement.)
Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"

A curious fact to be noticed in connection with this programme is that the three principal composers named upon it all died young, Weber at 40, Mozart and Goetz several years short of that. The symphony in F of Goetz's, which opened the concert last night, contains so much of both genius and originality that one cannot help thinking that had his life been spared he would surely have won himself a high place among the creative minds of music, a belief still further stimulated by the great success of his one opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," composed but two years before his death. The symphony does not follow strictly classical outlines, but rather leans toward the freer treatment of the modern style. But it is full of invention and charming ideas, while the scoring is that of a master hand. It was played in a most delightful manner, and warmly applauded.

The four movements from Mozart's serenade in D also met with demonstrative approval, which was fully justified, both by the exquisite quality of the music itself and the flawless rendering it received, especially on the part of the strings. Mr. Kneisel came in for a share of the applause, as considerable obligato work for solo violin fell to his share, which he performed in his usual skillful and intelligent way.

Mr. Schroeder played Davidoff's fine concerto for violoncello in a most artistic manner, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture made a brilliant finale to the evening's pleasure. Mr. Paur conducted with less demonstration than heretofore, and the orchestra played magnificently from beginning to end. The audience testified liberally their appreciation of the fine work done, nevertheless, some grumbling was heard that the concerts are so strictly instrumental. Not a vocal soloist has been vouchsafed us since the first concert, when Nordica appeared. For the last three concerts the only soloists presented have been Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder of the orchestra and Mrs. Paur as pianist. The latter's performance was but mediocre, and while no one disputes the ability of the orchestra's first violin and 'cello, the feeling seems to be abroad that the management might safely give us a little more variety in the choice of soloists. The attendance seems sufficiently large to warrant the slight additional expense, and to most people the concerts would be more enjoyable with an occasional break in the procession of heavy instrumental numbers.

[76]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday evening at Music Hall. The audience was large and extremely enthusiastic. Mr. Emil Paur conducted and Lillian Nordica sang. This was the music of the evening:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
Un poco sostenuto (C minor).
Allegro (C minor).
Andante sostenuto (E major).
Un poco allegretto e grazioso (A flat major).
L' Istesso tempo (B major).
Adagio (C minor).
Allegro non troppo, ma con brio (C major).
Recitative, "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and aria, "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio."....Beethoven
Overture, "Euryanthe"....Weber
Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Herodiade."....Massenet
Overture, "1812," op. 49....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Paur made more of the great work of Brahms than anything he has yet conducted in this city. The andante was read with insight and intellectual passion. As a whole, it was a most satisfactory performance and revealed Mr. Paur as a profound student of Brahms. The Weber overture was not so edifying. It lacked suppleness and contrast, and, above all, warmth. The Tschaikowsky overture, "1812," which, according to the analytic program, is also known as "The Holy War," is well named. It is wholly war with one's auditing apparatus, although cleverly conceived as a whole.

It is a pièce d'occasion, and is intended to celebrate the repulse of Napoleon in Russia. It was once rehearsed by Mr. Damrosch here, but it was given up. Scored for full orchestra, bells and cannon and a full brass band are added, but we were spared the latter grim realities. As it was there was enough noise at the conclusion to suggest a regiment of Cossacks full of vodka yelling on the open steppes. As ceremonial or state music it does not equal Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria," Rubinstein's "Russia" or Letolff's "Robespierre."

Lillian Nordica won much applause and several recalls by her earnest work.

The Kneisel Quartet.—This was the program of the third Kneisel Quartet concert in Chamber Music Hall last Friday night:

Quartet in F major, op. 96 (MS.).....Dvorák
Allegro ma non troppo.
Lento—Molto vivace.
Finale (vivace).
(First public performance.)
Quintet in E flat, op. 97 (MS.).....Dvorák
Allegro non tanto—Allegro vivo.
Andante—Finale (Allegro giusto).
(First public performance.)
Second viola, Mr. Zach.
Sextet in A major, for two violins, two violas and two 'celli, op. 48.....Dvorák
Allegro moderato.
Dumka (Élégie. Poco allegretto).
Furiant (Presto.).
Theme with variations.
(Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino).
Second viola, Mr. Zach.
Second 'cello, Mr. Schulz.

Of the first two works the quintet was the better, the first and second movements being charming. The quartet was rather rough and ready as to construction. Both had themes which were redolent of the South. Of course the sextet outshines the new compositions as a work of art. It is truly Bohemian in thematic texture and it first attracted to its composer the attention of Brahms and Hanslick. The club's playing was delightful, as usual. Dr. Dvorák was present and had to bow his acknowledgments.

Dr. Dvorák is the newest of the old masters. He preserves the sunny, child-like naiveté of Haydn and reminds one of Schubert in his unpremeditated lyric outpourings. He is the optimist of latter day composers.

PRO[illegible]NCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Infantry Hall last night, and was listened to by an audience of about the usual size. In fact, the Symphony audiences present about the same faces month after month and season after season. A few may go because it is the "correct thing," but for the most part the attendants upon these high-class concerts must of necessity be those who have some knowledge of music, or at least the cultivation and taste requisite to appreciate the art in its highest developments. The following programme was given:

Hermann Goetz....Symphony in F major, Op. 9
I. Allegro moderato (F major).
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto (C major).
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento (F minor).
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (F major).
Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.....Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)
Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
VIII. Adagio (D major).
Allegro assai (D major).
II. Andante (G major).
III. Menuetto (G minor).
Trio (G major).
IV. Rondo Allegro (G major).
Davidoff....Concerto for violoncello, in A minor (In one movement.)
Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"

A curious fact to be noticed in connection with this programme is that the three principal composers named upon it all died young, Weber at 40, Mozart and Goetz several years short of that. The symphony in F of Goetz's, which opened the concert last night, contains so much of both genius and originality that one cannot help thinking that had his life been spared he would surely have won himself a high place among the creative minds of music, a belief still further stimulated by the great success of his one opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," composed but two years before his death. The symphony does not follow strictly classical outlines, but rather leans toward the freer treatment of the modern style. But it is full of invention and charming ideas, while the scoring is that of a master hand. It was played in a most delightful manner, and warmly applauded.

The four movements from Mozart's serenade in D also met with demonstrative approval, which was fully justified, both by the exquisite quality of the music itself and the flawless rendering it received, especially on the part of the strings. Mr. Kneisel came in for a share of the applause, as considerable obligato work for solo violin fell to his share, which he performed in his usual skillful and intelligent way.

Mr. Schroeder played Davidoff's fine concerto for violoncello in a most artistic manner, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture made a brilliant finale to the evening's pleasure. Mr. Paur conducted with less demonstration than heretofore, and the orchestra played magnificently from beginning to end. The audience testified liberally their appreciation of the fine work done, nevertheless, some grumbling was heard that the concerts are so strictly instrumental. Not a vocal soloist has been vouchsafed us since the first concert, when Nordica appeared. For the last three concerts the only soloists presented have been Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder of the orchestra and Mrs. Paur as pianist. The latter's performance was but mediocre, and while no one disputes the ability of the orchestra's first violin and 'cello, the feeling seems to be abroad that the management might safely give us a little more variety in the choice of soloists. The attendance seems sufficiently large to warrant the slight additional expense, and to most people the concerts would be more enjoyable with an occasional break in the procession of heavy instrumental numbers.

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1894.

MUSIC LOVERS TREATED.

Another Concert by the Symphony Orchestra Proves a Delight.

Pleasure in its most substantial form was what an assemblage lived upon for two hours last night, in Infantry hall, where the Boston Symphony orchestra gave another of its fine concerts. In some phases the event topped any preceding entertainment in the symphony course, and in all phases it was a superb treat.

The program comprised as orchestral numbers Goetz's Symphony in F major, Mozart's Serenade in F and Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." To say that the trio of great compositions was perfectly rendered in every detail would be wholly appropriate in justice to Conductor Paur and his musicians, for more beautifully executed music none could desire.

The soloist was Henry Alwin Schroeder, the chief 'cello expert of the band and probably the chief artist in his particular line in the United States. His selection was Davidoff's Concerto in A minor. Franz Kneisel performed an exquisite violin obligato in the serenade, which started the audience into noisy acknowledgements of his power.

The Musical and Dramatic World

NEW YORK, JANUARY 17, 1894.

On Thursday evening the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme consisted of Brahm's symphony in C minor, Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," and Tschaïkowsky's overture, entitled, "1812," together with two vocal solos by Mme. Nordica. There was really nothing in the concert to call for particular comment, except the "1812" overture. I do not remember to have heard that work before, and I am sure that I don't care to hear it again. I will not admit that any man is a greater admirer of its composer than I am; but I honestly believe that he was indulging in a little musical sarcasm at the expense of the Czar when he wrote it at that monarch's request. The composition is intended to celebrate the retreat of Napoleon from Moscow, and the celebration takes the form of a noisy battle between the National hymns of France and Russia, in which the latter gets the best of it, amid general rejoicings, expressed by thumps on the bass drum, whacks on cymbals and the ringing of bells. It reminds one of Mr. Alfred Jingle's patriotic poem, written in the wine shop.

On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Alberto Jonas, the young Spanish pianist, who recently made a favorable impression at a Symphony Society concert, gave the first of two piano recitals in the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall. The young man displayed a very pretty touch, a good command of tone color, and not a little musical feeling. His playing, however, was generally marred by an exaggerated tempo rubato.

War has broken out between Boston and New York. A very bitter war it is, in which paper bullets of the brain are being hurled savagely. It appears that H. H. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune went over to Boston to hear the first performance of that everlasting American symphony. It appears furthermore that Mr. Krehbiel had the misfortune to be acquainted with the correct tempi of the composition, having learned them from the composer. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was not a victim to this same misfortune. When, therefore, Mr. Krehbiel found fault with Mr. Paur he seriously offended all the Boston critics, who, to their own great joy, did not know any more about the symphony than their greatly beloved conductor did. Consequently these Boston critics having praised Mr. Paur's interpretation of the work, were pretty angry when they discovered they had blundered. Therefore they pitched into Mr. Krehbiel with great vigor, taking the ground that his faith in the Americanism of the symphony was absurd. Mr. Krehbiel retorted through the columns of the Tribune, and the result is that Boston is up in arms. Phillip Hale, who is one of the best fellows in the world, seems to be "real mad," and as for Ben Woolf, I can fairly see his sardonic smile gleaming through his words in the Saturday Evening Gazette. I mean to let the public into the secret. These fellows who are giving one another such hits in their papers are the best of friends; and I, who poke fun at them here, love the whole lot of them.

* * *

BALTIMORE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert on Tuesday last. The programme opened with the Brahms C minor symphony. When Paur conducts Brahms he seems to be quite en pays de connaissance, for, without a doubt, it was superbly played. Even the non-admirers of Brahms must admit that the Andante, with its plaintive melody, is beautiful from the first note to the last. In the third movement, Un poco allegretto e grazioso, the grazioso must have been overlooked. The last movement, bursting forth in an exuberance of joy like a pæan of triumph, roused the audience to genuine enthusiasm. Alwin Schroeder's violincello sang the solo in the Volkmann serenade. I say, sang, for when a tone is so rich, so mellow, so velvety, the word play fails to express it. The Euryanthe overture was given in a forcible, brilliant style with the most perfectly marked rhythm; I am afraid the metronome has found a flesh and blood rival in Paur.

Those who had never seen Materna must have been amazed at her colossal stature, which made the orchestra appear like a band of Liliputians. As one young Miss wisely remarked, back of me—"Oh, Tom, she must have a grand voice; just see how big she is!" Her voice must have been grand ten or fifteen years ago; now her high notes have too marked a tremolo, her medium register sounds colorless and her chest tones are forced, still her artistic phrasing, perfect enunciation, and dramatic intensity always render her singing enjoyable. Gluck's "Alceste," and Weber's "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," elicited a spontaneous outburst of applause and repeated recalls.

[illegible] PROVIDENCE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1[illegible]

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Infantry Hall last night, and was listened to by an audience of about the usual size. In fact, the Symphony audiences present about the same faces month after month and season after season. A few may go because it is the "correct thing," but for the most part the attendants upon these high-class concerts must of necessity be those who have some knowledge of music, or at least the cultivation and taste requisite to appreciate the art in its highest developments. The following programme was given:

Hermann Goetz....Symphony in F major, Op. 9
I. Allegro moderato (F major).
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto (C major).
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento (F minor).
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (F major).
Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.....Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)
Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
VIII. Adagio (D major).
Allegro assai (D major).
II. Andante (G major).
III. Menuetto (G minor).
Trio (G major).
IV. Rondo Allegro (G major).
Davidoff....Concerto for violoncello, in A minor (In one movement.)
Weber.....Overture, "Euryanthe"

A curious fact to be noticed in connection with this programme is that the three principal composers named upon it all died young, Weber at 40, Mozart and Goetz several years short of that. The symphony in F of Goetz's, which opened the concert last night, contains so much of both genius and originality that one cannot help thinking that had his life been spared he would surely have won himself a high place among the creative minds of music, a belief still further stimulated by the great success of his one opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," composed but two years before his death. The symphony does not follow strictly classical outlines, but rather leans toward the freer treatment of the modern style. But it is full of invention and charming ideas, while the scoring is that of a master hand. It was played in a most delightful manner, and warmly applauded.

The four movements from Mozart's serenade in D also met with demonstrative approval, which was fully justified, both by the exquisite quality of the music itself and the flawless rendering it received, especially on the part of the strings. Mr. Kneisel came in for a share of the applause, as considerable obligato work for solo violin fell to his share, which he performed in his usual skillful and intelligent way.

Mr. Schroeder played Davidoff's fine concerto for violoncello in a most artistic manner, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture made a brilliant finale to the evening's pleasure. Mr. Paur conducted with less demonstration than heretofore, and the orchestra played magnificently from beginning to end. The audience testified liberally their appreciation of the fine work done, nevertheless, some grumbling was heard that the concerts are so strictly instrumental. Not a vocal soloist has been vouchsafed us since the first concert, when Nordica appeared. For the last three concerts the only soloists presented have been Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder of the orchestra and Mrs. Paur as pianist. The latter's performance was but mediocre, and while no one disputes the ability of the orchestra's first violin and 'cello, the feeling seems to be abroad that the management might safely give us a little more variety in the choice of soloists. The attendance seems sufficiently large to warrant the slight additional expense, and to most people the concerts would be more enjoyable with an occasional break in the procession of heavy instrumental numbers.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall:

Suite No. 2, B minor, for string orchestra and flutes.....Bach
Overture, "Coriolan".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

It is a doubtful experiment to bring out in modern concert halls the orchestral music of Sebastian Bach. This just man passed his life in writing counterpoint, and his works are many. In his compositions for the organ, in his well-tempered clavichord and in some of his choral music he reached sublime heights; but, incredibly industrious he wrote much that served the passing occasion and now is only of interest to the student. To fall down and worship any page that bears his name is rank fetichism; and yet much that is absolutely stupid from the purely musical standpoint is accepted by blind devotees as the work of inspiration. Now in the Suite played last evening how much was there that was honestly enjoyed by the hearers? I am not denying the supreme excellence of the workmanship, but is there not an absence of genuine musical beauty in some of the numbers of this suite? There are fugues in the "Well Tempered Clavichord," short as they are, that are worth the whole of such bewigged compositions for strings and flutes. There are charming passages in this very suite, but as a whole the work seemed memento-ous.

The program book contained a learned note on the Sarabande, and the conclusion drawn from the note is that the characteristic of the dance was a certain stateli ess. Now originally the Sarabande, as known in Spain, was a voluptuous dance, so voluptuous that the priests thundered against it from the pulpit. When it was brought into France the Sarabande became a favorite. Ninon de l'Enclos danced it in the 17th century to the great delight of young men. Cardinal Richelieu did not disdain to beat out the steps and flourish in gestures that he might attract the attention of Anne of Austria. And it was Yveteaux, who, at the age of 80 years, asked for a Sarabande tune that his soul might slip away with greater ease.

***

After the labor of Bach, the family man came the "Coriolan" overture, which was read in a frank, manly fashion and finely played. Indeed, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of a high order of excellence. The familiar symphony of Mendelssohn gave pleasure and it was read most sympathetically by Mr. Paur.

***

The overture, "King Lear," has not been played at a Symphony concert since the spring of '87. Certain admirers of Berlioz claim that this overture is the greatest of his purely orchestral compositions. I cannot agree with these admirers.

To me this musical version of "King Lear" is not only inadequate from the purely imaginative standpoint; it is not of marked musical interest either in thematic treatment or in instrumentation. Let it be granted that the "Cordelia theme," so called, has a pathetic tenderness and a modest, shrinking beauty; but in this overture there is not the volcanic passion of the old man Lear. The recitative-like opening phrase seems without real meaning, without genuine power. And there is no overwhelming burst of orchestral fury that paints or even suggests the crazed King defying the elements.

Music has its limitations. It is not interchangeable with passionate poetry or with such sonorous prose as that dreamed by the Opium Eater, or with an immortal painting, or with the view of the awful glacier track. This music of Berlioz, when all has been said in its praise, and you take it at its highest valuation, sinks far below the famous pages written by Victor Hugo in his admiration—say, rather, in his worship—of "King Lear."

And yet many have written music suggested by this tragedy. There are operas by Gobati (1881), Reynaud (1888), Sém éladis (1854) and Solowiew (1885). There is incidental music to the tragedy by André (1778), von Blumenthal (1828) and J. L. Hatton (1858). There are the overtures by Berlioz (1831), Leidgebel (1851) and Balakireff (about 1865).

This overture by Balakireff, the Russian, is said to be a remarkable work. Its "Cordelia theme" is said to be of exquisite beauty; the "Lear theme" is "grand and simple," and the instrumentation is of "great discretion and classic accuracy." Shall we ever hear this overture in a Symphony concert?

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 21, 1894.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Echoes from the Twelfth Symphony Program—Sunday Musical Offerings—Notes.

The 12th symphony concert at Music hall began with Bach's suite in B minor for strings and flutes, and late comers were obliged to wait in the lobby nearly half an hour until the seven numbers comprising the composition were finished before they could gain admission to the hall, conductor Paur evidently not wishing to mar the performance of the delicate work by the bustle and confusion of belated ones. The unfortunates missed a delightful interpretation of the dainty composition which, beginning with a stately introduction, impressively performed by Mr Paur's men, leads up to the free and livelier rondeau and dance measures of the sarabande, bourree, polonaise and minuet. The work of the strings and flute calls for high commendation. In the fourth movement and the finale of the fifth the flute phrasing was specially effective.

Mendelssohn's famous and familiar "Scotch" symphony was finely played. Probably it never has had a more artistic or smoother performance in this city. The wealth of minor details was not overshadowed by the broad treatment of the fortissimo passages, and the development of themes by the different contingents was refreshingly crisp and harmonious.

The second movement, with its merry bagpipe dance, was a capital illustration of musical humor, which brought smiles to the faces of the men and the conductor as well as to the auditors. The spontaneous applause which greeted this number evidenced the hearty appreciation of the audience.

Beethoven's passionate "Coriolan" overture was given with due regard to its dramatic character, and the Berlioz overture to "King Lear," which closed the concert, was played with the proper stormy effect. The program this week will be as follows: Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Weber, concerstuck; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody; Berlioz, Rakoczy march. Mr F. Busoni will be the soloist.

Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 21.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

With Bach at the top, Berlioz at the bottom and Mendelssohn and Beethoven for the filling, there was no lack of variety in last evening's Symphony concert programme. The new director, Emil Paur, is somewhat uneven in his success at programme making, but upon this occasion he succeeded in arranging a list of works which appealed with equal success to many classes of music lovers.

The Bach suite No. 2 in B minor, for strings and flute, introduced the evening's selections, and its several short movements were played with splendid precision and taste under the baton of Mr. Paur. In the playing of the string section of the band it was manifest that the conductor has succeeded in bringing back to these players much of the precision which characterized their work under Herr Gericke, and at the same time retaining the freedom of the Nikisch regime. The grand body of tone given out by the strings told with great effect in the stronger movements of the suite, and there was a delicacy and refinement in the performance of the work which was very delightful. M. Mole, master of the flute that he is, has never done better work than on this occasion, and although there was something of monotony in the seven movements, they were at all times enjoyable and thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, made the next work on the list, and the dramatic characteristics of the composition were fairly brought out in its performance.

The symphony No. 3 of Mendelssohn (Scotch) made the principal feature of the programme, and the reading given this work, while being thoroughly conservative and in keeping with the traditions of its earlier performances here, was full of interest to even those to whom it was a familiar composition. The adagio was especially effective as played on this occasion, and the brilliant allegro vivacissimo was also a strikingly enjoyable portion of the symphony. The grand finale was played in the broad style that gave all its characteristics with splendid effect, and made a marked impression upon the audience.

The overture to "King Lear" by Berlioz ended this most admirally arranged programme, and in the performance of the series of tone pictures so grandly portrayed by the composer Mr. Paur displayed the abilities of his orchestra in a fine fashion. Altogether, the programme was decidedly one of the best of the season.

Next week Mr. F. Busoni, the pianist, will be the soloist, and will play the Weber concertstuck and Liszt's Spanish rhapsodie. The programme will also include the "Euryanthe" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony and the Rakoczy march.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 21.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, were: Suite in B-minor, for string orchestra and flute, Bach; overture, "Coriolan," Beethoven; Symphony No. 3, (Scotch) Mendelssohn; Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz. The Bach Suite is very interesting but a steady half hour of B-minor makes a severe trial of one's musical orthodoxy, especially in an era when even the merest tyro of an ambitious song writer thinks it crassly conventional to remain in his original key after the second bar of his tune. The suite was beautifully played; in fact, the whole programme was given in a perfect manner. The orchestra was never in a more perfect condition, even under Mr. Gericke. The mischief that Mr. Nikisch worked with it has been wholly remedied, and its playing is always satisfying and delightful. It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven overture again, freed from the sickly sentimental affectations that the late conductor foisted on it. The reading was dramatic, without exaggeration, and was brilliant, dignified and finely colored. There was no attempt to make the music say more than it said plainly and clearly. The symphony received a clean cut, sympathetic and honest reading, the second movement in particular being given with fascinating grace and piquancy. The "Lear" overture was broadly and effectively interpreted. The work, however, seems to have aged since we last heard it. At the next concert will be given: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstuck, Weber; Symphony, D-minor, Schumann; Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt; "Rakoczy" March, Berlioz. Mr. F. Busoni is the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 21, 1894.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last evening was: Bach suite No. 2, in B minor, seven movements; Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," in C minor; Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, symphony No. 3, in A minor, and Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," in C major. The programme was a rather interesting one, which appealed to one's judgment and intellect rather than to the fancy.

Bach suite No. 2 is a stately and dignified composition, which was read in a scholarly and intelligent manner, the seventh movement, a dainty minuet, being particularly pleasing. Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan" is a most passionate composition, and was rendered in a magnificent manner. Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3, "Scotch," was very pleasing, the Scottish style being very marked through the piece.

Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" is exceedingly dramatic in character, and was read in a brilliant and powerful manner. The audience was large, and, while appre- ative, was not particularly demonstra-

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 22, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

After a dozen concerts presenting music in many different schools, and giving time for the conductor to become well acquainted with his men, one can form a tolerably accurate opinion of Mr. Paur and his merits and limitations, and the concert of Saturday seemed almost an object lesson in these. He is not a man who loses himself in the music, who has perfect abandon or bold caprice, and this may be recorded as one of his merits. He works loyally at the technique of the orchestra and does not despise routine work; the days of personal temperament in reading and ragged ensemble in performance are happily over. He is somewhat of a precisian, but he knows perfectly what he wants and is able to make his orchestra understand it. He is not afraid of a strong crescendo or a fortissimo, but more often attains loudness than breadth in such effects, as witness the blatancy of the noble theme of the coda in the finale of the Scotch symphony. In brief, it is certain that the orchestra is again on the up track, and the new conductor has been a decided gain to the organization.

Bach's suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, began the programme. It was carefully read and the balance of parts was perfect, but, after all, this vein of performance by a great modern orchestra gives but a slight idea of the quiet intention of the old composer, who would have been well-content to have such a suite given by less than a score of performers. A very small orchestra in Burnstead Hall would come nearer to the composer's original ideal. The succession of movements all in the same key, is not an advantage; it was however a point of tonality on which all the old composers insisted, probably on account of the lute, which was very troublesome to retune, and therefore was given its suite movements in a single key, a custom afterwards extended to the orchestra. The work presented Bach in his most melodic and least intricate side; the stately Sarabande was full of appropriate dignity; Bach seems to have appreciated this old Spanish religious dance (it was formerly danced in the cathedrals in Spain on Holy Thursday) and gives some of his most modern effects in this form. The Polonaise was charmingly played and brought the auditor much nearer to the old processional style of the lofty dance than the fiery effusions of Liszt or Chopin can do. The double, or variation, gave good opportunities for the flute, and Mr. Mole played the elaboration of the theme excellently. Altogether the contrasts of style made amends for the lack of contrasts in key.

The Coriolanus overture was not only one of the best bits of Beethoven reading that has recently been heard in Boston, but the ensemble of the orchestra was something to lavish laudatory adjectives upon. Then came the Scotch symphony, by far the most inspired and the most effective of Mendelssohn's symphonies. There was something of over-boldness in the reading of the chief theme of the first movement, but the performance of the coda with its weird chromatics and great crescendos was most impressive. The spectral touches of clarinette in deepest register (chalumeau), were a novelty when Mendelssohn wrote them. Although Mozart had done much for the instrument before this time, it was Mendelssohn and Weber who first discovered the full powers of the noble instrument. In this symphony the clarinette has very much to do (especially in the Scherzo), and its work was excellently done on this occasion.

Mendelssohn caught the spirit of the Scherzo better than any other composer, and this is his best Scherzo. Not only is it symmetrical and melodious, but it is emphatically Scotch without plagiarizing any national tune. In this again Mendelssohn stands paramount; Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch and a host of other masters have endeavored to represent the Scotch style in some of their music, yet none but Mendelssohn has entirely succeeded. The Scotch flavor is in every movement (least in the third), but it dominates everything in this Scherzo. If Dvorak had succeeded in giving a tenth part as much national flavor to his American symphony it might have been classed as a typically native work. The poetic beauty of the third movement, (not unlike in shape to the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony) was done full justice to by violins and cellos. Then came the Ossianic power of the finale. There was a bold, fierce style in the performance of the chief theme which suited the subject well, and the pensive charm of the counter-theme was well preserved; only in the coda was there more noise than breadth. Such a symphony shows that the ultra-modern reviewers have been celebrating the obliteration of Mendelssohn a few centuries too soon.

Berlioz's "King Lear" overture did not sound well (although splendidly played) after the clearness of the symphony; it seemed spasmodic, forced and artificial. One could imagine almost anything in the alternate wailings and thunderings, in the wild rushes to nowhere in particular, and the sudden pauses and syncopations. Berlioz achieved something really great in his interpretation of the balcony scene from "Romeo and Juliet," but as a general thing Shakespeare strained through a French mind is unsatisfactory, whether the result is given in tones or in Gallic rhymes. It was a great technical triumph for the orchestra to overcome the difficulties which abound in the work, but beyond this it seemed but a severe attack of musical hysteria.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

HERR PAUR HAPPY

IN HIS NEW JAMAICA PLAIN HOME.

The Symphony Orchestra's Leader a Most Courteous and Agreeable Man to Meet—How His English Grows—He Has Two Boys in the Roxbury Latin School.

I spent a very pleasant half hour with Emil Paur, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon. Herr Paur lives at 28 Burroughs st., Jamaica Plain, in a comfortable looking, spacious two and a half story frame house, a plain structure without any modern architectural frills, in the centre of a large yard. There is plenty of breathing space here, and it is in one of the prettiest parts of this charming suburban district, just off [illegible] He has lived in Boston but a few months, but he is delighted with his new home and with America and has no desire to exchange them for Leipsic, where he made the reputation that was the cause of his being sought after as the successor of Arthur Nikisch.

The house is modestly furnished, and when I was ushered into what was constructed as the parlor to the left of the hallway, I found the famous director seated before a grand piano rendering a solo that would have filled Music Hall. The other furniture in the room bespoke the man's profession, for, besides the piano, there was an organ, and a cabinet of books and musical compositions, while a violin case was conspicuous on the floor beneath the piano. Sheets of music were scattered about everywhere. Marble busts of Mozart and Beethoven occupied stands in two of the corners, and from one of them depended a great collection of white satin sashes of honor which have been bestowed on Herr Paur for his achievements on numerous notable occasions abroad. On the walls are two framed souvenirs which their owner justly prizes very highly, bits of autograph compositions by Beethoven and portraits of the great musical masters.

Herr Paur was very cordial as he turned and rose to greet his visitor. He wore a plain gray house jacket closely buttoned up beneath his shaggy, sandy beard and his heavy head of hair tumbled down over his forehead in a truly artistic fashion. Altogether the director of the first orchestra in the country has a very agreeably Bohemian, distingué appearance. He is very interesting to talk with, perhaps not less so because his mastery of English is not quite complete yet, so that the interviewer has to help him out occasionally by suggesting the word he wishes to use.

His inability to speak English fluently, in fact, he used at first as an apology for not expressing himself more freely, but he has made great progress since coming to Boston, when he could not speak a word of our language. He has a teacher, he says, who comes once or twice a week, and the pupil seems to think it a great joke that a man grown should be obliged to learn the rudiments of the language just as a child would do.

Herr Paur has two boys, Hans, aged 11, and Kurt, aged 9. "One of them," said the father, "is in the Roxbury Latin School and the other goes to the grammar school. Oh, they can talk English very well! Sometimes they correct me," and the speaker smiled mischievously.

"Are you going to make musicians of them?"

"Oh, no! They do not like it. They are—what you call it?—so impudent!" This was not just the word Herr Paur wanted, but his eyes twinkled and he laughed as if he had got somewhere near the idea he wished to express, at any rate.

"Well, how do you like Boston, now that you have got acquainted with it?" I asked.

"I am delighted with it, and I like Jamaica Plain so much. But I have not gone about much, nor got acquainted with many people. I have not gone into what you call society. I have no time. I spend all my time at home in study. But the Art Club, that is very nice, isn't it?"

"Do you not take any exercise at all?"

"No, I am not so fond of sports, though I like to walk in the garden in the summer time and play billiards," with the accent strong on the last syllable.

Herr Paur is enjoying in anticipation the new music hall, the plans of which he heartily approves, and rejoices in the prospect of getting into the splendid structure which he hopes will be ready next Nov. It is to be a vast improvement over the old music hall, though he grows enthusiastic over the acoustic properties of the latter.

"It is the best in this country that I have seen," he says, "though the hall in Philadelphia is very good. That in New York is bad. I did not like it at all."

He has not heard the New York Symphony and naïvely inquired if that were a good orchestra. Then he was asked how the Boston Symphony compared with the orchestras of Europe. He became interested at once and replied frankly, with a sort of unconcious mingling of enthusiasm and modesty:—

"Oh, there is nothing like our orchestra, nothing in the world, not in Berlin or Vienna or anywhere!" and he laughed as much as to imply "What else could you expect me to say?"

"How about Strauss?" I suggested.

"Ugh! Strauss!" and Herr Paur held up one hand deprecatingly, as if Strauss were not to be considered in the category of musicians for a moment, much less be mentioned in the same breath with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Strauss! Strauss!" he exclaimed. "That is worse yet. He cannot play the classical music at all!"

Herr Paur has not been West yet. He expects to take the symphony orchestra to Chicago, however, in May for a three weeks' sojourn, where they will play nightly.

He has found Boston a different place from Leipsic, though the fact that he followed Nikisch here took the edge off the strangeness for he was with the latter in Germany four years before coming here. "It was all Nikisch in Leipsic," says he, "and it was the same in Boston."

He has noted a great difference in the temperature here from that to which he has been accustomed, and he has been surprised at the frequent changes in the weather during the winter season, which in Leipsic remains uniformly cold. But he has enjoyed excellent health, he declares, since coming to America, his relations with the orchestra of which he is the director have been harmonious and pleasant, and he is happy. He is certainly a most agreeable man to meet.

[77]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall:

Suite No. 2, B minor, for string orchestra and flutes..Bach
Overture, "Coriolan".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

It is a doubtful experiment to bring out in modern concert halls the orchestral music of Sebastian Bach. This just man passed his life in writing counterpoint, and his works are many. In his compositions for the organ, in his well-tempered clavichord and in some of his choral music he reached sublime heights; but, incredibly industrious he wrote much that served the passing occasion and now is only of interest to the student. To fall down and worship any page that bears his name is rank fetichism; and yet much that is absolutely stupid from the purely musical standpoint is accepted by blind devotees as the work of inspiration. Now in the suite played last evening how much was there that was honestly enjoyed by the hearers? I am not denying the supreme excellence of the workmanship, but is there not an absence of genuine musical beauty in some of the numbers of this suite? There are fugues in the "Well Tempered Clavichord," short as they are, that are worth the whole of such bewigged compositions for strings and flutes. There are charming passages in this very suite, but as a whole the work seemed monotonous.

The program book contained a learned note on the Sarabande, and the conclusion drawn from the note is that the characteristic of the dance was a certain stateliness. Now originally the Sarabande, as known in Spain, was a voluptuous dance, so voluptuous that the priests thundered against it from the pulpit. When it was brought into France the Sarabande became a favorite. Ninon de l'Enclos danced it in the 17th century to the great delight of young men. Cardinal Richelieu did not disdain to beat out the steps and flourish in gestures that he might attract the attention of Anne of Austria. And it was Yveteaux, who, at the age of 80 years, asked for a Sarabande tune that his soul might slip away with greater ease.

***

After the labor of Bach, the family man, came the "Coriolan" overture, which was read in a frank, manly fashion and finely played. Indeed, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of a high order of excellence. The familiar symphony of Mendelssohn gave pleasure and it was read most sympathetically by Mr. Paur.

***

The overture, "King Lear," has not been played at a Symphony concert since the spring of '87. Certain admirers of Berlioz claim that this overture is the greatest of his purely orchestral compositions. I cannot agree with these admirers.

To me this musical version of "King Lear" is not only inadequate from the purely imaginative standpoint; it is not of marked musical interest either in thematic treatment or in instrumentation. Let it be granted that the "Cordelia theme," so called, has a pathetic tenderness and a modest, shrinking beauty; but in this overture there is not the volcanic passion of the old man Lear. The recitative-like opening phrase seems without real meaning, without genuine power. And there is no overwhelming burst of orchestral fury that paints or even suggests the crazed King defying the elements.

Music has its limitations. It is not interchangeable with passionate poetry or with such sonorous prose as that dreamed by the Opium Eater, or with an immortal painting, or with the view of the awful glacier track. This music of Berlioz, when all has been said in its praise, and you take it at its highest valuation, sinks far below the famous pages written by Victor Hugo in his admiration—say, rather, in his worship—of "King Lear."

And yet many have written music suggested by this tragedy. There are operas by Gobati (1881), Reynaud (1888), Sém éladis (1854) and Solowiew (1885). There is incidental music to the tragedy by André (1778), von Blumenthal (1828) and J. L. Hatton (1858). There are the overtures by Berlioz (1831), Leidgebel (1851) and Balakireff (about 1865).

This overture by Balakireff, the Russian, is said to be a remarkable work. Its "Cordelia theme" is said to be of exquisite beauty; the "Lear theme" is "grand and simple," and the instrumentation is of "great discretion and classic accuracy." Shall we ever hear this overture in a Symphony concert?

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 21, 1894.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Echoes from the Twelfth Symphony Program—Sunday Musical Offerings—Notes.

The 12th symphony concert at Music hall began with Bach's suite in B minor for strings and flutes, and late comers were obliged to wait in the lobby nearly half an hour until the seven numbers comprising the composition were finished before they could gain admission to the hall, conductor Paur evidently not wishing to mar the performance of the delicate work by the bustle and confusion of belated ones. The unfortunates missed a delightful interpretation of the dainty composition which, beginning with a stately introduction, impressively performed by Mr Paur's men, leads up to the free and livelier rondeau and dance measures of the sarabande, bourree, polonaise and minuet. The work of the strings and flute calls for high commendation. In the fourth movement and the finale of the fifth the flute phrasing was specially effective.

Mendelssohn's famous and familiar "Scotch" symphony was finely played. Probably it never has had a more artistic or smoother performance in this city. The wealth of minor details was not overshadowed by the broad treatment of the fortissimo passages, and the development of themes by the different contingents was refreshingly crisp and harmonious.

The second movement, with its merry bagpipe dance, was a capital illustration of musical humor, which brought smiles to the faces of the men and the conductor as well as to the auditors. The spontaneous applause which greeted this number evidenced the hearty appreciation of the audience.

Beethoven's passionate "Coriolan" overture was given with due regard to its dramatic character, and the Berlioz overture to "King Lear," which closed the concert, was also played with the proper stormy effects. The program this week will be as follows: "Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Weber, concerstuck; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody; Berlioz, Rakoczy march. Mr F. Busoni will be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XOV. NO. 21.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 21, 1894.

The Symphony Concert —

With Bach at the top, Berlioz at the bottom and Mendelssohn and Beethoven for the filling, there was no lack of variety in last evening's Symphony concert programme. The new director, Emil Paur, is somewhat uneven in his success at programme making, but upon this occasion he succeeded in arranging a list of works which appealed with equal success to many classes of music lovers.

The Bach suite No. 2 in B minor, for strings and flute, introduced the evening's selections, and its several short movements were played with splendid precision and taste under the baton of Mr. Paur. In the playing of the string section of the band it was manifest that the conductor has succeeded in bringing back to these players much of the precision which characterized their work under Herr Gericke, and at the same time retaining the freedom of the Nikisch regime. The grand body of tone given out by the strings told with great effect in the stronger movements of the suite, and there was a delicacy and refinement in the performance of the work which was very delightful. M. Mole, master of the flute that he is, has never done better work than on this occasion, and although there was something of monotony in the seven movements, they were at all times enjoyable and thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, made the next work on the list, and the dramatic characteristics of the composition were fairly brought out in its performance.

The symphony No. 3 of Mendelssohn (Scotch) made the principal feature of the programme, and the reading given this work, while being thoroughly conservative and in keeping with the traditions of its earlier performances here, was full of interest to even those to whom it was a familiar composition. The adagio was especially effective as played on this occasion, and the brilliant allegro vivacissimo was also a strikingly enjoyable portion of the symphony. The grand finale was played in the broad style that gave all its characteristics with splendid effect, and made a marked impression upon the audience.

The overture to "King Lear" by Berlioz ended this most admirally arranged programme, and in the performance of the series of tone pictures so grandly portrayed by the composer Mr. Paur displayed the abilities of his orchestra in a fine fashion. Altogether, the programme was decidedly one of the best of the season.

Next week Mr. F. Busoni, the pianist, will be the soloist, and will play the Weber concertstuck and Liszt's Spanish rhapsodie. The programme will also include the "Euryanthe" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony and the Rakoczy march.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 21.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, were: Suite in B-minor, for string orchestra and flute, Bach; overture, "Coriolan," Beethoven; Symphony No. 3, (Scotch) Mendelssohn; Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz. The Bach Suite is very interesting but a steady half hour of B-minor makes a severe trial of one's musical orthodoxy, especially in an era when even the merest tyro of an ambitious song writer thinks it crassly conventional to remain in his original key after the second bar of his tune. The suite was beautifully played; in fact, the whole programme was given in a perfect manner. The orchestra was never in a more perfect condition, even under Mr. Gericke. The mischief that Mr. Nikisch worked with it has been wholly remedied, and its playing is always satisfying and delightful. It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven overture again, freed from the sickly sentimental affectations that the late conductor foisted on it. The reading was dramatic, without exaggeration, and was brilliant, dignified and finely colored. There was no attempt to make the music say more than it said plainly and clearly. The symphony received a clean cut, sympathetic and honest reading, the second movement in particular being given with fascinating grace and piquancy. The "Lear" overture was broadly and effectively interpreted. The work, however, seems to have aged since we last heard it. At the next concert will be given: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstuck, Weber; Symphony, D-minor, Schumann; Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt; "Rakoczy" March, Berlioz. Mr. F. Busoni is the soloist.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 21, 1894.

The programme of the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last evening was: Bach suite No. 2, in B minor, seven movements; Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," in C minor; Mendelssohn-Barthoidy, symphony No. 3, in A minor, and Berlioz's overture to "King Lear," in C major. The programme was a rather interesting one, which appealed to one's judgment and intellect rather than to the fancy.

Bach suite No. 2 is a stately and dignified composition, which was read in a scholarly and intelligent manner, the seventh movement, a dainty minuet, being particularly pleasing. Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan" is a most passionate composition, and was rendered in a magnificent manner. Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3, "Scotch," was very pleasing, the Scottish style being very marked through the piece.

Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" is exceedingly dramatic in character, and was read in a brilliant and powerful manner. The audience was large, and, while appreciative, was not particularly demonstra-

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 22, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

After a dozen concerts presenting music in many different schools, and giving time for the conductor to become well acquainted with his men, one can form a tolerably accurate opinion of Mr. Paur and his merits and limitations, and the concert of Saturday seemed almost an object lesson in these. He is not a man who loses himself in the music, who has perfect abandon or bold caprice, and this may be recorded as one of his merits. He works loyally at the technique of the orchestra and does not despise routine work; the days of personal temperament in reading and ragged ensemble in performance are happily over. He is somewhat of a precisian, but he knows perfectly what he wants and is able to make his orchestra understand it. He is not afraid of a strong crescendo or a fortissimo, but more often attains loudness than breadth in such effects, as witness the blatancy of the noble theme of the coda in the finale of the Scotch symphony. In brief, it is certain that the orchestra is again on the up track, and the new conductor has been a decided gain to the organization.

Bach's suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, began the programme. It was carefully read and the balance of parts was perfect, but, after all, this vein of performance by a great modern orchestra gives but a slight idea of the quiet intention of the old composer, who would have been well-content to have such a suite given by less than a score of performers. A very small orchestra in Bumstead Hall would come nearer to the composer's original ideal. The succession of movements all in the same key, is not an advantage; it was however a point of tonality on which all the old composers insisted, probably on account of the lute, which was very troublesome to retune, and therefore was given its suite movements in a single key, a custom afterwards extended to the orchestra. The work presented Bach in his most melodic and least intricate side; the stately Sarabande was full of appropriate dignity; Bach seems to have appreciated this old Spanish religious dance (it was formerly danced in the cathedrals in Spain on Holy Thursday) and gives some of his most modern effects in this form. The Polonaise was charmingly played and brought the auditor much nearer to the old processional style of the lofty dance than the fiery effusions of Liszt or Chopin can do. The double, or variation, gave good opportunities for the flute, and Mr. Mole played the elaboration of the theme excellently. Altogether the contrasts of style made amends for the lack of contrasts in key.

The Coriolanus overture was not only one of the best bits of Beethoven reading that has recently been heard in Boston, but the ensemble of the orchestra was something to lavish laudatory adjectives upon. Then came the Scotch symphony, by far the most inspired and the most effective of Mendelssohn's symphonies. There was something of over-boldness in the reading of the chief theme of the first movement, but the performance of the coda with its weird chromatics and great crescendos was most impressive. The spectral touches of clarinette in deepest register (chalumeau), were a novelty when Mendelssohn wrote them. Although Mozart had done much for the instrument before this time, it was Mendelssohn and Weber who first discovered the full powers of the noble instrument. In this symphony the clarinette has very much to do (especially in the Scherzo), and its work was excellently done on this occasion.

Mendelssohn caught the spirit of the Scherzo better than any other composer, and this is his best Scherzo. Not only is it symmetrical and melodious, but it is emphatically Scotch without plagiarizing any national tune. In this again Mendelssohn stands paramount; Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch and a host of other masters have endeavored to represent the Scotch style in some of their music, yet none but Mendelssohn has entirely succeeded. The Scotch flavor is in every movement (least in the third), but it dominates everything in this Scherzo. If Dvorak had succeeded in giving a tenth part as much national flavor to his American symphony it might have been classed as a typically native work. The poetic beauty of the third movement, (not unlike in shape to the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony) was done full justice to by violins and cellos. Then came the Ossianic power of the finale. There was a bold, fierce style in the performance of the chief theme which suited the subject well, and the pensive charm of the counter-theme was well preserved; only in the coda was there more noise than breadth. Such a symphony shows that the ultra-modern reviewers have been celebrating the obliteration of Mendelssohn a few centuries too soon.

Berlioz's "King Lear" overture did not sound well (although splendidly played) after the clearness of the symphony; it seemed spasmodic, forced and artificial. One could imagine almost anything in the alternate wailings and thunderings, in the wild rushes to nowhere in particular, and the sudden pauses and syncopations. Berlioz achieved something really great in his interpretation of the balcony scene from "Romeo and Juliet," but as a general thing Shakespeare strained through a French mind is unsatisfactory, whether the result is given in tones or in Gallic rhymes. It was a great technical triumph for the orchestra to overcome the difficulties which abound in the work, but beyond this it seemed but a severe attack of musical hysteria.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

HERR PAUR HAPPY

IN HIS NEW JAMAICA PLAIN HOME.

The Symphony Orchestra's Leader a Most Courteous and Agreeable Man to Meet—How His English Grows—He Has Two Boys in the Roxbury Latin School.

I spent a very pleasant half hour with Emil Paur, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon. Herr Paur lives at 28 Burroughs st., Jamaica Plain, in a comfortable looking, spacious two and a half story frame house, a plain structure without any modern architectural frills, in the centre of a large yard. There is plenty of breathing space here, and it is in one of the prettiest parts of this charming suburban districts, just off Centre st. and not far from the beautiful Jamaica Pond. And Herr Paur likes it.

He has lived in Boston but a few months, but he is delighted with his new home and with America and has no desire to exchange them for Leipsic, where he made the reputation that was the cause of his being sought after as the successor of Arthur Nikisch.

The house is modestly furnished, and when I was ushered into what was constructed as the parlor to the left of the hallway, I found the famous director seated before a grand piano rendering a solo that would have filled Music Hall. The other furniture in the room bespoke the man's profession, for, besides the piano, there was an organ, and a cabinet of books and musical compositions, while a violin case was conspicuous on the floor beneath the piano. Sheets of music were scattered about everywhere. Marble busts of Mozart and Beethoven occupied stands in two of the corners, and from one of them depended a great collection of white satin sashes of honor which have been bestowed on Herr Paur for his achievements on numerous notable occasions abroad. On the walls are two framed souvenirs which their owner justly prizes very highly, bits of autograph compositions by Beethoven and portraits of the great musical masters.

Herr Paur was very cordial as he turned and rose to greet his visitor. He wore a plain gray house jacket closely buttoned up beneath his shaggy, sandy beard and his heavy head of hair tumbled down over his forehead in a truly artistic fashion. Altogether the director of the first orchestra in the country has a very agreeably Bohemian, distingué appearance. He is very interesting to talk with, perhaps not less so because his mastery of English is not quite complete yet, so that the interviewer has to help him out occasionally by suggesting the word he wishes to use.

His inability to speak English fluently, in fact, he used at first as an apology for not expressing himself more freely, but he has made great progress since coming to Boston, when he could not speak a word of our language. He has a teacher, he says, who comes once or twice a week, and the pupil seems to think it a great joke that a man grown should be obliged to learn the rudiments of the language just as a child would do.

Herr Paur has two boys, Hans, aged 11, and Kurt, aged 9. "One of them," said the father, "is in the Roxbury Latin School and the other goes to the grammar school. Oh, they can talk English very well! Sometimes they correct me," and the speaker smiled mischievously.

"Are you going to make musicians of them?"

"Oh, no! They do not like it. They are—what you call it?—so impudent!" This was not just the word Herr Paur wanted, but his eyes twinkled and he laughed as if he had got somewhere near the idea he wished to express, at any rate.

"Well, how do you like Boston, now that you have got acquainted with it?" I asked.

"I am delighted with it, and I like Jamaica Plain so much. But I have not gone about much, nor got acquainted with many people. I have not gone into what you call society. I have no time. I spend all my time at home in study. But the Art Club, that is very nice, isn't it?"

"Do you not take any exercise at all?"

"No, I am not so fond of sports, though I like to walk in the garden in the summer time and play billiards," with the accent strong on the last syllable.

Herr Paur is enjoying in anticipation the new music hall, the plans of which he heartily approves, and rejoices in the prospect of getting into the splendid structure which he hopes will be ready next Nov. It is to be a vast improvement over the old music hall, though he grows enthusiastic over the acoustic properties of the latter.

"It is the best in this country that I have seen," he says, "though the hall in Philadelphia is very good. That in New York is bad. I did not like it at all."

He has not heard the New York Symphony and naïvely inquired if that were a good orchestra. Then he was asked how the Boston Symphony compared with the orchestras of Europe. He became interested at once and replied frankly, with a sort of unconcious mingling of enthusiasm and modesty:—

"Oh, there is nothing like our orchestra, nothing in the world, not in Berlin or Vienna or anywhere!" and he laughed as much as to imply "What else could you expect me to say?"

"How about Strauss?" I suggested.

"Ugh! Strauss!" and Herr Paur held up one hand deprecatingly, as if Strauss were not to be considered in the category of musicians for a moment, much less be mentioned in the same breath with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Strauss! Strauss!" he exclaimed. "That is worse yet. He cannot play the classical music at all!"

Herr Paur has not been West yet. He expects to take the symphony orchestra to Chicago, however, in May for a three weeks' sojourn, where they will play nightly.

He has found Boston a different place from Leipsic, though the fact that he followed Nikisch here took the edge off the strangeness for he was with the latter in Germany four years before coming here. "It was all Nikisch in Leipsic," says he, "and it was the same in Boston."

He has noted a great difference in the temperature here from that to which he has been accustomed, and he has been surprised at the frequent changes in the weather during the winter season, which in Leipsic remains uniformly cold. But he has enjoyed excellent health, he declares, since coming to America, his relations with the orchestra of which he is the director have been harmonious and pleasant, and he is happy. He is certainly a most agreeable man to meet.

[77]

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1894.

Boston's New Music Hall.

OUR STAFF CORRESPONDENT EXAMINES THE MODEL.

Matters are coming to a focus over the proposed structure. Let us hope it will have some other name, for Music Hall conveys a wholly wrong impression to outside ears, Britishers taking it for a pothouse musical, and Frenchmen for a cafe chantant. For one I hope it will not be erected on the proposed site, at the junction of Chester Park and Huntington Avenue. So long as City Hall, Statehouse, Courthouse, Public Library, Common, theatres, public garden, newspaper offices, business hotels, piano houses are in the old centre of the city, so long ought our great concert hall to be in that centre, not on one side, where it is chiefly accessible only to one section of the city and its suburbs. The one great site in Boston for hall or theatre is the five-sided lot on Park Square, opposite the Providence Depot, a spot near so many steam, horse, and electric lines, and easily approachable by all the others, especially when our proposed subway, alongside the Common, comes into being. There the hall could be visible from afar, have several fronts and many doors, and a grand square for carriages, with no narrow streets to bother, a better place than the Paris Operahouse enjoys. Another good place for a new hall would be the old Public Library, soon to pass out of use. That, however, would not do for the model now on exhibition in the unfinished new Public Library on Copley Square,—the plaster model of the design by McKim, Mead & White. Though not large enough for a visitor to stand and walk about inside, the model is several feet square, and you stand underneath it, with your head in the centre of the main floor,—pit, if you choose to call it so.

The style is Greek. From the stage the floor slopes upward to the four parquet entrances, raised some 20 steps from the street. Around this parquet extends the amphitheatre, accessible by stairways beneath itself, where also is a surrounding corridor, to contain toilet rooms, foyer, and all sorts of offices. The model is covered with cloth, and of the outside no very definite idea can yet be formed. There would be seats, every one commanding a clear view of the stage, for 2,500 people, 500 more than our old Music Hall uncomfortably accommodates. The plan proposes a length of 150 feet from hall doors to the rear of the platform, with a width of 143 feet, and a height of 83, from the lowest part of the floor to the centre of the domed ceiling. There is no second balcony. The stage is arranged in ascending tiers, which would enable any conductor to group orchestra or chorus, 350 in number, in any way he would. Here and there are points for an Orpheus, and other statues. The descriptions refer to baignores, or close boxes beneath the amphitheatre; but these do not appear in the model, nor do they seem in accord with its outlines.

There is some question whether resident architects ought not to try their hands at others, before this New York model is accepted; but just now it recalls a certain apple, called the Seek-no-further.

For the privilege of inspecting this model I am indebted to Mr. Walters, who has charge of building the new Public Library, in whose Catalogue Room the model is exhibited.

[78]

[illegible], JAN. [illegible], 1894.

NO PANIC THERE.

Timely Find of Fire in Music Hall.

People Sat Silent While the Firemen Worked.

Flames Discovered as the Crowd Entered.

Prompt Efforts Saved the Great Structure.

In Half an Hour the Services Were Under Way.

The coolness and courage which are sometimes characteristic of a gathering of men and women in trying moments were given commendable illustration yesterday afternoon in Music hall. In consequence, a fire that for a moment looked serious was quickly subdued, and a panic that would possibly have resulted in loss of life was happily averted.

It was almost 2.30, and the hall was rapidly filling up with people to attend and participate in the grand service of music and song which was to commence half an hour later.

There were about 300 people in the hall at the time, and the steady stream of humanity was growing larger as the hour approached for the beginning of the services.

There was no thought of possible danger in the minds of those who were assembled there. There was no sound save the subdued whispers of the ushers as they showed the newcomers to their seats. The grand old hall, home of melody and scene of the triumphs of some of the world's greatest singers, was a picture of repose in keeping with the occasion.

There was a sudden cry of fire, and for a moment the people in the hall looked startled and glanced around them hurriedly in expectation of seeing the flames burst forth from some part of the hall.

Soon a tiny cloud of smoke became visible up in the right-hand corner of the upper balcony, but it did not emanate from the hall itself.

Some of the people sitting in that corner started up to investigate, and found that a brisk blaze was raging in a small closet on the third floor over the Tremont st entrance and just outside the balcony entrance to the hall.

The fire got quite a start when discovered, and the flames were licking the walls and woodwork.

In an Alarming Manner.

A sailor, in regulation costume and with his coat on his arm, was one of the first to see the fire, and afterward said that if he had had a pail of water there he could easily have extinguished it, but there was no fire apparatus at hand, and Henry S. Porter, who was standing near, hurried down to Tremont st and turned in an alarm from box 42.

It was but a few minutes until the arrival of the firemen, some of whom at first thought that the fire was in the hall itself. They were told that there were 300 people there, and they needed no further incentive to prompt work.

In almost less time than it takes to tell it there were several lines of hose laid through the corridors of the building, a chemical engine being the first to send up a line.

With an energy and promptness that were creditable they soon had two streams turned on the burning closet, and so far as the fire was concerned the excitement was over. The fire was out in less than 20 minutes.

And the congregation?

Whether it was from a vague knowledge of the real extent of the fire, and a feeling that there was no immediate danger, or utter indifference on their part, is uncertain, but it is a fact that comparatively few people left their seats, and those who did go passed out quietly as if nothing had happened.

While the few people on the third floor were trying to keep the fire within the limits of the closet, before the firemen came, while the firemen were laying the hose and fighting back the flames, the greater part of the congregation

Sat Perfectly Still,

although keeping a watchful eye on the corner in which the closet was located.

The door leading to the balcony seats cut off the view considerably, but the uncertainty of what was going on behind them seemed to cause no uneasiness. There was no excitement in the hall itself, no attempt to exaggerate, and in consequence no panic.

In fact, after the first brief wave of excitement had passed away people began to enter again, and in a little over half an hour after the fire started the hall was crowded with worshippers, and services had commenced, although the firemen had not yet finished their labors.

The closet burned was a small affair used for the storage of old furniture, etc. Its peculiar position made it rather difficult to reach, for the hose had to be carried up over winding stairways and through narrow passages.

Not only was the interior of the closet burned, but the fire broke through the walls, floor and ceiling, and burned considerable of the woodwork of the surrounding stairways. The damage, it is believed,

Will Not Exceed $600.

The cause of the fire is uncertain. It may have started from spontaneous combustion, and at present this seems the only plausible theory.

The door of the closet was unlocked the greater part of the time, so that there was free access to it.

Although considerable of the property was gotten out of the room by the firemen it was all more or less damaged.

None of the occupants of the building were affected except in one or two instances by a little water damage. As a precaution a large part of the books in the Boston Symphony library on the second floor were removed to a place of safety during the fire and the precaution proved a wise one, as considerable water came through into the room.

During the fire and its attendant excitement crowds of people surrounded the building on the Warren and Tremont st sides. The stops of the Tremont st cars were crowded with humanity, for the fire being in that direction was hurried spread rapidly. It was but a few moments to find out the true condition of things, and the crowd

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twelfth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Bach: Suite No. 2, in B minor, for strings and flute.
Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolan," Opus 62.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"). Opus 56.
Berlioz: Overture to "Le Roi Léar," Opus 4.

It is so good to hear almost anything by Sebastian Bach that, when one of his works figures on a programme, one inclines somewhat to take it as a gift horse, not to be looked in the mouth. Yet there are considerations which should not quite be passed over in silence. A whole suite by Bach, whether for pianoforte or orchestra, is a pretty large dose to take at once. With all that is great and immortal in the master's works, there are also things in them which time and the development of music since his day have thrown into obsolescence; and even the sincerest Bach lover, perhaps he more than anyone else, ought to wish these things wholly obsolete, buried for good and all. We should not forget one important element in the relations between his music and the public—the enormous leisureliness of life, both social and artistic, in his day, compared with the push and bustle of our modern life. His was the time when people could stand, and were glad to enjoy, huge doses of one and the same thing; they had time and to spare, and no doubt a good deal of it lay heavy on their hands; the comparative absense of acute excitement from their lives made them proportionately impervious to boredom; two-hour sermons, well-nigh endless arias, suites of seven or eight numbers all in the same key, did not make them think of yawning. But we of today are otherwise constituted; we cannot well stand so much of the same thing at a sitting; our artistic sense craves more variety and contrast. We may take just as keen delight in a Bach aria as listeners did a hundred years ago; but enough is as good as a feast, and we resent that eternal Da capo, in which a long first part is repeated without variation. We cut down Bach's and Handel's Da capo nowadays to its smallest practicable limits, and with no injury either to the form or spirit of their airs.

In the same way, a suite of seven or eight pieces, connected together by no link of internal musical necessity, no one of them growing out of nor ideally developed from any of the others, and all of them in the same key—this sort of thing is a direct slap in the face, not only to our present musical habits, but to our highest and best musical instincts. It is the musical counterpart of the old two-hour sermon; we do not enjoy it. We remember one of the most ardent, whole-souled and enlightened Bach-lovers the world ever knew, saying one day that he "could imagine no more infernal bore than listening to the whole of a Bach suite at a sitting." And what a high-priest of the Bach-cult rejects as too much is hardly wholesome food for the musical public at large. Of the seven numbers composing the B minor suite Mr. Paur cut out the minuet (one page of full score); but he gave all the rest unflinchingly, and it certainly was too much of a good thing. Three numbers would have been enough.

Another consideration of unspeakable importance in the present case is the condition in which Bach left his scores. The continuo of the B minor suite is very elaborately figured all through, showing that every number was intended by the composer to have an organ or clavichord accompaniment. In some places an accompaniment in full harmony is absolutely indispensable; passages here and there in the fugue of the first movement, in the second bourrée and the whole double of the polonaise need to be filled out. The suite was given without any accompaniment whatever, the bare places above referred to sounding as unlike Bach as possible. Otherwise the plan on which the suite was given—with two and sometimes three flutes to counterbalance the large mass of strings—was excellent. The performance was in general rather rough and lacking in finish, at times vacillating; Mr. Molé played the flute solo in the double of the polonaise beautifully, but the effect of that duet between flute and basses, without any middle parts, was too bare to make the movement enjoyable.

"The "Coriolan" overture, too, was given without much real effectiveness, and not always quite clearly; those strong, nervous passages in dotted quarters and eighths where the violins and violas follow the 'celli and double basses at half a beat's distance, did not "register" exactly, as the chromo lithographers say, and did not give the ear the definite impression of groups of four eighth-notes.

The ever beautiful "Scotch" symphony was given very effectively indeed, if, like the rest of the programme, somewhat roughly; one seldom found in it that beauty of tone that comes legitimately from Mendelssohn's orchestration. But the tempi were, one and all, admirably taken and the performance full of fire and spirit.

Berlioz's "Roi Léar" overture missed fire almost completely; for one thing, the second theme—as also the second theme in the "Coriolan"—seemed to us taken decidedly too slow. Has the modern slow cantilena become so naturalized here that we are never to hear a passionate second theme again?

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe;" Weber, Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, opus 79; Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody, arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni; Berlioz, Rakóczy March, from "La Damnation de Faust." Mr. F. Busoni will be the pianist.

FIRE IN MUSIC HALL.

The Tremont Temple Congregation Dispersed Without Panic—A $5000 Fire on Pearl Street.

While the Tremont Temple society was holding services in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, fire was discovered back of the stage in a room on the third story, where scenery was stored. When first discovered there was quite a little blaze, but the flames did not gain much headway and were soon extinguished. The people in the hall at the time were not at all excited, and left without any disturbance. The probable damage to the building and contents will not exceed $1000. Fortunately the valuable library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was immediately under the burned room, was rescued by one of the men employed in the building before it was at all damaged by water. It is not known how the fire started.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I will like to add my suffrage to the [illegible] in last Thursday's Transcript [illegible] for a Music Hall lately shown at the new Public Library by Messrs. McKim, Mead & White.

My adverse opinion rests on three grounds, two practical, one æsthetic.

(1.) As I understand your correspondent to have stated, in any square music hall a large proportion of the audience will not hear orchestral or choral music as a unit. In an ideal room for this purpose there should be as few seats as possible which are much farther from one wing of the orchestra than from the other.

(2.) The amphitheatrical form of the seating is that of a hall for social and not artistic pleasures. If one is to hear music well the eyes must not be given too interesting employment.

(3.) The lines of the roof and proscenium arches are to my eye far from beautiful. They suggest that an attempt has here been made to roof over a type of building whose designers a people of very delicate artistic perceptions planned to be completely roofless. G.

Boston, Jan. 20, 1894.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1894.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

The Work of the Orchestra Evidences the Admirable Skill of the Director.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening in Music Hall. The following numbers were performed:

Suite No. 2, in B minor.....Bach
Overture to "Coriolan".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn
Overture to "King Lear".....Berlioz

This programme, which was quite in contrast to that of the preceding concert, was played with fine effect. The orchestra seems to have become rehabilitated under the admirable conducting of Mr. Paur. The loose, slovenly manner that was so dominant a feature under Mr. Nikisch, has entirely disappeared, and the work of the orchestra is fast approaching the precision and general excellence that made this superb body of musicians so famous under the conducting of that eminent leader, Wilhelm Gericke. The Bach suite, which gets really monotonous during the one half hour interval that it lasts in its performance, was finely rendered by the orchestra, its polyphony being brought out with remarkable clearness, while the character of each movement was well marked and a happy degree of contrast obtained, thereby producing all possible effect in the rendering. The tutti flute passages were played by three flutes in unison, and the solo passages were artistically rendered by Mr. Molé. The audience warmly applauded its performance.

There has never been heard a more noble and exalted interpretation of Beethoven in Music Hall than the playing of the "Coriolan" overture on this occasion. Mr. Paur's conception of Beethoven commands the highest praise. It is a good index of the purity of his taste, and is an indication of the depth of musical feeling that he possesses. Equally commendable was his reading of the Mendelssohn symphony.

Mr. Paur showed at a previous concert, when the "Romeo and Juliet" selection of Berlioz was given, that he was master of this great French composer's manner, and so one was prepared for a fine rendering of the "King Lear" overture on Saturday night, although the composition is not one of the better of its fanciful author's works.

The playing of this overture was a most excellent performance on the part of the orchestra, if we except the infernal pounding of the drums. But then, as Mr. Paur has now the orchestra in his grip, it is chargeable upon him that the drummer is allowed to create such a din.

Mr. Paur should also see to it that this Ajax of the sheepskins should have more regard for the normal diapason. In the "King Lear" overture the tympani has much important work to do, and it is as necessary that the drums should be correctly tuned as that the other instruments should be. But this disturber of the peace defied the directions of Berlioz, and instead of having his upper drum tuned to the pitch of C, had screwed it up to C sharp nearly, and oblivious to the discord he created, revelled in his herculean efforts.

Of course this fury and false intonation have ruled for the past three or four seasons, but then no matter how coarse the performance or how badly out of tune anything was, it never seemed to disturb Mr. Nikisch. We have, however, a more exalted idea of Mr. Paur's direction as well as his acuteness in the matter of correct musical pitch. If this percussion thunderbolt could hear the curses that are heaped upon his head he would modify his gymnastic exhibitions. Let him learn to tune his drums first, and then, Mr. Paur, please make him draw it milder, and thereby receive the blessing of a large number of listeners who cannot understand this incongruity upon your part, who otherwise are so sensitively musical, evidently. Yesterday's Courier administered a deserved rebuke to this pounding nuisance.

The concert next Saturday evening will present the following programme: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstuck, Weber; Symphony No. 4, Schumann; Spanish rhapsody, Liszt; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist will be Mr. F. Busoni. WARREN DAVENPORT.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1894.

Boston's New Music Hall.

OUR STAFF CORRESPONDENT EXAMINES THE MODEL.

Matters are coming to a focus over the proposed structure. Let us hope it will have some other name, for Music Hall conveys a wholly wrong impression to outside ears, Britishers taking it for a pothouse musical, and Frenchmen for a cafe chantant. For one I hope it will not be erected on the proposed site, at the junction of Chester Park and Huntington Avenue. So long as City Hall, Statehouse, Courthouse, Public Library, Common, theatres, public garden, newspaper offices, business hotels, piano houses are in the old centre of the city, so long ought our great concert hall to be in that centre, not on one side, where it is chiefly accessible only to one section of the city and its suburbs. The one great site in Boston for hall or theatre is the five-sided lot on Park Square, opposite the Providence Depot, a spot near so many steam, horse, and electric lines, and easily approachable by all the others, especially when our proposed subway, alongside the Common, comes into being. There the hall could be visible from afar, have several fronts and many doors, and a grand square for carriages, with no narrow streets to bother, a better place than the Paris Operahouse enjoys. Another good place for a new hall would be the old Public Library, soon to pass out of use. That, however, would not do for the model now on exhibition in the unfinished new Public Library on Copley Square,—the plaster model of the design by McKim, Mead & White. Though not large enough for a visitor to stand and walk about inside, the model is several feet square, and you stand underneath it, with your head in the centre of the main floor,—pit, if you choose to call it so.

The style is Greek. From the stage the floor slopes upward to the four parquet entrances, raised some 20 steps from the street. Around this parquet extends the amphitheatre, accessible by stairways beneath itself, where also is a surrounding corridor, to contain toilet rooms, foyer, and all sorts of offices. The model is covered with cloth, and of the outside no very definite idea can yet be formed. There would be seats, every one commanding a clear view of the stage, for 2,500 people, 500 more than our old Music Hall uncomfortably accommodates. The plan proposes a length of 150 feet from hall doors to the rear of the platform, with a width of 143 feet, and a height of 83, from the lowest part of the floor to the centre of the domed ceiling. There is no second balcony. The stage is arranged in ascending tiers, which would enable any conductor to group orchestra or chorus, 350 in number, in any way he would. Here and there are points for an Orpheus, and other statues. The descriptions refer to baignores, or close boxes beneath the amphitheatre; but these do not appear in the model, nor do they seem in accord with its outlines.

There is some question whether resident architects ought not to try their hands at others, before this New York model is accepted; but just now it recalls a certain apple, called the Seek-no-further.

For the privilege of inspecting this model I am indebted to Mr. Walters, who has charge of building the new Public Library, in whose Catalogue Room the model is exhibited.

[78]

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, JAN 22, 1894.

NO PANIC THERE.

Timely Find of Fire in Music Hall.

People Sat Silent While the Firemen Worked.

Flames Discovered as the Crowd Entered.

Prompt Efforts Saved the Great Structure.

In Half an Hour the Services Were Under Way.

The coolness and courage which are sometimes characteristic of a gathering of men and women in trying moments were given commendable illustration yesterday afternoon in Music hall. In consequence, a fire that for a moment looked serious was quickly subdued, and a panic that would possibly have resulted in loss of life was happily averted.

It was almost 2.30, and the hall was rapidly filling up with people to attend and participate in the grand service of music and song which was to commence half an hour later.

There were about 300 people in the hall at the time, and the steady stream of humanity was growing larger as the hour approached for the beginning of the services.

There was no thought of possible danger in the minds of those who were assembled there. There was no sound save the subdued whispers of the ushers as they showed the newcomers to their seats. The grand old hall, home of melody and scene of the triumphs of some of the world's greatest singers, was a picture of repose in keeping with the occasion.

There was a sudden cry of fire, and for a moment the people in the hall looked startled and glanced around them hurriedly in expectation of seeing the flames burst forth from some part of the hall.

Soon a tiny cloud of smoke became visible up in the right-hand corner of the upper balcony, but it did not emanate from the hall itself.

Some of the people sitting in that corner started up to investigate, and found that a brisk blaze was raging in a small closet on the third floor over the Tremont st entrance and just outside the balcony entrance to the hall.

The fire got quite a start when discovered, and the flames were licking the walls and woodwork

In an Alarming Manner.

A sailor, in regulation costume and with his coat on his arm, was one of the first to see the fire, and afterward said that if he had had a pail of water there he could easily have extinguished it, but there was no fire apparatus at hand, and Henry S. Porter, who was standing near, hurried down to Tremont st and turned in an alarm from box 42.

It was but a few minutes until the arrival of the firemen, some of whom at first thought that the fire was in the hall itself. They were told that there were 300 people there, and they needed no further incentive to prompt work.

In almost less time than it takes to tell it there were several lines of hose laid through the corridors of the building, a chemical engine being the first to send up a line.

With an energy and promptness that were creditable they soon had two streams turned on the burning closet, and so far as the fire was concerned the excitement was over. The fire was out in less than 20 minutes.

And the congregation?

Whether it was from a vague knowledge of the real extent of the fire, and a feeling that there was no immediate danger, or utter indifference on their part, is uncertain, but it is a fact that comparatively few people left their seats, and those who did go passed out quietly as if nothing had happened.

While the few people on the third floor were trying to keep the fire within the limits of the closet, before the firemen came, while the firemen were laying the hose and fighting back the flames, the greater part of the congregation

Sat Perfectly Still,

although keeping a watchful eye on the corner in which the closet was located.

The door leading to the balcony seats cut off the view considerably, but the uncertainty of what was going on behind them seemed to cause no uneasiness. There was no excitement in the hall itself, no attempt to exaggerate, and in consequence no panic.

In fact, after the first brief wave of excitement had passed away people began to enter again, and in a little over half an hour after the fire started the hall was crowded with worshippers, and services had commenced, although the firemen had not yet finished their labors.

The closet burned was a small affair used for the storage of old furniture, etc. Its peculiar position made it rather difficult to reach, for the hose had to be carried up over winding stairways and through narrow passages.

Not only was the interior of the closet burned, but the fire broke through the walls, floor and ceiling, and burned considerable of the woodwork of the surrounding stairways. The damage, it is believed

Will Not Exceed $600.

The cause of the fire is uncertain. It may have started from spontaneous combustion, and at present this seems the only plausible theory.

The door of the closet was unlocked the greater part of the time, so that there was free access to it.

Although considerable of the property was gotten out of the room by the firemen it was all more or less damaged.

None of the occupants of the building were affected except in one or two instances by a little water damage. As a precaution a large part of the books in the Boston Symphony library on the second floor were removed to a place of safety during the fire and the precaution proved a wise one, as considerable water came through into the rooms.

During the fire and its attendant excitement crowds of people surrounded the building on the Winter and Tremont st sides. The steps of the Park st church were packed with humanity, for the rumor that Music hall was burning spread rapidly. It took but a few moments to find out the actual condition of things, and the crowd went its way.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twelfth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Bach: Suite No. 2, in B minor, for strings and flute.
Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolan," Opus 62.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"), Opus 56.
Berlioz: Overture to "Le Roi Léar," Opus 4.

It is so good to hear almost anything by Sebastian Bach that, when one of his works figures on a programme, one inclines somewhat to take it as a gift horse, not to be looked in the mouth. Yet there are considerations which should not quite be passed over in silence. A whole suite by Bach, whether for pianoforte or orchestra, is a pretty large dose to take at once. With all that is great and immortal in the master's works, there are also things in them which time and the development of music since his day have thrown into obsolescence; and even the sincerest Bach lover, perhaps he more than anyone else, ought to wish these things wholly obsolete, buried for good and all. We should not forget one important element in the relations between his music and the public—the enormous leisureliness of life, both social and artistic, in his day, compared with the push and bustle of our modern life. His was the time when people could stand, and were glad to enjoy, huge doses of one and the same thing; they had time and to spare, and no doubt a good deal of it lay heavy on their hands; the comparative absense of acute excitement from their lives made them pro portionately impervious to boredom; two-hour sermous, well-nigh endless arias, suites of seven or eight numbers all in the same key, did not make them think of yawning. But we of today are otherwise constituted; we cannot well stand so much of the same thing at a sitting; our artistic sense craves more variety and contrast. We may take just as keen delight in a Bach aria as listeners did a hundred years ago; but enough is as good as a feast, and we resent that eternal Da capo, in which a long first part is repeated without variation. We cut down Bach's and Handel's Da capo nowadays to its smallest practicable limits, and with no injury either to the form or spirit of their airs.

In the same way, a suite of seven or eight pieces, connected together by no link of internal musical necessity, no one of them growing out of nor ideally developed from any of the others, and all of them in the same key—this sort of thing is a direct slap in the face, not only to our present musical habits, but to our highest and best musical instincts. It is the musical counterpart of the old two-hour sermon; we do not enjoy it. We remember one of the most ardent, whole-souled and enlightened Bach-lovers the world ever knew, saying one day that he "could imagine no more infernal bore than listening to the whole of a Bach suite at a sitting." And what a high-priest of the Bach-cult rejects as too much is hardly wholesome food for the musical public at large. Of the seven numbers composing the B minor suite Mr. Paur cut out the minuet (one page of full score); but he gave all the rest unflinchingly, and it certainly was too much of a good thing. Three numbers would have been enough.

Another consideration of unspeakable importance in the present case is the condition in which Bach left his scores. The continuo of the B minor suite is very elaborately figured all through, showing that every number was intended by the composer to have an organ or clavichord accompaniment. In some places an accompaniment in full harmony is absolutely indispensable; passages here and there in the fugue of the first movement, in the second bourrée and the whole double of the polonaise need to be filled out. The suite was given without any accompaniment whatever, the bare places above referred to sounding as unlike Bach as possible. Otherwise the plan on which the suite was given—with two and sometimes three flutes to counterbalance the large mass of strings—was excellent. The performance was in general rather rough and lacking in finish, at times vacillating; Mr. Molé played the flute solo in the double of the polonaise beautifully, but the effect of that duet between flute and basses, without any middle parts, was too bare to make the movement enjoyable.

"The "Coriolan" overture, too, was given without much real effectiveness, and not always quite clearly; those strong, nervous passages in dotted quarters and eighths where the violi . and violas follow the 'celli and double basses at half a beat's distance, did not "register" exactly, as the chromo lithographers say, and did not give the ear the definite impression of groups of four eighth-notes.

The ever beautiful "Scotch" symphony was given very effectively indeed, if, like the rest of the programme, somewhat roughly; one seldom found in it that beauty of tone that comes legitimately from Mendelssohn's orchestration. But the tempi were, one and all, admirably taken and the performance full of fire and spirit.

Berlioz's "Roi Léar" overture missed fire almost completely; for one thing, the second theme—as also the second theme in the "Coriolan"—seemed to us taken decidedly too slow. Has the modern slow cantilena become so naturalized here that we are never to hear a passionate second theme again?

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe;" Weber, Conzertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, opus 79; Schumann, symphony No, 4, in D minor, opus 120; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody, arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni; Berlioz, Rakóczy March, from "La Damnation de Faust." Mr. F. Busoni will be the pianist.

FIRE IN MUSIC HALL.

The Tremont Temple Congregation Dispersed Without Panic—A $5000 Fire on Pearl Street.

While the Tremont Temple society was holding services in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, fire was discovered back of the stage in a room on the third story, where scenery was stored. When first discovered there was quite a little blaze, but the flames did not gain much headway and were soon extinguished. The people in the hall at the time were not at all excited, and left without any disturbance. The probable damage to the building and contents will not exceed $1000. Fortunately the valuable library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was immediately under the burned room, was rescued by one of the men employed in the building before it was at all damaged by water. It is not known how the fire started.

MUSIC HALL PROPORTIONS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I should like to add my suffrage to that of the writer in last Thursday's Transcript against the plan for a Music Hall lately shown at the new Public Library by Messrs. McKim, Mead & White.

My adverse opinion rests on three grounds, two practical, one æsthetic.

(1.) As I understand your correspondent to have stated, in any square music hall a large proportion of the audience will not hear orchestral or choral music as a unit. In an ideal room for this purpose there should be as few seats as possible which are much farther from one wing of the orchestra than from the other.

(2.) The amphitheatrical form of the seating is that of a hall for social and not artistic pleasures. If one is to hear music well the eyes must not be given too interesting employment.

(3.) The lines of the roof and proscenium arches are to my eye far from beautiful. They suggest that an attempt has here been made to roof over a type of building whose designers a people of very delicate artistic perceptions planned to be completely roofless. G.

Boston, Jan. 20, 1894.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
MONDAY, JANUARY 22, 1894.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

The Work of the Orchestra Evidences the Admirable Skill of the Director.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening in Music Hall. The following numbers were performed:

Suite No. 2, in B minor.....Bach
Overture to "Coriolan".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn
Overture to "King Lear".....Berlioz

This programme, which was quite in contrast to that of the preceding concert, was played with fine effect. The orchestra seems to have become rehabilitated under the admirable conducting of Mr. Paur. The loose, slovenly manner that was so dominant a feature under Mr. Nikisch, has entirely disappeared, and the work of the orchestra is fast approaching the precision and general excellence that made this superb body of musicians so famous under the conducting of that eminent leader, Wilhelm Gericke. The Bach suite, which gets really monotonous during the one half hour interval that it lasts in its performance, was finely rendered by the orchestra, its polyphony being brought out with remarkable clearness, while the character of each movement was well marked and a happy degree of contrast obtained, thereby producing all possible effect in the rendering. The tutti flute passages were played by three flutes in unison, and the solo passages were artistically rendered by Mr. Molé. The audience warmly applauded its performance.

There has never been heard a more noble and exalted interpretation of Beethoven in Music Hall than the playing of the "Coriolan" overture on this occasion. Mr. Paur's conception of Beethoven commands the highest praise. It is a good index of the purity of his taste, and is an indication of the depth of musical feeling that he possesses. Equally commendable was his reading of the Mendelssohn symphony.

Mr. Paur showed at a previous concert, when the "Romeo and Juliet" selection of Berlioz was given, that he was master of this great French composer's manner, and so one was prepared for a fine rendering of the "King Lear" overture on Saturday night, although the composition is not one of the better of its fanciful author's works.

The playing of this overture was a most excellent performance on the part of the orchestra, if we except the infernal pounding of the drums. But then, as Mr. Paur has now the orchestra in his grip, it is chargeable upon him that the drummer is allowed to create such a din.

Mr. Paur should also see to it that this A ax of the sheepskins should have more regard for the normal diapason. In the "King Lear" overture the tympani has much important work to do, and it is as necessary that the drums should be correctly tuned as that the other instruments should be. But this disturber of the peace defied the directions of Berlioz, and instead of having his upper drum tuned to the pitch of C, had screwed it up to C sharp nearly, and oblivious to the discord he created, revelled in his herculean efforts.

Of course this fury and false intonation have ruled for the past three or four seasons, but then no matter how coarse the performance or how badly out of tune anything was, it never seemed to disturb Mr. Nikisch. We have, however, a more exalted idea of Mr. Paur's direction as well as his acuteness in the matter of correct musical pitch. If this percussion thunderbolt could hear the curses that are heaped upon his head he would modify his gymnastic exhibitions. Let him learn to tune his drums first, and then, Mr. Paur, please make him draw it milder, and thereby receive the blessing of a large number of listeners who cannot understand this incongruity upon your part, who otherwise are so sensitively musical, evidently. Yesterday's Courier administered a deserved rebuke to this pounding nuisance.

The concert next Saturday evening will present the following programme: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstuck, Weber; Symphony No. 4, Schumann; Spanish rhapsody, Liszt; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist will be Mr. F. Busoni. WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, gave the fifth concert of its ninth season last evening in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartette, E flat major, op. 127.....Beethoven
Four love songs, op. 83.....Dvorak
Mr. Hubbard.
Romanza for violin and piano.....Beach
(MS. first time.)
Piano quintette, op. 44.....Schumann

The performance of the first movement of the Beethoven quartette was not all that could be reasonably desired in precision and in intonation. Passages in the third movement were ragged. But the adagio was nobly played,—with breadth and with full appreciation of the moods of the composer. It is this same adagio that is the glory of the quartette, made by Beethoven at the invitation of Prince Galitzin, who played the 'cello, and did not always pay his debts as Beethoven found out to his cost. Such music as the adagio is unearthly in its beauty; but if the other movements were heard to-day for the first time, and if they bore the name of Schmidt, Mueller or Jones, would they hold the attention of the hearer, would they be honestly enjoyed? Would they not seem at times grotesque, rude, barbaric, without musical beauty, serene strength, or even vague, mystical enchantment?

If I am not mistaken, the romanza by Mrs. Beach was first played at Chicago last summer by Miss Maud Powell and the composer. It is a pleasing piece with a theme that at once interests an audience, and, as a whole, the work is creditable to the reputation of Mrs. Beach, who has won renown in widely differing branches of composition. There was hearty applause, and the players were recalled. Mr. Kneisel played the violin part most sympathetically.

The quintette was performed brilliantly and gave much pleasure. Mrs. Beach played with accuracy, firmness and intelligence.

Mr. Hubbard sang four uninteresting songs by Dvorak. The singer has gained in certain respects. His delivery is not as explosive as of old, and his sentences are more firmly knit together.

It may be said that in the ensemble of last evening the second violin was occasionally too modest and subdued.

The next concert will be Feb. 12.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The fifth concert of the season was given last night at Chickering Hall by the Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, tenor. The Beethoven quartette in E flat major, opus 127, was the first number given on the programme and was excellently played, with the possible exception of the beautiful adajio, where at times the 'cello was overstrenuous. Some harshnesses were also perceptible in the delicate finale. The four Love songs, by Dvorak, were pleasantly rendered by Mr. Hubbard, although not in themselves quite all that may be expected, usually, from Dvorak. For anything that might be judged from the character of the songs, they might as properly have been termed songs of the seasons or anything else.

Mrs. Beach's romanza for violin, with piano accompaniment, was given in public for the first time, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin and the composer the piano. It must be confessed that any expectations of originality and distinction were disappointed. The work was musically correct, without a doubt, easy and flowing, but entirely commonplace. The Schumann piano quintette was brilliantly performed.

The sixth concert will be given Feb. 12.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 23.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The leading feature of the programme at the fifth of the Kneisel quartet's chamber concerts, given at Chickering Hall last evening, was a romance for violin, with piano accompaniment, composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, which had its first performance on this occasion, with Mrs. Beach as pianist and Mr. Kneisel as violinist. The fact of the work being the first effort of the composer in writing for the solo violin added much to the interest attaching to its hearing, and it is a pleasure to say that Mrs. Beach is to be credited with another marked success in this, to her, new field of composition. The romance shows the same strong individuality as all of the work done by Mrs. Beach in her compositions for voice and piano, and the use made of the solo violin shows her to be well versed in its characteristics and possibilities. The romance is a melodious composition, full of sentiment, and well calculated to impress itself upon the hearer even upon a first reading. Mr. Kneisel played his part of the work delightfully, and Mrs. Beach gave him excellent support. The audience appreciated the beauties of the composition and its performance heartily, and rewarded the talented composer and musician with enthusiastic applause. Mrs. Beach showed rare skill in the piano quintet in E flat by Schumann, which she subsequently played with the quartet and gave additional evidence of her aptness as an ensemble player in this work.

Mr. Elliott Hubbard, tenor, sung a group of love songs (op. 83) by Dvorak with excellent taste, and the quartet for strings, in B flat major, op. 127, by Beethoven, completed a highly enjoyable programme.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The programme of the fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening was Beethoven's quartet in E flat major; Dvorak, four love songs, No. 83; Romanza for violin, with piano accompaniment; Schumann's piano quartet in E flat major. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach assisted at the piano and Mr. Elliot Hubbard was the soloist of the evening.

The concert was a most delightful one, the various selections being rendered in a most brilliant and artistic manner. Mr. Hubbard has a splendid voice and sings with artistic feeling and intelligence. The Romanza for the violin was beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel. It is a rather pleasing composition, and was given for the first time last evening. Mrs. Beach accompanied at the piano to the evident satisfaction of the audience. Her playing was marked by its vigor, and at times was exceptionally brilliant. The next concert will be Feb. 12.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, gave the fifth concert of this, its ninth, season, in Chickering Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in E-flat major, Opus 127.
Dvorák: Four Love Songs, Opus 83.
Beach: Romanza for violin with pianoforte accompaniment (MS.).
Schumann: Quintet for pianoforte and strings, in E-flat major, Opus 44.

Beethoven wrote two quartets in E-flat major: the opus 74, dedicated to Prince von Lobkowitz, and the opus 127, dedicated to Prince Nicolaus von Galitzin. Both quartet players and dilettanti are in the habit of speaking of "the great" E-flat quartet, and one cannot always tell at once which of the two they mean: it depends on their point of view, on whether "the great" Beethoven, in their eyes, is the Beethoven of the second or of the third period. To us "the great" E-flat quartet is unquestionably this one, the opus 127: in it the Beethoven of the third period stands revealed in all his grandeur, ideality and strength. To be sure, the work belongs to the category of Beethoven's "quartets that are not quartets," its utter freedom in form places it well forward in the ranks of distinctly "modern" compositions. But few lovers of the great in music will like it the less for this nowadays. It is a work of enormous difficulty, both technically and otherwise, a work that needs an admirable performance in every sense, if its true meaning is to be made clear. The Kneisel Quartet played it simply wonderfully last evening: purity of intonation, beauty of tone, fire, sentiment, and well-sustained power were all there in ample measure. To hear such music so played is to receive one of the most vivid and overpowering musical impressions of which the human mind is capable. It was superb at every point.

Mr. Hubbard sang the four love songs by Dvorák most excellently, the only point in his singing to which one could take exception being his generally indistinct utterance of the text. The songs themselves evidently contain much that is beautiful, albeit that a single hearing does not give one any very solid basis for judging of their true character. But the immediate impression they made was certainly fine. Mrs. Beach's new violin romanza also made a distinctly good first impression: one felt that the composer had ideas, and knew what to make of them; the work shows warmth of feeling too. It was admirably played by Mr. Kneisel, the accompaniment being done full justice to by the composer herself.

The great Schumann Quintet struck fire from the audience, as it always does. Mrs. Beach played the pianoforte part in capital style, with all due fire, sound musical judgment and appreciation, and without any merely trivial means of momentary effectiveness. We thought she played somewhat too loud all through; it was not only that the strings were often hard put to it to make themselves heard, but that we can hardly recall an instance of the lack of sympathy in tone between the full-toned modern concert-grand and the strings being made more unpleasantly evident. Now, beauty of tone per se is generally one of the strong points of Mrs. Beach's playing, and, if the pianoforte sounded somewhat coarse and out of character under her hands last evening in the quintet, we suspect that it may have been because she rather distrusted her own strength, and tried to play more strongly than is quite natural to her. When a pianist handicaps herself in this way, she runs great risk of robbing her performance of all variety of color and producing the impression of what is commonly called "bad touch." This is the first time we have ever noticed anything of the sort in Mrs. Beach; but we could not help feeling it last evening, and that her otherwise excellent playing suffered from it.

The sixth concert comes on Monday evening, Feb. 12.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1894.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In regard to the new Music Hall, I should like to express my sympathy with the opinion that in a matter of so much importance competitive plans should be submitted to the committee.

There is one very important point which has not been touched upon in any criticism I have read or heard on the subject, and that is ventilation. To the successful production and thorough enjoyment of music, pure air is almost as vital a necessity as good acoustic qualities, and as thorough ventilation without draughts is still an unsolved problem in our civilization, should not the point be made a prominent one in the construction of this new hall?

One other suggestion I should like to make, viz., that besides having many broad and easy exits, there should be a separate approach, under cover, for carriages.

A STOCKHOLDER.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place in Chickering Hall last evening with the following programme:

Quartet in E flat major, op. 127....Beethoven
Four love songs, op. 83.....Dvorak
Romanza for violin.....Beach
(M.S. first time.)
Piano quintet in E flat, op. 44.....Schumann

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard was the singer.

The quartet of Beethoven, op. 127, belongs to the composer's third period, which includes several others, the five piano sonatas op. 101 to 111, and the Ninth Symphony, a work the rationality of which has been a subject of discussion from the time of its production to that of the present day. The adagio is to be excepted, for it is a movement of heavenly beauty. The other movements drag somewhat upon the attention of the listener. That automatic perfection identical with the playing of the Kneisels was slightly disturbed in the performance of the first movement of this quartet.

The quintet of Schumann, however, was finely played, the piano part in the hands of Mrs. Beach receiving a most sympathetic, well-defined, as well as a brilliant rendering. The ensemble was perfect. Mrs. Beach's touch was crisp and at the same time flexible in quality. The marked rhythm of the piano part was well sustained by this accomplished performer.

Mr. Kneisel played the Romanza in that highly polished manner that we always expect from him in his artistic efforts. He imparted, also, a sympathetic touch to his part that was in consonace with the charming manner in which Mrs. Beach gave the piano accompaniment. The Romanza is a credit to its composer, for it is a delightful piece, not at all intricate but melodious withal and effectively placed upon the instrument.

Mr. Hubbard's singing was dry and monotonously inexpressive. What it was all about it was impossible to tell, for the singer failed to impart any sentiment to the songs, and as there were no titles given, and as he indulged in the reprehensible affectation of addressing an American audience in a foreign tongue, and his articulation was so totally deficient that only an occasional German word could be caught, it was not to be discovered what the "amorous plaint" of the composer might have otherwise revealed. It was an uninteresting interpolation among the instrumental numbers.

The next concert takes place Feb. 12.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1894.

The Thirteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert last evening in Music Hall:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concert-stuck for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, op 79.....Weber
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.....Schumann
Rhapsodie Espagnole, rearranged as a concert-stuck for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni (MS.) (first time).....Liszt
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

Mr. Paur was in Ercles vein. The performance of the symphony was characterized chiefly by a virility that at times stepped over the border line and became coarseness. Take the opening measures of the first movement, "Ziemlich langsam." Schumann was most careful in his dynamic indications in these measures, but Mr. Paur saw almost nothing in them but "a brave forte: or he read them through a magnifying glass, and romance fled. We have heard the Romanze played more romantically in Music Hall, and the trio of the Scherzo has been given here with more tenderness. In the Finale, the slow introduction was well read and performed with marked effect; but the modern practice of singing every tune of three measures with "great expression" and letting the rhythm flag without any really adequate reason was followed by Mr. Paur in the allegro (or lebhaft as Schumann was pleased to call it). It seems now to be an inflexible rule with conductors of the advanced school to make a marked change in tempo with the entrance of the subsidiary theme. There are singers who cannot sing allegro and at the same time piano; and there are conductors who apparently believe that a gentle or a pathetic theme in an allegro must of itself turn the allegro into an andante con moto or an allegretto. As in the symphony last evening, so in the overture, as far as this question of subsidiary themes was concerned.

The performance of the orchestra in the symphony was not always up to the high standard that has characterized the concerts of late. But the music itself is so passionate, melancholy and noble, that hearty applause followed the finale and Mr. Paur was recalled.

* * *

Mr. Busoni gave a remarkable exhibition of technique. The most difficult passages were played with apparent ease and with grace. In the piece by Weber, which, I believe, has not been played at a Symphony Concert since '85, when Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist, there was an occasional lack of pronounced rhythm, as in the opening of the finale; but, on the whole, Mr. Busoni's performance was remarkable for its precision, power and brilliancy. The pianist enlivened the second movement with embellishments, joining with the orchestra in the march, and although purists might object to Weber improved, the audience enjoyed the modern version. Mr. Busoni is by no means alone in this treatment of the march.

The Spanish Rhapsody, as arranged by Mr. Busoni and played by him, is great sport. There is no need here of debating the question whether the true characteristics of the Jota are preserved in this Liszt-Busoni machine. It is sufficient to say that Busoni has given the piano piece a gorgeously colored and highly fantastic dress. It was a great evening for the men who deal in percussion, and there was a most diversified exhibition of musical fireworks from cannon crackers to sky-scraping rockets, from pin-wheels to set-pieces of intricate construction. Mr. Busoni did what he pleased with the piano. The harder the task, the more demoniac his agility. All forms of technical exercises known as supreme and transcendental were playthings in his fingers. His reception was hearty, and the applause that followed his feats was long continued and loudly sustained. The evening, when Mr. Busoni was on the stage, was one of bravura rather than of temperament. Mr. Busoni has in times past in this city, which should have kept him as her citizen, risen to a greater musical height; he has afforded an audience greater and purer musical pleasure, but he has never, at least in public, given so remarkable an exhibition of modern technique as he did last evening.

PHILIP HALE.

[79]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1894.

The program of the twelfth Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Suite (for strings and flute).....Bach
Overture, "Coriolan," No. 2, B minor.....Beethoven
Symphony No 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

The playing of the orchestra was excellent throughout the evening, and Mr. Paur read sympathetically and directed with authority. The Bach suite in spite of occasional charming passages was a good deal of a bore. Nor can I agree with certain admirers of Berlioz, as Hippeau, for example, who are inclined to place "King Lear" at the head of the purely orchestral works of the great Frenchman. There is no trace of the volcanic passion that shook the old man Lear. The "Cordelia theme" may have a pathetic tenderness, a modest, shrinking beauty; but the opening recitative is without genuine power, and there is no overwhelming burst of orchestral fury that paints or suggests the crazed king defying the elements.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert the 27th will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstück, Weber; Symphony, D minor, No. 4, Schumann; Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt; "Rakoczy March," Berlioz. Mr. F. Busoni will be the pianist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concert-Stuck for piano and orchestra, Weber; Symphony in D minor, op. 120, Schumann; Rhapsodie Espagnole, Liszt-Busoni; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist was Mr. F. Busoni. The Weber overture was given a masterly reading. The climax was worked up with immense effect, and the brilliancy of the performance as a whole was remarkable. The symphony was vigorously interpreted, but the rendering, as a whole, was too persistently noisy, and as a consequence there was a lack of necessary contrast in tone color. It was immensely effective, and the orchestra never surpassed the precision, the fire and the beauty of technique it displayed in this work. Had there been something more of temperance in the reading the presentation of this music would have been surprisingly fine. As it was, it was stirring and impressive enough, but the coloring was too monotonously heavy. The Berlioz March was given with immense spirit; but here, too, something was left to be wished for on the score of delicacy and piquancy in the less stormy phases of the score. Mr. Busoni, who was received very cordially, played the Weber concert-piece with almost surprising deftness of technique. The effect of the opening larghetto might have been heightened if its tenderness had been better emphasized. The following allegro was taken at a fearful pace, so fast, indeed, that its proper character was lost and it became a mere means for a display of rapid fingering. This was indeen astonishing enough in the distinct utterances that attended the furious rush with which the movement was given, but the meaning of the music was lost in colorless virtuosity, and its rhythm was not always distinct. The finale was also reduced to an exhibition of finger work. As a triumph of technique it was fairly wonderful, but as an interpretation it was of little value. Mr. Busoni's performance, however, stirred his audience to a frenzy of applause, and he was recalled three times with a fervor that was almost wild in its exuberance. The Liszt piece, which was rearranged for piano and orchestra, and with great skill and effect, is a trashy and, musically speaking, an uninteresing bit of charlatanism. Its difficulties are immense. Mr. Busoni's performance of the work was extraordinary in the amazing skill in finger flexibility that it showed. His fingers are as rapid as the wind, and as firm as steel. It would be impossible to play a show piece in a more perfectly showy style than this one was played by the artist, who was again stormily applauded, and recalled four times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Morceaux Fantastique, for 'cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music," Feramorz," Rubinstein; Overture, "Esther," E. D'Albert (first time). The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening, the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, gave its fifth concert of the season in Chickering Hall. The selections were: Quartet, E-flat, op. 127, Beethoven; Four Love Songs, op. 83, Dvorak; Romanza for violin and piano, Mrs. Beach; Quintet for piano and strings, Schumann. The Beethoven Quartet is doubtless very fine music, but it is far from edifying as to its meaning. It may be that we have not yet progressed to that stage of musical development which enables us to comprehend the many beauties that it contains; but, with the exception of the slow movement, it seems vague, eccentric, uninspired and wearisome. The extremest vagaries of modern music are outdone in this work, and seem crystal clear in comparison. The performance was not up to the admirable standard established by the artists. There was much uncertainty, much scratching, numerous lapses in intonation and an unaccustomed roughness in the playing, especially in the first movement and in the finale. The adagio, however, was beautifully given. Mrs. Beach's Romanza has a graceful theme, an easy flow and a warm and tender melodiousness generally. It is well written for the solo instrument, is interesting and effective, and was listened to with attention and pleasure, a hearty round of applause and a recall for Mr. Kneisel and Mrs. Beach following the performance. The Dvorak songs were not strikingly attractive. They were sung by Mr. Hubbard tastefully and skilfully, and in an admirable legato style. The Quintet was thoughtfully read and finely played, Mrs. Beach acquitting herself at the piano with brilliancy, precision and vigor. The date of the next concert is Feb. 9.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, gave the fifth concert of its ninth season last evening in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartette, E flat major, op. 127.....Beethoven
Four love songs, op. 83.....Dvorak
Mr. Hubbard.
Romanza for violin and piano.....Beach
(MS. first time.)
Piano quintette, op. 44.....Schumann

The performance of the first movement of the Beethoven quartette was not all that could be reasonably desired in precision and in intonation. Passages in the third movement were ragged. But the adagio was nobly played,—with breadth and with full appreciation of the moods of the composer. It is this same adagio that is the glory of the quartette, made by Beethoven at the invitation of Prince Galitzin, who played the 'cello, and did not always pay his debts as Beethoven found out to his cost. Such music as the adagio is unearthly in its beauty; but if the other movements were heard to-day for the first time, and if they bore the name of Schmidt, Mueller or Jones, would they hold the attention of the hearer, would they be honestly enjoyed? Would they not seem at times grotesque, rude, barbaric, without musical beauty, serene strength, or even vague, mystical enchantment?

If I am not mistaken, the romanza by Mrs. Beach was first played at Chicago last summer by Miss Maud Powell and the composer. It is a pleasing piece with a theme that at once interests an audience, and, as a whole, the work is creditable to the reputation of Mrs. Beach, who has won renown in widely differing branches of composition. There was hearty applause, and the players were recalled. Mr. Kneisel played the violin part most sympathetically.

The quintette was performed brilliantly and gave much pleasure. Mrs. Beach played with accuracy, firmness and intelligence.

Mr. Hubbard sang four uninteresting songs by Dvorak. The singer has gained in certain respects. His delivery is not as explosive as of old, and his sentences are more firmly knit together.

It may be said that in the ensemble of last evening the second violin was occasionally too modest and subdued.

The next concert will be Feb. 12.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The fifth concert of the season was given last night at Chickering Hall by the Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, tenor. The Beethoven quartette in E flat major, opus 127, was the first number given on the programme and was excellently played, with the possible exception of the beautiful adajio, where at times the 'cello was overstrenuous. Some harshnesses were also perceptible in the delicate finale. The four Love songs, by Dvorak, were pleasantly rendered by Mr. Hubbard, although not in themselves quite all that may be expected, usually, from Dvorak. For anything that might be judged from the character of the songs, they might as properly have been termed songs of the seasons or anything else.

Mrs. Beach's romanza for violin, with piano accompaniment, was given in public for the first time, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin and the composer the piano. It must be confessed that any expectations of originality and distinction were disappointed. The work was musically correct, without a doubt, easy and flowing, but entirely commonplace. The Schumann piano quintette was brilliantly performed.

The sixth concert will be given Feb. 12.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 23.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The leading feature of the programme at the fifth of the Kneisel quartet's chamber concerts, given at Chickering Hall last evening, was a romance for violin, with piano accompaniment, composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, which had its first performance on this occasion, with Mrs. Beach as pianist and Mr. Kneisel as violinist. The fact of the work being the first effort of the composer in writing for the solo violin added much to the interest attaching to its hearing, and it is a pleasure to say that Mrs. Beach is to be credited with another marked success in this, to her, new field of composition. The romance shows the same strong individuality as all of the work done by Mrs. Beach in her compositions for voice and piano, and the use made of the solo violin shows her to be well versed in its characteristics and possibilities. The romance is a melodious composition, full of sentiment, and well calculated to impress itself upon the hearer even upon a first reading. Mr. Kneisel played his part of the work delightfully, and Mrs. Beach gave him excellent support. The audience appreciated the beauties of the composition and its performance heartily, and rewarded the talented composer and musician with enthusiastic applause. Mrs. Beach showed rare skill in the piano quintet in E flat by Schumann, which she subsequently played with the quartet and gave additional evidence of her aptness as an ensemble player in this work.

Mr. Eliott Hubbard, tenor, sung a group of love songs (op. 83) by Dvorak with excellent taste, and the quartet for strings, in B flat major, op. 127, by Beethoven, completed a highly enjoyable programme.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTET.

The programme of the fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening was Beethoven's quartet in E flat major; Dvorak, four love songs, No. 83; Romanza for violin, with piano accompaniment; Schumann's piano quartet in E flat major. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach assisted at the piano and Mr. Elliot Hubbard was the soloist of the evening.

The concert was a most delightful one, the various selections being rendered in a most brilliant and artistic manner. Mr. Hubbard has a splendid voice and sings with artistic feeling and intelligence. The Romanza for the violin was beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel. It is a rather pleasing composition, and was given for the first time last evening. Mrs. Beach accompanied at the piano to the evident satisfaction of the audience. Her playing was marked by its vigor, and at times was exceptionally brilliant. The next concert will be Feb. 12.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, gave the fifth concert of this, its ninth, season, in Chickering Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Quartet in E-flat major, Opus 127.
Dvorák: Four Love Songs, Opus 83.
Beach: Romanza for violin with pianoforte accompaniment (MS.).
Schumann: Quintet for pianoforte and strings, in E-flat major, Opus 44.

Beethoven wrote two quartets in E-flat major: the opus 74, dedicated to Prince von Lobkowitz, and the opus 127, dedicated to Prince Nicolaus von Galitzin. Both quartet players and dilettanti are in the habit of speaking of "the great" E-flat quartet, and one cannot always tell at once which of the two they mean: it depends on their point of view, on whether "the great" Beethoven, in their eyes, is the Beethoven of the second or of the third period. To us "the great" E-flat quartet is unquestionably this one, the opus 127: in it the Beethoven of the third period stands revealed in all his grandeur, ideality and strength. To be sure, the work belongs to the category of Beethoven's "quartets that are not quartets," its utter freedom in form places it well forward in the ranks of distinctly "modern" compositions. But few lovers of the great in music will like it the less for this nowadays. It is a work of enormous difficulty, both technically and otherwise, a work that needs an admirable performance in every sense, if its true meaning is to be made clear. The Kneisel Quartet played it simply wonderfully last evening; purity of intonation, beauty of tone, fire, sentiment, and well-sustained power were all there in ample measure. To hear such music so played is to receive one of the most vivid and overpowering musical impressions of which the human mind is capable. It was superb at every point.

Mr. Hubbard sang the four love songs by Dvorák most excellently, the only point in his singing to which one could take exception being his generally indistinct utterance of the text. The songs themselves evidently contain much that is beautiful, albeit that a single hearing does not give one any very solid basis for judging of their true character. But the immediate impression they made was certainly fine. Mrs. Beach's new violin romanza also made a distinctly good first impression; one felt that the composer had ideas, and knew what to make of them; the work shows warmth of feeling too. It was admirably played by Mr. Kneisel, the accompaniment being done full justice to by the composer herself.

The great Schumann Quintet struck fire from the audience, as it always does. Mrs. Beach played the pianoforte part in capital style, with all due fire, sound musical judgment and appreciation, and without any merely trivial means of momentary effectiveness. We thought she played somewhat too loud all through; it was not only that the strings were often hard put to it to make themselves heard, but that we can hardly recall an instance of the lack of sympathy in tone between the full-toned modern concert-grand and the strings being made more unpleasantly evident. Now, beauty of tone per se is generally one of the strong points of Mrs. Beach's playing, and, if the pianoforte sounded somewhat coarse and out of character under her hands last evening in the quintet, we suspect that it may have been because she rather distrusted her own strength, and tried to play more strongly than is quite natural to her. When a pianist handicaps herself in this way, she runs great risk of robbing her performance of all variety of color and producing the impression of what is commonly called "bad touch." This is the first time we have ever noticed anything of the sort in Mrs. Beach; but we could not help feeling it last evening, and that her otherwise excellent playing suffered from it.

The sixth concert comes on Monday evening, Feb. 12.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1894.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In regard to the new Music Hall, I should like to express my sympathy with the opinion that in a matter of so much importance competitive plans should be submitted to the committee.

There is one very important point which has not been touched upon in any criticism I have read or heard on the subject, and that is ventilation. To the successful production and thorough enjoyment of music, pure air is almost as vital a necessity as good acoustic qualities, and as thorough ventilation without draughts is still an unsolved problem in our civilization, should not the point be made a prominent one in the construction of this new hall?

One other suggestion I should like to make, viz., that besides having many broad and easy exits, there should be a separate approach, under cover, for carriages. A STOCKHOLDER.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

The fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place in Chickering Hall last evening with the following programme:

Quartet in E flat major, op. 127....Beethoven
Four love songs, op. 83.....Dvorak
Romanza for violin.....Beach
(M.S. first time.)
Piano quintet in E flat, op. 44.....Schumann

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was the pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard was the singer.

The quartet of Beethoven, op. 127, belongs to the composer's third period, which includes several others, the five piano sonatas op. 101 to 111, and the Ninth Symphony, a work the rationality of which has been a subject of discussion from the time of its production to that of the present day. The adagio is to be excepted, for it is a movement of heavenly beauty. The other movements drag somewhat upon the attention of the listener. That automatic perfection identical with the playing of the Kneisels was slightly disturbed in the performance of the first movement of this quartet.

The quintet of Schumann, however, was finely played, the piano part in the hands of Mrs. Beach receiving a most sympathetic, well-defined, as well as a brilliant rendering. The ensemble was perfect. Mrs. Beach's touch was crisp and at the same time flexible in quality. The marked rhythm of the piano part was well sustained by this accomplished performer.

Mr. Kneisel played the Romanza in that highly polished manner that we always expect from him in his artistic efforts. He imparted, also, a sympathetic touch to his part that was in consonace with the charming manner in which Mrs. Beach gave the piano accompaniment. The Romanza is a credit to its composer, for it is a delightful piece, not at all intricate but melodious withal and effectively placed upon the instrument.

Mr. Hubbard's singing was dry and monotonously inexpressive. What it was all about it was impossible to tell, for the singer failed to impart any sentiment to the songs, and as there were no titles given, and as he indulged in the reprehensible affectation of addressing an American audience in a foreign tongue, and his articulation was so totally deficient that only an occasional German word could be caught, it was not to be discovered what the "amorous plaint" of the composer might have otherwise revealed. It was an uninteresting interpolation among the instrumental numbers.

The next concert takes place Feb. 12.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1894.

The Thirteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert last evening in Music Hall:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concert-stuck for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, op 79.....Weber
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.....Schumann
Rhapsodie Espagnole, rearranged as a concert-stuck for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni (MS.) (first time).....Liszt
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

Mr. Paur was in Ercles vein. The performance of the symphony was characterized chiefly by a virility that at times stepped over the border line and became coarseness. Take the opening measures of the first movement, "Ziemlich langsam." Schumann was most careful in his dynamic indications in these measures, but Mr. Paur saw almost nothing in them but a brave forte; or he read them through a magnifying glass, and romance fled. We have heard the Romanze played more romantically in Music Hall, and the trio of the Scherzo has been given here with more tenderness. In the Finale, the slow introduction was well read and performed with marked effect; but the modern practice of singing every tune of three measures with "great expression" and letting the rhythm flag without any really adequate reason was followed by Mr. Paur in the allegro (or lebhaft as Schumann was pleased to call it). It seems now to be an inflexible rule with conductors of the advanced school to make a marked change in tempo with the entrance of the subsidary theme. There are singers who cannot sing allegro and at the same time piano; and there are conductors who apparently believe that a gentle or a pathetic theme in an allegro must of itself turn the allegro into an andante con moto or an allegretto. As in the symphony last evening, so in the overture, as far as this question of subsidiary themes was concerned.

The performance of the orchestra in the symphony was not always up to the high standard that has characterized the concerts of late. But the music itself is so passionate, melancholy and noble, that hearty applause followed the finale and Mr. Paur was recalled.

***

Mr. Busoni gave a remarkable exhibition of technique. The most difficult passages were played with apparent ease and with grace. In the piece by Weber, which, I believe, has not been played at a Symphony Concert since '85, when Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist, there was an occasional lack of pronounced rhythm, as in the opening of the finale; but, on the whole, Mr. Busoni's performance was remarkable for its precision, power and brilliancy. The pianist enlivened the second movement with embellishments, joining with the orchestra in the march, and although purists might object to Weber improved, the audience enjoyed the modern version. Mr. Busoni is by no means alone in this treatment of the march.

The Spanish Rhapsody, as arranged by Mr. Busoni and played by him, is great sport. There is no need here of debating the question whether the true characteristics of the Jota are preserved in this Liszt-Busoni machine. It is sufficient to say that Busoni has given the piano piece a gorgeously colored and highly fantastic dress. It was a great evening for the men who deal in percussion, and there was a most diversified exhibition of musical fireworks from cannon crackers to sky-scraping rockets, from pin-wheels to set-pieces of intricate construction. Mr. Busoni did what he pleased with the piano. The harder the task, the more demoniac his agility. All forms of technical exercises known as supreme and transcendental were playthings in his fingers. His reception was hearty, and the applause that followed his feats was long continued and loudly sustained. The evening, when Mr. Busoni was on the stage, was one of bravura rather than of temperament. Mr. Busoni has in times past in this city, which should have kept him as her citizen, risen to a greater musical height; he has afforded an audience greater and purer musical pleasure, but he has never, at least in public, given so remarkable an exhibition of modern technique as he did last evening.

PHILIP HALE.

[79]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1894.

The program of the twelfth Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Suite (for strings and flute).....Bach
Overture, "Coriolan," No. 2. B minor.....Beethoven
Symphony No 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

The playing of the orchestra was excellent throughout the evening, and Mr. Paur read sympathetically and directed with authority. The Bach suite in spite of occasional charming passages was a good deal of a bore. Nor can I agree with certain admirers of Berlioz, as Hippeau, for example, who are inclined to place "King Lear" at the head of the purely orchestral works of the great Frenchman. There is no trace of the volcanic passion that shook the old man Lear. The "Cordelia theme" may have a pathetic tenderness, a modest, shrinking beauty; but the opening recitative is without genuine power, and there is no overwhelming burst of orchestral fury that paints or suggests the crazed king defying the elements.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert the 27th will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstück, Weber; Symphony, D minor, No. 4, Schumann; Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt; "Rakoczy March," Berlioz. Mr. F. Busoni will be the pianist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 28.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concert-Stuck for piano and orchestra, Weber; Symphony in D-minor, op. 120, Schumann; Rhapsodie Espagnole, Liszt-Busoni; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist was Mr. F. Busoni. The Weber overture was given a masterly reading. The climax was worked up with immense effect, and the brilliancy of the performance as a whole was remarkable. The symphony was vigorously interpreted, but the rendering, as a whole, was too persistently noisy, and as a consequence there was a lack of necessary contrast in tone color. It was immensely effective, and the orchestra never surpassed the precision, the fire and the beauty of technique it displayed in this work. Had there been something more of temperance in the reading the presentation of this music would have been surprisingly fine. As it was, it was stirring and impressive enough, but the coloring was too monotonously heavy. The Berlioz March was given with immense spirit; but here, too, something was left to be wished for on the score of delicacy and piquancy in the less stormy phases of the score. Mr. Busoni, who was received very cordially, played the Weber concert-piece with almost surprising deftness of technique. The effect of the opening larghetto might have been heightened if its tenderness had been better emphasized. The following allegro was taken at a fearful pace, so fast, indeed, that its proper character was lost and it became a mere means for a display of rapid fingering. This was indeed astonishing enough in the distinct utterances that attended the furious rush with which the movement was given, but the meaning of the music was lost in colorless virtuosity, and its rhythm was not always distinct. The finale was also reduced to an exhibition of finger work. As a triumph of technique it was fairly wonderful, but as an interpretation it was of little value. Mr. Busoni's performance, however, stirred his audience to a frenzy of applause, and he was recalled three times with a fervor that was almost wild in its exuberance. The Liszt piece, which was rearranged for piano and orchestra, and with great skill and effect, is a trashy and, musically speaking, an uninteresing bit of charlatanism. Its difficulties are immense. Mr. Busoni's performance of the work was extraordinary in the amazing skill in finger flexibility that it showed. His fingers are as rapid as the wind, and as firm as steel. It would be impossible to play a show piece in a more perfectly showy style than this one was played by the artist, who was again stormily applauded, and recalled four times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Morceaux Fantastique, for 'cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music," Feramorz," Rubinstein; Overture, "Esther," E. D'Albert (first time). The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening, the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, gave its fifth concert of the season in Chickering Hall. The selections were: Quartet, E-flat, op. 127, Beethoven; Four Love Songs, op. 83, Dvorak; Romanza for violin and piano, Mrs. Beach; Quintet for piano and strings, Schumann. The Beethoven Quartet is doubtless very fine music, but it is far from edifying as to its meaning. It may be that we have not yet progressed to that stage of musical development which enables us to comprehend the many beauties that it contains; but, with the exception of the slow movement, it seems vague, eccentric, uninspired and wearisome. The extremest vagaries of modern music are outdone in this work, and seem crystal clear in comparison. The performance was not up to the admirable standard established by the artists. There was much uncertainty, much scratching, numerous lapses in intonation and an unaccustomed roughness in the playing, especially in the first movement and in the finale. The adagio, however, was beautifully given, Mrs. Beach's Romanza has a graceful theme, an easy flow and a warm and tender melodiousness generally. It is well written for the solo instrument, is interesting and effective, and was listened to with attention and pleasure, a hearty round of applause and a recall for Mr. Kneisel and Mrs. Beach following the performance. The Dvorak songs were not strikingly attractive. They were sung by Mr. Hubbard tastefully and skilfully, and in an admirable legato style. The Quintet was thoughtfully read and finely played, Mrs. Beach acquitting herself at the piano with brilliancy, precision and vigor. The date of the next concert is Feb. 9.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1894.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL; SOME PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The plan for the new Music Hall having been well discussed on æsthetic and musical grounds, I venture to intrude on your generosity with some practical considerations. I find many features in the plan that are not admirable, viewed from the business side. In the first place, the arrangement of seats is objectionable as it does not admit of graded prices. To draw a line through a gallery or a parquet, with dollar seats on one side and seventy-five-cent seats on the other, is sure to create dissatisfaction. The division must be by a rail and a decided difference in the elevation, such as is presented by a gallery compared with a parquet. In the plan under discussion there is no distinct provision for the twenty-five-cent ticket holders at the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals, a feature upon which the generous backer of the orchestra firmly insists.

In the second place, assuming that half of the audience will be seated in the parquet, the provision for their leaving rapidly is inadequate—three portals for 1200 people.

Thirdly, it is a blunder to put the main entrance on a back street, 225 feet away from the travelled road. The stage end should be on St. Stephens street—with an extra exit for the audience, after the plan of the Boston Theatre—while the principal entrance should be through a lobby from Huntington avenue, where, it is understood, a business block will be built. Entrances on West Chester Park should also be provided. These requirements neglected the hall may lose business.

Several of your correspondents have spoken of the want of a good concert hall in Paris. The fact is that Paris is blest with the most satisfactory concert hall known, so far as the ears are concerned, that of the Conservatoire. Unfortunately it is not available for general use. Concerning the hall of the Gewandhaus, it may be interesting to know that some of the older Leipzigers complain that the new hall is, in its acoustic properties, far inferior to the old one.

A CONCERT MANAGER.

To the Editor of the Transcript: It seems to be very generally admitted that the McKim plan for the new Music Hall is a very beautiful design. Some criticisms have been made upon it, and it seems to me that the exits would be found insufficient if there were a full house, but that could be easily remedied. The shape and size of the hall are of the utmost importance, however. There has been for some years a growing feeling among musicians that our present hall is too large for the best effects, nothing, perhaps, excepting the Handel and Haydn concerts being completely satisfactory there, and no solos, either vocal or instrumental, being properly heard. Now, how does the new (proposed) hall compare with the old one? The old one seats 2400 persons. On the floor, in front of the balcony, are 900 seats; under the balcony are 350; making a total of 1250 seats on the floor of the hall. In the first balcony, at the sides, are 350 seats, and at the end 340; a total of 690; in the second balcony, at the sides, 380, and at the end 80, a total of 460; making the grand total 2400. The entire length of the hall is 125 feet, its width is 62 feet, and its height 65 feet.

In the McKim plan for the new hall, all the seats are on the floor, three or four hundred of them on a level, and the rest rising gradually, but of course occupying just as much floor space as if all were on a level.

The dimensions of the hall are given as 150x143, and 83 feet in height. The length and width here stated are, without doubt, the outside dimensions, and the length and width of the auditorium itself are probably not far from one hundred feet each, but as its seating capacity is to be substantially the same as that of the present hall, and all its seats are to be on the floor, the space in front of the stage must be at least twice as great as the corresponding space in the present hall. The stage in the old hall is 31 feet deep, leaving the floor 94 feet by 62, or 5828 square feet, containing 1250 seats with the necessary aisles. Now even if the new hall is to have seats and aisles no larger or wider than the old, its floor space must be twice as great as in the old hall, or twice 5828 feet, which is 11,656 feet. The height of the present hall is 65 feet, making its cubic contents 503,750 feet; the height of the proposed hall is said to be 83 feet; if we allow for curvature, the ceiling not being flat, and call it 70 feet only, the cubic contents would be 815,920 feet, more than fifty per cent greater than those of the present hall. Is it likely that so large a space can be satisfactorily filled with sound, when it is a very general opinion that the present space, only two-thirds as much, is too great? Moreover, according to your correspondent, "R. C. D.," the European verdict is that a music hall should be long, not square, for the best effects.

It must be possible to produce a more satisfactory plan than McKim's, and nothing but a competition can accomplish this. As we are to have a new hall, in spite of the fact that the old one is not to be destroyed by an elevated railroad, let us not hastily decide upon the first plan offered, simply because it attracts the eye. It is not the eye, but the ear, that is to be satisfied.

A. R.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1894.

It would not have been easy, even for the being most oppressed by the standard Music Hall atmosphere, to get in much of a nap during the thirteenth symphony concert. In the first place the programme was comfortably short, although it had five numbers; and in the second place, those numbers were all good lively, demonstrative, insistent pieces, in which the band grew bigger and noisier as at each remove the lengthening chain of harmony was dragged.

For a beginning there was Weber's familiar overture to "Euryanthe," in which there is no weak spot, although there are a few soft ones. It begins with a dash and a decision which make one sit up in his seat at once with expectancy, if he knows the work, and with a lively curiosity if he does not. The latter will be interested to find out if Weber "can hold out as he has begun," to use the homely New England phrase. But he can; and although he has to toy a little with those gloomy tone-combinations of which he seemed to have the patent—a patent upon which nobody has successfully infringed—and to indulge in a brief, poetic reverie, he soon comes back to his splendor and vitality for his finale. The overture had a well considered and very effective rendering.

The second number was also from Weber, being his favorite "Concert-Stuck," in which the solo part was taken by Mr. Busoni, who was warmly welcomed as he came to the piano. This composition is unquestionably original and able; it is put together with admirable knowledge of all the instruments and respect for them; it has brilliant, fanciful or romantic passages which are well worthy of its author, and it is both a test of a pianist's ability and a gratification to him as a study. Yet it does not make quite the effect which one would expect from its reputation, the favor which it has enjoyed and the mastership of composition which it demonstrates. But Mr Busoni, who adds to honest, broad phrasing, a flashing style of ornamentation and a sure, bold execution, a genuine enthusiasm, made it unusually telling, both in mere technical delivery and in animation of spirit, contrasting well the pretty, glistening march with the more usual types of the vigorous beginning and end.

Schumann's noble fourth symphony followed, his injunction that the several movements should proceed without interruption being obeyed by Mr. Paur, who also attended carefully and agreeably to the proper presentment of each according to its mood and form. The opposition between the soft pensiveness of the romance and the burly, heavy-footed gaiety of the scherzo was well discriminated, and the climax of the final allegro brought up ably to the vehement presto of the finale.

Mr. Busoni now reappeared to take the lead in Liszt's "Spanish" rhapsody, which he had arranged for piano and orchestra. There is no end of ingenuity and ability in this arrangement, and the performance elicited a great deal of applause. But we may reasonably doubt if the result were worth the trouble of composition and rehearsal. The rhapsody is augmented in size; but is it enhanced in value? There are a host of sudden little fits and starts of phrasing,—isolated spurts of piccolo, short rattle of castanets, tap of drum or collision of cymbals, which may be supposed to imply a fitful, feverish, irregular and emphatic excitement, and therefore to suit with the kind of terpsichorean exercise which the lumbering Carmencita has so often illustrated to the ecstasy of the Four Hundred in its boudoirs and studios and to the admiration of the average citizen in theatres and music halls. But is the adaptation expressive and just? This queer, erratic—and often uncanny and gruesome—orchestration suggests to us a revel of gnomes or a spree of ghosts far more than an ardent, sensuous, expansive and amatory ebullition of sunlit, fervid Spain. We do not deny the cleverness and a certain kind of effectiveness, deriving chiefly from the oddities and the difficulties of the score; but we are not prepared to praise the labor as well devoted or to think that the time of the orchestra and the audience was at all well bestowed upon an experiment of this kind, when so much music of approved worth, dignity and beauty lies unnoticed and unknown. Nor was the performance very commendable. Mr. Busoni was too anxious about the outcome to give himself freely to his share, and the fragmentary nature of much of the score kept the orchestra on the tenterhooks all the time and made their attacks uncertain and their reading ragged.

Mr. Busoni wanted the extra percussion instruments to fill up his quota of noise; and so, as they were on hand, it seemed economical to utilize them further. Therefore the concert ended with a pretty loud and showy performance of the Raccoczy march, which has now about as much right to appear on a Symphony programme as the Anvil Chorus, or the Kermesse from Faust.

Next Saturday night will be played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the ballet music in Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Eugene d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's drama, "Esther," together with a manuscript work which is sure to be worth the hearing—a "morceau fantastique" for violoncello and orchestra, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

That gentleman of sporting proclivities expressed more than his own opinion when, looking in through one of those upper slits into that Music Hall model, he exclaimed ecstatically, "Great Heavens! what a superb cock-pit!"

Why would it not be a wholesome thing for the Symphony management just to print a neat little edition of Berlioz's effusive prose writings—or at any rate of the "A Travers Champs"—and present copies outright to its patrons, instead of doling them out, a half a dozen pages at a time through three or four years of programme books? There might then be a chance for some other essayist on music to be heard from.

A WEEK WELL FILLED WITH CONCERTS.

The musical week began promptly on Monday evening with the fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, whose programme named Beethoven's E-flat major quartette, opus 127; a manuscript romance for violin, with piano accompaniment, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; Schumann's piano quintette in E-flat major, opus 44, and the group of four love-songs contained in Dvorak's opus 83. Mrs. Beach was the pianist, Mr. Eliot Hubbard the singer, and Mr. Kneisel played the romance. For once the Quartette's playing was decidedly open to criticism, and the Beethoven was not only uneven and uncertain, as if because of too little rehearsal or too much self-confidence, but the intonation was frequently discordant and the tone rough or harsh. Exception should perhaps be made of the adagio, which was well played, as became the gem of the whole work, which is not all interesting nor all inspired. The first movement wanders moodily and the finale is not a unit in thought or feeling, each suggesting restlessness and weariness in Beethoven, or sounding as if he were trying at first to find his way to some congenial idea and then, having found that and enjoyed it, he had lost interest and were working out a regular conclusion for formality's sake. Later in the evening the players drew into better form and fettle and with Mrs. Beach played the Schumann with great spirit, vigor and freedom, the lady in particular adding to her usual elegance, refinement and precision, a vividness and vivacity of spirit and a warmth of coloring which have never been so brightly and strongly shown before. The scherzo, above all, had a dash and a flash which were new and delightful exhibitions of her talent and touch.

Her romance was a pretty melody in a good salon style, but in no way pre-eminent for thought or treatment. Mr. Kneisel read it smoothly and suavely and the composer sustained him handsomely with the not elaborate but clever accompaniment, based upon a sharply syncopated figure and worked out solidly and broadly. Mr. Hubbard, who sings even better (since he has ascended from barytone music to tenor, did very well by the Dvorak songs, but they had little intrinsic interest and did not charm by their own merit.

Why should it be so hard for the Musical Courier to speak the truth about the Boston Symphony and its conductors? If it does not care about having misrepresentation charged against it, one would think that it would hardly care to be proved an ignoramus.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 28, 1894.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The feature at the symphony rehearsal and concert was the superb piano playing of Mr Ferrucoio Busoni, his numbers being a Weber concert piece and Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" arranged by the pianist for orchestra and piano. The other numbers on the program were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Schumann's symphony No. 4 and Berlioz' Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust."

Mr Busoni's performance was refined, scholarly and without a trace of sensationalism or display to catch the eyes of the auditor. In the Weber number, the preliminary theme and development were broadly treated, the fragmentary parts being clear and effective. The arpeggios and the coda ending the first movement were brilliant, the march in the second part was finely and firmly marked, and the difficult glissandos in octaves, played as written, were very smooth and regular.

In arranging the Liszt rhapsody Mr Busoni has given the orchestra some difficult work to do, the transitions and breaks being ingenious and very frequent. The characteristics of the two dances forming the composition have been well preserved, and save a slight deviation in tempo between the pianist and orchestra in some of the more rapid passages, the work was finely performed. The applause at the close of Mr Busoni's numbers was hearty, and he was recalled several times to the platform.

The orchestral numbers were most satisfactorily interpreted. The second version of the Schumann symphony was used. The "spiral figures" were clearly given out by the different contingents, and the Schumannesque tone of the work was thoroughly preserved by Mr Paur and his men. The Rakoczy march was given in a spirited and properly tumultuous manner.

This is the program for the concerts by the orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday night: Beethoven, eighth symphony; Loeffler, fantastic piece, violoncello and orchestra, first time; Rubinstein, ballet music from "Feramors;" D'Albert, overture to Grillparzer's "Esther."

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1894.

The feature of the Symphony concert last evening was the work of Mr. F. Busoni on the pianoforte. The programme consisted of orchestral numbers of Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Faust."

Mr. Busoni gave Weber's concert-stuck in F minor with the orchestra, and his own adaptation of Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody. Mr. Busoni's talents are recognized in Boston, where he has before appeared. He has a strong, firm touch, a fine technique and plays with artistic phrasing. The Weber number is brilliant and displayed his powers, particularly in the second movement. The Spanish Rhapsody was played for the first time at these concerts, and was well received. There are some unique transitions and treatments of the original themes.

The work of the orchestra was fully up to the usual high standard. The programme for the next rehearsal and concert, Friday and Saturday, Feb. 2 and 3, will be as follows: Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F; C. M. Loeffler's "Morceau Fantastique," for 'cello and orchestra (first time); Rubinstein's Ballet Music, "Feramors;" Eugen D'Albert's Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther" (first time); soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

[80]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR. VOL. XCV. NO. 26.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. F. Busoni.

Beauties of "Tobacco"—Mr. George Grossmith to Talk About America—The West Point Band's Visit—Plans for Opera—Silvinski's Recitals—News Notes and Gossip.

Conductor Emil Paur needs a word of caution.

Another concert like that of last evening will go far to make the symphony a synonym for a popular event rather than an educational one.

The programme was modelled after those with which Mr. Hens hel est blished these concerts, and it is a model that can hardly be improved upon.

Such, at least, was evidently the opinion of the audience last evening, and as it was one of the largest of the season its preferences have some right to be respected.

The soloist was Ferruccio B. Busoni, a pianist who has already established himself in the favor of Boston audiences, but has never received such a recognition of his abilities as that given him last evening. His great achievement was the performance of the "Spanish Rhapsodie" by Liszt, which he had rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra. The work done by Mr. Busoni in the arrangement of this concert piece commands the sincerest commendation, for in the use of the orchestra he has equalled the master Liszt in his arrangements of his own and other composers' works for the orchestra. Mr. Busoni's work at the piano was nothing more or less than stupendous. Such an exhibition of a complete mastery of this instrument has seldom been heard in this city within the present generation. He rose to the demands of his own great score in a way that aroused the enthusiasm of his hearers, on both sides the stage line the musicians of the orchestra vieing with the patrons of the concerts in expressing their admiration for the work done by the pianist. Such a scene of enthusiasm has seldom attended the appearance of the pianists of the day, and it can be honestly said that Mr. Busoni deserved the great compliment paid him.

Mr. Busoni's earlier appearance was made in the familiar concertstucke by Weber in F minor, op. 79. In his playing of the first movement of this piece Mr. Busoni appeared at some disadvantage, his interpretation having certain mechanical characteristics which are at times noticeable in his playing. In the march movement, however, this characteristic entirely disappeared, and throughout the second and third movements he played in a fashion to satisfy the most critical. Altogether, Mr. Busoni is to be congratulated upon having reached the climax of his career in this city on this occasion.

Mr. Paur introduced the programme with a delightful performance of the "Euryanthe" overture, and in the middle of the programme came the Schumann symphony No. 4, which has seldom had a more thoroughly gratifying performance than that given it on this occasion. The four movements were played without pause, and the entire work was given with the brilliancy and fire that realized all its beauties in the most complete manner.

When the great "Rakoczy" march was reached at the end of the programme the audience had well nigh exhausted itself in the way of enthusiasm, but such a performance of this composition would quicken the pulses and stir the blood of the most blase concertgoer. This is what it did on this occasion, at least, and the magnificent fashion in which this stupendous composition was read and played sent the audience out of the hall full of admiration for the new conductor and the men over whom he has gained such a masterly control. The concert will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it.

Next Saturday evening's programme includes the eighth Beethoven symphony, the ballet music from Feramors, Eugene D'Albert overture to Esther, and a morceau fantastique for the 'cello and orchestra by C. M. Loeffler.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 28, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach appeared as composer and soloist at the fifth Kneisel quartette concert, which took place in Chickering hall last Monday evening. Her Romanza for violin and piano was given its first public performance by Mr. Kneisel and herself. Adything which has the title of romanza is not likely to be regarded with sharply critical eye, since composers generally adopt a dreamy, rather careless method of improvisation in dealing with such things. The thematic material of the new romanza did not strike us as particularly attractive or significant, but the work was pleasing throughout, and was cordially received by the audience.

In the Schumann quintette which closed the concert, Mrs. Bach played the piano part. She exemplified the oft stated truth that not all excellent pianists are good ensemble players. There was too great monotony of treatment; too continual maintenance of the piano's supremacy. The charming work, instead of being refreshing, became oppressive. Yet the pianist's errors were solely those of judgment; for she was more than mistress of the situation so far as technical ability is concerned.

The quartette performed a great task nobly in its rendering of the most enjoyable of Beethoven's later quartettes, that in E flat, op. 127. Each year our quartette gives us at least one of this great group, and the playing of it is really a musical event. Last Monday's rendering of the second movement seemed to be absolutely ideal, and that of the other movements fell but little short of perfection.

During the evening Mr. Eliot Hubbard sang very delightfully four charming love songs of Dvorak, op. 83, and won hearty applause.

February 12 is the date of the next concert.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1894.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL: SOME PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The plan for the new Music Hall having been well discussed on æsthetic and musical grounds, I venture to intrude on your generosity with some practical considerations. I find many features in the plan that are not admirable, viewed from the business side. In the first place, the arrangement of seats is objectionable as it does not admit of graded prices. To draw a line through a gallery or a parquet, with dollar seats on one side and seventy-five-cent seats on the other, is sure to create dissatisfaction. The division must be by a rail and a decided difference in the elevation, such as is presented by a gallery compared with a parquet. In the plan under discussion there is no distinct provision for the twenty-five-cent ticket holders at the Symphony Orchestra rehearsals, a feature upon which the generous backer of the orchestra firmly insists.

In the second place, assuming that half of the audience will be seated in the parquet, the provision for their leaving rapidly is inadequate—three portals for 1200 people.

Thirdly, it is a blunder to put the main entrance on a back street, 225 feet away from the travelled road. The stage end should be on St. Stephens street—with an extra exit for the audience, after the plan of the Boston Theatre—while the principal entrance should be through a lobby from Huntington avenue, where, it is understood, a business block will be built. Entrances on West Chester Park should also be provided. These requirements neglected the hall may lose business.

Several of your correspondents have spoken of the want of a good concert hall in Paris. The fact is that Paris is blest with the most satisfactory concert hall known, so far as the ears are concerned, that of the Conservatoire. Unfortunately it is not available for general use. Concerning the hall of the Gewandhaus, it may be interesting to know that some of the older Leipzigers complain that the new hall is, in its acoustic properties, far inferior to the old one.

A CONCERT MANAGER.

To the Editor of the Transcript: It seems to be very generally admitted that the McKim plan for the new Music Hall is a very beautiful design. Some criticisms have been made upon it, and it seems to me that the exits would be found insufficient if there were a full house, but that could be easily remedied. The shape and size of the hall are of the utmost importance, however. There has been for some years a growing feeling among musicians that our present hall is too large for the best effects, nothing, perhaps, excepting the Handel and Haydn concerts being completely satisfactory there, and no solos, either vocal or instrumental, being properly heard. Now, how does the new (proposed) hall compare with the old one? The old one seats 2400 persons. On the floor, in front of the balcony, are 900 seats; under the balcony are 350; making a total of 1250 seats on the floor of the hall. In the first balcony, at the sides, are 350 seats, and at the end 340; a total of 690; in the second balcony, at the sides, 380, and at the end 80, a total of 460; making the grand total 2400. The entire length of the hall is 125 feet, its width is 62 feet, and its height 65 feet.

In the McKim plan for the new hall, all the seats are on the floor, three or four hundred of them on a level, and the rest rising gradually, but of course occupying just as much floor space as if all were on a level.

The dimensions of the hall are given as 150x143, and 83 feet in height. The length and width here stated are, without doubt, the outside dimensions, and the length and width of the auditorium itself are probably not far from one hundred feet each, but as its seating capacity is to be substantially the same as that of the present hall, and all its seats are to be on the floor, the space in front of the stage must be at least twice as great as the corresponding space in the present hall. The stage in the old hall is 31 feet deep, leaving the floor 94 feet by 62, or 5328 square feet, containing 1250 seats with the necessary aisles. Now even if the new hall is to have seats and aisles no larger or wider than the old, its floor space must be twice as great as in the old hall, or twice 5828 feet, which is 11,656 feet. The height of the present hall is 65 feet, making its cubic contents 503,750 feet; the height of the proposed hall is said to be 83 feet; if we allow for curvature, the ceiling not being flat, and call it 70 feet only, the cubic contents would be 815,920 feet, more than fifty per cent greater than those of the present hall. Is it likely that so large a space can be satisfactorily filled with sound, when it is a very general opinion that the present space, only two-thirds as much, is too great? Moreover, according to your correspondent, "R. C. D.," the European verdict is that a music hall should be long, not square, for the best effects.

It must be possible to produce a more satisfactory plan than McKim's, and nothing but a competition can accomplish this. As we are to have a new hall, in spite of the fact that the old one is not to be destroyed by an elevated railroad, let us not hastily decide upon the first plan offered, simply because it attracts the eye. It is not the eye, but the ear, that is to be satisfied.

A. R.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1894.

It would not have been easy, even for the being most oppressed by the standard Music Hall atmosphere, to get in much of a nap during the thirteenth symphony concert. In the first place the programme was comfortably short, although it had five numbers; and in the second place, those numbers were all good lively, demonstrative, insistent pieces, in which the band grew bigger and noisier as at each remove the lengthening chain of harmony was dragged.

For a beginning there was Weber's familiar overture to "Euryanthe," in which there is no weak spot, although there are a few soft ones. It begins with a dash and a decision which make one sit up in his seat at once with expectancy, if he knows the work, and with a lively curiosity if he does not. The latter will be interested to find out if Weber "can hold out as he has begun," to use the homely New England phrase. But he can; and although he has to toy a little with those gloomy tone-combinations of which he seemed to have the patent—a patent upon which nobody has successfully infringed—and to indulge in a brief, poetic reverie, he soon comes back to his splendor and vitality for his finale. The overture had a well considered and very effective rendering.

The second number was also from Weber, being his favorite "Concert-Stuck," in which the solo part was taken by Mr. Busoni, who was warmly welcomed as he came to the piano. This composition is unquestionably original and able; it is put together with admirable knowledge of all the instruments and respect for them; it has brilliant, fanciful or romantic passages which are well worthy of its author, and it is both a test of a pianist's ability and a gratification to him as a study. Yet it does not make quite the effect which one would expect from its reputation, the favor which it has enjoyed and the mastership of composition which it demonstrates. But Mr Busoni, who adds to honest, broad phrasing, a flashing style of ornamentation and a sure, bold execution, a genuine enthusiasm, made it unusually telling, both in mere technical delivery and in animation of spirit, contrasting well the pretty, glistening march with the more usual types of the vigorous beginning and end.

Schumann's noble fourth symphony followed, his injunction that the several movements should proceed without interruption being obeyed by Mr. Paur, who also attended carefully and agreeably to the proper presentment of each according to its mood and form. The opposition between the soft pensiveness of the romance and the burly, heavy-footed gaiety of the scherzo was well discriminated, and the climax of the final allegro brought up ably to the vehement presto of the finale.

Mr. Busoni now reappeared to take the lead in Liszt's "Spanish" rhapsody, which he had arranged for piano and orchestra. There is no end of ingenuity and ability in this arrangement, and the performance elicited a great deal of applause. But we may reasonably doubt if the result were worth the trouble of composition and rehearsal. The rhapsody is augmented in size; but is it enhanced in value? There are a host of sudden little fits and starts of phrasing,—isolated spurts of piccolo, short rattle of castanets, tap of drum or collision of cymbals, which may be supposed to imply a fitful, feverish, irregular and emphatic excitement, and therefore to suit with the kind of terpsichorean exercise which the lumbering Carmencita has so often illustrated to the ecstasy of the Four Hundred in its boudoirs and studios and to the admiration of the average citizen in theatres and music halls. But is the adaptation expressive and just? This queer, erratic—and often uncanny and gruesome—orchestration suggests to us a revel of gnomes or a spree of ghosts far more than an ardent, sensuous, expansive and amatory ebullition of sunlit, fervid Spain. We do not deny the cleverness and a certain kind of effectiveness, deriving chiefly from the oddities and the difficulties of the score; but we are not prepared to praise the labor as well devoted or to think that the time of the orchestra and the audience was at all well bestowed upon an experiment of this kind, when so much music of approved worth, dignity and beauty lies unnoticed and unknown. Nor was the performance very commendable. Mr. Busoni was too anxious about the outcome to give himself freely to his share, and the fragmentary nature of much of the score kept the orchestra on the tenterhooks all the time and made their attacks uncertain and their reading ragged.

Mr. Busoni wanted the extra percussion instruments to fill up his quota of noise; and so, as they were on hand, it seemed economical to utilize them further. Therefore the concert ended with a pretty loud and showy performance of the Rackoczy march, which has now about as much right to appear on a Symphony programme as the Anvil Chorus, or the Kermesse from Faust.

Next Saturday night will be played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the ballet music in Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Eugene d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's drama, "Esther," together with a manuscript work which is sure to be worth the hearing—a "morceau fantastique" for violoncello and orchestra, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

That gentleman of sporting proclivities expressed more than his own opinion when, looking in through one of those upper slits into that Music Hall model, he exclaimed ecstatically, "Great Heavens! what a superb cock-pit!"

Why would it not be a wholesome thing for the Symphony management just to print a neat little edition of Berlioz's effusive prose writings—or at any rate of the "A Travers Champs"—and present copies outright to its patrons, instead of doling them out, a half a dozen pages at a time through three or four years of programme books? There might then be a chance for some other essayist on music to be heard from.

A WEEK WELL FILLED WITH CONCERTS.

The musical week began promptly on Monday evening with the fifth concert of the Kneisel Quartette, whose programme named Beethoven's E-flat major quartette, opus 127; a manuscript romance for violin, with piano accompaniment, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; Schumann's piano quintette in E-flat major, opus 44, and the group of four love-songs contained in Dvorak's opus 83. Mrs. Beach was the pianist, Mr. Eliot Hubbard the singer, and Mr. Kneisel played the romance. For once the Quartette's playing was decidedly open to criticism, and the Beethoven was not only uneven and uncertain, as if because of too little rehearsal or too much self-confidence, but the intonation was frequently discordant and the tone rough or harsh. Exception should perhaps be made of the adagio, which was well played, as became the gem of the whole work, which is not all interesting nor all inspired. The first movement wanders moodily and the finale is not a unit in thought or feeling, each suggesting restlessness and weariness in Beethoven, or sounding as if he were trying at first to find his way to some congenial idea and then, having found that and enjoyed it, he had lost interest and were working out a regular conclusion for formality's sake. Later in the evening the players drew into better form and fettle and with Mrs. Beach played the Schumann with great spirit, vigor and freedom, the lady in particular adding to her usual elegance, refinement and precision, a vividness and vivacity of spirit and a warmth of coloring which have never been so brightly and strongly shown before. The scherzo, above all, had a dash and a flash which were new and delightful exhibitions of her talent and touch.

Her romance was a pretty melody in a good salon style, but in no way pre-eminent for thought or treatment. Mr. Kneisel read it smoothly and suavely and the composer sustained him handsomely with the not elaborate but clever accompaniment, based upon a sharply syncopated figure and worked out solidly and broadly. Mr. Hubbard, who sings even better since he has ascended from barytone music to tenor, did very well by the Dvorak songs, but they had little intrinsic interest and did not charm by their own merit.

Why should it be so hard for the Musical Courier to speak the truth about the Boston Symphony and its conductors? If it does not care about having misrepresentation charged against it, one would think that it would hardly care to be proved an ignoramus.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 28, 1894.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The feature at the symphony rehearsal and concert was the superb piano playing of Mr Ferruccio Busoni, his numbers being a Weber concert piece and Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" arranged by the pianist for orchestra and piano. The other numbers on the program were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Schumann's symphony No. 4 and Berlioz' Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust."

Mr Busoni's performance was refined, scholarly and without a trace of sensationalism or display to catch the eyes of the auditor. In the Weber number, the preliminary theme and development were broadly treated, the fragmentary parts being clear and effective. The arpeggios and the coda ending the first movement were brilliant, the march in the second part was finely and firmly marked, and the difficult glissandos in octaves, played as written, were very smooth and regular.

In arranging the Liszt rhapsody Mr Busoni has given the orchestra some difficult work to do, the transitions and breaks being ingenious and very frequent. The characteristics of the two dances forming the composition have been well preserved, and save a slight deviation in tempo between the pianist and orchestra in some of the more rapid passages, the work was finely performed. The applause at the close of Mr Busoni's numbers was hearty, and he was recalled several times to the platform.

The orchestral numbers were most satisfactorily interpreted. The second version of the Schumann symphony was used. The "spiral figures" were clearly given out by the different contingents, and the Schumannesque tone of the work was thoroughly preserved by Mr Paur and his men. The Rakoczy march was given in a spirited and properly tumultuous manner.

This is the program for the concerts by the orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday night: Beethoven, eighth symphony; Loeffler, fantastic piece, violoncello and orchestra, first time; Rubinstein, ballet music from "Feramors;" D'Albert, overture to Grillparzer's "Esther."

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 28, 1894.

The feature of the Symphony concert last evening was the work of Mr. F. Busoni on the pianoforte. The programme consisted of orchestral numbers of Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Faust."

Mr. Busoni gave Weber's concert-stuck in F minor with the orchestra, and his own adaptation of Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody. Mr. Busoni's talents are recognized in Boston, where he has before appeared. He has a strong, firm touch, a fine technique and plays with artistic phrasing. The Weber number is brilliant and displayed his powers, particularly in the second movement. The Spanish Rhapsody was played for the first time at these concerts, and was well received. There are some unique transitions and treatments of the original themes.

The work of the orchestra was fully up to the usual high standard. The programme for the next rehearsal and concert, Friday and Saturday, Feb. 2 and 3, will be as follows: Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F; C. M. Loeffler's "Morceau Fantastique," for 'cello and orchestra (first time); Rubinstein's Ballet Music, "Feramors;" Eugen D'Albert's Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther" (first time); soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

[80]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 28.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. F. Busoni.

Beauties of "Tobasco"—Mr. George Grossmith to Talk About America—The West Point Band's Visit—Plans for Opera—Silvinski's Recitals—News Notes and Gossip.

Conductor Emil Paur needs a word of caution.

Another concert like that of last evening will go far to make the symphony a synonym for a popular event rather than an educational one.

The programme was modelled after those with which Mr. Hens hel est blished these concerts, and it is a model that can hardly be improved upon.

Such, at least, was evidently the opinion of the audience last evening, and as it was one of the largest of the season its preferences have some right to be respected.

The soloist was Ferruccio B. Busoni, a pianist who has already established himself in the favor of Boston audiences, but has never received such a recognition of his abilities as that given him last evening. His great achievement was the performance of the "Spanish Rhapsodie" by Liszt, which he had rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra. The work done by Mr. Busoni in the arrangement of this concert piece commands the sincerest commendation, for in the use of the orchestra he has equalled the master Liszt in his arrangements of his own and other composers' works for the orchestra. Mr. Busoni's work at the piano was nothing more or less than stupendous. Such an exhibition of a complete mastery of this instrument has seldom been heard in this city within the present generation. He rose to the demands of his own great score in a way that aroused the enthusiasm of his hearers, on both sides the stage line the musicians of the orchestra vieing with the patrons of the concerts in expressing their admiration for the work done by the pianist. Such a scene of enthusiasm has seldom attended the appearance of the pianists of the day, and it can be honestly said that Mr. Busoni deserved the great compliment paid him.

Mr. Busoni's earlier appearance was made in the familiar concertstucke by Weber in F minor, op. 79. In his playing of the first movement of this piece Mr. Busoni appeared at some disadvantage, his interpretation having certain mechanical characteristics which are at times noticeable in his playing. In the march movement, however, this characteristic entirely disappeared, and throughout the second and third movements he played in a fashion to satisfy the most critical. Altogether, Mr. Busoni is to be congratulated upon having reached the climax of his career in this city on this occasion.

Mr. Paur introduced the programme with a delightful performance of the "Euryanthe" overture, and in the middle of the programme came the Schumann symphony No. 4, which has seldom had a more thoroughly gratifying performance than that given it on this occasion. The four movements were played without pause, and the entire work was given with the brilliancy and fire that realized all its beauties in the most complete manner.

When the great "Rakoczy" march was reached at the end of the programme the audience had well nigh exhausted itself in the way of enthusiasm, but such a performance of this composition would quicken the pulses and stir the blood of the most blase concertgoer. This is what it did on this occasion, at least, and the magnificent fashion in which this stupendous composition was read and played sent the audience out of the hall full of admiration for the new conductor and the men over whom he has gained such a masterly control. The concert will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it.

Next Saturday evening's programme includes the eighth Beethoven symphony, the ballet music from Feramors, Eugene D'Albert overture to Esther, and a morceau fantastique for the 'cello and orchestra by C. M. Loeffler.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JAN. 28, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach appeared as composer and soloist at the fifth Kneisel quartette concert, which took place in Chickering hall last Monday evening. Her Romanza for violin and piano was given its first public performance by Mr. Kneisel and herself. Adything which has the title of romanza is not likely to be regarded with sharply critical eye, since composers generally adopt a dreamy, rather careless method of improvisation in dealing with such things. The thematic material of the new romanza did not strike us as particularly attractive or significant, but the work was pleasing throughout, and was cordially received by the audience.

In the Schumann quintette which closed the concert, Mrs. Bach played the piano part. She exemplified the oft stated truth that not all excellent pianists fare good ensemble players. There was too great monotony of treatment; too continual maintenance of the piano's supremacy. The charming work, instead of being refreshing, became oppressive. Yet the pianist's errors were solely those of judgment; for she was more than mistress of the situation so far as technical ability is concerned.

The quartette performed a great task nobly in its rendering of the most enjoyable of Beethoven's later quartettes, that in E flat, op. 127. Each year our quartette gives us at least one of this great group, and the playing of it is really a musical event. Last Monday's rendering of the second movement seemed to be absolutely ideal, and that of the other movements fell but little short of perfection.

During the evening Mr. Eliot Hubbard sang very delightfully four charming love songs of Dvorak, op. 83, and won hearty applause.

February 12 is the date of the next concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 29, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

The orchestral part of the concert of Saturday was a disappointment. Everything was done with a heavy hand and almost every trace of delicacy vanished from the performance. Yet evidence that the orchestra plays together with more unanimity than heretofore was not lacking, and there was clearness even amidst a far too constant power. The general public will always prefer force to careful shading, and it was not surprising to find the applause greater than that which would have greeted a more subtle reading.

In the Weber numbers a degree of spicy sensation may be permitted; one does not render Weber as if he were Beethoven, and the strongly marked contrasts of the "Euryanthe" overture were merits rather than defects, for Weber was theatrical in his style and an accentuation of his effects is to be desired. In the performance there was great virility and the composer's thoughts stood forth as clear cut as if they were a silhouette. But when this process was applied to the more dreamy Schumann the result was most unsatisfactory. The D minor symphony has been given in these concerts by all of the conductors, and never so roughly as on this occasion. Even the beautiful Romanza (so song-like that Schumann originally wrote a guitar accompaniment for the cello theme) was given with sturdiness, and the reading proved that Mr. Paur, while advancing the orchestra in the direction of unity, cares less for details of shading. Naturally the forcible touches made the Rackozcy March very exciting, but the auditor unfamiliar with the work would scarcely have suspected the thrilling effect made by Thomas or Gericke in the soft passage of the beginning. Nevertheless the steadiness and perfect ensemble of the orchestra was something to praise, and the applause here was to a great extent deserved, which it was not in the case of the Schumann symphony, the least creditable part of the evening's performance

The fortissimo character of the concert did not limit itself to the orchestra. Mr. Busoni has wrists of steel, and much prefers the fortiter in re to the suaviter in modo. As both of his numbers were of the brilliant type, his energy was well placed. He began with the Weber "Concert-stueck," which is largely given over to heroic and to joyful emotions. It is one of the best examples of programme music in the piano repertoire, and posseses the true Weberian contrasts. There was an inclination to force the pace in the delineation of parting and of the subsequent sorrow in absence, but the march theme (which is twin brother to the effect which Raff used later, in his "Lenore" symphony) and the jubilant and triumphant reunion, were performed with a verve that compelled admiration, and won many recalls. In Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" Mr. Busoni appeared in a dual role, for the orchestration of the work was his own. This scoring shows the pianist to be capable of excellent work in the modern style of orchestration; it has more definite purpose than the scoring of the Busoni Symphonic Poem, which out-Berliozed Berlioz in these concerts two seasons ago. Triangle, tambourine, castagnettes, cymbals and all possible touches of percussion were present in the Rhapsody, the tropical flavor was well-preserved, and even pifferrari seemed to pipe in portions of the work. Whether taken as a Liszt composition or a Busoni arrangement, however, the work is little else than virtuosity; taken on this level it won a very great success, and four recalls testified the delight of the audience. Although the pianist's work at this concert did not represent the classical school, he has so thoroughly won his spurs in the deeper vein that it is only owning his versatility to praise him from the purely technical side; his brilliancy is simply phenomenal. Had he not made his first appearances here under the shadow of the Paderewski craze he would have caused a furore. If he yet lacks the perfect balance and self-poise of a Paderewski, if he leans a little more towards the brilliantly technical or the calmly intellectual than towards the poetic and emotional, these are things which experience, rather than criticism, will correct. Meanwhile, Mr. Busoni is a great pianist with possibilities of becoming world-famous.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER
MONDAY, JANUARY 29, 1894.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY

A Brilliant Programme Given With Great Technical Excellence.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Musical Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concert-stück, for piano and orchestra..Weber
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann
Spanish Rhapsody.....Liszt
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz
Mr. F. Busoni was soloist.

The Spanish Rhapsody is a re-arrangement of Liszt's piece by F. Busoni, its new form being that of a concert piece for piano and orchestra; it was played from manuscript, and for the first time on this occasion.

This programme taken altogether was a brilliant one and of reasonable length. The orchestra played magnificently as regards volume of tone, precision and general technical excellence. Mr. Paur had it well in hand, and was eminently successful in making it obey the dictation of his intention. He however gave too robust a touch to about everything performed, thereby failing to gain repose and to obtain sufficient contrast in strictly orchestral numbers always.

The playing of the Schumann Symphony was consequently a disappointment, for it was too noisy, generally speaking. One might object to the slow tempo in the melodic episodes that occurred, and reasonably so, also, especially in the "Euryanthe" Overture, but, if this modern failing or fad be excepted, and the robustness of the renderings be overlooked, then it must be said that the playing throughout the evening showed many excellent qualities. The drummer, however, made it dismal for the acute ear with the false intonation of his instruments, but he did not pound so terribly as at the previous concert. His fury can still be modified with beneficial results.

What a noble work is Schumann's Symphony No. 4. It stands upon the highest plane of symphonic writing. As broad and massive as it is, it demands, however, a more gentle touch than Mr. Paur gave it, at times, to do justice to the depths of its composer's emotion. The accompaniment to the Concert-stück of Weber, was played with fine effect.

The orchestral part of the Spanish Rhapsody, however, was a matter of considerable anxiety to both the conductor and the players, but they got through without accident.

As excellent as was the playing of the "Euryanthe" Overture, it did not cause the listener to forget the more refined, highly artistic and superbly effective renderings that this and the other Weber overtures have received in these concerts under the baton of Mr. Gericke. The Rakoczy March was played in a loud and brilliant manner. All of the orchestral numbers called forth the most enthusiastic applause.

When Mr. Busoni came forth to play his first number he was warmly welcomed. What amazing technical resources this player possesses. There seems to be no limit to his faculty in the matter of execution. There is a lack of warmth in his temperament, however, that often is felt in places requiring sensitive expression, as in the larghetto affettuoso of Weber's Concert-stuck. This was the case Saturday evening in his rendering of that movement. He also took the last movement at a tremendous pace that caused it to suffer somewhat in clearness. In the Liszt number Mr. Busoni shone in his most brilliant light. The greatest technical difficulties were accomplished with the utmost facility; in brilliancy and power the rendering was simply marvellous. The audience was wildly enthusiastic over the display, and recalled the player many times.

There is a constant improvement in the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Paur's conducting. It is to be hoped that with his many excellences Mr. Paur will yet show a finer sense of the gradation of tone, and impart more repose to his renderings. A higher form of expression will thus be secured and more effective contrasts gained. The effect will be heightened, the climaxes made more powerful, and the monotony of constant overloudness will be remedied. If, however, Mr. Paur's musical nature is too robust, then probably we shall not experience this refinement in orchestral renderings, and he will never gain that high standard that Mr. Gericke established.

The programme next Saturday evening will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Morceau Fantastic for 'cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein; and overture to "Esther," D'Albert.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 29, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Weber: Concert-Stück for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, Opus 79.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Opus 120.
Liszt: Rhapsodie Espagnole, rearranged as a Concert-Stück for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni.
Berlioz: Rákóczy March from "La Damnation de Faust," Opus 24.
Mr. F. Busoni was the pianist.

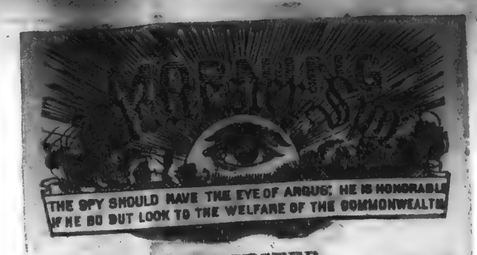
The "Euryanthe" overture was given with great spirit and effect. The performance of the Schumann symphony was, in many respects, one of the finest we have heard; it was marked by noteworthy painstaking in the matter of following the composer's expression marks, the tempi were in general admirable, and the whole thing was played with great fire, force and effectiveness. Now and then, to be sure, one regretted to note the cropping-up again of an old tendency, and one that has been complained of more than once before, in past years; a disposition on the part of the strings, and at times of the wood-wind also, to play expressive cantilena, marked "piano, dolce" in the score, too passionately and with too much tone. The temptation to imitate the old 'cellist, in the amateur orchestra, who replied to the conductor's reiterated cries of "piano!" with "Oh! don't bother me; if you only knew what a delight it is to bring out that big full tone!" is doubtless great in such cases; but giving in to it does not bring about the best artistic results. Another defect of the same sort was a tendency to begin too loud on cantabile phrases, marked "crescendo." Bülow's paradoxical-sounding rule has, after all, much truth at the bottom of it: "Crescendo means piano; diminuendo means forte." We have said that Mr. Paur's tempi were generally excellent; we might say more than this, that his slight modifications of the tempo in the first movement were as finely artistic as possible. Only in the last movement did we find one exceptionable point: the sudden, and to us wholly unaccountable, slackening of the tempo on the third theme,—the one that first enters in A major in the first violins, flute, and oboe, and is worked up with characteristically Schumannesque persistency. The point of view from which this theme can be regarded as a sentimental phrase is to us inconceivable; with all its "piano, dolce" marking, it is to our mind a phrase that pushes irresistibly foward and onward, not one that tends to hold back. The little sforzando accent on the second beat, the omitting the first beat in the violins, the dotted-eights and sixteenths on the third and fourth beats, all point to lightness, buoyant grace, perhaps even to something of coquettishness, but in no wise to sentimentalism; had the phrase been one of sentimental purport, the third beat of the measure would have had two eighths, not a dotted eighth and a sixteenth—and it was noticeable on Saturday evening that some of the orchestra instinctively felt this; some of the wind players, evidently entering into the spirit of Mr. Paur's slow tempo, could not help now and then giving the sixteenth-note of the third beat almost the full value of an eighth. If the modern musical mind could only grasp the fact that every bit of lyric cantilena is not of necessity slow! But for the few exceptions mentioned, the performance was exceedingly fine, and was heartily recognized as such by the audience.

Berlioz's Rákóczy March was given with all due fire and vim, and with a certain appreciation for telling details that would have been immensely effective, had the ensemble-playing been more exact; as it was, the performance was rather ragged. For one point, what could have been the idea of omitting the cymbals throughout the first half of the march? The bass-drum strokes "simulating far-off cannon shots," were all too feeble; we doubt if anyone heard them who did not know beforehand that they were there.

It is a long time since Weber's Concert-Stück has been heard in Boston; Mr. Busoni is much to be thanked for reviving it once more, for it is a composition quite unique in its way, and has in it the stuff of which immortality is made. Mr. Busoni played it superbly, with true sentiment in the first part, and with infinite dash and verve in the final rondo. It was great playing! We can not but think, however—Liszt and almost all modern pianists to the contrary notwithstanding—that it is a mistake to add a pianoforte part to the orchestral march intermezzo; Weber's orchestration is here so absolutely delicious that the superadded strumming of the pianoforte does more harm than good. It is also noticeable how none of the more or less ingeniously devised substitutes for Weber's glissando octaves produce any really satisfying effect; to be sure, no pianist need be asked to tear his fingers to pieces by sliding octaves on a modern concert-grand; but we have heard these scales played glissando in single notes with more telling effect than comes from any of the Liszt or Bülow devices.

Mr. Busoni's arrangement of Liszt's Rhapsodie espagnole for pianoforte and orchestra is about as brilliantly done as could be imagined; indeed, it is so enormously effective as to be really worth while. His playing was one of the most stupendous exhibitions of pianoforte virtuosity we have ever witnessed, and was, moreover, admirably artistic at every point. Anyone anxious to learn how the pianoforte can be made to scintillate and corruscate against a background of the most gorgeous orchestral coloring, should hear Mr. Busoni play this piece. The audience went fairly wild with enthusiasm over it, as indeed it did over his playing of the Weber Concert-Stück; he was repeatedly called out after both pieces.

The next programme is: Beethoven, No. 8, in F major, opus 93; C. M. Loeffler, morceau fantastique pour violoncelle et orchestre (MS.); Rubinstein, ballet-music from "Feramors;" d'Albert, overture to Grilparzer's "Esther." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.



WORCESTER.
WEDNESDAY, JAN. 31, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Contented Audience and an Extraordinary Program.

An audience that was not large, but was decidedly happy listened to the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall Tuesday night. The program was as follows:

Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, op. 17.
Part II.—Fete at Capulet's House, andante, allegro.
Part III.—Love scene, adagio.
Part IV.—Queen Mab, Scherzo, prestissimo, trio, allegretto.
Beethoven, first movement, violin concerto, D major, op. 61 (Joachim's cadenza).
Wagner, Siegfried Idyl.
Weber, overture, "Euryanthe."
Soloist, Franz Kneisel.

Probably no other conductor in America would have made up such a list as that. On paper it looks like rather more than a "dose." It appears to be an entire "prescription." Beethoven's great violin concerto on top of three movements (50 minutes) of the long winded Berlioz, was well calculated to appall the stoutest heart. Nevertheless, the listener found his fears vanishing and himself confessing that it was a delightful concert. In reading the symphony Mr. Paur displayed the same analytical clearness which has been so often commended, but without the stiffness that sometimes characterizes his work. There was an abundance both of flexibility and of piquancy. Berlioz is quite as apt as Wagner to cloy the listener, but none of the movements palled upon the ear and both the first and the third movements were splendidly played. In slow movements Mr. Paur's method is not always calculated to carry both pleasure and conviction. Spontaneous and hearty applause followed each movement and at the end Mr. Paur was recalled a second time to bow his acknowledgments.

Mr. Kneisel played the concerto with that elaborate finish which is all his own. This work was long classed with certain others of Beethoven's that are too profound or too prophetic, possibly too incomprehensible, for the average violinist to make effective with the average audience.

Not till Joachim revived and established it as the first of violin concertos was there a man who could bring out its full meaning. Popularly speaking, the first movement is the most congenial of the three, and Mr. Kneisel gave it a very interesting interpretation. A livelier passion and a more fervid fire than his would sometimes be grateful, but for grace, for honest feeling, elegant phrasing, unfailing purity of tone and perfect technic he is superb—unsurpassed by any violinist in America. The earnest recall testified to the popular approbation.

Wagner's Siegfried idyl was little more than an anti-climax, after this, and at least half of it seemed prosaic and dull. Though the audience gave expression to the usual contented satisfaction, the idyl is not one of Mr. Paur's star pieces.

The concert closed with a frantic performance of the "Euryanthe" overture Mr. Paur is accused of exaggerating the slow movements, but there was no exaggerated slowness about this overture. The playing was brilliant. In fact, the tempo was so rapid that clearness was inevitably sacrificed, and both the first and the second themes were marred. The effect was electrical on both audience and orchestra, and the latter made a flying switch for the Boston train.

The next concert will be given on Tuesday, March 13.

The Telegram.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1894.

MUSIC LOVERS TREATED.

Another Concert by the Symphony Orchestra Proves a Delight.

Pleasure in its most substantial form was what an assemblage lived upon for two hours last night, in Infantry hall, where the Boston Symphony orchestra gave another of its fine concerts. In some phases the event topped any preceding entertainment in the symphony course, and in all phases it was a superb treat.

The program comprised as orchestral numbers Goetz's Symphony in F major, Mozart's Serenade in F and Weber's overture, "Euryanthe." To say that the trio of great compositions was perfectly rendered in every detail would be wholly appropriate in justice to Conductor Paur and his musicians, for more beautifully executed music none could desire.

The soloist was Henry Alwin Schroeder, the chief 'cello expert of the band and probably the chief artist in his particular line in the United States. His selection was Davidoff's Concerto in A minor. Franz Kneisel performed an exquisite violin obligato in the serenade, which started the audience into noisy acknowledgements of his power.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1894.

FROM the "Boston Saturday Evening Transcript" we cull a bit of wisdom. We all revere the classics, and confounded thrice be the man who would meddle with the precious legacy bequeathed us by the masters! But skillful editing and pruning, even curtailment is growing daily more necessary. Listen then to what Mr. Apthorp has to say on the subject and apropos of the B minor Bach suite played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

It is so good to hear almost anything by Sebastian Bach that when one of his works figures on a program one inclines somewhat to take it as a gift horse, not to be looked in the mouth. Yet there are considerations which should not quite be passed over in silence. A whole suite by Bach, whether for piano or orchestra, is a pretty large dose to take at once. With all that is great and immortal in the master's works, there are also things in them which time and the development of music since his day have thrown into obsolescence; and even the sincerest Bach lover, perhaps he more than anyone else, ought to wish these things wholly obsolete, buried for good and all.

We should not forget one important element in the relations between his music and the public—the enormous leisureliness of life, both social and artistic, in his day, compared with the push and bustle of our modern life. His was the time when people could stand, and were glad to enjoy huge doses of one and the same thing; they had time and to spare, and no doubt a good deal of it lay heavy on their hands; the comparative absence of acute excitement from their lives made them proportionately impervious to boredom; two hour sermons, well nigh endless arias, suites of seven or eight numbers all in the same key did not make them think of yawning. But we of to-day are otherwise constituted; we cannot well stand so much of the same thing at a sitting; our artistic sense craves more variety and contrast. We may take just as keen delight in a Bach aria as listeners did a hundred years ago; but enough is as good as a feast, and we resent that eternal da capo, in which a long first part is repeated without variations. We cut down Bach's and Händel's da capo nowadays to its smallest practicable limits, and with no injury either to the form or spirit of their airs.

In the same way a suite of seven or eight pieces connected together by no link of internal musical necessity, no one of them growing out of nor ideally developed from any of the others, and all of them in the same key—this sort of thing is a direct slap in the face, not only to our present musical habits, but to our highest and best musical instincts. It is the musical counterpart of the old two hour sermon; we do not enjoy it. We remember one of the most ardent, whole-souled and enlightened Bach lovers the world ever knew saying one day that he "could imagine no more infernal bore than listening to the whole of a Bach suite at a sitting." And what a high priest of the Bach cult rejects as too much is hardly wholesome food for the musical public at large. Of the seven numbers composing the B minor suite Mr. Pauer cut out the minuet (one page of full score), but he gave all the rest unflinchingly, and it certainly was too much of a good thing. Three numbers would have been enough.

Another consideration of unspeakable importance in the present case is the condition in which Bach left his scores. The continuo of the B minor suite is very elaborately figured all through, showing that every number was intended by the composer to have an organ or clavichord accompaniment. In some places an accompaniment in full harmony is absolutely indispensable; passages here and there in the fugue of the first movement, in the second bourrée and the whole double of the polonaise need to be filled out. The suite was given without any accompaniment whatever, the bare places above referred to sounding as unlike Bach as possible. Otherwise the plan on which the suite was given—with two and sometimes three flutes to counterbalance the large mass of strings—was excellent.

BOSTON, January 28, 1894.

THE Kneisel Quartet gave the fifth concert of its ninth season the evening of the 23d in Chickering Hall. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard assisted. The program was as follows:

Quartet, E flat major, op. 127.....Beethoven
Four love songs, op. 83.....Dvorák
Mr. Eliot Hubbard.
Romanza for violin, with piano accompaniment.....Beach
(MS. First time.)
Piano quintet, op. 44.....Schumann

Mirabile dictu! In the performance of the quartet of Beethoven there was a lack of precision; the intonation was at times impure, and there was an unusual roughness. These failings, rare in a Kneisel concert, were particularly noticeable in the first and the last two movements. The adagio was nobly played, and this one movement is the glory of the quartet.

I am not sure that many would listen patiently to the quartet as a whole, if it were not signed with the name of Beethoven. But that which is unintelligible in it was enjoyed outwardly, and Monday evening there were frequent exclamations of "Grand! beautiful! lovely!" applied rather indiscriminately.

Mrs. Beach's romanza was first played in Chicago last summer by Miss Maud Powell and the composer. This last week it gave a Boston audience pleasure. Mrs. Beach in the romanza, as well as in the quintet, played with accuracy and firmness.

Mr. Hubbard sang four dull songs by Dvorák. That they seemed dull was possibly the fault of the singer, for he sang without dramatic discrimination and his enunciation was so defective that it was not easy to catch the meaning of the German text. Mr. Hubbard has gained in certain respects: his delivery is less explosive, his sentences are more firmly bound together, but he is out of place when he assists in a concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

* * *

The program of the thirteenth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Karl Maria von Weber - Overture to "Euryanthe," in E-flat major
Karl Maria von Weber, Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F minor, op. 79.
I. Larghetto affetuoso (F minor) - - - 3-4
Allegro passionato (F minor) - - - - 4-4
II. Tempo di Marcia (C major) - - - - 4-4
III. Presto giojoso (F major) - - - - - 6-8
Robert Schumann - - - Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor) - - - - 3-4
Lebhaft (D minor) - - - - - - 2-4
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A minor) - 3-4
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor) - - - - 3-4
Trio (B-flat major) - - - - - - 3-4
IV. Langsam (D minor) - - - - - - 4-4
Lebhaft (D major) - - - - - - - 4-4
Franz Liszt - - - - - - - - Spanish Rhapsody
(Rearranged as a Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra by F. BUSONI.)
Hector Berlioz, Rákóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24.

Will you kindly print this program verbatim et literatim, just to show the outside world how precise we are here in such matters? This program is taken out of the program book. Please be careful about the figures and the accents.

I cannot understand, however, why Mr. Busoni's first name was dwarfed ignominiously as a mere initial. Ferruccio is a brave, mouth filling word, and it often gives the key to his performance.

The romantic, the nobly romantic symphony of Schumann was read in a matter of fact way by healthy, robust lungs and a throat that needed occasionally emollient poltices and troches. I do not mean to say for a moment that the performance was bad, although the work of the orchestra was not its best, but the color was laid on with a trowel, and the color was about the same throughout the movement. In the finale Mr. Paur flirted and trifled with the lesser theme and "undiscoverable phrases," so that the pulse of the whole flagged.

Mr. Busoni gave a remarkable exhibition of technical prowess. At times he seemed the Corbett of the pianistic ring. Not that he pounded continually. On the contrary delicate passages were clean cut, polished and refined. But he was master of all technical exercises, sublime, supreme, incredible, impossible and transcendental. His arrangement of the Liszt Spanish Rhapsody is great sport and it is worth a mile walk to hear. With all his setting off of fireworks the pianist escaped unscathed. Not a finger, not even a joint was blown off, bruised or even blackened. Mr. Busoni was applauded furiously and recalled again and again.

The program for next Saturday is as follows:

Symphony in F, No. 8.....Beethoven
"Morceau Fantastique," pour violoncello et orchestre, (MS).....C. M. Loeffler
(First time.)
Ballet music, "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther".....Eugen d'Albert

* * *

The Musical and Dramatic World.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 31, 1894.

The programme of the Symphony Concert, Saturday evening, Jan. 27, was as follows:

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E flat major, Op. 127.
Maestoso. Allegro teneramente.
Adagio ma non troppo e molto cantabile.
Scherzando vivace. Finale.
DVORAK. FOUR LOVE SONGS, Op. 83.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard.
BEACH. ROMANZA for VIOLIN with Piano Accompaniment.
(MS. first time.)
SCHUMANN. PIANO QUINTET in E flat major, Op. 44.
Allegro brillante. In modo d'una marcia.
Scherzo (molto vivace). Allegro ma non troppo.

The overture to "Euryanthe" went with an amount of spontaneity, warmth and grace that left nothing to be desired, and Mr. Paur was absolutely at home with the work.

I have endeavored in vain to decide what is lacking in our conductor's reading of Schumann.

What subtle element is missing? Why this sense of disappointment? Is it a lack of refinement, is it carelessness, or the effect of more than one oversight in the finer points of this composer's music?

The Rákóczy March but proved the position I have heretofore maintained regarding Mr. Paur's grasp of Berlioz. It was masterly.

Of Mr. Busoni I can but wish that he had had different surroundings. His temperament in this concert was like a flash of lightning among a group of ministers.

The contrast between his magnetic touch and the support of the orchestra, caused his work to stand out hard, unyielding and crystalline. While the accompaniment sounded sluggish, especially in the Liszt Spanish Rhapsody, there was little, if any southern color in the band—although a plenty had been indicated in Mr. Busoni's orchestration.

The castenettes rattled into line just after the show had passed and loose ends were apparent everywhere.

Mr. Busoni is always masterly in the facility of his technique, and the brilliancy and crispness of his tone color, which has also great expansion; but he inclines to exaggeration in accent, and his phrasing approaches the chromo order. Especially when working with the Boston orchestra, composed largely of Germans, his eccentricities at times mar his performance.

On Monday evening, the Kneizel Quartette, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, tenor, gave a Chamber Concert at Chickering Hall.

Here is the programme:

KARL MARIA VON WEBER....Overture to "Euryanthe" in E flat major.
KARL MARIA VON WEBER....Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F minor, Op. 79.
I. Larghetto affettuoso (F minor).....3-4
Allegro passionato (F minor).....4-4
II. Tempo di Marcia (C major).....4-4
III. Presto giojoso (F major).....6-8
ROBERT SCHUMANN.....Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120
I. Ziemblich langsam (D minor).....3-4
Lebhaft (D minor).....2-4
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A minor).....3-4
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor).....3-4
Trio (B flat major).....3-4
IV. Langsam (D minor).....4-4
Lebhaft (D major).....4-4
FRANZ LISZT.....Spanish Rhapsody
(Rearranged as a Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra by F. BUSONI.)
HECTOR BERLIOZ....Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.
Soloist, Mr. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

Space is denied me to go into a critical analysis of the playing of this organization, but I will consider one point.

While the ensemble is excellent, the balance of color is open to criticism.

The leading violin and the 'cello are at all times conspicuous, both in power and precision.

The second violin is so weak that it occupies almost no place in point of individuality. The viola is again of still another temperament, and though more clearly heard than the second violin, the player opens a phrase with more or less hesitation.

There were times, in the Beethoven quartette, when the violin and 'cello seemed to be playing a duet, and the second violin and viola adding a pianissimo accompaniment.

In the second movement of the Schumann quartette, the solo phrases for the viola lacked solidity and color.

It is difficult to speak of Mrs. Beach and Mr. Hubbard without great danger of misinterpretation. They cannot be considered at the standard of the Kneigels, and yet they deserve mention. Mrs. Beach plays with sincerity and fluency, but her performance of the Schumann quintette contained too little depth, and she was unsteady in her tempi.

The little romanza for violin, exquisitely played by Mr. Kneizel, was very pretty, but hardly merited a place on such a programme.

Mr. Hubbard sang the Dvôrák songs carefully and with evident devotion, but the compositions were of a temper that he failed to grasp fully.

[82]

Telegram

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1894.

FRANZ KNEISEL'S TRIUMPH.

Third Symphony Concert a Masterly Performance.

There were a few seats that were not empty when Herr Paur stepped on the platform of Mechanics hall, last evening, to conduct the third of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts. But the attendance was so small that it is wonderful that the orchestra was able to put enough enthusiasm into its work to present such a magnificent quartet of numbers as it rendered. Widely differing as to composition and in the interpretation required, the numbers were such as to satisfy any critic, however exacting.

The program opened with three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, op. 17, by Hector Berlioz. The rendition was superb, and each succeeding movement seemed better than the other.

When Franz Kneisel stepped forward to play his violin solo, he was heartily received and both the artist and the concerto which he was to play were included in the welcome. Beethoven's concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61, is the only concerto for the violin from that composer's pen. It is one of the most difficult compositions ever written, and since its revival by Joachim, has been the most popular of all concertos, with the possible exception of Mendelssohn's.

Mr. Kneisel, Herr Paur and the orchestra were in perfect sympathy, last night, and Worcester ears never listened to a more delicious interpretation than that given by them. Mr. Kneisel, of course, took the lion's share of the honors, and laid stronger claim than ever to his position in the very front rank of violinists. Joachim's beautiful cadenza, played in a masterly way, brought the solo to a close, and the artist, bowing right and left, modestly accepted his triumph, and smiled at the "bravos," hand-clapping and hearty congratulations of his fellow musicians. He was forced to bow a dozen times, and then tucked his violin under his chin and lead the first violins as the orchestra quietly started into "A Siegfried idyl" by Wagner. Worcester's musical people listened a little critically to this selection and could not help comparing, though not to Herr Paur's detriment, the performance of the same selection by Seidl's orchestra last winter.

The concert ended in a flash of brilliancy and sparkling melody, the overture to "Euryanthe" in E flat major by Weber. It was a dazzling bit of instrumentation and came to an end all too soon, for it brought to a close a program of as fine music as was ever presented to a Worcester audience.

EVENING GAZETTE

WORCESTER, MASS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JAN. 31, 1894.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Berlioz, Beethoven, Wagner, and Von Weber.

Conductor Paur's third concert in Worcester took place last evening. He now has his great Orchestra thoroughly in sympathy with him, and there was even less room for criticism than at first. Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet Symphony" of Hector Berlioz formed the pièce de resistance,—the body of the concert. It was interesting, but not evenly engrossing. It was impossible for an auditor, however familiar with Shakspeare, to realize all the shades of action and feeling which the talented editor of the programme has guaranteed may be found in the music. It is not easy, even when "personally conducted" to imagine that Tybalt, the "rat-catcher," as Mercutio calls him, has scented out the party of Montagues in the ball room and that "fighting and sharp strokes are in the air." Besides there is no fighting in the ball room in Shakspeare's version of the tragedy. It must be admitted, however, by the most captious that the opening of the music which typifies Mercutio's famous soliloquy, beginning:—

"Oh then, I see, Queen Mab hath been with you."

was wonderfully light, bright and fairy like. This movement was the gem of the whole and was absolutely delightful. The several orchestral sections are thus characterized: I. "Romeo alone; melancholy; concert and ball; grand fête at the house of Capulet." II. "Love-scene." III. "Queen Mab, or the dream-fairy."

Any criticisms of the violin solo must be made against the selection and not against Mr. Kneisel, whose intelligent comprehension and almost perfect technique brought him unbounded applause from the Conductor and the Orchestra, as well as from the audience. The trouble was that there was no soul to the music, and it did not bring out what is best in a violin,—its sympathy and its sentiment. The concerto is based on a motive which suggests a deep feeling, but never quite sounds its depths. This melody only occasionally appears. The music is brilliant and difficult, but there is far more meaning in the accompaniment than in the solo. The cadenza, written by the violinist, Joachim, who resurrected this concerto, is quite in keeping with the rest. This was Beethoven's only violin concerto, and it may be guessed that he saw later that he failed to understand the instrument, for he arranged the solo part afterwards for the piano-forte, leaving the orchestral parts untouched, and published it as a piano-forte concerto. We speak only of the first movement, which was all that was played last night. It is essentially a brilliant and interesting concerto for the piano-forte. It is out of place on the violin. Mr. Kneisel owns a violin with a soul. We prefer it.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," written on themes taken from the Tetralogy, to commemorate the birth of his son, born while the opera "Siegfried" was in process of composition and named after it, was highly interesting and full of color. It is quiet;—not enough so to serve as a lullaby for the infant,—but so great a composer, however noisy by nature, could not forget his special theme. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" ended the programme, and at a later hour than heretofore. What we have said above need not be taken to mean that the concert was not enjoyed. The audience, which was small, seemed to enjoy it. Some were heard to say that it was the best of the season, and we could agree with them. The interpretation of the music was that of

Worcester Telegram

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1894.

FRANZ KNEISEL'S TRIUMPH.

Third Symphony Concert a Masterly Performance.

There were a few seats that were not empty when Herr Paur stepped on the platform of Mechanics hall, last evening, to conduct the third of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts. But the attendance was so small that it is wonderful that the orchestra was able to put enough enthusiasm into its work to present such a magnificent quartet of numbers as it rendered. Widely differing as to composition and in the interpretation required, the numbers were such as to satisfy any critic, however exacting.

The program opened with three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, op. 17, by Hector Berlioz. The rendition was superb, and each succeeding movement seemed better than the other.

When Franz Kneisel stepped forward to play his violin solo, he was heartily received and both the artist and the concerto which he was to play were included in the welcome. Beethoven's concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61, is the only concerto for the violin from that composer's pen. It is one of the most difficult compositions ever written, and since its revival by Joachim, has been the most popular of all concertos, with the possible exception of Mendelssohn's.

Mr. Kneisel, Herr Paur and the orchestra were in perfect sympathy, last night, and Worcester ears never listened to a more delicious interpretation than that given by them. Mr. Kneisel, of course, took the lion's share of the honors, and laid stronger claim than ever to his position in the very front rank of violinists. Joachim's beautiful cadenza, played in a masterly way, brought the solo to a close, and the artist, bowing right and left, modestly accepted his triumph, and smiled at the "bravos," hand-clapping and hearty congratulations of his fellow musicians. He was forced to bow a dozen times, and then tucked his violin under his chin and lead the first violins as the orchestra quietly started into "A Siegfried idyl" by Wagner. Worcester's musical people listened a little critically to this selection and could not help comparing, though not to Herr Paur's detriment, the performance of the same selection by Seidl's orchestra last winter.

The concert ended in a flash of brilliancy and sparkling melody, the overture to "Euryanthe" in E flat major by Weber. It was a dazzling bit of instrumentation and came to an end all too soon, for it brought to a close a program of as fine music as was ever presented to a Worcester audience.

EVENING GAZETTE

WORCESTER, MASS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JAN. 31, 1894.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Berlioz, Beethoven, Wagner, and Von Weber.

Conductor Paur's third concert in Worcester took place last evening. He now has his great Orchestra thoroughly in sympathy with him, and there was even less room for criticism than at first. Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet Symphony" of Hector Berlioz formed the pièce de resistance,—the body of the concert. It was interesting, but not evenly engrossing. It was impossible for an auditor, however familiar with Shakspeare, to realize all the shades of action and feeling which the talented editor of the programme has guaranteed may be found in the music. It is not easy, even when "personally conducted" to imagine that Tybalt, the "rat-catcher," as Mercutio calls him, has scented out the party of Montagues in the ball room and that "fighting and sharp strokes are in the air." Besides there is no fighting in the ball room in Shakspeare's version of the tragedy. It must be admitted, however, by the most captious that the opening of the music which typifies Mercutio's famous soliloquy, beginning:—

"Oh then, I see, Queen Mab hath been with you."

was wonderfully light, bright, and fairy like. This movement was the gem of the whole and was absolutely delightful. The several orchestral sections are thus characterized: I. "Romeo alone; melancholy; concert and ball; grand fête at the house of Capulet." II. "Love-scene." III. "Queen Mab, or the dream-fairy."

Any criticisms of the violin solo must be made against the selection and not against Mr. Kneisel, whose intelligent comprehension and almost perfect technique brought him unbounded applause from the Conductor and the Orchestra, as well as from the audience. The trouble was that there was no soul to the music, and it did not bring out what is best in a violin,—its sympathy and its sentiment. The concerto is based on a motive which suggests a deep feeling, but never quite sounds its depths. This melody only occasionally appears. The music is brilliant and difficult, but there is far more meaning in the accompaniment than in the solo. The cadenza, written by the violinist, Joachim, who resurrected this concerto, is quite in keeping with the rest. This was Beethoven's only violin concerto, and it may be guessed that he saw later that he failed to understand the instrument, for he arranged the solo part afterwards for the piano-forte, leaving the orchestral parts untouched, and published it as a piano-forte concerto. We speak only of the first movement, which was all that was played last night. It is essentially a brilliant and interesting concerto for the piano-forte. It is out of place on the violin. Mr. Kneisel owns a violin with a soul. We prefer it.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," written on themes taken from the Tetralogy, to commemorate the birth of his son, born while the opera "Siegfried" was in process of composition and named after it, was highly interesting and full of color. It is quiet,—not enough so to serve as a lullaby for the infant,—but so great a composer, however noisy by nature, could not forget his special theme. Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" ended the programme, and at a later hour than heretofore. What we have said above need not be taken to mean that the concert was not enjoyed. The audience, which was small, evidently did enjoy it. Some were heard to say that it was the best of the season, but not all would agree with them. The general effect of the music was that of lightness.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1894.

FROM the "Boston Saturday Evening Transcript" we cull a bit of wisdom. We all revere the classics, and confounded thrice be the man who would meddle with the precious legacy bequeathed us by the masters! But skillful editing and pruning, even curtailment is growing daily more necessary. Listen then to what Mr. Apthorp has to say on the subject and apropos of the B minor Bach suite played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

It is so good to hear almost anything by Sebastian Bach that when one of his works figures on a program one inclines somewhat to take it as a gift horse, not to be looked in the mouth. Yet there are considerations which should not quite be passed over in silence. A whole suite by Bach, whether for piano or orchestra, is a pretty large dose to take at once. With all that is great and immortal in the master's works, there are also things in them which time and the development of music since his day have thrown into obsolescence; and even the sincerest Bach lover, perhaps he more than anyone else, ought to wish these things wholly obsolete, buried for good and all.

We should not forget one important element in the relations between his music and the public—the enormous leisureliness of life, both social and artistic, in his day, compared with the push and bustle of our modern life. His was the time when people could stand, and were glad to enjoy huge doses of one and the same thing; they had time and to spare, and no doubt a good deal of it lay heavy on their hands; the comparative absence of acute excitement from their lives made them proportionately impervious to boredom; two hour sermons, well nigh endless arias, suites of seven or eight numbers all in the same key did not make them think of yawning. But we of to-day are otherwise constituted; we cannot well stand so much of the same thing at a sitting; our artistic sense craves more variety and contrast. We may take just as keen delight in a Bach aria as listeners did a hundred years ago; but enough is as good as a feast, and we resent that eternal da capo, in which a long first part is repeated without variations. We cut down Bach's and Händel's da capo nowadays to its smallest practicable limits, and with no injury either to the form or spirit of their airs.

In the same way a suite of seven or eight pieces connected together by no link of internal musical necessity, no one of them growing out of nor ideally developed from any of the others, and all of them in the same key—this sort of thing is a direct slap in the face, not only to our present musical habits, but to our highest and best musical instincts. It is the musical counterpart of the old two hour sermon; we do not enjoy it. We remember one of the most ardent, whole-souled and enlightened Bach lovers the world ever knew saying one day that he "could imagine no more infernal bore than listening to the whole of a Bach suite at a sitting." And what a high priest of the Bach cult rejects as too much is hardly wholesome food for the musical public at large. Of the seven numbers composing the B minor suite Mr. Pauer cut out the minuet (one page of full score), but he gave all the rest unflinchingly, and it certainly was too much of a good thing. Three numbers would have been enough.

Another consideration of unspeakable importance in the present case is the condition in which Bach left his scores. The continuo of the B minor suite is very elaborately figured all through, showing that every number was intended by the composer to have an organ or clavichord accompaniment. In some places an accompaniment in full harmony is absolutely indispensable; passages here and there in the fugue of the first movement, in the second bourrée and the whole double of the polonaise need to be filled out. The suite was given without any accompaniment whatever, the bare places above referred to sounding as unlike Bach as possible. Otherwise the plan on which the suite was given—with two and sometimes three flutes to counterbalance the large mass of strings—was excellent.

BOSTON, January 28, 1894.

THE Kneisel Quartet gave the fifth concert of its ninth season the evening of the 23d in Chickering Hall. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard assisted. The program was as follows:

Quartet, E flat major, op. 127.....Beethoven
Four love songs, op. 83.....Dvorák
Mr. Eliot Hubbard.
Romanza for violin, with piano accompaniment.....Beach
(MS. First time.)
Piano quintet, op. 44.....Schumann

Mirabile dictu! In the performance of the quartet of Beethoven there was a lack of precision; the intonation was at times impure, and there was an unusual roughness. These failings, rare in a Kneisel concert, were particularly noticeable in the first and the last two movements. The adagio was nobly played, and this one movement is the glory of the quartet.

I am not sure that many would listen patiently to the quartet as a whole, if it were not signed with the name of Beethoven. But that which is unintelligible in it was enjoyed outwardly, and Monday evening there were frequent exclamations of "Grand! beautiful! lovely!" applied rather indiscriminately.

Mrs. Beach's romanza was first played in Chicago last summer by Miss Maud Powell and the composer. This last week it gave a Boston audience pleasure. Mrs. Beach in the romanza, as well as in the quintet, played with accuracy and firmness.

Mr. Hubbard sang four dull songs by Dvorák. That they seemed dull was possibly the fault of the singer, for he sang without dramatic discrimination and his enunciation was so defective that it was not easy to catch the meaning of the German text. Mr. Hubbard has gained in certain respects: his delivery is less explosive, his sentences are more firmly bound together, but he is out of place when he assists in a concert of the Kneisel Quartet.

* * *

The program of the thirteenth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Karl Maria von Weber - Overture to "Euryanthe," in E flat major
Karl Maria von Weber, Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F minor, op. 79.
I. Larghetto affetuoso (F minor) - - - 3-4
Allegro passionato (F minor) - - - - 4-4
II. Tempo di Marcia (C major) - - - - 4-4
III. Presto giojoso (F major) - - - - 6-8
Robert Schumann - - - Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor) - - - - 3-4
Lebhaft (D minor) - - - - - - 2-4
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A minor) - 3-4
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor) - - - - 3-4
Trio (B-flat major) - - - - - - 3-4
IV. Langsam (D minor) - - - - - - 4-4
Lebhaft (D major) - - - - - - - 4-4
Franz Liszt - - - - - - - - Spanish Rhapsody
(Rearranged as a Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra by F. BUSONI.)
Hector Berlioz, Rákóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24.

Will you kindly print this program verbatim et literatim, just to show the outside world how precise we are here in such matters? This program is taken out of the program book. Please be careful about the figures and the accents.

I cannot understand, however, why Mr. Busoni's first name was dwarfed ignominiously as a mere initial. Ferruccio is a brave, mouth filling word, and it often gives the key to his performance.

The romantic, the nobly romantic symphony of Schumann was read in a matter of fact way by healthy, robust lungs and a throat that needed occasionally emollient poltices and troches. I do not mean to say for a moment that the performance was bad, although the work of the orchestra was not its best, but the color was laid on with a trowel, and the color was about the same throughout the movement. In the finale Mr. Paur flirted and trifled with the lesser theme and "undiscoverable phrases," so that the pulse of the whole flagged.

Mr. Busoni gave a remarkable exhibition of technical prowess. At times he seemed the Corbett of the pianistic ring. Not that he pounded continually. On the contrary delicate passages were clean cut, polished and refined. But he was master of all technical exercises, sublime, supreme, incredible, impossible and transcendental. His arrangement of the Liszt Spanish Rhapsody is great sport and it is worth a mile walk to hear. With all his setting off of fireworks the pianist escaped unscathed. Not a finger, not even a joint was blown off, bruised or even blackened. Mr. Busoni was applauded furiously and recalled again and again.

The program for next Saturday is as follows:

Symphony in F, No. 8.....Beethoven
"Morceau Fantastique," pour violoncello et orchestre, (MS).....C. M. Loeffler
(First time.)
Ballet music, "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther".....Eugen d'Albert

*

The Musical and Dramatic World.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 31, 1894.

The programme of the Symphony Concert, Saturday evening, Jan. 27, was as follows:

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E flat major, Op. 127.
Maestoso. Allegro teneramente.
Adagio ma non troppo e molto cantabile.
Scherzando vivace. Finale.
DVORAK. FOUR LOVE SONGS, Op. 83.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard.
BEACH. ROMANZA for VIOLIN with Piano Accompanimen'.
(MS. first time.)
SCHUMANN. PIANO QUINTET in E flat major, Op. 44.
Allegro brillante. In modo d'una marcia.
Scherzo (molto vivace). Allegro ma non troppo.

The overture to "Euryanthe" went with an amount of spontaneity, warmth and grace that left nothing to be desired, and Mr. Paur was absolutely at home with the work.

I have endeavored in vain to decide what is lacking in our conductor's reading of Schumann.

What subtle element is missing? Why this sense of disappointment? Is it a lack of refinement, is it carelessness, or the effect of more than one oversight in the finer points of this composer's music?

The Rákóczy March but proved the position I have heretofore maintained regarding Mr. Paur's grasp of Berlioz. It was masterly.

Of Mr. Busoni I can but wish that he had had different surroundings. His temperament in this concert was like a flash of lightning among a group of ministers.

The contrast between his magnetic touch and the support of the orchestra, caused his work to stand out hard, unyielding and crystalline. While the accompaniment sounded sluggish, especially in the Liszt Spanish Rhapsody, there was little, if any southern color in the band—although a plenty had been indicated in Mr. Busoni's orchestration.

The castenettes rattled into line just after the show had passed and loose ends were apparent everywhere.

Mr. Busoni is always masterly in the facility of his technique, and the brilliancy and crispness of his tone color, which has also great expansion; but he inclines to exaggeration in accent, and his phrasing approaches the chromo order. Especially when working with the Boston orchestra, composed largely of Germans, his eccentricities at times mar his performance.

On Monday evening, the Kneizel Quartette, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist, and Mr. Eliot Hubbard, tenor, gave a Chamber Concert at Chickering Hall.

Here is the programme:

KARL MARIA VON WEBER....Overture to "Euryanthe" in E flat major.
KARL MARIA VON WEBER....Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F minor, Op. 79.
I. Larghetto affettuoso (F minor).....3-4
Allegro passionato (F minor).....4-4
II. Tempo di Marcia (C major).....4-4
III. Presto giojoso (F major).....6-8
ROBERT SCHUMANN.....Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor).....3-4
Lebhaft (D minor).....2-4
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A minor).....3-4
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor).....3-4
Trio (B flat major).....3-4
IV. Langsam (D minor).....4-4
Lebhaft (D major).....4-4
FRANZ LISZT.....Spanish Rhapsody
(Rearranged as a Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra by F. BUSONI.)
HECTOR BERLIOZ....Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.
Soloist, Mr. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

Space is denied me to go into a critical analysis of the playing of this organization, but I will consider one point.

While the ensemble is excellent, the balance of color is open to criticism.

The leading violin and the 'cello are at all times conspicuous, both in power and precision.

The second violin is so weak that it occupies almost no place in point of individuality. The viola is again of still another temperament, and though more clearly heard than the second violin, the player opens a phrase with more or less hesitation.

There were times, in the Beethoven quartette, when the violin and 'cello seemed to be playing a duet, and the second violin and viola adding a pianissimo accompaniment.

In the second movement of the Schumann quartette, the solo phrases for the viola lacked solidity and color.

It is difficult to speak of Mrs. Beach and Mr. Hubbard without great danger of misinterpretation. They cannot be considered at the standard of the Kneigels, and yet they deserve mention. Mrs. Beach plays with sincerity and fluency, but her performance of the Schumann quintette contained too little depth, and she was unsteady in her tempi.

The little romanza for violin, exquisitely played by Mr. Kneizel, was very pretty, but hardly merited a place on such a programme.

Mr. Hubbard sang the Dvôrák songs carefully and with evident devotion, but the compositions were of a temper that he failed to grasp fully.

[82]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 4, 1894.

NEW COMPOSITIONS AT THE SYMPHONY.

The audience at the fourteenth Symphony concert evidently found its chief satisfaction in Mr. C. M. Loeffler's new composition for violoncello and orchestra, entitled by him "A Fantastic Concerto," and played with Mr. Schroeder for the soloist. It is true that Beethoven's ever fresh and favorite eighth symphony began the evening and might have been expecsed to so fill the mind with thought and pleasure that an orchestral composition of our day, following immediately after it, would seem tame and unremunerative. But the symphony has had better readings than that which the band gave it last night; for the men played rather as if they were relying too much upon their own familiarity with the score, so that there were roughness, inelegance, heaviness, and even inaccuracy in the performance. The audience responded with thanks, but not with enthusiasm.

Mr. Loeffler gave an intimation last winter, in the string sextette which the Kneisel Quartette played, that he is a man who has something to say and knows how to say it. This concerto enforced that affirmation. It is music of the time in its diversity of ideas and its fantasies of treatment; it passes unexpectedly from one phase to another, alternating the smoothest and calmest ensembles with the most vivacious and ecstatic individual virtuosity; it has passages in which the solo instrument is heard alone, and others in which piccolo, tuba, cymbals, triangle and harp are invoked to assist the standard orchestra. Yet it does not seem eccentric, extravagant or far fetched; the successive phases, however opposite in tone and tenor, apparently belong together, like the strange colors which lie side by side in some sunset skies. The concerto has fine changes of tempo and of theme, but there is no suspension of the continuous flow, and the disposition of the solo part against those of the orchestra is intelligent and handled with mastery, while the separate themes are interesting, easily followed and original. The score is not unlike that by Mr. Busoni, which was heard a week ago in the respect that it uses some instruments in sharp, short sallies and in quaint emphases: but it differs from it in this—that where Mr. Busoni's instrumentation was erratic, laborious and difficult to fit together, Mr. Loeffler's is natural, fluent, and emerges from the instruments with the suggestion that each odd little bit is just where it ought to be, can be found without anxiety and presented with facility. The solo part is of immense difficulty as well as of frequent beauty, and even Mr. Schroeder's eminent virtuosity was none too much for the brilliant variations upon the Russian theme of the fourth part, nor for the extraordinary long and elaborate cadenza. The concerto was greatly applauded and both composer and player were personally applauded.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors" followed, and it was pleasant to notice that Mr. Loeffler's scoring did not suffer in comparison with the poetic and fanciful treatment of these dances.

The concert ended with another novelty—D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." Without knowing something about what kind of a thing that "Esther" is—and the programme book was silent as usual upon a subject about which its readers must be personally ignorant and without ready means of informing themselves—it is not possible to say how well this overture does its duty. But in itself, although of clever mechanical construction, it is not particularly interesting and gives little to remember. It has a rather sturdy introducton with some brass and a good deal of drum. Then there is a slower and prettier part, mildly tinged with the romantic; another phase, in which a tripping or trotting figure is recognizable; and a full and resonant, but by no means dramatic or exciting, conclusion. The listener can assumed that the theme is Biblical and fit on at his pleasure, the pomp of Ahasuerus, the soft persuasions of Esther, the insinuations of Haman, the cavalcade of Mordecai and the imperious judgment which rounds out the Hebrew story. Having done which, he may find that he is all wrong. But all the same, any one of a dozen bright and gay French overtures would have given a nicer ending to the concert, which was pleasantly brief.

There will be no concert next week, but for the succeeding week the programme assigns to the orchestra together with Brahm's second symphony, these novelties—Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt" overture and Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini." Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist and he will introduce new violin pieces by Bruch and Saint-Saens.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 5, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

Not since the days of Henschel as conductor, have there been so many novelties upon our symphonic programmes. The concert of Saturday gave a new violincello concerto and an unfamiliar overture, while the next programme is to present Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt," Bruch's "Romanza" for violin, St. Saens' "Morceau de Concert" for the same instrument, and Tschaikowski's symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," an array of novelties sufficient to appal the reviewer and to delight the general auditor.

The concert of Saturday began with Beethoven's eighth symphony. This is the "humorous symphony" par excellence, and it is pleasant to note that most of the playful touches were given with sufficient appreciation of their intent. The piquant ritenuto effects of the chief theme of the first movement could have had more grace, but the brusquerie of the second movement was excellently portrayed. The minuet of this symphony is an idealization of what Haydn attempted in this form, much nearer to Haydn's style than the minuet of the first symphony, but it is the only point in which the work at all resembles the older school, and even here the bold touches of horn and clarinette remove it from the older style of scoring. The clarinette was played too forcibly, but the horn was perfect in this as in other works of the programme. The finale went brilliantly, the chattering figure of the chief theme was clearly read, and that sudden jump from the garret to the cellar, where the figure of the flutes is answered so brusquely by the contrabasses, was given with appropriate emphasis, although the latter instruments might have had even more of gruffness; but this was a fault which proceeded from numerical weakness, for our orchestra could well bear the addition of two contrabasses, where there is such a powerful body of violins. Those comical octaves for bassoon and kettle-drum were charmingly played, the drummer repressing himself for a single and only time, for which he repaid himself by playing more forcibly than ever through the rest of the concert. Per contra, the bassoon might have been more prominent in this symphony; if ever there was a bassoon symphony, it is this. Beethoven loved the bassoon as Weber loved the horn. He cared little however, for that earnest side of the instrument, which Meyerbeer brought out in the rising of the nuns, in "Robert le Diable," or Berlioz in the "March to Execution, but enjoyed its humor, and was, as he termed it, "aufgeknoepft," when he wrote obbligato effects for this clown of the orchestra. The tuning of the drums in octaves was a new device in its time, yet Beethoven, from the very first symphony, showed a disposition to do new things with the kettle-drums, and had already tuned in sixths in his seventh symphony.

A violoncello concerto composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler came next, and was brilliantly performed by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. It is difficult to speak fairly of this work on a first hearing, but it seems as if one might give the poet's advice, to the composer:—

"Be bold! be bold! be not too bold."

for there is a constant boldness in the treatment and modulation that causes the auditor mental effort at every turn; it is too modern in its progressions and some of its orchestral combinations are experimental. The passages for flute and cello sounded empty and some of the piccolo work suggested the march of the first act of "Carmen." The work at first seemed too improvisational in flavor, it left the impression of being disjointed and spasmodic, its ideas seemed loosely strung together. The Russian finale reminded the reviewer of how much better the composer had done in his sextette, a composition which greatly overshadows this work. There was brilliancy in the solo part and to spare; if virtuosity is its own reward, then Mr. Schroeder must be quite content, for he conquered many furious difficulties in the course of the concerto. The cadenza in the finale was phenomenal, and the broad work on the C string, the clear harmonics, the double-stopped passages, were all very wonderful. There was great enthusiasm at the close, and both the performer and the composer were applauded to the echo. Mr. Schroeder had played finely, and Mr. Loeffler is respected and admired by all who have ever known him, so that the outburst was to have been expected; yet the reviewer cannot consider this concerto as the composer's best work.

One should feel grateful to Mr. Paur for giving such music as the ballet numbers from Rubenstein's "Feramors"; it is not below the dignity of these concerts to have such pretty numbers once in a while, and if these musical dainties might be followed by such numbers as St. Saens' "Suite Algerienne," Massenet's "Dimanche au Village," etc., it would give an added charm to the concerts.

The "Feramors" ballet music is far more graceful and characteristic than that which the same composer has given in "The Demon," and its delicacy was splendidly brought out by the orchestra. It was given with a praiseworthy perfection of ensemble and shading.

The concert ended with D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," which was a work showing that there are lofty possibilities in the great pianist. The themes were ponderous, and there was strong dramatic contrast evident; at times the rhythmic changes and syncopations seemed to promise a Schumann, but at the end it left no very definite impression. Some of the climaxes were well wrought up, but the art of concealing art had not been attained in the work. It was broadly and majestically played, and the excellence of the horn and oboe work deserves special mention.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1894.

The Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening, Mr. Paur conductor, in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8 ..... Beethoven
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra (MS. (First time) ..... C. M. Loeffler
Ballet Music, "Feramors ..... Rubinstein
1. Candle dance of the Brides of Cashmere.
2. Dance of Bayaderes.
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther" ..... d'Albert

The symphony was well read and well played. The famous allegretto scherzando that is said to have made Schopenhauer forget that the world was nothing but a receiving vault of hopes and illusions was given delightfully, and it was a pleasure to find Mr. Paur believing in the theory that the third movement was intended to be played as an old fashioned symphonic menuet.

***

It was also a great pleasure to hear again extracts from the beautiful ballet music in "Feramora." The operas of Rubinstein are not long-lived, and they will probably only be remembered on account of the ballet music, as in "Feramors," "Nero" and "The Demon," just as for a long time the famous overture of Mehul preserved the name of an unsuccessful opera. The music played last evening is exquisite in conception and in instrumentation. "Too frivolous," I hear some one say. But, good sir, or sweet madam, do you wish to listen to symphonies and symphonic poems and long-winded concertos with cadenzas of still longer wind all the time? Because Brahms lives, must Auber apologize for his own birth, life and death? Because Dvorak is a musician of great talent, has Bizet or Delibes no right to musical existence? Such music as this ballet in "Feramors" shows imagination and refined technical skill. And let it here be said that any one of a half dozen, at least, of Auber's overtures is more deserving of a place in a Symphony concert than the mischmasch known to men as d'Albert's overture to "Esther."

The fastidious Gericke knew the value of these voluptuous danses by Rubinstein. They were last played here in a Symphony concert in October, 1885. Would that Mr. Paur would let us hear Delibes's charming suite "Le roi s' amuse," in which ancient danse-forms are clothed in sympathetic, adorning and not impertinent, not incongruous dress.

***

Mr. Loeffler is well known to us all as an admirable violinist and a composer of ingenuity and refined taste. He has named his concerto "fantastic" and with reason; the music seems like the sleep-chasings of a fanciful musician. There is much in this work that is imaginative and ingenious; perhaps, on account of its title, it is wrong to crave a little more solidity in thought and in treatment. Mr. Loeffler here seems to me to be a symbolist; not grim and cruel like Maeterlinck and some of his French neighbors, but a man of fine and wandering fancy, who uses words chiefly for their rhythm and color. The greatest charm in his work is the piquant instrumentation; and yet right here there is an absence of fullness, when well-nourished inner parts would fill the longing of the hearer. That which follows the beginning of the adagio seems the stronger part of the work. The theme (Russian, as stated by the program book), is not particularly attractive, and the variations are not all interesting. The impression made after one hearing is that Mr. Loeffler was not fortunate in securing a first-class melodic idea. But his work, in spite of lack of cohesion and balanced sentences, is often interesting, never cheap, vulgar, sensational. It was played with loving care and with skill by Mr. Schroeder, and player and composer were stormily applauded.

***

Mr. d'Albert's overture was first performed in this country, I believe, at a Sarasate d'Albert concert in New York, during the season of '89-'90, and under the beat of the composer. The overture was entitled originally, "Dramatic Overture," and the present title was an afterthought.

Some of us have read through the Book of Esther; and some have heard in their younger days the cantata by Mr. Butterfield (?) known as "Esther, the Beautiful Queen;" but how many in the audience last night knew Grillparzer's "Esther" well enough to be moved or obstructed or reminded by d' Albert's music.

The overture is a collection of episodes. The themes are neither fresh nor beautiful nor striking, and little is done with them after they are announced. The composer plays with them as with checkermen; now he brings forward one, and now another; but he does not win the game. He is terribly in earnest, he studies carefully each move, but he has no organized plan; he moves each piece for itself, and he does not win the game, this serious man, this gnome of the piano. And now please put it back on the shelf, Mr. Paur, and let it slumber by the side of pieces by Humperdinck and Riemenschneider.

***

The symphonic poem by Tschaikowsky, to be played the 17th, is "Francesca da Rimini" and not "Romeo and Juliet," as announced in the program book.

PHILIP HALE.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Samstag 3. Februar 1894.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester wird am nächsten Mittwoch Abend das vorletzte Konzert unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur in unserer Academy of Music geben. Als Solist wird der bekannte ausgezeichnete Bassist Herr Max Heinrich fungiren. Das Programm bietet folgende Nummern: Symphonie in C-Moll, No. 1, Brahms; Lied, mit Orchester, „Die Allmacht," Schubert; Entre Acte, „Gwendoline," Chabrier; Ballet-Musik, „Feramors," Rubinstein; „Wotan's Abschied und Feuerzauber," Wagner.

Tickets sind jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 4.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony in F, No. 8, Beethoven; Concerto Fantastique, for violoncello and orchestra (MS.), C. M Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music, "Feramorz, Rubinstein; Overture "Esther," E. d'Albert (first time.) The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The Symphony was beautifully read, the tempi were faultless, and the playing throughout was of the finest. In listening to Mr. Loeffler's concerto, it is necessary to remember the qualification "Fantastique" that is attached to it. The work has evidently been composed with great thought and care. It is strikingly new, is admirable in its contrasts of orchestral tone color, and the instrumentation is often surprising in its fresh combinations. It is well divided between the orchestra and the solo instrument and forms a strongly welded whole. It is so full of novel effects that more than a single hearing is necessary to a complete appreciation of its merit. The style is wholly modern. The opening movement is broad and dignified in its general aspect; but occasionally it is exceedingly brilliant. The themes are gracefully melodious, and their development is as ingenious as it is interesting. The slow movement has a fascinating theme, of rare refinement, and abounds in lovely moments, especially in the instrumentation. The finale is founded on a very brief theme in the Russian style, and is elaborately developed through variations for the solo instrument and the orchestra. It is remarkable for the variety of treatment to which it is subjected, and for the clearness that sways all its intricacies. Here the solo cello and the other instruments are used in the most brilliant manner. It is impossible to do full justice to the concerto in the brief space we have at our command, but we have room to say that it is creditable in every way to the fine musicianship of its composer and is a work upon which he may justly pride himself. The solo part bristles with difficulties, but they were overcome in a masterly manner by Mr. Schroeder, whose skill has never been evidenced more convincingly than it was in his performances on this occasion. The work was listened to with rapt attention, and though it is somewhat long, interest in it never flagged. At its end the audience broke into a spontaneous outburst of applause, and recalled the soloist again and again, and also paid enthusiastic tribute to the composer, who seemed modestly bent on keeping himself in the background. The pretty "Feramorz" music was exquisitely played. The D'Albert overture is a clearer work than we expected from its composer. It is not extravagantly modern, is fairly melodious and is richly scored. There is nothing to be said against it, except that is noisy and uninteresting. The programme for the next concert is Symphony No. 2, Brahms; a new overture by Hartmann; two solos for violin, one by Bruch and one by Saint Saens; and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini." The soloist is Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 35.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alwyn Schroeder.

The novelty in the Symphony concert programme of last evening, played at Music Hall by the Boston orchestra, was Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Fantastic Concerto," for violincello and orchestra, which is still in manuscript.

Mr. Loeffler's popularity as one of the leading violins of the orchestra gives a peculiar interest to any composition which he contributes at these concerts, and in this new concerto he has quite fully realized the expectations of those who are familiar with his earlier contributions to local programmes. Mr. Loeffler is a capital musician, with a thorough knowledge of the art of composition, possessed of good taste in the choice of forms, and a master in orchestration. All these characteristics are shown in his concerto of last night, and its merits were quickly recognized both by the audience and his fellow-players in the orchestra. The work is in five short movements, which are played without pause, and in the concerto he has made use of some grand and imposing themes, which are treated in a masterly fashion. He introduces a cadenza for the solo 'cello which is full of difficult passages for the player, and, demands a perfect mastery of the instrument. Mr. Loeffler was fortunate in having the solo work given to Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, whose playing throughout the concerto was equal to his best efforts in these concerts. The concerto and its performance were alike vastly enjoyed by the audience, and at its conclusion the composer and soloist were alike honored by the audience with a great ovation.

Another novelty of a less interesting character in the programme was Eugen D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." This composition is an ably written one, and scored for the ordinary grand orchestra. D'Albert follows conservative forms in his instrumentation, and the themes which are of striking originality are well worked out, and the overture is brought to a very effective and dramatic climax. It is, however, a work that would not generally interest an audience other than as a novelty.

Co ductor Paur introduced his programme with a brilliant performance of the eighth Beethoven symphony, and also included in its numbers the "Candle Dance" and the Dance of the Bayaderes" from the ballet music of "Feramors."

The orchestra makes its usual tour next week, and for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and some novelties by Hartmann, Bruch, Saint-Saens and Tschaikowsky are announced, with Mr. C. M. Loeffler as soloist.

[83]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 4, 1894.

NEW COMPOSITIONS AT THE SYMPHONY.

The audience at the fourteenth Symphony concert evidently found its chief satisfaction in Mr. C. M. Loeffler's new composition for violoncello and orchestra, entitled by him "A Fantastic Concerto," and played with Mr. Schroeder for the soloist. It is true that Beethoven's ever fresh and favorite eighth symphony began the evening and might have been expecsed to so fill the mind with thought and pleasure that an orchestral composition of our day, following immediately after it, would seem tame and unremunerative. But the symphony has had better readings than that which the band gave it last night; for the men played rather as if they were relying too much upon their own familiarity with the score, so that there were roughness, inelegance, heaviness, and even inaccuracy in the performance. The audience responded with thanks, but not with enthusiasm.

Mr. Loeffler gave an intimation last winter, in the string sextette which the Kneisel Quartette played, that he is a man who has something to say and knows how to say it. This concerto enforced that affirmation. It is music of the time in its diversity of ideas and its fantasies of treatment; it passes unexpectedly from one phase to another, alternating the smoothest and calmest ensembles with the most vivacious and ecstatic individual virtuosity; it has passages in which the solo instrument is heard alone, and others in which piccolo, tuba, cymbals, triangle and harp are invoked to assist the standard orchestra. Yet it does not seem eccentric, extravagant or far fetched; the successive phases, however opposite in tone and tenor, apparently belong together, like the strange colors which lie side by side in some sunset skies. The concerto has fine changes of tempo and of theme, but there is no suspension of the continuous flow, and the disposition of the solo part against those of the orchestra is intelligent and handled with mastery, while the separate themes are interesting, easily followed and original. The score is not unlike that by Mr. Busoni, which was heard a week ago in the respect that it uses some instruments in sharp, short sallies and in quaint emphases: but it differs from it in this—that where Mr. Busoni's instrumentation was erratic, laborious and difficult to fit together, Mr. Loeffler's is natural, fluent, and emerges from the instruments with the suggestion that each odd little bit is just where it ought to be, can be found without anxiety and presented with facility. The solo part is of immense difficulty as well as of frequent beauty, and even Mr. Schroeder's eminent virtuosity was none too much for the brilliant variations upon the Russian theme of the fourth part, nor for the extraordinary long and elaborate cadenza. The concerto was greatly applauded and both composer and player were personally applauded.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors" followed, and it was pleasant to notice that Mr. Loeffler's scoring did not suffer in comparison with the poetic and fanciful treatment of these dances.

The concert ended with another novelty—D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." Without knowing something about what kind of a thing that "Esther" is—and the programme book was silent as usual upon a subject about which its readers must be personally ignorant and without ready means of informing themselves—it is not possible to say how well this overture does its duty. But in itself, although of clever mechanical construction, it is not particularly interesting and gives little to remember. It has a rather sturdy introducton with some brass and a good deal of drum. Then there is a slower and prettier part, mildly tinged with the romantic; another phase, in which a tripping or trotting figure is recognizable; and a full and resonant, but by no means dramatic or exciting, conclusion. The listener can assumed that the theme is Biblical and fit on at his pleasure, the pomp of Ahasuerus, the soft persuasions of Esther, the insinuations of Haman, the cavalcade of Mordecai and the imperious judgment which rounds out the Hebrew story. Having done which, he may find that he is all wrong. But all the same, any one of a dozen bright and gay French overtures would have given a nicer ending to the concert, which was pleasantly brief.

There will be no concert next week, but for the succeeding week the programme assigns to the orchestra together with Brahm's second symphony, these novelties—Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt" overture and Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini." Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist and he will introduce new violin pieces by Bruch and Saint-Saens.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 5, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

Not since the days of Henschel as conductor, have there been so many novelties upon our symphonic programmes. The concert of Saturday gave a new violincello concerto and an unfamiliar overture, while the next programme is to present Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt," Bruch's "Romanza" for violin, St. Saens' "Morceau de Concert" for the same instrument, and Tschaikowski's symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," an array of novelties sufficient to appal the reviewer and to delight the general auditor.

The concert of Saturday began with Beethoven's eighth symphony. This is the "humorous symphony" par excellence, and it is pleasant to note that most of the playful touches were given with sufficient appreciation of their intent. The piquant ritenuto effects of the chief theme of the first movement could have had more grace, but the brusquerie of the second movement was excellently portrayed. The minuet of this symphony is an idealization of what Haydn attempted in this form, much nearer to Haydn's style than the minuet of the first symphony, but it is the only point in which the work at all resembles the older school, and even here the bold touches of horn and clarinette remove it from the older style of scoring. The clarinette was played too forcibly, but the horn was perfect in this as in other works of the programme. The finale went brilliantly, the chattering figure of the chief theme was clearly read, and that sudden jump from the garret to the cellar, where the figure of the flutes is answered so brusquely by the contrabasses, was given with appropriate emphasis, although the latter instruments might have had even more of gruffness; but this was a fault which proceeded from numerical weakness, for our orchestra could well bear the addition of two contrabasses, where there is such a powerful body of violins. Those comical octaves for bassoon and kettle-drum were charmingly played, the drummer repressing himself for a single and only time, for which he repaid himself by playing more forcibly than ever through the rest of the concert. Per contra, the bassoon might have been more prominent in this symphony; if ever there was a bassoon symphony, it is this. Beethoven loved the bassoon as Weber loved the horn. He cared little however, for that earnest side of the instrument, which Meyerbeer brought out in the rising of the nuns, in "Robert le Diable," or Berlioz in the "March to Execution, but enjoyed its humor, and was, as he termed it, "aufgeknoepft," when he wrote obbligato effects for this clown of the orchestra. The tuning of the drums in octaves was a new device in its time, yet Beethoven, from the very first symphony, showed a disposition to do new things with the kettle-drums, and had already tuned in sixths in his seventh symphony.

A violoncello concerto composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler came next, and was brilliantly performed by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. It is difficult to speak fairly of this work on a first hearing, but it seems as if one might give the poet's advice, to the composer:—

"Be bold! be bold! be not too bold."

for there is a constant boldness in the treatment and modulation that causes the auditor mental effort at every turn; it is too modern in its progressions and some of its orchestral combinations are experimental. The passages for flute and cello sounded empty and some of the piccolo work suggested the march of the first act of "Carmen." The work at first seemed too improvisational in flavor, it left the impression of being disjointed and spasmodic, its ideas seemed loosely strung together. The Russian finale reminded the reviewer of how much better the composer had done in his sextette, a composition which greatly overshadows this work. There was brilliancy in the solo part and to spare; if virtuosity is its own reward, then Mr. Schroeder must be quite content, for he conquered many furious difficulties in the course of the concerto. The cadenza in the finale was phenomenal, and the broad work on the C string, the clear harmonics, the double-stopped passages, were all very wonderful. There was great enthusiasm at the close, and both the performer and the composer were applauded to the echo. Mr. Schroeder had played finely, and Mr. Loeffler is respected and admired by all who have ever known him, so that the outburst was to have been expected; yet the reviewer cannot consider this concerto as the composer's best work.

One should feel grateful to Mr. Paur for giving such music as the ballet numbers from Rubenstein's "Feramors"; it is not below the dignity of these concerts to have such pretty numbers once in a while, and if these musical dainties might be followed by such numbers as St. Saens' "Suite Algerienne," Massenet's "Dimanche au Village," etc., it would give an added charm to the concerts.

The "Feramors" ballet music is far more graceful and characteristic than that which the same composer has given in "The Demon," and its delicacy was splendidly brought out by the orchestra. It was given with a praiseworthy perfection of ensemble and shading.

The concert ended with D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," which was a work showing that there are lofty possibilities in the great pianist. The themes were ponderous, and there was strong dramatic contrast evident; at times the rhythmic changes and syncopations seemed to promise a Schumann, but at the end it left no very definite impression. Some of the climaxes were well wrought up, but the art of concealing art had not been attained in the work. It was broadly and majestically played, and the excellence of the horn and oboe work deserves especial mention.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1894.

The Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening, Mr. Paur conductor, in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra (MS. (First time).....C. M. Loeffler
Ballet Music, "Feramors".....Rubinstein
1. Candle dance of the Brides of Cashmere.
2. Dance of Bayaderes.
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther".....d'Albert

The symphony was well read and well played. The famous allegretto scherzando that is said to have made Schopenhauer forget that the world was nothing but a receiving vault of hopes and illusions was given delightfully, and it was a pleasure to find Mr. Paur believing in the theory that the third movement was intended to be played as an old fashioned symphonic menuet.

***

It was also a great pleasure to hear again extracts from the beautiful ballet music in "Feramors." The operas of Rubinstein are not long-lived, and they will probably only be remembered on account of the ballet music, as in "Feramors," "Nero" and "The Demon," just as for a long time the famous overture of Mehul preserved the name of an unsuccessful opera. The music played last evening is exquisite in conception and in instrumentation. "Too frivolous," I hear some one say. But, good sir, or sweet madam, do you wish to listen to symphonies and symphonic poems and long-winded concertos with cadenzas of still longer wind all the time? Because Brahms lives, must Auber apologize for his own birth, life and death? Because Dvorak is a musician of great talent, has Bizet or Delibes no right to musical existence? Such music as this ballet in "Feramors" shows imagination and refined technical skill. And let it here be said that any one of a half dozen, at least, of Auber's overtures is more deserving of a place in a Symphony concert than the mischmasch known to men as d'Albert's overture to "Esther."

The fastidious Gericke knew the value of these voluptuous danses by Rubinstein. They were last played here in a Symphony concert in October, 1885. Would that Mr. Paur would let us hear Delibes's charming suite "Le roi s' amuse," in which ancient danse-forms are clothed in sympathetic, adorning and not impertinent, not incongruous dress.

***

Mr. Loeffler is well known to us all as an admirable violinist and a composer of ingenuity and refined taste. He has named his concerto "fantastic" and with reason; the music seems like the sleep-chasings of a fanciful musician. There is much in this work that is imaginative and ingenious; perhaps, on account of its title, it is wrong to crave a little more solidity in thought and in treatment. Mr. Loeffler here seems to me to be a symbolist; not grim and cruel like Maeterlinck and some of his French neighbors, but a man of fine and wandering fancy, who uses words chiefly for their rhythm and color. The greatest charm in his work is the piquant instrumentation; and yet right here there is an absence of fullness, when well-nourished inner parts would fill the longing of the hearer. That which follows the beginning of the adagio seems the stronger part of the work. The theme (Russian, as stated by the program book), is not particularly attractive, and the variations are not all interesting. The impression made after one hearing is that Mr. Loeffler was not fortunate in securing a first-class melodic idea. But his work, in spite of lack of cohesion and balanced sentences, is often interesting, never cheap, vulgar, sensational. It was played with loving care and with skill by Mr. Schroeder, and player and composer were stormily applauded.

***

Mr. d'Albert's overture was first performed in this country, I believe, at a Sarasate d'Albert concert in New York, during the season of '89-'90, and under the beat of the composer. The overture was entitled originally, "Dramatic Overture," and the present title was an afterthought.

Some of us have read through the Book of Esther; and some have heard in their younger days the cantata by Mr. Butterfield (?) known as "Esther, the Beautiful Queen;" but how many in the audience last night knew Grillparzer's "Esther" well enough to be moved or instructed or reminded by d' Albert's music.

The overture is a collection of episodes. The themes are neither fresh nor beautiful nor striking, and little is done with them after they are announced. The composer plays with them as with checkermen; now he brings forward one, and now another; but he does not win the game. He is terribly in earnest, he studies carefully each move, but he has no organized plan; he moves each piece for itself, and he does not win the game, this serious man, this gnome of the piano. And now please put it back on the shelf, Mr. Paur, and let it slumber by the side of pieces by Humperdink and Riemenschneider.

***

The symphonic poem by Tschaikowsky, to be played the 17th, is "Francesca da Rimini" and not "Romeo and Juliet," as announced in the program book.

PHILIP HALE.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Samstag 3. Februar 1894.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester wird am nächsten Mittwoch Abend das vorletzte Konzert unter Leitung des Herrn Emil Paur in unserer Academy of Music geben. Als Solist wird der bekannte ausgezeichnete Bassist Herr Max Heinrich fungiren. Das Programm bietet folgende Nummern: Symphonie in C-Moll, No. 1, Brahms; Lied, mit Orchester, „Die Allmacht," Schubert; Entre Acte, „Gwendoline," Chabrier; Ballet-Musik, „Feramors," Rubinstein; „Wotan's Abschied und Feuerzauber," Wagner.

Tickets sind jetzt bei Fischer, No. 1221 Chestnut Str., zu haben.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 4.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony in F, No. 8, Beethoven; Concerto Fantastique, for violoncello and orchestra (MS.), C. M Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music, "Feramorz, Rubinstein; Overture "Esther," E. d'Albert (first time.) The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The Symphony was beautifully read, the tempi were faultless, and the playing throughout was of the finest. In listening to Mr. Loeffler's concerto, it is necessary to remember the qualification "Fantastique" that is attached to it. The work has evidently been composed with great thought and care. It is strikingly new, is admirable in its contrasts of orchestral tone color, and the instrumentation is often surprising in its fresh combinations. It is well divided between the orchestra and the solo instrument and forms a strongly welded whole. It is so full of novel effects that more than a single hearing is necessary to a complete appreciation of its merit. The style is wholly modern. The opening movement is broad and dignified in its general aspect; but occasionally it is exceedingly brilliant. The themes are gracefully melodious, and their development is as ingenious as it is interesting. The slow movement has a fascinating theme, of rare refinement, and abounds in lovely moments, especially in the instrumentation, The finale is founded on a very brief theme in the Russian style, and is elaborately developed through variations for the solo instrument and the orchestra. It is remarkable for the variety of treatment to which it is subjected, and for the clearness that sways all its intricacies. Here the solo cello and the other instruments are used in the most brilliant manner. It is impossible to do full justice to the concerto in the brief space we have at our command, but we have room to say that it is creditable in every way to the fine musicianship of its composer and is a work upon which he may justly pride himself. The solo part bristles with difficulties, but they were overcome in a masterly manner by Mr. Schroeder, whose skill has never been evidenced more convincingly than it was in his performances on this occasion. The work was listened to with rapt attention, and though it is somewhat long, interest in it never flagged. At its end the audience broke into a spontaneous outburst of applause, and recalled the soloist again and again, and also paid enthusiastic tribute to the composer, who seemed modestly bent on keeping himself in the background. The pretty "Feramorz" music was exquisitely played. The D'Albert overture is a clearer work than we expected from its composer. It is not extravagantly modern, is fairly melodious and is richly scored. There is nothing to be said against it, except that is noisy and uninteresting. The programme for the next concert is Symphony No. 2, Brahms; a new overture by Hartmann; two solos for violin, one by Bruch and one by Saint Saens; and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini. The soloist is Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 35.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alwyn Schroeder.

The novelty in the Symphony concert programme of last evening, played at Music Hall by the Boston orchestra, was Mr. C. N. Loeffler's "Fantastic Concerto," for violincello and orchestra, which is still in manuscript.

Mr. Loeffler's popularity as one of the leading violins of the orchestra gives a peculiar interest to any composition which he contributes at these concerts, and in this new concerto he has quite fully realized the expectations of those who are familiar with his earlier contributions to local programmes. Mr. Loeffler is a capital musician, with a thorough knowledge of the art of composition, possessed of good taste in the choice of forms, and a master in orchestration. All these characteristics are shown in his concerto of last evening, and its merits were quickly recognized both by the audience and his fellow-players in the orchestra. The work is in five short movements, which are played without pause, and in the concerto he has made use of some grand and imposing themes, which are treated in a masterly fashion. He introduces a cadenza for the solo 'cello which is full of difficult passages for the player, and demands a perfect mastery of the instrument. Mr. Loeffler was fortunate in having the solo work given to Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, whose playing throughout the concerto was equal to his best efforts in these concerts. The concerto and its performance were alike vastly enjoyed by the audience, and at its conclusion the composer and soloist were alike honored by the audience with a great ovation.

Another novelty of a less interesting character in the programme was Eugen D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." This composition is an ably written one, and scored for the ordinary grand orchestra. D'Albert follows conservative forms in his instrumentation, and the themes which are of striking originality are well worked out, and the overture is brought to a very effective and dramatic climax. It is, however, a work that would not generally interest an audience other than as a novelty.

Conductor Paur introduced his programme with a brilliant performance of the eighth Beethoven symphony, and also included in its numbers the "Candle Dance" and the Dance of the Bayaderes" from the ballet music of "Feramors."

The orchestra makes its usual tour next week, and for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and some novelties by Hartmann, Bruch, Saint-Saens and Tschaikowsky are announced, with Mr. C. M. Loeffler as soloist.

[83]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 4, 1894.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Fourteenth Symphony Program—

The program for the 14th symphony rehearsal and concert contained two novelties, Mr C. M. Loeffler's fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and Eugen d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," both given for the first time in this city. The greater interest naturally centered in the work by the talented resident composer and violinist, Mr Loeffler, who not only has gained an enviable position as a performer, but whose musical writings have stamped him as a composer of marked ability. Additional interest was given this new work by reason of the soloist, Mr Alwin Schroeder, also a member of the symphony orchestra.

The composition is florid and fantastic, and the themes and variations given to the cellist bristle with difficulties and call into play about all the resources of that instrument running from double and triple chords in the bass up to harmonics in the upper scale.

The solo work is almost continuous, beginning with the first part of the florid oriental introduction. The second movement, a melancholy series of passages, was beautifully played, the cello in Mr Schroeder's hands singing with all the delicacy and tenderness of the violin.

An elaborate cadenza in the third part, leading into a wild Russian theme, was deftly and very clearly executed, but its intricacies are so great that no one but an accomplished cellist can hope to master it satisfactorily. But few harsh or discordant notes were discernible in Mr Schroeder's playing.

The impetuous finale was smoothly given by soloist and orchestra. At the close of the performance composer and soloist were most heartily applauded, and each one received cordial hand grips of congratulation from their confreres.

D'Albert's overture to "Esther" is a brilliant work, abounding in turbulent episodes. The brasses in the fanfares were a trifle unsteady at times, but the overture was in the main excellently performed. The tremulous accompaniments by the strings, which run all through the piece, were played with commendable absence of cloudiness, while the syncopated form of a theme in the finale received capital treatment by the four parts of the string contingent.

Beethoven's delightfully humorous eighth symphony was daintily and sympathetically played. Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors" was given trippingly and lightly. The program for the next concerts, Feb 16 and 17, is as follows: Brahms, second symphony; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" violin solos, Bruch's romance, op 42 and Saint-Saens' concert piece, played by Mr Loeffler; Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 4, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme Rendered Last Evening---Other Amusement Notes.

The programme presented at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening consisted of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major; a manuscript "Concerto Fantastique," for the 'cello and orchestra, by C. M. Loeffler; Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors," and D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther."

The concerto and the overture were new to Boston and were enthusiastically received. Mr. Loeffler's work is an ambitious effort and he is fortunate in having so able a soloist as Mr. Alwin Schroeder. There are no waits between the three movements, and the first theme of the solo begins at once. This is developed at some length and is somewhat florid in its passages. This coloring is continued until the second and third themes are introduced with some elaboration.

The second movement is introduced by the orchestra and the theme quickly appears with a rather plaintive melody, which is worked out with skill and striking effects, and in the allegro the original themes are again brought into use, also a Russian theme, which is given with quaint variations. The cadenza for the solo instrument is intricate, at times pleasing and at times a trifle monotonous, and the concerto ends with a quick movement by the entire orchestra of the Russian theme. There is also a beautiful part for the harp introduced.

Mr. Schroeder played the difficult number with great skill, and both he and the composer were forced to bow their acknowledgments to the audience.

Beethoven's symphony was skilfully rendered, and Rubinstein's dainty ballet music was loudly applauded.

The D'Albert overture proved very pleasing and fittingly concluded a most entertaining programme. There will be no concert or rehearsal this week.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 93.
C. M. Loeffler: Concert fantastique for violoncello and orchestra (MS.)
Rubinstein: Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire and Dance of Bayaderes No. 1, from "Feramors."
Eugen d'Albert: Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Opus 8.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

The performance of the eighth symphony—the "humorous" symphony par excellence—was one of the finest we have heard. The playing was technically smooth, finished and exact in ensemble, and there was a nervous vigor of accent, a general brightness and vivacity about the performance, that made every point tell. The humorous strokes were particularly well made; notably good was the way in which that wonderful passage near the end of the last movement was given, where the 'celli and basses take the melodious second theme out of the wood-wind's mouth, and, as Ambros says, "can not help singing and growling it after it with terrific sentimentality;" the full humor of the passage was shown, yet without falling into mere burlesque or parody.

The two movements from Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet-music were given with more distinction of effect than we can remember to have heard them before; the music, with all its grace and piquancy, verges dangerously on the commonplace, and Rubinstein's instrumentation is in general not of a sort to cure or veil this to any great extent. Upon the whole it may be said that Rubinstein's habitual handling of the orchestra is not very easy to be accounted for; he often seems distinctly bent on not laying himself open to the charge of anything like super-refinement or dandyism—the last vein in the world into which a man with his talent for the slip-shod was in any danger of falling. If his orchestration keeps quite clear of that rather wholesale, monotonous and cloying gorgeousness one finds in men like Goldmark, it also seldom, if ever, has the captivating, delicate espièglerie so characteristic of many writers of the modern French school; and, what is most curious, this latter quality seems just what would best fit a good deal of his music, notably the two ballet movements in question. But he seems determined to confine himself, so to speak, to mere primary colors, to sharp contrasts between masses of strings with masses of horn-tone, or not particularly well blended masses of wood-wind; that clever and, as the French say, savant blending of colors, those delicate tertiary tints of which Saint-Saëns, Bizet, and Wagner—to mention no others—are so fond, are for the most part absent from his palette. But, as the two movements were played last Saturday evening, we must say that we had never heard his instrumentation sound so well and charming.

Eugen d'Albert's overture to "Esther" is a work which at once inspires respect. It is worked out elaborately, with great care and conscientiousness, yet wholly without ostentation; one feels that the young composer well appreciated the true character of his task, that his good workmanship had a higher aim than merely to show what he could do, for, with all its thoroughness, it is never excessive, he never loses sight of the essentially dramatic character of his composition, and does not let an over-anxiety for elaboration betray him into obscuring the larger outlines of his work, nor into forgetfulness of the boider methods of dramatic musical development. In a word, he keeps his balance, between the purely musical on the one hand, and the impressively dramatic on the other, remarkably well. Of especially distinguished melodic invention he shows perhaps not very much; yet his themes have character, they are not vulgar nor trivial, and, best of all, they are really themes—not merely impressive or emotional phrases, whose only value lies in their immediate effect, but melodic passages that contain within themselves the germs of further development and growth. The whole overture shows great seriousness of purpose and nobility of aim; one would much like to hear it again. It was grandly played.

Mr. Loeffler's new "Fantastic" concerto—its original title, by the way, was simply "Morceau fantastique"—seems to us to come nearer to a solution of an "irreducible case of Cardan" than any other modern composition of the sort we have heard. For writing such a piece Mr. Loeffler may be said to possess quite peculiar qualifications; if not specifically a 'cellist, he is a violinist, that is a string player, well versed in the technique of stringed instruments and with a good deal of native sympathy with the virtuoso aspect of string playing—like enough, too, he plays the 'cello itself more than any of us know—he can thus get a certain amount of inspiration from the very character and quality of the instrument he writes for. His melodic inventiveness can fall easily and naturally into the 'cello vein. Then he is a composer to the manner born; he has abundantly proved this before. He does not at all come within the class of virtuosi who write simply virtuoso compositions, who compose merely because they are brilliant players and want something brilliant to play. If his enthusiasm for Brahms leads him in the direction of solidity of workmanship, his admiration for the French and Slavic composers leads him quite as naturally toward brilliancy, piquancy and the highly-spiced and charming in general. He has much of the characteristically French lightness of touch, of their instinctive knowing when they have said enough, while his German side saves him from their too frequent contentment with half-expressed ideas, with mere clever innuendoes.

If in this 'cello concerto the first thing that strikes one is its immense cleverness, one finds also in it that the composer was not willing to content himself with being merely clever; he has shown all due regard for musical proportion, balance, and distinction. Of sentiment there is just enough in the work; and here more than in any other way has Mr. Loeffler shown his nice appreciation of the task he undertook. All modern 'cello concertos we know have had one or the other of two serious defects: either they have been the work of virtuoso 'cellists, effectively and gratefully written for the solo instrument, but devoid of musical ideas and true sentiment of any sort, or else they have been the work of real composers, worthy of the name, who had ideas to express and genuine sentiment to start with, but found the 'cello a most uncomfortable and thankless medium. In listening to concertos of the first class, one wishes heartily that they had never been written; in listening to those of the second, one longs to ask the 'cello kindly to stop and not interfere with the music. Mr. Loeffler seems to have [illegible] technical difficulty or artistic skill, if such will to walk safely between this Scylla and Charybdis. He has musical ideas and expresses them musically; but they are essentially 'cello ideas, melodic forms and phrases that absolutely call for the 'cello to give them life. And note this, that, in so far as sentiment and the emotional in general are concerned, although he shows no little warmth and beauty of feeling, he wisely avoids entering upon such deeper and more poignant emotional regions as would make the voice of a single 'cello seem inadequate, and make you long for the stronger and richer expressive power of the full orchestra. The ever-recurring presence and predominance of the fantastic element in his work saves him from this. He goes into the emotional only just as far as the 'cello will easily and naturally carry him; when he has reached this limit, he returns to the light and fancifully piquant, to the graceful and enchanting. In a word, he cuts his coat according to his cloth. And this is why we lay such stress upon his cleverness. He has written a composition that is at once interesting and charming in itself, and effective and thankful for the 'cello, both in its sentimental aspect as a singer of expressive cantilena and in the way of giving the player every chance of displaying such virtuosity as his instrument admits of.

Mr. Schroeder—to whom the concerto is dedicated, by the way—fairly outdid himself in his performance of the work. Indeed it was evident that he had a task before him which he could perform equally con amore as a 'cellist and as a musician. In point of beauty of tone, purity of intonation and, in short, all that goes to make up a fine 'cello technique, his playing was impeccable; while his graceful, artistic phrasing, his penetrating sentiment in cantilena and brilliancy in bravura passages called for the heartiest recognition and admiration. It was superb playing at every point, and was exuberantly recognized as such by the audience. Both 'cellist and composer had a real ovation.

And has this concerto of Mr. Loeffler's really reconciled us to the 'cello concerto in general, as a form that can withstand the tooth of time? In one sense, yes; in another, decidedly, no! The very success with which he has accomplished the task of writing an acceptable one shows what an abnormal task it essentially was. A form of composition in which a composer of recognizably high and noble aspirations, a man who is primarily a "Brahmsianer," and only secondarily a Gallo-Slav, has to draw so enormously and constantly on his cleverness has to be so clever all the time, at the risk of falling into nothingness and extinction, is not a form to which he can feel himself bound by any very deep-going ties. Mr. Loeffler can be very charming and fascinating in it, but he cannot find room for the whole of himself in it. Indeed, he knew enough not to try to. And think what a risk he ran! Swelling what was essentially of the nature of bright musical vers de société to well nigh epic proportions! Let him rest well content with his success this time; for neither the lightning nor any other form of electricity strikes twice in the same place. He has achieved the all-but-impossible in the most brilliant way; now let him write some more quartets or sextets, and if he should try an overture we, for one, should be by no means sorry.

The next programme (for Feb. 16 and 17, there is no concert this week) is: Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" Bruch, romanza for violin, opus 42; Saint-Saëns, morceau de concert for violin; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1894.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY.

First Performance of Loeffler's Concerto and "Esther" Overture.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, with a programme composed of the following numbers:

Symphony No. 8, in F major.....Beethoven
Fantastic Concerto, for violoncello and orchestra.....C. M. Loeffler
Ballet music from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Op. 8.....D'Albert

Mr. Alvin Schroeder was the soloist.

The "Fantastic Concerto," by Mr. Loeffler, had its first performance on this occasion, and the "Esther" overture was played for the first time in these concerts, having been first performed in this country in New York during the season of 1889-90 under the direction of the composer.

The playing of the orchestra on this occasion was the best that it has done under the baton of Mr. Paur. There was a fair degree of repose in the renderings, and contrasts were better marked than usual.

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony was a highly commendable one, just what we have learned to expect from this conscientious, earnest and artistic conductor, and thorough musician, who shows proper regard for the demands of classic compositions. Mr. Paur was comparatively successful in the presentation of the nuances of the different movements. His tempi was excellent.

All that Mr. Paur needs to do now to ensure a complete success is to still further refine the renderings through gaining a still more marked degree in the gradation of tone; a more determined sustaining of sempre piano and sempre pianissimo where it occurs, not allowing a swelling or increasing of tone because of the movement of the melody or theme; and oblige the wood-wind to play the piano and pianissimo passages much softer than is now its custom, thereby completing the restoration of the former perfection of the orchestra before it was subjected to the coarse and vulgar processes of Mr. Nikisch.

There is one other item that might be profitably considered also, and that is the terrible pounding of the drums, for which Mr. Paur is responsible, for the drummer himself often uses his instruments with considerable skill and effect. But when Mr. Paur looks up at him and throws up both hands, and with a gesture of evolone energy summons this Hercules of the sheepskins to "let slip the dogs of war," what is the poor man to do but "lay on" for all he is worth, and when he does, it don't seem as if Saudow could increase the din if he had the job in hand.

I can't see that the drummer is responsible for the noise he makes under these circumstances whereby the effect is often ruined and all music destroyed, because of this horrible distortion of the percussion effect which is supposed to intensify the climax, not totally ruin it.

It may seem that I am making a much ado about nothing in paying so much attention to this matter; but when one player can ruin the best efforts of the rest of the orchestra, it demands the severest criticism. If a steam whistle was blown, or some one with stentorian voice should yell in the places where the drums so often offend, it would not be a bit more foreign to the effect than the disturbance made upon the drums in places at every concert.

We had a most excellent and artistic tympani player, Mr. Henry Simpson, during the engagements of both Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. Mr. Simpson (who is still attached to the orchestra in another capacity) was also drummer during the first season of Mr. Nikisch's incumbency, but the discreet and effective manner in which he played the tympani did not suit Mr. Nikisch's ideas of noise, and as Mr. Simpson would not abuse his instrument to please the craving of Mr. Nikisch he was supplanted by the present performer, imported by Nikisch, no doubt, to do his bidding. So it can be seen that this infernal noise that is made on the drums at times is chargeable to Mr. Nikisch's depraved taste, and was one of the elements of coarseness that served in reducing the automatic perfection of the orchestra that existed under Mr. Gericke to the orchestral patois that marked the state of degradation to which it sunk under the incompetent direction of his successor.

Mr. Paur has shown that he has refinement in his musical nature; now let him apply its processes to the directing of a more discreet and normally effective use of the drums in his orchestra and thereby enhance, not ruin, the effect of the playing, and render unnecessary the curses loud and deep that are heaped upon the unfortunate drummer so often by the listeners who have music in their souls and have no desire for a boiler-shop attachment to the orchestra.

The "Fantastic Concerto" by Mr. Loeffler, proved to be a work of genuine merit. It is much clearer than his suite for violin and orchestra, given two seasons ago, because it is not overelaborated. It nevertheless is quite intricate in its construction, a feature of Mr. Loeffler's style in composition. It is highly finished in its every part, and is most skilfully handled in the working out. It is in the modern school, wholly, both as regards the composition and the instrumentation; it is also delightful in its contrasts and replete with melodious themes. A spirit of refinement pervades the music and the composer's effort is spontaneous. Mr. Schroeder played the solo part in a masterly manner, fairly eclipsing all his previous efforts, exhibiting a degree of virtuosity that few believed this sterling player possessed. Both the soloist and the composer were enthusiastically applauded and recalled again and again. The performance of the orchestral part was admirable under the careful direction of Mr. Paur.

To the severely classical the selections from the "Feramors" ballet music may seem a sort of "gumdrop offering" in the programme of a symphony concert, but the liberal, critical listener will thank Mr. Paur for this exquisite bit, for to the audience it was as refreshing as a breath of fresh air to the suffocating passengers in an almost hermetically sealed electric car on a cold morning. Mr. Paur could not ensure his popularity so quickly and at the same time be serving the cause of true art so well as to introduce into each and every programme one such number, which should include occasionally a waltz of Strauss or Gungl as very proper material.

Even that prince of martinets, Dr. Von Bulow, upholds such a contrasting element in the programme of a symphony concert.

The "Esther" overture of D'Albert was a better composition than many thought this eminent pianist capable of producing. Although there seemed to be a lack of continuity of purpose in the plan of the work, there still was much to admire, if it were not excitingly interesting. There were melodious themes and some fine effects in the instrumentation. It leaned more to the quasi-modern school than to the ultra-modern form of treatment. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for showing us this composition, even if we had not the least idea of what Grillparzer's "Esther" is all about, the programme book not being able to furnish any information.

Altogether the programme of this concert was an interesting one, and showed that Mr. Paur is not going to be partisan in his selections.

There will be no concert this week, but for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, another interesting programme is announced, to wit: Symphony No. 2, Brahms; Overture, "Nordische Heerfaht," Hartmann; Romanza for violin, op. 42, Bruch; Morceau de Concert for Violin, Saint-Saens; Symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini," Tschaikowsky. All but the Brahms number will be played for the first time. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[84]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 4, 1894.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Fourteenth Symphony Program—

The program for the 14th symphony rehearsal and concert contained two novelties, Mr C. M. Loeffler's fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and Eugen d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," both given for the first time in this city. The greater interest naturally centered in the work by the talented resident composer and violinist, Mr Loeffler, who not only has gained an enviable position as a performer, but whose musical writings have stamped him as a composer of marked ability. Additional interest was given this new work by reason of the soloist, Mr Alwin Schroeder, also a member of the symphony orchestra.

The composition is florid and fantastic, and the themes and variations given to the cellist bristle with difficulties and call into play about all the resources of that instrument running from double and triple chords in the bass up to harmonics in the upper scale.

The solo work is almost continuous, beginning with the first part of the florid oriental introduction. The second movement, a melancholy series of passages, was beautifully played, the cello in Mr Schroeder's hands singing with all the delicacy and tenderness of the violin.

An elaborate cadenza in the third part, leading into a wild Russian theme, was deftly and very clearly executed, but its intricacies are so great that no one but an accomplished cellist can hope to master it satisfactorily. But few harsh or discordant notes were discernible in Mr Schroeder's playing.

The impetuous finale was smoothly given by soloist and orchestra. At the close of the performance composer and soloist were most heartily applauded, and each one received cordial hand grips of congratulation from their confreres.

D'Albert's overture to "Esther" is a brilliant work, abounding in turbulent episodes. The brasses in the fanfares were a trifle unsteady at times, but the overture was in the main excellently performed. The tremulous accompaniments by the strings, which run all through the piece, were played with commendable absence of cloudiness, while the syncopated form of a theme in the finale received capital treatment by the four parts of the string contingent.

Beethoven's delightfully humorous eighth symphony was daintily and sympathetically played. Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors" was given trippingly and lightly. The program for the next concerts, Feb 16 and 17, is as follows: Brahms, second symphony; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" violin solos, Bruch's romance, op 42 and Saint-Saens' concert piece, played by Mr Loeffler; Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 4, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme Rendered Last Evening---Other Amusement Notes.

The programme presented at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening consisted of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major; a manuscript "Concerto Fantastique," for the 'cello and orchestra, by C. M. Loeffler; Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors," and D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther."

The concerto and the overture were new to Boston and were enthusiastically received. Mr. Loeffler's work is an ambitious effort and he is fortunate in having so able a soloist as Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

There are no waits between the three movements, and the first theme of the solo begins at once. This is developed at some length and is somewhat florid in its passages. This coloring is continued until the second and third themes are introduced with some elaboration.

The second movement is introduced by the orchestra and the theme quickly appears with a rather plaintive melody, which is worked out with skill and striking effects, and in the allegro the original themes are again brought into use, also a Russian theme, which is given with quaint variations. The cadenza for the solo instrument is intricate, at times pleasing and at times a trifle monotonous, and the concerto ends with a quick movement by the entire orchestra of the Russian theme. There is also a beautiful part for the harp introduced.

Mr. Schroeder played the difficult number with great skill, and both he and the composer were forced to bow their acknowledgments to the audience.

Beethoven's symphony was skilfully rendered, and Rubinstein's dainty ballet music was loudly applauded.

The D'Albert overture proved very pleasing and fittingly concluded a most entertaining programme. There will be no concert or rehearsal this week.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 93.
C. M. Loeffler: Concert fantastique for violoncello and orchestra (MS.)
Rubinstein: Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire and Dance of Bayaderes No. 1, from "Feramors."
Eugen d'Albert: Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Opus 8.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

The performance of the eighth symphony—the "humorous" symphony par excellence—was one of the finest we have heard. The playing was technically smooth, finished and exact in ensemble, and there was a nervous vigor of accent, a general brightness and vivacity about the performance, that made every point tell. The humorous strokes were particularly well made; notably good was the way in which that wonderful passage near the end of the last movement was given, where the 'celli and basses take the melodious second theme out of the wood-wind's mouth, and, as Ambros says, "can not help singing and growling it after it with terrific sentimentality;" the full humor of the passage was shown, yet without falling into mere burlesque or parody.

The two movements from Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet-music were given with more distinction of effect than we can remember to have heard them before; the music, with all its grace and piquancy, verges dangerously on the commonplace, and Rubinstein's instrumentation is in general not of a sort to cure or veil this to any great extent. Upon the whole it may be said that Rubinstein's habitual handling of the orchestra is not very easy to be accounted for; he often seems distinctly bent on not laying himself open to the charge of anything like super-refinement or dandyism—the last vein in the world into which a man with his talent for the slip-shod was in any danger of falling. If his orchestration keeps quite clear of that rather wholesale, monotonous and cloying gorgeousness one finds in men like Goldmark, it also seldom, if ever, has the captivating, delicate espièglerie so characteristic of many writers of the modern French school; and, what is most curious, this latter quality seems just what would best fit a good deal of his music, notably the two ballet movements in question. But he seems determined to confine himself, so to speak, to mere primary colors, to sharp contrasts between masses of strings with masses of horn-tone, or not particularly well blended masses of wood-wind; that clever and, as the French say, savant blending of colors, those delicate tertiary tints of which Saint-Saëns, Bizet, and Wagner—to mention no others—are so fond, are for the most part absent from his palette. But, as the two movements were played last Saturday evening, we must say that we had never heard his instrumentation sound so well and charming.

Eugen d'Albert's overture to "Esther" is a work which at once inspires respect. It is worked out elaborately, with great care and conscientiousness, yet wholly without ostentation; one feels that the young composer well appreciated the true character of his task, that his good workmanship had a higher aim than merely to show what he could do, for, with all its thoroughness, it is never excessive, he never loses sight of the essentially dramatic character of his composition, and does not let an overanxiety for elaboration betray him into obscuring the larger outlines of his work, nor into forgetfulness of the boider methods of dramatic musical development. In a word, he keeps his balance, between the purely musical on the one hand, and the impressively dramatic on the other, remarkably well. Of especially distinguished melodic invention he shows perhaps not very much; yet his themes have character, they are not vulgar nor trivial, and, best of all, they are really themes—not merely impressive or emotional phrases, whose only value lies in their immediate effect, but melodic passages that contain within themselves the germs of further development and growth. The whole overture shows great seriousness of purpose and nobility of aim; one would much like to hear it again. It was grandly played.

Mr. Loeffler's new "Fantastic" concerto—its original title, by the way, was simply "Morceau fantastique"—seems to us to come nearer to a solution of an "irreducible case of Cardan" than any other modern composition of the sort we have heard. For writing such a piece Mr. Loeffler may be said to possess quite peculiar qualifications; if not specifically a 'cellist, he is a violinist, that is a string player, well versed in the technique of stringed instruments and with a good deal of native sympathy with the virtuoso aspect of string playing—like enough, too, he plays the 'cello itself more than any of us know—he can thus get a certain amount of inspiration from the very character and quality of the instrument he writes for. His melodic inventiveness can fall easily and naturally into the 'cello vein. Then he is a composer to the manner born; he has abundantly proved this before. He does not at all come within the class of virtuosi who write simply virtuoso compositions, who compose merely because they are brilliant players and want something brilliant to play. If his enthusiasm for Brahms leads him in the direction of solidity of workmanship, his admiration for the French and Slavic composers leads him quite as naturally toward brilliancy, piquancy and the highly-spiced and charming in general. He has much of the characteristically French lightness of touch, of their instinctive knowing when they have said enough, while his German side saves him from their too frequent contentment with half-expressed ideas, with mere clever innuendoes.

If in this 'cello concerto the first thing that strikes one is its immense cleverness, one finds also in it that the composer was not willing to content himself with being merely clever; he has shown all due regard for musical proportion, balance, and distinction. Of sentiment there is just enough in the work; and here more than in any other way has Mr. Loeffler shown his nice appreciation of the task he undertook. All modern 'cello concertos we know have had one or the other of two serious defects: either they have been the work of virtuoso 'cellists, effectively and gratefully written for the solo instrument, but devoid of musical ideas and true sentiment of any sort, or else they have been the work of real composers, worthy of the name, who had ideas to express and genuine sentiment to start with, but found the 'cello a most uncomfortable and thankless medium. In listening to concertos of the first class, one wishes heartily that they had never been written; in listening to those of the second, one longs to ask the 'cello kindly to stop and not interfere with the [illegible] extraordinary luck—or artistic skill, if you will—to walk safely between this Scylla and Charybdis. He has musical ideas and expresses them musically; but they are essentially 'cello ideas, melodic forms and phrases that absolutely call for the 'cello to give them life. And note this, that, in so far as sentiment and the emotional in general are concerned, although he shows no little warmth and beauty of feeling, he wisely avoids entering upon such deeper and more poignant emotional regions as would make the voice of a single 'cello seem inadequate, and make you long for the stronger and richer expressive power of the full orchestra. The ever-recurring presence and predominance of the fantastic element in his work saves him from this. He goes into the emotional only just as far as the 'cello will easily and naturally carry him; when he has reached this limit, he returns to the light and fancifully piquant, to the graceful and enchanting. In a word, he cuts his coat according to his cloth. And this is why we lay such stress upon his cleverness. He has written a composition that is at once interesting and charming in itself, and effective and thankful for the 'cello, both in its sentimental aspect as a singer of expressive cantilena and in the way of giving the player every chance of displaying such virtuosity as his instrument admits of.

Mr. Schroeder—to whom the concerto is dedicated, by the way—fairly outdid himself in his performance of the work. Indeed it was evident that he had a task before him which he could perform equally con amore as a 'cellist and as a musician. In point of beauty of tone, purity of intonation and, in short, all that goes to make up a fine 'cello technique, his playing was impeccable; while his graceful, artistic phrasing, his penetrating sentiment in cantilena and brilliancy in bravura passages called for the heartiest recognition and admiration. It was superb playing at every point, and was exuberantly recognized as such by the audience. Both 'cellist and composer had a real ovation.

And has this concerto of Mr. Loeffler's really reconciled us to the 'cello concerto in general, as a form that can withstand the tooth of time? In one sense, yes; in another, decidedly, no! The very success with which he has accomplished the task of writing an acceptable one shows what an abnormal task it essentially was. A form of composition in which a composer of recognizably high and noble aspirations, a man who is primarily a "Brahmsianer," and only secondarily a Gallo-Slav, has to draw so enormously and constantly on his cleverness has to be so clever all the time, at the risk of falling into nothingness and extinction, is not a form to which he can feel himself bound by any very deep-going ties. Mr. Loeffler can be very charming and fascinating in it, but he cannot find room for the whole of himself in it. Indeed, he knew enough not to try to, And think what a risk he ran! Swelling what was essentially of the nature of bright musical vers de société to well nigh epic proportions! Let him rest well content with his success this time; for neither the lightning nor any other form of electricity strikes twice in the same place. He has achieved the all-but-impossible in the most brilliant way; now let him write some more quartets or sextets, and if he should try an overture we, for one, should be by no means sorry.

The next programme (for Feb. 16 and 17, there is no concert this week) is: Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" Bruch, romanza for violin, opus 42; Saint-Saëns, morceau de concert for violin; Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

energy summons this Hercules of the sheepskins to "let slip the dogs of war," what is the poor man to do but "lay on" for all he is worth, and when he does, it don't seem as if Sandow could increase the din if he had the job in hand.

I can't see that the drummer is responsible for the noise he makes under these circumstances whereby the effect is often ruined and all music destroyed, because of this horrible distortion of the percussion effect which is supposed to intensify the climax, not totally ruin it.

It may seem that I am making a much ado about nothing in paying so much attention to this matter; but when one player can ruin the best efforts of the rest of the orchestra, it demands the severest criticism. If a steam whistle was blown, or some one with stentorian voice should yell in the places where the drums so often offend, it would not be a bit more foreign to the effect than the disturbance made upon the drums in places at every concert.

We had a most excellent and artistic tympani player, Mr. Henry Simpson, during the engagements of both Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. Mr. Simpson (who is still attached to the orchestra in another capacity) was also drummer during the first season of Mr. Nikisch's incumbency, but the discreet and effective manner in which he played the tympani did not suit Mr. Nikisch's ideas of noise, and as Mr. Simpson would not abuse his instrument to please the craving of Mr. Nikisch he was supplanted by the present performer, imported by Nikisch, no doubt, to do his bidding. So it can be seen that this infernal noise that is made on the drums at times is chargeable to Mr. Nikisch's depraved taste, and was one of the elements of coarseness that served in reducing the automatic perfection of the orchestra that existed under Mr. Gericke to the orchestral patois that marked the state of degradation to which it sunk under the incompetent direction of his successor.

Mr. Paur has shown that he has refinement in his musical nature; now let him apply its processes to the directing of a more discreet and normally effective use of the drums in his orchestra and thereby enhance, not ruin, the effect of the playing, and render unnecessary the curses loud and deep that are heaped upon the unfortunate drummer so often by the listeners who have music in their souls and have no desire for a boiler-shop attachment to the orchestra.

The "Fantastic Concerto" by Mr. Loeffler, proved to be a work of genuine merit. It is much clearer than his suite for violin and orchestra, given two seasons ago, because it is not overelaborated. It nevertheless is quite intricate in its construction, a feature of Mr. Loeffler's style in composition. It is highly finished in its every part, and is most skilfully handled in the working out. It is in the modern school, wholly, both as regards the composition and the instrumentation; it is also delightful in its contrasts and replete with melodious themes. A spirit of refinement pervades the music and the composer's effort is spontaneous. Mr. Schroeder played the solo part in a masterly manner, fairly eclipsing all his previous efforts, exhibiting a degree of virtuosity that few believed this sterling player possessed. Both the soloist and the composer were enthusiastically applauded and recalled again and again. The performance of the orchestral part was admirable under the careful direction of Mr. Paur.

To the severely classical the selections from the "Feramors" ballet music may seem a sort of "gumdrop offering" in the programme of a symphony concert, but the liberal, critical listener will thank Mr. Paur for this exquisite bit, for to the audience it was as refreshing as a breath of fresh air to the suffocating passengers in an almost hermetically sealed electric car on a cold morning. Mr. Paur could not ensure his popularity so quickly and at the same time be serving the cause of true art so well as to introduce into each and every programme one such number, which should include occasionally a waltz of Strauss or Gungl as very proper material.

Even that prince of martinets, Dr. Von Bulow, upholds such a contrasting element in the programme of a symphony concert.

The "Esther" overture of D'Albert was a better composition than many thought this eminent pianist capable of producing. Although there seemed to be a lack of continuity of purpose in the plan of the work, there still was much to admire, if it were not excitingly interesting. There were melodious themes and some fine effects in the instrumentation. It leaned more to the quasi-modern school than to the ultra-modern form of treatment. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for showing us this composition, even if we had not the least idea of what Grillparzer's "Esther" is all about, the programme book not being able to furnish any information.

Altogether the programme of this concert was an interesting one, and showed that Mr. Paur is not going to be partisan in his selections.

There will be no concert this week, but for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, another interesting programme is announced, to wit: Symphony No. 2, Brahms; Overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt," Hartmann; Romanza for violin, op. 42, Bruch; Morceau de Concert for Violin, Saint-Saens; Symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini," Tschaikowsky. All but the Brahms number will be played for the first time. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1894.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY.

First Performance of Loeffler's Concerto and "Esther" Overture.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, with a programme composed of the following numbers:

Symphony No. 8, in F major.....Beethoven
Fantastic Concerto, for violoncello and orchestra.....C. M. Loeffler
Ballet music from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Overture to Grillparjer's "Esther," Op. 8.....D'Albert

Mr. Alvin Schroeder was the soloist.

The "Fantastic Concerto," by Mr. Loeffler, had its first performance on this occasion, and the "Esther" overture was played for the first time in these concerts, having been first performed in this country in New York during the season of 1889-90 under the direction of the composer.

The playing of the orchestra on this occasion was the best that it has done under the baton of Mr. Paur. There was a fair degree of repose in the renderings, and contrasts were better marked than usual.

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony was a highly commendable one, just what we have learned to expect from this conscientious, earnest and artistic conductor, and thorough musician, who shows proper regard for the demands of classic compositions. Mr. Paur was comparatively successful in the presentation of the nuances of the different movements. His tempi was excellent.

All that Mr. Paur needs to do now to ensure a complete success is to still further refine the renderings through gaining a still more marked degree in the gradation of tone; a more determined sustaining of sempre piano and sempre pianissimo where it occurs, not allowing a swelling or increasing of tone because of the movement of the melody or theme; and oblige the wood-wind to play the piano and pianissimo passages much softer than is now its custom, thereby completing the restoration of the former perfection of the orchestra before it was subjected to the coarse and vulgar processes of Mr. Nikisch.

There is one other item that might be profitably considered also, and that is the terrible pounding of the drums, for which Mr. Paur is responsible, for the drummer himself often uses his instruments with considerable skill and effect. But when Mr. Paur looks up at him and throws up both hands, and with a gesture of [illegible]

[84]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1894.

The program of the Fourteenth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony No 8.....Beethoven
Concerto fantastique, for violoncello and orchestra (MS.).....C. M. Loeffler
Allegro.
Adagio.
Allegro—Thême russe; poco allegretto—presto.
(First time.)
Ballet music from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
"Dance of Bayaderes"
"Candle Dance of the Brides of Cashmere."
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther".....D'Albert
(First time.)

You have heard the d'Albert overture in New York. What did you think of it—for you certainly do not think about it now? To me it is a thing of shreds and patches. Episode follows episode. There is no logical connection, there is no mighty pulse. The themes are neither new nor interesting. As I have never read Grillparzer's "Esther," I could not look outside the music itself for real or fancied enjoyment, and in the music itself I found no genuine beauty or strength.

Mr. Loeffler has in a measure protected himself from the charge of neglecting form in his new 'cello concerto by calling his piece "fantastic." The movements are bound together without interruption, and in another sense the music as a whole is not well knit together. Mr. Loeffler is a musician of rare refinement, technical ingenuity and a singular individuality. Perhaps it would be better for his abiding fame if he had a stronger dash of sensuousness or even coarseness in his nature. In this concerto there is little warm blood, there is little that pierces the skin. The music seems like unto a sleep chasing, such as Walt Whitman described in the yawp, beginning

I wander all night in my vision,
Stepping with light feet, swiftly and noiselessly stepping and stopping,
Bending with open eyes over the shut eyes of sleepers.

There are charming passages of fancy and piquant instrumentation in this piece, that is full of difficulties for the soloist, but the hearer is tempted constantly to cry out, "I'd give a dollar for one fat, juicy theme!"

Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, and Mr. Loeffler were applauded heartily.

The symphony was well read and played and the ballet music was played delightfully.

The Musical and Dramatic Review.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

A most interesting and well-balanced programme was given at the Symphony Concert last week.

Here is the material:

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN...Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio (F major).....3-4
II. Allegretto scherzando B flat major).....2-4
III. Tempo di menuetto (F major).....3-4
IV. Allegro vivace (F major).....2-2
C. M. LOEFFLER.....Fantastic Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra (MS.)
Allegro (D major).....2-2
Adagio (B flat major).....6-8
Allegro (D major).....4-4
Theme Russe: Poco allegretto (D major).....4-4
Presto (D major).....4-4
(First time.)
ANTON RUBINSTEIN.....Ballet music from "Feramors."
I. Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire: Moderato con moto (D minor).....3-4
II. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto (B flat major).....2-4
EUGEN D'ALBERT.....Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Op. 8.
(First time.)
Soloist...MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mr. Paur's best friends must acknowledge that the playing of the symphony was dry. It could not have grown out of any lack of interest on the part of conductor or band. So it can only be set down as a somewhat unsatisfactory reading. It fell short in unlooked-for places.

The introduction of themes was always satisfactory, but few were as successfully developed or ended. Crescendos were nearly always brought to full power before arriving at the all-important measure.

The Eighth Symphony has generally been considered roughly to mark the beginning of Beethoven's third manner. It introduces several elements of style, termed eccentricities at the time it was written, that are usually pounced upon by conductors as means to effects impossible in this composer's earlier symphonies. It is brimming over with humor, sudden and unlooked-for effects. Its development is often extremely elaborate. These characteristics make the dullness of this performance all the more difficult to understand. The failure did not seem to arise from too slow tempi, either, for I am the last one to subscribe to exaggerated tempi or other undignified modernizing of Beethoven.

I cannot speak in too high enthusiastic praise of Mr. Loeffler's 'cello concerto, or of Mr. Schroeder's great performance of it. As much as I have always admired Mr. Loffler, both as a violinist and composer, I was quite unprepared for such masterly skill, such wealth of invention as this work evinced.

The color of the orchestration, excepting, perhaps, portions of the last movement, which did not seem to reach an adequate expression of the author's thought, was ample, vital, finely balanced.

I prophesy that Mr. Loeffler will rank among the world's noted composers, and, too, at no very distant day.

Mr. Schroeder's tone is never wonderful, and he did not, on this occasion, play absolutely in tune, but his phrasing was magnificent—full of subtle grace.

The solo part does not always lie well for the 'cello; indeed, at times its figures bristle with difficulties, but he who could pick flaws in such a performance of such a work, would be indeed hard to please.

Rubinstein's ballet-music was daintily and well played.

The Esther overture impressed me as a beautiful work, rich in color and containing great skill. In form it was at times too long in reaching a point, but this I will not affirm after one hearing. The orchestration showed much resource and familiarity with the best means.

The programme, as a whole, impressed me as most happily made up, and the performance was quite up to standard.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1868 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1894

A Busoni-Liszt Rhapsody.

It was given for the first time, at Boston Symphony Concert XIII. What is it? Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody written for the piano, arranged by F. Busoni, the talented young pianist now residing in our city, for piano and full orchestra, including cymbals, castanets, piccolo, tambourine, all fitting delightfully into the Jota Aragonesa, and other melodies gracing the composition. While finding it thoroughly enjoyable, a leading musician well says, that Liszt is already so bizarre in his original work, that this version is like annexing Forepaugh's menagerie to Barnum's. However, one could hear its jingle over and over with renewed pleasure, and Mr. Busoni was called out four times by enthusiastic approval. He has well done with Liszt, what that genius did with the works of his own predecessors.

Mr. Busoni also bore his part finely in Weber's Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra, in F-minor, op. 79. The other orchestral numbers were Schumann's Fourth Symphony; the Rakoczy March, from Berlioz's Faust; Weber's Euryanthe Overture.

If anything the recent Symphony Concerts have been somewhat too long, but Paur's programs leave no room for reasonable fault-finding on the score of freshness.

A new work by Mrs. Dr. Beach was produced at the fifth Kneisel Concert, a delightful Romanza for Violin, with piano accompaniment played by Mrs. Beach herself, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin. Mrs. Beach also played, very finely, her part in Schumann's Quintet in E-flat, op. 44, the Kneisel Quartet taking the string part, the march movement given with uncommon beauty, and the whole brilliantly. The stock piece was Beethoven's Quartet, op. 127, in E-flat. Eliot Hubbard assisted with four lovesongs by Dvorak, op. 83, sung with musical vigor.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 11, 1894.

Somebody has suggested as a motto for the new Music Hall in case the few determined managers should force through the proposed plan, "Such a-gittin' up stairs." For the amphitheatrical form will compel two thirds of the audience to clamber up and down over a pretty considerable altitude. The model showed a strange deficiency in entrances and exits, and any increase of them will imply a corresponding diminution of the seating capacity of the room, which would be at the best only about equal to that of the present hall, and would admit of no increase to meet the growing wants of an expanding community. But then as the site is such as to be only accessible with great difficulty and much expenditure of time—to say nothing of expense—from many districts which now furnish large contingents of patrons, the chances would seem to be that there will be room enough for a good while yet.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1894.

The program of the Fourteenth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony No 8.....Beethoven
Concerto fantastique, for violoncello and orchestra (MS.).....C. M. Loeffler
Allegro.
Adagio.
Allegro—Thême russe; poco allegretto—presto.
(First time.)
Ballet music from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
"Dance of Bayaderes"
"Candle Dance of the Brides of Cashmere."
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther".....D'Albert
(First time.)

You have heard the d'Albert overture in New York. What did you think of it—for you certainly do not think about it now? To me it is a thing of shreds and patches, Episode follows episode. There is no logical connection, there is no mighty pulse. The themes are neither new nor interesting. As I have never read Grillparzer's "Esther," I could not look outside the music itself for real or fancied enjoyment, and in the music itself I found no genuine beauty or strength.

Mr. Loeffler has in a measure protected himself from the charge of neglecting form in his new 'cello concerto by calling his piece "fantastic." The movements are bound together without interruption, and in another sense the music as a whole is not well knit together. Mr. Loeffler is a musician of rare refinement, technical ingenuity and a singular individuality. Perhaps it would be better for his abiding fame if he had a stronger dash of sensuousness or even coarseness in his nature. In this concerto there is little warm blood, there is little that pierces the skin. The music seems like unto a sleep chasing, such as Walt Whitman described in the yawp, beginning

I wander all night in my vision,
Stepping with light feet, swiftly and noiselessly stepping and stopping,
Bending with open eyes over the shut eyes of sleepers.

There are charming passages of fancy and piquant instrumentation in this piece, that is full of difficulties for the soloist, but the hearer is tempted constantly to cry out, "I'd give a dollar for one fat, juicy theme!"

Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, and Mr. Loeffler were applauded heartily.

The symphony was well read and played and the ballet music was played delightfully.

The Musical and Dramatic World.

NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

A most interesting and well-balanced programme was given at the Symphony Concert last week.

Here is the material:

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN...Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio (F major).....3-4
II. Allegretto scherzando B flat major).....2-4
III. Tempo di menuetto (F major).....3-4
IV. Allegro vivace (F major).....2-2
C. M. LOEFFLER.....Fantastic Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra (MS.)
Allegro (D major).....2-2
Adagio (B flat major).....6-8
Allegro (D major).....4-4
Theme Russe: Poco allegretto (D major).....4-4
Presto (D major).....4-4
(First time.)
ANTON RUBINSTEIN.....Ballet music from "Feramors."
I. Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire: Moderato con moto (D minor).....3-4
II. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto (B flat major).....2-4
EUGEN D'ALBERT.....Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Op. 8.
(First time.)
Soloist...MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mr. Paur's best friends must acknowledge that the playing of the symphony was dry. It could not have grown out of any lack of interest on the part of conductor or band. So it can only be set down as a somewhat unsatisfactory reading. It fell short in unlooked-for places.

The introduction of themes was always satisfactory, but few were as successfully developed or ended. Crescendos were nearly always brought to full power before arriving at the all-important measure.

The Eighth Symphony has generally been considered roughly to mark the beginning of Beethoven's third manner. It introduces several elements of style, termed eccentricities at the time it was written, that are usually pounced upon by conductors as means to effects impossible in this composer's earlier symphonies. It is brimming over with humor, sudden and unlooked-for effects. Its development is often extremely elaborate. These characteristics make the dullness of this performance all the more difficult to understand. The failure did not seem to arise from too slow tempi, either, for I am the last one to subscribe to exaggerated tempi or other undignified modernizing of Beethoven.

I cannot speak in too high enthusiastic praise of Mr. Loeffler's 'cello concerto, or of Mr. Schroeder's great performance of it. As much as I have always admired Mr. Loffler, both as a violinist and composer, I was quite unprepared for such masterly skill, such wealth of invention as this work evinced.

The color of the orchestration, excepting, perhaps, portions of the last movement, which did not seem to reach an adequate expression of the author's thought, was ample, vital, finely balanced.

I prophesy that Mr. Loeffler will rank among the world's noted composers, and, too, at no very distant day.

Mr. Schroeder's tone is never wonderful, and he did not, on this occasion, play absolutely in tune, but his phrasing was magnificent—full of subtle grace.

The solo part does not always lie well for the 'cello; indeed, at times its figures bristle with difficulties, but he who could pick flaws in such a performance of such a work, would be indeed hard to please.

Rubinstein's ballet-music was daintily and well played.

The Esther overture impressed me as a beautiful work, rich in color and containing great skill. In form it was at times too long in reaching a point, but this I will not affirm after one hearing. The orchestration showed much resource and familiarity with the best means.

The programme, as a whole, impressed me as most happily made up, and the performance was quite up to standard.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1868 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1894

A Busoni-Liszt Rhapsody.

It was given for the first time, at Boston Symphony Concert XIII. What is it? Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody written for the piano, arranged by F. Busoni, the talented young pianist now residing in our city, for piano and full orchestra, including cymbals, castanets, piccolo, tambourine, all fitting delightfully into the Jota Aragonesa, and other melodies gracing the composition. While finding it thoroughly enjoyable, a leading musician well says, that Liszt is already so bizarre in his original work, that this version is like annexing Forepaugh's menagerie to Barnum's. However, one could hear its jingle over and over with renewed pleasure, and Mr. Busoni was called out four times by enthusiastic approval. He has well done with Liszt, what that genius did with the works of his own predecessors.

Mr. Busoni also bore his part finely in Weber's Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra, in F-minor, op. 79. The other orchestral numbers were Schumann's Fourth Symphony; the Rakoczy March, from Berlioz's Faust; Weber's Euryanthe Overture.

If anything the recent Symphony Concerts have been somewhat too long, but Paur's programs leave no room for reasonable fault-finding on the score of freshness.

A new work by Mrs. Dr. Beach was produced at the fifth Kneisel Concert, a delightful Romanza for Violin, with piano accompaniment played by Mrs. Beach herself, Mr. Kneisel playing the violin. Mrs. Beach also played, very finely, her part in Schumann's Quintet in E-flat, op. 44, the Kneisel Quartet taking the string part, the march movement given with uncommon beauty, and the whole brilliantly. The stock piece was Beethoven's Quartet, op. 127, in E-flat. Eliot Hubbard assisted with four lovesongs by Dvorak, op. 83, sung with musical vigor.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 11, 1894.

Somebody has suggested as a motto for the new Music Hall in case the few determined managers should force through the proposed plan, "Such a-gittin' up stairs." For the amphitheatrical form will compel two thirds of the audience to clamber up and down over a pretty considerable altitude. The model showed a strange deficiency in entrances and exits, and any increase of them will imply a corresponding diminution of the seating capacity of the room, which would be at the best only about equal to that of the present hall, and would admit of no increase to meet the growing wants of an expanding community. But then as the site is such as to be only accessible with great difficulty and much expenditure of time—to say nothing of expense—from many districts which now furnish large contingents of patrons, the chances would seem to be that there will be room enough for a good while yet.

The Washington Post

, FEBRUARY 6, 1894.

Berlioz, Schubert, Rubenstein, and Wagner were the four master composers whose works were interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. It was the next to the last of the symphony series. Every seat in the house was filled, and many stood throughout the performance about the doors. Mr. Paur conducted the orchestra through one of the smoothest and most finished performances that it has ever been the pleasure of the orchestra to give or the fortune of a Washington audience to enjoy. The applause of the audience was generous throughout the five numbers, and after the last graceful waltz movement of ballet music in Rubenstein's "Feramors" and the splendid burst of choral music which closed the overture to "Tannhauser" the audience pleaded for a recall, but the master of the baton only bowed and smiled, and drew his musical armament into array for the succeeding number.

The Berlioz number, three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, was the longest and the most delicate and varied on the programme. It carried the hearers from the exquisitely soft and dreamy night scene at the house of the Capulets, where to Romeo, musing without, there comes the sound of the dance music within the house, to the rapid movement of the street fight between the political factions. The second scene upon the balcony is an impassioned piece of work and the love song rising at first from the faintest whisper gains strength till it becomes an almose human melody carried upon the bassoons, the horn and the strings of the celli, swaying at times into absolute melody that pleads to rise and soar but falls again into soft harmony under the wave of the leader's hand. The number ends with the brilliant Scherzo Queen Mab, gay and sparkling, after the more sober measures of the preceding scenes.

Mr. Max Heinrich, the soloist, had two opportunities, the first in Schubert's "Die Allmacht," which was well received, but in the second, Wotan's "Farewell to Brunhilde" and the "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," with the magnificent descriptive support of the orchestra, he rose to a height that carried the house with him, and under ordinary conditions would have meant an imperative recall.

The most popular number of the evening was when the whole force of the orchestra was thrown into the interpretation of the witching ballet music of "Feramors." The first selection, the dance of the Bayaderes, a graceful little bit, was given almost throughout with the strings, with the horns and wood wind coming in on the last beat of every two measure section to complete the phrase. The feature of the second selection, the Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire, was the trio of the violas, the violins and the horns, a whirling waltze-like movement in which the wood wind plays a prominent part, and where the enthusiasm of the movement is contagious.

The fifth and last concert of the series will be given on Monday, March 26.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1894.

Third Concert Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In his account of his own life, Berlioz has this to say of his symphony, which was played yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House by the Boston Orchestra: "What is left to an author but to avow frankly that he cannot do better and resign himself to the imperfection of his work? When I had come to that, and not till then, was the symphony of 'Romeo and Juliet' published.'" He declares in another place, in speaking of his love for the actress who had revealed to him in her interpretation of Juliet, hitherto unknown beauty in Shakspeare, that the symphony is his best. If love for Miss Smithson fired his genius to express Shakspeare's thoughts in musical form, as he has done, it is easy to see that the passion of Berlioz touched the deeper things in his soul. Nowhere, perhaps, in any of his compositions does Berlioz show what a consummate master he is in producing splendid orchestral effects as in this symphony. The purely orchestral parts only were given yesterday.

Berlioz gives a picture in tones of the fete at the house of the Capulets, with dances, lovemaking in the soft Italian air, which is by-and-by interrupted, or wooing on the balcony, where the delights of love are intermingled with sorrows and trials, and of the doings of the airy Queen Mab, with such wonderful vividness, color, originality and truth that at times one almost fancies himself in Italy, hearing the story of the play, with the melodies of the composer as accompaniment. All the resources of the modern orchestra are availed of in the setting of the story. The hearer is struck by the beautiful balance of the different grouds of instruments, the rich color, the harmonies, subtile effects and delicate shadings that everywhere interpenetrate the work.

The audience was again profoundly impressed with the rare qualities of Mr. Paur's players. The symphony was given almost faultlessly. The excellence of their work was especially noteworthy in the adagio movement—the balcony scene—the finest piece of writing of its kind Berlioz ever gave to the world and matched by very few composers in any age. It is as adequate an interpretation in music of Shakspeare's story as could be imagined, and the orchestra revealed its beauties as only thorough musicians are capable of doing. In sharp contrast to this movement was the dainty, artistic fashion in which the scherzo—the tale of Mab's doings—a light, etherial, charmingly tripping thing, was played. Berlioz gave this symphony complete, in St. Petersburg, himself as leader. He said of the performance: "I recall it as one of the greatest delights of my life. Such was the impression made upon me by my setting of that divine Shakspearian poem that after the finale I fled into one of the side rooms, where Ernst found me a few moments later in floods of tears. He let me cry like a hysterical girl for a quarter of an hour." There were no tears yesterday, because, perhaps, there are but few souls like that possessed by Berlioz.

The other orchestral pieces were the beautiful, stirring ballet music from Rubinstein's opera "Feramours" and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser." The orchestra was in fine form yesterday throughout the concert. Mr. Max Heinrich sang Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and "Wotan's Farewell," from Wagner's "Die Walkuere." He has a baritone voice of good quality, and he uses it well. It was hardly powerful enough, however, in the Wagner selection. The attempt was good.

THE MORNING HERALD
PUBLISHED BY
THE HERALD PUBLISHING COMPANY
A. BECHHOFER,
General Manager.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Brilliant Rendition of a Fine Programme Given Yesterday.

It requires such a conductor as Emil Paur and an organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do justice to a programme like the one given at the fourth concert in Ford's Opera House yesterday afternoon.

The combined interest of the many present was centred in the first number. This was three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony. One only casually acquainted with the sentiment of Shakespeare's great play can readily interpret in this work the delineation of love existing between the fair daughter of Capulet and her swain of Montague. As a tone painter Berlioz reigns unexcelled, and the opus 17, the last of his four symphonies, stands as a monument in this respect. The composition in full is intended for chorus, soli, orchestra and prologue in choral recitative.

The three movements given yesterday are purely orchestral. Romeo, brooding over his misfortunes while the house of Capulet is all en fete, is the subject for the first movement—andante mal. sostenuto, F major. Here a wealth of tone-coloring is introduced. The theme is depicted by the dreamy movement of the strings, leading into a beautiful love plaint, which finds its way into a bewildering dance melody. The sad song peeps through, ever and anon, being given its principle for a long strain by the oboe primo. Then, as the scene is heightened, comes a thrilling introduction of counter melody, with the first trombone in striking contrast to the reed, which preceded it, taking the love-song subject, and the movement is brought to a climax by the brilliant work of string, woodwind and brass depicting the ending of the festivities in ribald confusion.

The true poetry of Berlioz's soul is probably best observed in the "Balcony Scene," which is the subject for the next movement—adagio, A major. Every incident of the love scene is vividly recalled in the slow, string work, with its depth of sentiment. The concluding number is a scherzo, portraying the soliloquy of Mercutio reciting the advent of "Queen Mab; Or, the Dream Fairy." This subject is largely dealt with by muted strings, prestissimo, F major, and the trio, allegretto D minor.

Anton Rubenstein's familiar and beautiful music from "Freamors" ballet, comprising the dance of the Bayaderes, and the candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire, and the original Tannhauser overture in E major, by Wagner, were the other orchestral numbers.

Max Heinrich, the celebrated baritone, was the soloist. His rich and pliable voice sounded to excellent advantage in Schubert's song "Die Allmacht," which was given with orchestral accompaniment, but his best effort was the rendition of Wotan's "Farewell to Brunhilde" and the "Fire-Charm" from "Die Walkuere," by Wagner.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, FEB. 7, 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.—A quartette of strong names figured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Ford's Opera House yesterday afternoon. They were Berlioz, Schubert, Rubinstein and Wagner. The first number was the great dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," by Berlioz. The music is descriptive yet truly beautiful for itself alone, a rare combination, of which Berlioz was master. In the symphony his wonderful gift of melodic and harmonic beauty is remarkably apparent, and the orchestration is worthy of this master of instrumentation, under whose will strings and wood, wind and brass respond in exquisite effects, and a touch of the triangle, or a tambourine, cymbals or drum becomes a glowing, living thing as potent as the violins themselves.

The crisp, delicious ballet music of Rubinstein's "Feramors" was the second orchestral number, and the closing one was the "Tannhauser" overture of Wagner, which served to arouse the hearers to enthusiasm and to bring a storm of applause upon Director Emil Paur and his orchestra.

The soloist, Max Heinrich, sustained by his massive rendering the general tone of the concert. His voice is sonorous, powerful, expressive, and these qualities, allied to his musical style, carried his hearers into the heart of the music—Schubert's "Die Allmacht," and the great Wagner numbers, "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkure," with orchestra.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 8, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy last night was a very strong and brilliant performance of Brahms' big C minor symphony. No possible performance can make this work otherwise than inordinately long, but Mr. Paur makes it wonderfully interesting. He gives a splendid life and color to its romantic imagination while keeping the broad dignity of its classical foundation. Mr. Paur has done nothing that displayed his individuality as a conductor more forcibly. Max Heinrich sang "Die Allmacht," which is more interesting with his own accompaniment at the piano, Mr. Mees' orchestration of Schubert's music being not particularly inspired, and also "Wotan's Farewell," the beautiful execution of the fire-charm forming an exquisite close to the concert. The other orchestral numbers were an entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and the familiar dance of Bayadere and the candle-dance from Rubinstein's "Feramors."

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Delightful Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The fourth of the present series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night before the usual crowded house. It is a matter of satisfaction that Director Paur grows constantly in favor with the public. He is in no sense a showy man. He does not pose. He is a thorough musician, with sound ideas, who strives only to produce results, and his mannerisms are no detraction from his most excellent work. The orchestra has never played better.

The symphony was Brahms' first in C minor, which made a veritable sensation when first produced and has had a determining influence on later compositions by composers all over Europe. The first movement is very long and the ideas very complex. There is much in it that is novel, and the general plan of instrumentation separates it from the works of older schools. Nevertheless, it is full of vigor and though a little too much overwrought to be popular with uncultivated music lovers, it is a scholarly work which has has reached a deservedly high place in modern symphonic compositions. The second and third numbers are full of musical beauty, while the last is a strong piece of instrumentation. It was played with eminent satisfaction. In the lighter numbers for the orchestra, an entre, act by Charbier and ballet music by Rubinstein, Paur came in competition with his predecessor and the result was satisfactory.

While the present conductor is less poetic than Nikisch, he is more versatile, and his music was in every way pleasing. Mr. Max Heinrich, well-known as a ballad singer almost unrivaled, sang a Schubert song with his accustomed sweetness, and Wotan's "Farewell" with more dramatic power than anyone would suppose him capable who has heard him in chamber music only. As an accompanist, Paur's handling of the orchestra leaves little to be desired.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Large Audience Aroused to Enthusiasm by a Brilliant Programme.

With each additional visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is becoming more and more evident that the selection of Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, was an excellent one, for his work is of the quality that grows upon one and wins by its legitimacy and scholarly achievements. With each appearance of this stupendous orchestra, his masterly ability is convincing his hearers that he is one of the best orchestral conductors that Europe has furnished us in years, and all indications point to the fact that by next season all doubt will have been dispelled as to his unqualified greatness in his chosen sphere.

The programme rendered last evening at the Academy of Music, was one of the most charming given by a symphony orchestra here in many a day, and the mammoth audience was unusually liberal in its applause throughout. The Brahm's Symphony was delightfully interpreted, and played as nearly perfect as it is in the powers of humans to do. The second movement particularly was entrancingly played. The beautiful violin solo movement by Mr. Kneisel was effective, and brought out prominently. This work has been given the soubriquet of "the tenth symphony," placing it next in list with Beethoven's nine master pieces, and although it is Brahm's first symphonic attempt, it is his greatest.

The novelty of the concert was the charming "Entre Act," from Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," and was heard for the first time here on this occasion. It is a dreamy, slow movement of marvelous beauty and very melodic, and is sure to become popular as an intermezzo of the highest order. The treatment at times suggests Grieg and that of Wagner in his quiet movements. The instrumentation is full of color and bears the imprint of genius.

The dainty ballet music from "Feramors," by Rubinstein, has never been heard in this city with better effect. It was given with a buoyancy and piquancy that stirred the audience to enthusiasm. Mr. Paur was repeatedly forced to bow his acknowledgement, and finally had to succumb to the wishes of the assemblage and repeat the last movement, despite the rule of the organization against encores. In this selection Mr. Paur demonstrated a romanticism hitherto unknown in him. It was full of poetry and dainty touches.

The solo numbers were furnished by that superb basso, Mr. Max Heinrich, who was in excellent voice and sang his two selections superbly. It has been a long time since he has acquitted himself as creditably as he did in "Wotan's Farewell," from "Die Walkure," and it has been many a day since this famous Wagner excerpt has been as artistically sung and as well played. Mr. Heinrich was repeatedly recalled and assured of the approval of his listeners. Both orchestra and soloist surprised their most enthusiastic friends in this number, and Mr. Paur established himself as one of the proficient Wagner conductors. The make-up of the programme was delightful and from beginning to end left nothing to be desired. There was not a dull movement in it and all the beauties of this fine instrumental combination were boldly brought to the fore.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Thursday, Feb. 8, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Emil Paur proved conclusively last evening, at the fourth concert of the current Boston Symphony series, that he is as much at home with Brahms as he is with Wagner, for he gave an admirable reading of the former's first symphony in C minor, with which the programme opened. That this musicianly work, which Theodore Thomas first made known here, improves in favor upon renewed acquaintance was evidenced plainly in this instance, when the large audience showed its marked appreciation of the several movements, especially with the andante. The orchestra played it really exquisitely, and it was easily to be seen that Mr. Paur entered thoroughly into the spirit of the symphony, with the result that the number was heard to the very best advantage. To say this where Brahms is concerned is to say a great deal, for this composer, to be exploited at all effectively, requires sympathetic treatment from the conductor and a finished performance.

Mr. Paur and the orchestra are also to be commended for the presentation of an entre acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" (a poetic, if not remarkably striking, excerpt), two delightfully dainty dances from Rubinstein's opera of "Feramors" (given with a delicate beauty that suggested the refined methods of Gericke), and the Magic Fire music from "Die Walkure. The latter was notably well played, and its execution showed once again that the new conductor has a keen appreciation of the possibilities of Wagner in such an example.

Max Heinrich, the well-known baritone, was the soloist, and received great applause for his singing of Schubert's "Die Allmacht," to which he imparted the finish and correctness of phrasing that are distinguishing traits of his work. He made an equally good impression in Wotan's farewell song, given, of course, in connection with the Magic Fire music.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, February 8, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme presented last evening at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a particularly attractive and varied one. It had been admirably chosen and arranged, and the character of the selections indicated the catholicity of Conductor Emil Paur as a musical provider. The composers interpreted included Brahms, Chabrier, Schubert, Rubinstein and Wagner. Paur's special fitness of high leadership grows more evident with each visit he makes to this city. He is now in splendid control of his orchestra. The instrumentalists have learned his ways, methods and intentions, and he has become thoroughly acquainted with the peculiarities and possibilities of his players. The result of this mutual understanding is shown in the immediate response to every call of the conductor, the effective precision and unity of concerted action and the intelligent manner in which any innovation in reading is given successful illustration. The concert began last night with Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor. It was treated in a scholarly manner, and technical skill was apparent in every passage; but it was not until the conclusion that this number in effect rose above the mere excellence of the interpretation.

The last movement has beauties in it which Leader Paur brought out in most satisfying fullness. The earlier divisions were somewhat monotonous, but that may be laid to the composer. That excellent basso, Mr. Max Heinrich, sang with fine power and most intelligent expression Schubert's "Die Allmacht," with a full orchestral accompaniment, that had been arranged by Arthur Mees. It may be said that Mr. Heinrich has been equally as effective on other occasions, with far less elaborate assistance. One of the most charming numbers of the evening was the poetical prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline," which is the composition of Emmanuel Chabrier. It was beautifully played in an exquisitely tender and colorful manner. The Rubinstein contribution created quite a furore, and was so loudly and enthusiastically applauded that Leader Paur graciously allowed a repetition. It consisted of two selections from the ballet music of "Feramors," and the candle dance, particularly, was given with delicious spirit and brightness. It is brilliant with ingenious musical conceits, and these were admirably interpreted. The concert concluded with the Wagnerian selection, "Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm," from "Die Walkuere." Mr. Heinrich was the soloist, and he sang remarkably well. The orchestra was notably fine here; and again Conductor Paur emphatically demonstrated his rare knowledge of Wagnerian intricacies.

[86]

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1894.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Fourth Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of the usual crowded and brilliant audience. The programme was a rather curiously assorted one, passing as it did from one extreme to the other in a somewhat disconcerting way, but it did not lack for variety, and its performance was attended by many manifestations of interest and pleasure. It opened with Brahms' famous symphony No. 1, in C minor. This is one of those works which it is not possible properly to appreciate or fully enjoy until after several hearings. Its score is extremely intricate and elaborate, and while there are passages simple and obvious enough to be understood at once, the composition in its entirety requires earnest study and close attention from the listener for him to apprehend its meaning and perceive its beauties. Yet even at a first hearing it can be enjoyed, when played as well as it was last evening, for Mr. Paur interprets Brahms as eloquently and accurately as he does Wagner, and under his intelligently guiding baton all the complications of a singularly abstruse and baffling score were made clear and plain. The success with which he maintained the balance of the parts, emphasized their contrasts, exhibited their significance and preserved their symmetry, entitles him to the highest praise, and goes to confirm the opinion already expressed of his high rank as a conductor. The other orchestral numbers were a flimsy and incoherent entr'acte by Chabrier, and Rubinstein's familiar ballet music from "Feramore," the second movement of which, with its flowing rhythm and seductive melody, pleased the audience so much that an encore was urgently asked for and gracefully accorded. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich, whose selections were Schubert's "Die Allmacht," with orchestral accompaniment by Arthur Mees, and "Wotan's Farewell." He delivered both numbers with much beauty of voice, dignity of spirit, breadth of manner, and effectiveness of method, and was heartily and deservedly applauded. He does not, however, sing any better than when he used to live here eight or ten years ago, but he had to go to London to get an opportunity of appearing under such auspices as favored him last evening.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The principal interest of the fourth Boston Symphony Concert, given last evening in Carnegie Hall, lay in Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and in Wagner's finale of "Die Walküre." In the first of these the exquisite finish of Mr. Paur's orchestra was shown in its greatest perfection. Berlioz himself speaks of the immense difficulties of this remarkable work, and of the immense labor it is for a conductor to lead it properly. Nothing but smoothness and ease was, however, apparent last night in the movements either of maestro or players. The three movements—"The Fête," "The Love Scene," and "Queen Mab Scherzo"—were done without a flaw, with charming taste, and a legato that would have delighted any old master of the Italian school from Boccherinin down to Boito. For the "Wotan's Abschied," that excellent musician, Max Heinrich, lent his aid, bringing his rare intelligence and clever phrasing to bear most potentially upon the well-known lines that have never been else than admirably sung to our audiences. His voice was at better advantage in this than in Schubert's song, "Allmacht," where richness and beauty of tone is a necessity. Heinrich's voice is larger and more powerful than of old, but still lacking in charm of quality. Without it he attracts, when other singers would fail, simply by his artistic acquirements in the æsthetics of his art, by his earnestness and his enthusiasm.

Paur shows immense skill in his interpretation of Wagner. He makes his music free, buoyant, and powerfully worked up to the climaxes, as well as clear and unmistakable in its subtle language. Chabrier's "Entr'acte from Gwendoline" had little force or meaning compared with the other compositions. It was unobjectionable, and might have been anything made by anybody. The "Feramors Ballet" evidently charmed the audience by its brightness, for Mr. Paur was induced to accept its encore.

[illegible]

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1894.

PAUR AND HEINRICH.

The One in a Modern Programme, the Other with New Fascinations.

With the solitary exception of the name of Schubert, the scheme of music presented by Mr. Paur last night at Music Hall was an eminently modern one. Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Chabrier's "Gwendoline" entr'acte, some pretty ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Wotan's "Abschied" from "Walkure," gave a distinct impression of the sympathies of the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for latter-day music.

The orchestra played superbly. No other organization in the country could have given the "Queen Mab Scherzo" with such inimitable finish. Rubinstein's ballet music—out of place on a serious programme—was charmingly played, and the Candle Dance was encored.

Mr. Paur conducted with his usual devotion, but fell short in impressiveness and dramatic dignity in the Wagner number. Chabrier's entr'acte music showed that this eccentric Frenchman has studied Wagner to good disadvantage. He has the manner—too much of it, but he says little and that little with a tortured voice.

Max Heinrich has been a stranger to our concert stage for some years, as he has been a resident of London until recently. He comes back to us as superb an artist as ever, but he sings with more breadth and has more of the heroic in his style than of yore. By all odds the best musician among singers, he does wonders with that vibrant basso cantante of his. It is not a large voice, but a most eloquent one, and he colors it with every emotion at will. He sang first Schubert's "Die Allmacht," a most trying song, and there the beauty of his legato nd his musical phrasing were apparent. He caught the note of immensity in the work, which was orchestrated by Arthur Mees. Mr. Heinrich was recalled three times at the conclusion.

He also gave an excellent reading to Wotan's music. He is one of the most satisfactory vocal artists before the concert public. The house was well filled. The orchestra plays at the Brooklyn Academy of Music this afternoon and Saturday evening.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was much moody music performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Music Hall last night. Modern tendencies were noticeable, not only in the work of the composers represented, but also in the freedom from conventional ideas manifest in the compilation of the programme. We have been accustomed in New-York to a differentiation between the programmes of Symphonic and Popular concerts. In the latter for many years the ballet music from "Feramors," by Rubinstein, was an admired number. It remained, however, for Mr. Paur to come from Boston and introduce it in a concert of the kind supposed in this latitude and longitude to be reserved for matters of greater pith and moment. There is no occasion to complain of him, for that might seem querulous in view of the fact that the Dances of the Bayaderes and the Brides of Cashmere, in the Original opera, are very pretty bits of music, and so pleased the audience that Mr. Paur could still the noise of approbation only by repeating the latter number; but there can be no harm in calling attention to the fact that in New-York such a performance was anomalous, and yet, in spite of the fact, the people liked it.

Mayhap it was because of the circumstance that the graceful dance measures provided something of a relief from the large infusion of moody music aforementioned. First there were three numbers from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," also old-time favorites in the consulship of Theodore Thomas; then, after Schubert's stately song, "Die Allmacht," rendered still more dignified and impressive by the orchestral accompaniment written by Arthur Mees, came some between-acts music from Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," over which the spirit of Berlioz sat brooding, and finally, after the terpsichorian intermezzo, there came, to end all, some pure, fresh and invigorating breezes from Wagner, the finale of "Die Walküre," beginning with Wotan's farewell address to his disobedient daughter. Concerning the manner in which this music was played it is possible only to speak in terms of highest praise. The redoubtable band has seldom appeared to better advantage here, and Mr. Paur displayed some of the pedantic angularities which caused comment in the tone of disappointment at his earlier concerts. It seems as if he were benefiting by his American sojourn. The Berlioz music was read with passionate eloquence, and the dances were played with a refinement of feeling, an appreciation of their beauties of tonal color, a daintiness and a precision that were altogether charming. Of Chabrier's music little has been heard in New-York; we can only recall, on the spur of the moment, a brilliantly orchestrated, but essentially vulgar, Spanish rhapsody which found its way into local lists a few years ago. The entr' acte played last night was much loftier in ideas, and even more brilliant in its instrumental dressing. It is full of the stress of unhappy passion, and in its place is doubtless extremely effective. The very least that can be said about it is that it is an interesting new acquaintance, worthy of further cultivation.

The singer of the occasion was Max Heinrich, who is so much of an artist in all that he does that it is impossible to quarrel with him because of the plentiful lack of sensuous charm disclosed by his voice. He sang the Schubert song with the spiritual exaltation of a congregation in the Temple on Mount Zion proclaiming its "Schema Yisroel, Adonai eloheru, Adonai echod!" and the dramatic selection with a breadth, clearness and impressiveness worthy of the highest praise.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 9, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Performance Better Than the Programme Deserved.

While it would undoubtedly be futile to attempt to play "Die Götterdämmerung" on a penny whistle, it would be quite as unnecessary to engage the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire for a performance of "H. M. S. Pinafore." This remark is evoked by the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Music Hall last night. The programme consisted of five numbers, of which one was so familiar that an exceptionally good performance could be its only excuse, and another was wholly out of place in an entertainment presumably serious. It is not at all necessary that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should come so far to do so small a thing as two movements from the "Feramors" ballet music of Rubinstein. To be sure they were admirably played, but nothing can excuse the fact that the "Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire" was encored. A Boston Symphony audience would properly have more serious ideas of art. But serious ideas of art are indeed rare.

The other numbers on the programme were three movements from Hector Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, Schubert's song, "Die Allmacht," with the accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Artuh Mees; an entr'acte from Charbrier's "Gwendoline," and the familiar farewell of Wotan, from "Die Walküre." The appearance of the last-named numbers in one programme was unfortunate for Charbrier. The most popular opera in Paris in the last year was the second of the "Nibelung" series of Richard Wagner. Indeed, the French capital, which spurned "Tannhäuser" in 1861, is now a hotbed of Wagnerism, and the unfortunate Parisian composers are fairly carried away by the tide. Charbrier's entr'acte, heard last night, is a deliberate and cold-hearted imitation of Wagner's later style, with the inevitable addition of a large quantity of Parisian water, which is generally admitted to be unwholesome. Either the orchestral parts contained some peculiar blunders or Charbrier has made some disturbing experiments in harmony. There is a point at which dissonance ceases to be a virtue.

The orchestra has never been heard here to better advantage than it was last night in the Berlioz music. It was played throughout with a superb solidity and opulence of tone, and with a splendid precision and unanimity. The performance of the marvelously dainty and formidably difficult scherzo was a veritable tour de force. The soloist of the concert was Max Heinrich, who sang both the Schubert song and the Wagner excerpt with excellent vocal art and with admirable dignity of style. The Wagner numbers would have been more effective had Mr. Paur been somewhat less deliberate in the matter of tempo and a little more impassioned in his approach to the climaxes.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To-night is the time for the fourth concert in the series given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was publicly rehearsed yesterday. Philharmonic weather probably, and Lent possibly, had something to do with limiting the size of the audience, for it should have been larger, but perhaps the programme scared away some people, also Brahms, who heads it with his First symphony, is not yet popular with the mass and some people think he never will be. Others hold that he is the Wagner of the present and that he is writing the music of the future. In fifty years from now, they say, the world will be as much surprised at our failure to recognize his transcendent genius as we are at the inability of our fathers to enjoy Wagner. Possibly. The time may arrive when Mr. Howells will be accepted as just as great an author as he believes he is, and when Henry James' glowing reports of 5 o'clock teas and rides on Rotten row will be read in place of beef and brains stories such as De Foe, Dickens, Thackeray, Hawthorne, Stevenson and Kipling have written. The world of our time needs action, whether it wants it or not, and Brahms is another Howells: he thinks about his thoughts and feels about his feelings. His symphonies are essays, not poems. They concern themselves more with the manufacture of music than its art. They do not touch the heart, and it is only the musician's intellect that they appeal to. To the general mind they are as abstruse as Brahminism itself, and there is a certain fitness in his name. His studious avoidance of beauty is as marked as that of some of the young painters, and he seems to be of those who deny any consequence to the subject, believing that the interest of the work is wholly that of narration, whereas some of the best things in the world are as innocent of conscious, technical effort as the prattle of a child. It is hardly art for art with Brahms; it is rather art for science. His First symphony is a musical synthesis in which the process of orchestral writing is exemplified, but in which no remarkable method is exploited. He has no theories, as Wagner had, such as those concerning perpetual melody and the leading motive. He is independent and perverse. In his later things he allows himself more liberty and his audience more pleasure; he shows that he can be musical if he likes; he dances, for instance, and in the "St. Anthony" choral he almost excuses the practice of writing variations. This First symphony is Brahms at his driest and most abstruse. The unspeakable in it suggests the longings and pains of a restless soul. It might be called a "Faust" symphony, if there were a few such interspersals of drama as he gives in the last movement. The pastoral moment in the third movement is also pleasing, but as a rule he is not writing for the nineteenth century. The twentieth is not far away. Emmanuel Chabrier is a modern Frenchman, and after hearing his entr'acte from "Gwendoline" it would be safe to bet that he has been hearing Brahms. He has more sympathy, tenderness and geniality than that dogmatist, but he likes to play with the orchestra in Brahms' manner. He likes to tease a theme and keep it revolving about the band. His knowledge of instrumentation is considerable and he has written several happy melodic phrases. He is strong of hand, but infirm of purpose. In his orchestration he cannot be accused of following anyone, but he is one of those composers who would have been writing their music for piano or brass band, had not Wagner been born in their day. There are several delightful things in this "Gwendoline" and Brahms might take a lesson from it, if he could bear to take a lesson from anyone. Wholly charming are the two dances from Rubinstein's "Feramors," with their strong oriental color and their clear, free melody. No mathematics here—at least, no conscious ones—but the warm impulse of the musical creator. Anton Rubinstein modestly said that the race of composers perished with Chopin. In his own person he refutes his spoken word. Arthur Mees has written an orchestral setting to Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and increased its dignity and interest. It was sung with this new accompaniment yesterday by Max Heinrich. This singer used to be heard in the Thomas concerts some years ago. He has been to Europe since then and has been idle. He has not returned translated, his art has certainly improved. He sings more musically and more skillfully than he did and his songs are more dramatic. There is still something of his reediness of voice, but his upper notes have cleared and are sweeter and fuller. He sang the Schubert number carefully and intelligently, and went boldly through the Wotan music in the last scene of "The Walkyries," which, by one of those odd orderings of fate, or managers, had been sung by Plançon on the same stage on the night before. The Frenchman brought the better voice to it, but the gritty German language seems to better fit the music, and the orchestra under Mr. Paur did astonishing things. Mr. Paur in his first weeks in this country was a trifle disappointing. He had to learn the people, as they had to learn him. He had to know his band and win its liking. He was not fortunate in his programmes. As a result he was accused of being a safe, formal director. Could his readings of Wagner have been heard at that time he would have saved himself the pain of being called names like that. Never was the wildly splendid music of this scene played with more power, more pomp and gorgeousness of orchestration than under his command. The crescendos were cyclonic. The imagination of the audience arose on them and was whirled higher than the Walkyrie rock, though the clink and play of the magic flames that circled the sleeping goddess was never out of the ear. At the last concert Mr. Paur gave a Wagner programme, but in that he did not surpass himself as he did yesterday. The mere dynamic effect of the piece was overmastering. The band as well as its leader was in excellent health and spirits, and the Philharmonic weather seemed to make no difference to it. Perhaps the fine fire that it threw into the Wagner number was due to the exuberance of relief from the Brahms symphony. The concert to-night is announced on the tickets to begin at 8 o'clock, but the programme says 8:15. The programme comes nearest to it.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1894.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its Fourth Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of the usual crowded and brilliant audience. The programme was a rather curiously assorted one, passing as it did from one extreme to the other in a somewhat disconcerting way, but it did not lack for variety, and its performance was attended by many manifestations of interest and pleasure. It opened with Brahms' famous symphony No. 1, in C minor. This is one of those works which it is not possible properly to appreciate or fully enjoy until after several hearings. Its score is extremely intricate and elaborate, and while there are passages simple and obvious enough to be understood at once, the composition in its entirety requires earnest study and close attention from the listener for him to apprehend its meaning and perceive its beauties. Yet even at a first hearing it can be enjoyed, when played as well as it was last evening, for Mr. Paur interprets Brahms as eloquently and accurately as he does Wagner, and under his intelligently guiding baton all the complications of a singularly abstruse and baffling score were made clear and plain. The success with which he maintained the balance of the parts, emphasized their contrasts, exhibited their significance and preserved their symmetry, entitles him to the highest praise, and goes to confirm the opinion already expressed of his high rank as a conductor. The other orchestral numbers were a flimsy and incoherent entr'acte by Chabrier, and Rubinstein's familiar ballet music from "Feramore," the second movement of which, with its flowing rhythm and seductive melody, pleased the audience so much that an encore was urgently asked for and gracefully accorded. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich, whose selections were Schubert's "Die Allmacht," with orchestral accompaniment by Arthur Mees, and "Wotan's Farewell." He delivered both numbers with much beauty of voice, dignity of spirit, breadth of manner, and effectiveness of method, and was heartily and deservedly applauded. He does not, however, sing any better than when he used to live here eight or ten years ago, but he had to go to London to get an opportunity of appearing under such auspices as favored him last evening.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The principal interest of the fourth Boston Symphony Concert, given last evening in Carnegie Hall, lay in Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and in Wagner's finale of "Die Walküre." In the first of these the exquisite finish of Mr. Paur's orchestra was shown in its greatest perfection. Berlioz himself speaks of the immense difficulties of this remarkable work, and of the immense labor it is for a conductor to lead it properly. Nothing but smoothness and ease was, however, apparent last night in the movements either of maestro or players. The three movements—"The Fête," "The Love Scene," and "Queen Mab Scherzo"—were done without a flaw, with charming taste, and a legato that would have delighted any old master of the Italian school from Boccherinin down to Boito. For the "Wotan's Abschied," that excellent musician, Max Heinrich, lent his aid, bringing his rare intelligence and clever phrasing to bear most potentially upon the well-known lines that have never been else than admirably sung to our audiences. His voice was at better advantage in this than in Schubert's song, "Allmacht," where richness and beauty of tone is a necessity. Heinrich's voice is larger and more powerful than of old, but still lacking in charm of quality. Without it he attracts, when other singers would fail, simply by his artistic acquirements in the æsthetics of his art, by his earnestness and his enthusiasm.

Paur shows immense skill in his interpretation of Wagner. He makes his music free, buoyant, and powerfully worked up to the climaxes, as well as clear and unmistakable in its subtle language. Chabrier's "Entr'acte from Gwendoline" had little force or meaning compared with the other compositions. It was unobjectionable, and might have been anything made by anybody. The "Feramors Ballet" evidently charmed the audience by its brightness, for Mr. Paur was induced to accept its encore.

The [illegible] Record

[illegible] W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1894.

PAUR AND HEINRICH.

The One in a Modern Programme, the Other with New Fascinations.

With the solitary exception of the name of Schubert, the scheme of music presented by Mr. Paur last night at Music Hall was an eminently modern one. Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Chabrier's "Gwendoline" entr'acte, some pretty ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Wotan's "Abschied" from "Walkure," gave a distinct impression of the sympathies of the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for latter-day music.

The orchestra played superbly. No other organization in the country could have given the "Queen Mab Scherzo" with such inimitable finish. Rubinstein's ballet music—out of place on a serious programme—was charmingly played, and the Candle Dance was enchored.

Mr. Paur conducted with his usual devotion, but fell short in impressiveness and dramatic dignity in the Wagner number. Chabrier's entr'acte music showed that this eccentric Frenchman has studied Wagner to good disadvantage. He has the manner—too much of it, but he says little and that little with a tortured voice.

Max Heinrich has been a stranger to our concert stage for some years, as he has been a resident of London until recently. He comes back to us as superb an artist as ever, but he sings with more breadth and has more of the heroic in his style than of yore. By all odds the best musician among singers, he does wonders with that vibrant basso cantante of his. It is not a large voice, but a most eloquent one, and he colors it with every emotion at will. He sang first Schubert's "Die Allmacht," a most trying song, and there the beauty of his legato nd his musical phrasing were apparent. He caught the note of immensity in the work, which was orchestrated by Arthur Mees. Mr. Heinrich was recalled three times at the conclusion.

He also gave an excellent reading to Wotan's music. He is one of the most satisfactory vocal artists before the concert public. The house was well filled. The orchestra plays at the Brooklyn Academy of Music this afternoon and Saturday evening.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was much moody music performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Music Hall last night. Modern tendencies were noticeable, not only in the work of the composers represented, but also in the freedom from conventional ideas manifest in the compilation of the programme. We have been accustomed in New-York to a differentiation between the programmes of Symphonic and Popular concerts. In the latter for many years the ballet music from "Feramors," by Rubinstein, was an admired number. It remained, however, for Mr. Paur to come from Boston and introduce it in a concert of the kind supposed in this latitude and longitude to be reserved for matters of greater pith and moment. There is no occasion to complain of him, for that might seem querulous in view of the fact that the Dances of the Bayaderes and the Brides of Cashmere, in the Original opera, are very pretty bits of music, and so pleased the audience that Mr. Paur could still the noise of approbation only by repeating the latter number; but there can be no harm in calling attention to the fact that in New-York such a performance was anomalous, and yet, in spite of the fact, the people liked it.

Mayhap it was because of the circumstance that the graceful dance measures provided something of a relief from the large infusion of moody music aforementioned. First there were three numbers from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," also old-time favorites in the consulship of Theodore Thomas; then, after Schubert's stately song, "Die Allmacht," rendered still more dignified and impressive by the orchestral accompaniment written by Arthur Mees, came some between-acts music from Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline," over which the spirit of Berlioz sat brooding, and finally, after the terpsichorian intermezzo, there came, to end all, some pure, fresh and invigorating breezes from Wagner, the finale of "Die Walküre," beginning with Wotan's farewell address to his disobedient daughter. Concerning the manner in which this music was played it is possible only to speak in terms of highest praise. The redoubtable band has seldom appeared to better advantage here, and Mr. Paur displayed some of the pedantic angularities which caused comment in the tone of disappointment at his earlier concerts. It seems as if he were benefiting by his American sojourn. The Berlioz music was read with passionate eloquence, and the dances were played with a refinement of feeling, an appreciation of their beauties of tonal color, a daintiness and a precision that were altogether charming. Of Chabrier's music little has been heard in New-York; we can only recall, on the spur of the moment, a brilliantly orchestrated, but essentially vulgar, Spanish rhapsody which found its way into local lists a few years ago. The entr' acte played last night was much loftier in ideas, and even more brilliant in its instrumental dressing. It is full of the stress of unhappy passion, and in its place is doubtless extremely effective. The very least that can be said about it is that it is an interesting new acquaintance, worthy of further cultivation.

The singer of the occasion was Max Heinrich, who is so much of an artist in all that he does that it is impossible to quarrel with him because of the plentiful lack of sensuous charm disclosed by his voice. He sang the Schubert song with the spiritual exaltation of a congregation in the Temple on Mount Zion proclaiming its "Schema Yisroel, Adonai elohenu, Adonai echod!" and the dramatic selection with a breadth, clearness and impressiveness worthy of the highest praise.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 9, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Performance Better Than the Programme Deserved.

While it would undoubtedly be futile to attempt to play "Die Götterdämmerung" on a penny whistle, it would be quite as unnecessary to engage the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire for a performance of "H. M. S. Pinafore." This remark is evoked by the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Music Hall last night. The programme consisted of five numbers, of which one was so familiar that an exceptionally good performance could be its only excuse, and another was wholly out of place in an entertainment presumably serious. It is not at all necessary that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should come so far to do so small a thing as two movements from the "Feramors" ballet music of Rubinstein. To be sure they were admirably played, but nothing can excuse the fact that the "Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire" was encored. A Boston Symphony audience would properly have more serious ideas of art. But serious ideas of art are indeed rare.

The other numbers on the programme were three movements from Hector Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, Schubert's song, "Die Allmacht," with the accompaniment arranged for orchestra by Artuh Mees; an entr'acte from Charbrier's "Gwendoline," and the familiar farewell of Wotan, from "Die Walküre." The appearance of the last-named numbers in one programme was unfortunate for Charbrier. The most popular opera in Paris in the last year was the second of the "Nibelung" series of Richard Wagner. Indeed, the French capital, which spurned "Tannhäuser" in 1861, is now a hotbed of Wagnerism, and the unfortunate Parisian composers are fairly carried away by the tide. Charbrier's entr'acte, heard last night, is a deliberate and cold-hearted imitation of Wagner's later style, with the inevitable addition of a large quantity of Parisian water, which is generally admitted to be unwholesome. Either the orchestral parts contained some peculiar blunders or Charbrier has made some disturbing experiments in harmony. There is a point at which dissonance ceases to be a virtue.

The orchestra has never been heard here to better advantage than it was last night in the Berlioz music. It was played throughout with a superb solidity and opulence of tone, and with a splendid precision and unanimity. The performance of the marvelously dainty and formidably difficult scherzo was a veritable tour de force. The soloist of the concert was Max Heinrich, who sang both the Schubert song and the Wagner excerpt with excellent vocal art and with admirable dignity of style. The Wagner numbers would have been more effective had Mr. Paur been somewhat less deliberate in the matter of tempo and a little more impassioned in his approach to the climaxes.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To-night is the time for the fourth concert in the series given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was publicly rehearsed yesterday. Philharmonic weather probably, and Lent possibly, had something to do with limiting the size of the audience, for it should have been larger, but perhaps the programme scared away some people, also. Brahms, who heads it with his First symphony, is not yet popular with the mass and some people think he never will be. Others hold that he is the Wagner of the present and that he is writing the music of the future. In fifty years from now, they say, the world will be as much surprised at our failure to recognize his transcendent genius as we are at the inability of our fathers to enjoy Wagner. Possibly. The time may arrive when Mr. Howells will be accepted as just as great an author as he believes he is, and when Henry James' glowing reports of 5 o'clock teas and rides on Rotten row will be read in place of beef and brains stories such as De Foe, Dickens, Thackeray, Hawthorne, Stevenson and Kipling have written. The world of our time needs action, whether it wants it or not, and Brahms is another Howells: he thinks about his thoughts and feels about his feelings. His symphonies are essays, not poems. They concern themselves more with the manufacture of music than its art. They do not touch the heart, and it is only the musician's intellect that they appeal to. To the general mind they are as abstruse as Brahminism itself, and there is a certain fitness in his name. His studious avoidance of beauty is as marked as that of some of the young painters, and he seems to be of those who deny any consequence to the subject, believing that the interest of the work is wholly that of narration, whereas some of the best things in the world are as innocent of conscious, technical effort as the prattle of a child. It is hardly art for art with Brahms; it is rather art for science. His First symphony is a musical synthesis in which the process of orchestral writing is exemplified, but in which no remarkable method is exploited. He has no theories, as Wagner had, such as those concerning perpetual melody and the leading motive. He is independent and perverse. In his later things he allows himself more liberty and his audience more pleasure; he shows that he can be musical if he likes; he dances, for instance, and in the "St. Anthony" choral he almost excuses the practice of writing variations. This First symphony is Brahms at his driest and most abstruse. The unspeakable in it suggests the longings and pains of a restless soul. It might be called a "Faust" symphony, if there were a few such interspersals of drama as he gives in the last movement. The pastoral moment in the third movement is also pleasing, but as a rule he is not writing for the nineteenth century. The twentieth is not far away. Emmanuel Chabrier is a modern Frenchman, and after hearing his entr'acte from "Gwendoline" it would be safe to bet that he has been hearing Brahms. He has more sympathy, tenderness and geniality than that dogmatist, but he likes to play with the orchestra in Brahms' manner. He likes to tease a theme and keep it revolving about the band. His knowledge of instrumentation is considerable and he has written several happy melodic phrases. He is strong of hand, but infirm of purpose. In his orchestration he cannot be accused of following anyone, but he is one of those composers who would have been writing their music for piano or brass band, had not Wagner been born in their day. There are several delightful things in this "Gwendoline" and Brahms might take a lesson from it, if he could bear to take a lesson from anyone. Wholly charming are the two dances from Rubinstein's "Feramors" with their strong oriental color and their clear, free melody. No mathematics here—at least, no conscious ones—but the warm impulse of the musical creator. Anton Rubinstein modestly said that the race of composers perished with Chopin. In his own person he refutes his spoken word. Arthur Mees has written an orchestral setting to Schubert's "Die Allmacht" and increased its dignity and interest. It was ng with this new accompaniment yester- by Max Heinrich. This singer used to eard in the Thomas concerts some years He has been to Europe since then and has een idle. He has not returned translated, has certainly improved. He sings more and more skillfully than he did and h are more dramatic. There is still some- ng of his reediness of voice, but his upper tes have cleared and are sweeter and fuller. H sang the Schubert number carefully and intelligently, and went boldly through the Wotan music in the last scene of "The Walkyries," which, by one of those odd orderings of fate, or managers, had been sung by Plancon on the same stage on the night before. The Frenchman brought the better voice to it, but the gritty German language seems to better fit the music, and the orchestra under Mr. Paur did astonishing things. Mr. Paur in his first weeks in this country was a trifle disappointing. He had to learn the people, as they had to learn him. He had to know his band and win its liking. He was not fortunate in his programmes. As a result he was accused of being a safe, formal director. Could his readings of Wagner have been heard at that time he would have saved himself the pain of being called names like that. Never was the wildly splendid music of this scene played with more power, more pomp and gorgeousness of orchestration than under his command. The crescendos were cyclonic. The imagination of the audience arose on them and was whirled higher than the Walkyrie rock, though the clink and play of the magic flames that circled the sleeping goddess was never out of the ear. At the last concert Mr. Paur gave a Wagner programme, but in that he did not surpass himself as he did yesterday. The more dynamic effect of the piece was overmastering. The band as well as its leader was in excellent health and spirits, and the Philharmonic weather seemed to make no difference to it. Perhaps the fine fire that it threw into the Wagner number was due to the exuberance of relief from the Brahms symphony. The concert to-night is announced on the tickets to begin at 8 o'clock, but the programme says 8:15. The programme comes nearest to it.

[illegible] Musical.

[illegible]DAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1894.

The Sixth Concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Chickering Hall.

The program of the Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Chickering Hall last evening, with the assistance of Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, was as follows:

Quartette, op. 32.....Foote
(MS, first time.)
Quartette, op. 59, No. 3.....Beethoven
Piano trio, op. 112.....Raff

The introductory andante con moto in the Beethoven quartette was taken as though it were almost an adagio, and at times the second violin spoke in a comparatively weak voice, when it should have spoken clearly and decisively, but with these exceptions noted there is nought but praise for the fine performance of this noble work. The second movement was given with loving tenderness, and the finale was played superbly in all respects.

Mr. Perabo is always welcome as an ensemble player. He is master of the difficult and seemingly paradoxical art of preserving his own individuality and yet remembering that he is only one member of a body. He is too conscientious an artist to be brilliant at the expense of his neighbors, and yet the clearness and smoothness of his technique are in evidence. He has a remarkably keen sense of proportion. He is not restive when the composer calls on the violin or 'cello to speak. The pianist's sotto voce remarks meanwhile do not interrupt the speaker, nor is his accompaniment mechanical and perfunctory, nordoes he seem to say: "Just wait a minute and listen to me." An admirable ensemble player is Mr. Perabo. Would that there were more like him.

Mr. Foote's new quartette contains amiable passages of music. Some of the variations in the third movement are pretty, and it may be here said that this movement is the strongest of the four. The first movement seems like unto a piece of mosaic work, rather than a spontaneously conceived and skillfully worked out organic whole. The themes are not particularly striking in originality, in beauty, or in force, and the development is without the musical conviction that stamps with a hall-mark the slightest work of the master of his trade. The scherzo is agreeable music, with the exception of the trio, which is, to be sure, a brave striving after effect, but the striving is too apparent. Mr. Foote calls the finale of his quartette an allegro con fuoco, but the fire does not burn brightly; it does not crack and sparkle; it is rather inclined to smoulder.

Mr. Foote is one of the most industrious of our American musicians. He teaches, he plays piano pieces in public, he accompanies singers in public, he is organist of a church, and in addition to all these musical duties which he discharges faithfully, he finds time to compose songs, secular and profane choral works and pieces for various instruments. Now, the question naturally arises, Can a man do all these things well? Then another question may be justly asked, and it is this: If a composer has really nothing particular to say at a given time should he be praised for his industry in preparing a speech, ambitious in its proportions, amiable and polite in its language, without marked solecisms, and also without the thought that moves or masters the hearer, without the paradox that strikes the fancy, without the brilliancy of rhetoric that for the moment confuses the judgment? It must also be remembered that industry of itself is not the most pronounced characteristic of the born musician.

But on the other hand, let us acknowledge cheerfully that there are minor musicians as well as minor poets, and they give pleasure to many. Last evening the audience listened to Mr. Foote's quartette with evident enjoyment, and the applause after the finale was so hearty and so long continued that the composer arose and bowed his thanks to the members of the Kneisel Quartet.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Blizzards have no effect upon the Kneisel Quartette audiences, and Chickering Hall was well filled at the sixth concert of the series given last night. A new string quartette by Arthur Foote began the concert. Mr. Foote is a master of the classical forms, and has done much work in them, but is scarcely inspired enough to balance with the masters in this field, and was somewhat at a disadvantage by being placed in juxtaposition with Raff and Beethoven.

The first movement of his quartette was short and to the point. Its chief theme was much syncopated, and gave an impression of straining for oddity, but there were some good touches in development.

The Scherzo had a rather melancholy trio (the entire work tended toward the minor mode), with some good work for first violin and cello in special phrases, and ended with the conventional "Da Capo," although the coda brought a quaint end in high position.

The andante gave a set of variations of much ingenuity, some of real beauty, the only two faults being an unimpressive ending (a species of anticlimax) and the fact that the movement was far too large for true balance, particularly after the short first movement. Nevertheless this movement deserves praise as being the best part of the quartette. There were excellent points in the finale also, especially in the treatment of the cellos (in a short but characteristic figure) and in certain touches reminiscent of the preceding movement. Mr. Foote has certainly not retrograded in this work, but its last two movements are much stronger, and longer, than its first, and there is no equipoise in the cycle form as here employed. The work was applauded to the echo.

The Beethoven Quartette in C major was most brilliantly performed, and the fugal passages of the end were clear in spite of their rapidity.

It was scarcely just to a pianist of Mr. Perabo's ability, and one who appears so seldom, to place him at the end of a long programme; but it fortunately made no difference in the warmth of his reception and certainly did not in his playing. He is one of the best interpreters of chamber music in this country. With the memory of a recent performance at these concerts, where an enthusiastic pianist drowned the strings as effectually as if they had been young kittens, it was a real delight to find perfect balance of power again. The canonic work in the second movement was an illustration of artistic interweaving of parts. Raff's Piano Trio in G major, op. 112, was the work, and its melodious and enforced style formed a strong contrast to the odd and syncopated beginning of the concert. Mr. Perabo should be heard oftener in this class of work. At each appearance he teaches a lesson to our piano thunderers. In these days of tremendous soloists it is not easy to find a good pianist in the abnegation of chamber music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The sixth concert by the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening, and in spite of the disagreeable weather Chickering Hall was filled by a representative Boston music-loving audience that was delighted with the programme. The first number played was written by Mr. Arthur Foote, and last evening was the first time it has been given in public. It was in E major, and both the players and composer received an ovation.

A piano trio in G major, with Mr. Ernst Perabo as pianist, concluded the evening's entertainment. Mr. Perabo was warmly received. The first violin was played by Franz Kneisel; second, by Otto Roth; viola, by L. Sveenski; violoncello, by Alwin Schroeder.

The next concert will be given March 5.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 44.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

At the Kneisel quartet concert in Chickering Hall, last evening, Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, assisted, and the programme included a piano trio, in G major, op. 112, (Raff): Rasch, frob bewegt—Sehr rasch—Massig langsam—Rasch durchaus belebt.

Mr. Foote's quartet proved another most interesting contribution to the repertoire of Mr. Kneisel's organization, and its playing revealed all its admirable workmanship in the happiest fashion. Mr. Perabo's playing was in keeping with his own high standing as a musician, and the concert as a whole proved to be among the most enjoyable of the present season.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, gave the sixth concert of this its ninth season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Arthur Foote: Quartet in E major, Opus 32 (MS.) (First time.)
Beethoven: Quartet in C major, Opus 59, No. 3.
Raff: Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, in G major, Opus 112.

Mr. Foote's new quartet made a very fine impression. It is in four movements: Allegro commodo—Scherzo; Vivace—Andante un poco con moto—Allegro con fuoco. The third movement might have been marked Andante con variazioni, for it is distinctly and openly in that form. Mr. Foote shows more and more individuality in his writing; in this quartet, notably in the first movement, one finds the influence of Raff—which has been noticeable in his instrumental compositions from the first—and the somewhat later influence of Brahms already well fused into something which is recognizable as his own style. The two favorite movements of the quartet were plainly the Scherzo and the Andante; yet, to our mind, the first movement, if falling somewhat behind these two in point of brilliancy, surpasses them both in a certain masterliness of harmony and fine coherency of development; we should call it the strongest movement Mr. Foote has yet put out. The beauty and force of the variations (third movement) are unmistakable; the movement was, however, given under conditions not entirely the most favorable for judging of it as a whole at the first hearing. The movement was not marked as a theme with variations on the programme; the quartet made the customary, and perhaps desirable, short waits after many of the variations, and the audience, thinking the movement was at an end, kept breaking in with applause. This broke the musical continuity, and several times in the movement it was like beginning all over again. Of the individual beauty of each variation one could judge well enough, but it was impossible to obtain a distinct general impression of the movement as a whole. The one point in the quartet about which we are as yet in doubt is the last movement; first impressions are deceptive, but somehow it did not seem to us to have the real character of a finale, it did not seem to bring the work recognizably to a definite conclusion; and strange to say, one seemed to have a certain premonition of this quite early in the movement; one kept wondering how the composer would manage it, and how he would succeed in giving one the due sense of finality and completeness. If we should much like to hear the first three movements again for pleasure, we should particularly like to hear this Finale again for study, to clear up the rather hazy impression it has left on us. The quartet was admirably played, and received with every mark of enthusiasm.

The playing of the third Rasoumoffsky quartet was masterly at every point. The Raff trio was superbly given by Mr. Perabo, Mr. Kneisel, and Mr. Schroeder; it is one of Raff's best things, full of invention and carried through with a very firm hand. Once more Mr. Perabo proved himself an artist of the first water; in the matter of concerted playing he comes about as near perfection as one can well imagine. His sense for musical balance, his power of now taking the lead, now following sympathetically, is conspicuous. The performance was greeted with the heartiest applause. Upon the whole, it was a superb concert.

BALTIMORE LIFE.

LTIMORE, MD., FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony, Emil Paur Conductor, which took place at Ford's Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon, was one of the best given this season; the program was an excellent one, and the attendance also very good. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist; he sang "Die Allmacht," by Schubert, also Wotan's Farewell" and Fire-Charm, from "Die Walkuere," by Wagner, both were sung with Orchestra accompainment. The other numbers were, Hector Berlioz's, "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony Op. 17, Anton Rubinstein's, Ballet Music from "Feramors," and Richard Wagner's "Tannhauser" in E major. The fifth and last concert, season 93-94, takes place at Ford's Grand Opera House Tuesday afternoon, March 27.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday night in Carnegie Music Hall.

With the solitary exception of the name of Schubert, the scheme of music presented by Mr. Paur was an eminently modern one. Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Chabrier's "Gwendoline" entr'acte, some pretty ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Wotan's "Abschied" from "Walküre," gave a distinct impression of the sympathies of the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for latter day music.

The orchestra played superbly. No other organization in the country could have given the "Queen Mab Scherzo" with such inimitable finish. Rubinstein's ballet music—out of place on a serious program—was charmingly played, and the candle dance was encored.

Mr. Paur conducted with his usual devotion, but fell short in impressiveness and dramatic dignity in the Wagner number. Chabrier's entr'acte music showed that this eccentric Frenchman has studied Wagner to good disadvantage. He has the manner, too much of it, but he says little and that little with a tortured voice.

Max Heinrich has been a stranger to our concert stage for some years, as he has been a resident of London until recently. He comes back to us as superb an artist as ever, but he sings with more breadth and has more of the heroic in his style than of yore. By all odds the best musician among singers, he does wonders with that vibrant basso cantante of his. It is not a large voice, but a most eloquent one, and he colors it with every emotion at will. He sang first Schubert's "Die Allmacht," a most trying song, and there the beauty of his legato and his musical phrasing were apparent. He caught the note of immensity in the work, which was orchestrated by Arthur Mees. Mr. Heinrich was recalled three times at the conclusion.

He also gave an excellent reading to Wotan's music.

Nature has not endowed him with the rich, mellow organ of Plançon, but he sang the Wagner number with more virility and meaning than the Frenchman. Mr. Paur's interpretation of the "Walküre" music, when compared with Seidl's, was labored and cautious. He is not to the Wagnerian manner born. Yet it was an interesting concert.

The Last Kneisel Quartet Concert.

THE Kneisel Quartet gave an interesting concert last Friday night in Chamber Music Hall, and played for the first time in this city a string quartet by Eugen d'Albert, the pianist. The work reveals learning and ingenuity, but is deficient on the spiritual side. The spoor of Brahms, Beethoven, even Saint-Saëns is present, the French composer's "Rouet d'Omphale" being suggested in the scherzo. The work as a whole reminds one of Beethoven's later style, and really deserved the exceptionally smooth interpretation it received. Mr. Franz Kneisel played Bach's great "Chaconne" in a finished manner, and the evening closed with the performance of Beethoven's quintet in C, Mr. Zach taking the second viola part. The playing of the club this season has been of inestimable value to the lovers of the most refined form of musical art.

Paur in Brooklyn.—The fourth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, were given at the Academy of Music Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last. Max Heinrich was the soloist, and this was the program given under Mr. Paur's direction:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
Song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht".....Schubert
Orchestrated by Arthur Mees.
Entr'acte from "Gwendoline".....Emmanuel Chabrier
Ballet-music from "Feramors".....Anton Rubinstein
Dance of Bayaderes.
Candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
"Wotan's" "Farewell', and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkuere".....Richard Wagner

[illegible]
Philadelphia, Saturday, February 17, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts have been a great fad among society people for several years and full houses have been the order of the day. They certainly deserved the excellent support they received as Conductor Paur has an excellent organization, and has proved himself a worthy successor to Nikish.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1894.

The Sixth Concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Chickering Hall.

The program of the Kneisel Quartet concert, given in Chickering Hall last evening, with the assistance of Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, was as follows:

Quartette, op. 32.....Foote
(MS, first time.)
Quartette, op. 59, No. 3.....Beethoven
Piano trio, op. 112.....Raff

The introductory andante con moto in the Beethoven quartette was taken as though it were almost an adagio, and at times the second violin spoke in a comparatively weak voice, when it should have spoken clearly and decisively, but with these exceptions noted there is nought but praise for the fine performance of this noble work. The second movement was given with loving tenderness, and the finale was played superbly in all respects.

Mr. Perabo is always welcome as an ensemble player. He is master of the difficult and seemingly paradoxical art of preserving his own individuality and yet remembering that he is only one member of a body. He is too conscientious an artist to be brilliant at the expense of his neighbors, and yet the clearness and smoothness of his technique are in evidence. He has a remarkably keen sense of proportion. He is not restive when the composer calls on the violin or 'cello to speak. The pianist's sotto voce remarks meanwhile do not interrupt the speaker, nor is his accompaniment mechanical and perfunctory, nor does he seem to say: "Just wait a minute and listen to me." An admirable ensemble player is Mr. Perabo. Would that there were more like him.

Mr. Foote's new quartette contains amiable passages of music. Some of the variations in the third movement are pretty, and it may be here said that this movement is the strongest of the four. The first movement seems like unto a piece of mosaic work, rather than a spontaneously conceived and skilfully worked out organic whole. The themes are not particularly striking in originality, in beauty, or in force, and the development is without the musical conviction that stamps with a hall-mark the slightest work of the master of his trade. The scherzo is agreeable music, with the exception of the trio, which is, to be sure, a brave striving after effect, but the striving is too apparent. Mr. Foote calls the finale of his quartette an allegro con fuoco, but the fire does not burn brightly; it does not crack and sparkle; it is rather inclined to smoulder.

Mr. Foote is one of the most industrious of our American musicians. He teaches, he plays piano pieces in public, he accompanies singers in public, he is organist of a church, and in addition to all these musical duties which he discharges faithfully, he finds time to compose songs, secular and profane choral works and pieces for various instruments. Now, the question naturally arises, Can a man do all these things well? Then another question may be justly asked, and it is this: If a composer has really nothing particular to say at a given time should he be praised for his industry in preparing a speech, ambitious in its proportions, amiable and polite in its language, without marked solecisms, and also without the thought that moves or masters the hearer, without the paradox that strikes the fancy, without the brilliancy of rhetoric that for the moment confuses the judgment? It must also be remembered that industry of itself is not the most pronounced characteristic of the born musician.

But on the other hand, let us ackpowledge cheerfully that there are minor musicians as well as minor poets, and they give pleasure to many. Last evening the audience listened to Mr. Foote's quartette with evident enjoyment, and the applause after the finale was so hearty and so long continued that the composer arose and bowed his thanks to the members of the Kneisel Quartet.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

Blizzards have no effect upon the Kneisel Quartette audiences, and Chickering Hall was well filled at the sixth concert of the series given last night. A new string quartette by Arthur Foote began the concert. Mr. Foote is a master of the classical forms, and has done much work in them, but is scarcely inspired enough to balance with the masters in this field, and was somewhat at a disadvantage by being placed in juxtaposition with Raff and Beethoven.

The first movement of his quartette was short and to the point. Its chief theme was much syncopated, and gave an impression of straining for oddity, but there were some good touches in development.

The Scherzo had a rather melancholy trio (the entire work tended toward the minor mode), with some good work for first violin and cello in special phrases, and ended with the conventional "Da Capo," although the coda brought a quaint end in high position.

The andante gave a set of variations of much ingenuity, some of real beauty, the only two faults being an unimpressive ending (a species of anticlimax) and the fact that the movement was far too large for true balance, particularly after the short first movement. Nevertheless this movement deserves praise as being the best part of the quartette. There were excellent points in the finale also, especially in the treatment of the cellos (in a short but characteristic figure) and in certain touches reminiscent of the preceding movement. Mr. Foote has certainly not retrograded in this work, but its last two movements are much stronger, and longer, than its first, and there is no equipoise in the cycle form as here employed. The work was applauded to the echo.

The Beethoven Quartette in C major was most brilliantly performed, and the fugal passages of the end were clear in spite of their rapidity.

It was scarcely just to a pianist of Mr. Perabo's ability, and one who appears so seldom, to place him at the end of a long programme; but it fortunately made no difference in the warmth of his reception and certainly did not in his playing. He is one of the best interpreters of chamber music in this country. With the memory of a recent performance at these concerts, where an enthusiastic pianist drowned the strings as effectually as if they had been young kittens, it was a real delight to find perfect balance of power again. The canonic work in the second movement was an illustration of artistic interweaving of parts. Raff's Piano Trio in G major, op. 112, was the work, and its melodious and enforced style formed a strong contrast to the odd and syncopated beginning of the concert. M. Perabo should be heard oftener in this class of work. At each appearance he teaches a lesson to our piano thunderers. In these days of tremendous soloists it is not easy to find a good pianist in the abnegatory field of chamber music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

The sixth concert by the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening, and in spite of the disagreeable weather Chickering Hall was filled by a representative Boston music-loving audience that was delighted with the programme. The first number played was written by Mr. Arthur Foote, and last evening was the first time it has been given in public. It was in E major, and both the players and composer received an ovation.

A piano trio in G major, with Mr. Ernst Perabo as pianist, concluded the evening's entertainment. Mr. Perabo was warmly received. The first violin was played by Franz Kneisel; second, by Otto Roth; viola, by L. Sveenski; violoncello, by Alwin Schroeder.

The next concert will be given March 5.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 44.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT.

At the Kneisel quartet concert in Chickering Hall, last evening, Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, assisted, and the programme included a piano trio, in G major, op. 112, (Raff); Rasch, froh bewegt—Sehr rasch—Massig langsam—Rasch durchaus belebt.

Mr. Foote's quartet proved another most interesting contribution to the repertoire of Mr. Kneisel's organization, and its playing revealed all its admirable workmanship in the happiest fashion. Mr. Perabo's playing was in keeping with his own high standing as a musician, and the concert as a whole proved to be among the most enjoyable of the present season.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, gave the sixth concert of this its ninth season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Arthur Foote: Quartet in E major, Opus 32 (MS.) (First time.)
Beethoven: Quartet in C major, Opus 59, No. 3.
Raff: Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, in G major, Opus 112.

Mr. Foote's new quartet made a very fine impression. It is in four movements: Allegro commodo—Scherzo; Vivace—Andante un poco con moto—Allegro con fuoco. The third movement might have been marked Andante con variazioni, for it is distinctly and openly in that form. Mr. Foote shows more and more individuality in his writing; in this quartet, notably in the first movement, one finds the influence of Raff—which has been noticeable in his instrumental compositions from the first—and the somewhat later influence of Brahms already well fused into something which is recognizable as his own style. The two favorite movements of the quartet were plainly the Scherzo and the Andante; yet, to our mind, the first movement, if falling somewhat behind these two in point of brilliancy, surpasses them both in a certain masterliness of harmony and fine coherency of development; we should call it the strongest movement Mr. Foote has yet put out. The beauty and force of the variations (third movement) are unmistakable; the movement was, however, given under conditions not entirely the most favorable for judging of it as a whole at the first hearing. The movement was not marked as a theme with variations on the programme; the quartet made the customary, and perhaps desirable, short waits after many of the variations, and the audience, thinking the movement was at an end, kept breaking in with applause. This broke the musical continuity, and several times in the movement it was like beginning all over again. Of the individual beauty of each variation one could judge well enough, but it was impossible to obtain a distinct general impression of the movement as a whole. The one point in the quartet about which we are as yet in doubt is the last movement; first impressions are deceptive, but somehow it did not seem to us to have the real character of a finale, it did not seem to bring the work recognizably to a definite conclusion; and strange to say, one seemed to have a certain premonition of this quite early in the movement; one kept wondering how the composer would manage it, and how he would succeed in giving one the due sense of finality and completeness. If we should much like to hear the first three movements again for pleasure, we should particularly like to hear this Finale again for study, to clear up the rather hazy impression it has left on us. The quartet was admirably played, and received with every mark of enthusiasm.

The playing of the third Rasoumoffsky quartet was masterly at every point. The Raff trio was superbly given by Mr. Perabo, Mr. Kneisel, and Mr. Schroeder; it is one of Raff's best things, full of invention and carried through with a very firm hand. Once more Mr. Perabo proved himself an artist of the first water; in the matter of concerted playing he comes about as near perfection as one can well imagine. His sense for musical balance, his power of now taking the lead, now following sympathetically, is conspicuous. The performance was greeted with the heartiest applause. Upon the whole, it was a superb concert.

BALTIMORE LIFE.

LTIMORE, MD., FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony, Emil Paur Conductor, which took place at Ford's Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon, was one of the best given this season; the program was an excellent one, and the attendance also very good. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist; he sang "Die Allmacht," by Schubert, also Wotan's Farewell" and Fire-Charm, from "Die Walkuere," by Wagner, both were sung with Orchestra accompainment. The other numbers were, Hector Berlioz's, "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony Op. 17, Anton Rubinstein's, Ballet Music from "Feramors," and Richard Wagner's "Tannhauser" in E major. The fifth and last concert, season 93-94, takes place at Ford's Grand Opera House Tuesday afternoon, March 27.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday night in Carnegie Music Hall.

With the solitary exception of the name of Schubert, the scheme of music presented by Mr. Paur was an eminently modern one. Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Chabrier's "Gwendoline" entr'acte, some pretty ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Wotan's "Abschied" from "Walküre," gave a distinct impression of the sympathies of the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for latter day music.

The orchestra played superbly. No other organization in the country could have given the "Queen Mab Scherzo" with such inimitable finish. Rubinstein's ballet music—out of place on a serious program—was charmingly played, and the candle dance was encored.

Mr. Paur conducted with his usual devotion, but fell short in impressiveness and dramatic dignity in the Wagner number. Chabrier's entr'acte music showed that this eccentric Frenchman has studied Wagner to good disadvantage. He has the manner, too much of it, but he says little and that little with a tortured voice.

Max Heinrich has been a stranger to our concert stage for some years, as he has been a resident of London until recently. He comes back to us as superb an artist as ever, but he sings with more breadth and has more of the heroic in his style than of yore. By all odds the best musician among singers, he does wonders with that vibrant basso cantante of his. It is not a large voice, but a most eloquent one, and he colors it with every emotion at will. He sang first Schubert's "Die Allmacht," a most trying song, and there the beauty of his legato and his musical phrasing were apparent. He caught the note of immensity in the work, which was orchestrated by Arthur Mees. Mr. Heinrich was recalled three times at the conclusion.

He also gave an excellent reading to Wotan's music.

Nature has not endowed him with the rich, mellow organ of Plançon, but he sang the Wagner number with more virility and meaning than the Frenchman. Mr. Paur's interpretation of the "Walküre" music, when compared with Seidl's, was labored and cautious. He is not to the Wagnerian manner born. Yet it was an interesting concert.

The Last Kneisel Quartet Concert.

THE Kneisel Quartet gave an interesting concert last Friday night in Chamber Music Hall, and played for the first time in this city a string quartet by Eugen d'Albert, the pianist. The work reveals learning and ingenuity, but is deficient on the spiritual side. The spoor of Brahms, Beethoven, even Saint-Saëns is present, the French composer's "Rouet d'Omphale" being suggested in the scherzo. The work as a whole reminds one of Beethoven's later style, and really deserved the exceptionally smooth interpretation it received. Mr. Franz Kneisel played Bach's great "Chaconne" in a finished manner, and the evening closed with the performance of Beethoven's quintet in C, Mr. Zach taking the second viola part. The playing of the club this season has been of inestimable value to the lovers of the most refined form of musical art.

Paur in Brooklyn.—The fourth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, were given at the Academy of Music Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last. Max Heinrich was the soloist, and this was the program given under Mr. Paur's direction:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
Song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht".....Schubert
Orchestrated by Arthur Mees.
Entr'acte from "Gwendoline".....Emmanuel Chabrier
Ballet-music from "Feramors".....Anton Rubinstein
Dance of Bayaderes.
Candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
"Wotan's" "Farewell', and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkuere".....Richard Wagner

Stageland

Philadelphia, Saturday, February 17, 1894.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts have been a great fad among society people for several years and full houses have been the order of the day. They certainly deserved the excellent support they received as Conductor Paur has an excellent organization, and has proved himself a worthy successor to Nikish.

[88]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 18, 1894.

THE KNEISEL AND SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The programme for the fifteenth Symphony concert was a trifle long, and it ended tamely at the very last; but it held a great amount of interesting matter, and of its five numbers four were absolute novelties and two were for a solo instrument. The symphony, according to Mr. Paur's usual and excellent disposition, had the first place, and was consequently heard to the best possible advantage in the freshness of the listening. Being a work of Brahms—the second, in D major,—it naturally needed the closest and clearest attention. Yet the scores of Brahms, so complicated and forbidding at first, not only clarify but also endear themselves by repetition. Not the audiences merely, but the players and conductors themselves, are constantly obtaining a better grasp upon his methods and his manners; and there are accordingly a better transference of his ideas and a larger sympathy with his purposes. This second symphony is full of beauties as well as fraught with strength, and the sweet charm of its adagio and the quaint trickery of its scherzo can hardly escape even those who cannot trace the fragments of the themes which pass in and out with changeful form and elusive modulation in the opening allegro or those who fail to follow the impetuous rush of the intermingled motives of the finale. Mr. Paur's clear head and firm hand are well suited to the exposition of Brahms, for his tendency to over elucidate or over-accent the minor phrases in Beethoven, is almost exactly what is needed to help the listener find the wandering sentences which are so nearly lost in the curious and busy counterpoint and full instrumentation of the modern master. The present reading was an excellent one and was thoroughly appreciated.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler followed with two new morceaux for violin, each short and in a single movement. The one was a romance of a generally reposeful and placid character, by Bruch, and the other a Concert Piece by Saint-Saens, fantastic almost to grotesqueness and brilliantly gay, but without levity. Each in its way showed its author's knowledge of the instrument for which he was writing, both in the adaptation of its tone colors to the genre of his composition and in the choice of the technical display and difficulty appointed for the development and embellishment of his themes. At the place indicated for it in the latter piece Mr. Loeffler introduced a long cadenza of his own, quite in keeping with the principal theme and bristling with terrible but not repellent tests of technique. Mr. Loeffler's playing was altogether admirable—delightful in its smoothness and equality of tone, exact in intonation, elegant in phrasing, facile in the delivery of all the perplexities and audacities of the technical execution, sweet and sincere in sentiment. He was very spontaneously and very liberally applauded.

Next came "A Northern Campaign," described as an overture to a tragedy, and credited to Emil Hartmann, a native and resident of Copenhagen, now retired from public life, although less than sixty years of age and devoting himself to composition. This is a brief, but rather impressive work—impressive, rather by its dignified, coherent treatment and its atmosphere, than by any notable originality of melodic form or development, although it has touches of distinct individuality and felicity. It begins with the gloomy gravity of an impassive northern climate and temperament, and then passes,—through a trumpet figure which often reappears later on,—to its main matter in an energetic and excited allegro, which must be accepted as suggesting the outward pressure of military force, with conflict, clangor, exhilaration and courage against and over obstacles. Brilliancy is imparted by the flights of harp chords and mystery is added in the occasional gloomy rattle of the tam-tam. This part of the work is developed with discreet reserve in extent as well as in volume, and a brief return to the theme and spirit of the introduction brings a quiet close.

The Tschaikowsky symphonic poem which had been promised was not forthcoming; but in place of it there was a "Humoresque" about Don Quixote, by Rubinstein. This purports to display symbolically a few of the characteristic episodes in the career of the notable knight of La Mancha. The sequence of these stands about as follows: The inflammation of his imagination by tales of chivalry and his resolve to set off on a conquering career all "plated in habiliments of war," to do doughty deeds and to win his Dulcinea's favor; his departure on his lumbering steed; his discovery and dispersal of the flock of sheep; his impassioned suit to the village women and their fear of him; his rescue from their escort of the criminals, who in recompense fall upon him and beat him; his lamentations over his bruises and because of the ingratitude and blindness of the world; his return home and his death among his sympathizing relatives and friends. There is a plenty of clever writing in this attempt at musical comedy and some of the minor episodes are really picturesque, particularly the pastoral incidents, the notions of martial pomp and valor and the ponderous onslaughts of knight and charger. But when all is said and done, one cannot set the piece down as very amusing, while it is not at all adapted for the end of a long programme because it dies away into nothingness after a lot of dolorous exclamations and melancholy phrases.

The playing all through the concert was fine, and even the drummer rarely expanded into excess.

Next Saturday's programme names nothing new: Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings, Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing twice.

Mr. Arthur Foote is an assiduous and prolific writer, and hardly a week passes without his making some contributions to the stock of local composition, if only in the shape of a batch of songs or a few anthems. But he is not disposed to limit his ambitions to these narrower and easily worked fields, and therefore he makes frequent essays into that of chamber music, where he has already brought good harvests to maturity. His latest production in this manner is a string quartette which was introduced at the Kneisel concert of Monday evening. This is well thought out and generally well handled, and Mr. Foote's understanding and use of the standard forms in the announcement and development of his themes received new illustration in each movement. Some little smell of the lamp might have been perceived and a sense of effort was at times suggested; but generally the ideas were fresh and their treatment free and diversified, particularly in the andante and its variations. On the programme with this composition were a Beethoven quartette—one of the Rasoumoffsky set—and Raff's pianoforte trio in G major, opus 112, in which Mr. Perabo's earnest, honest and artistic cooperation gave the piano its proper place in the scheme and helped on toward a beautiful and strong interpretation.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 18.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Symphony D, Op. 73, Brahms; Romanza in A minor for violin, Bruck; Concert Piece, E minor, for violin; Saint-Saens; Overture, "A Northern Campaign," Hartmann; "Don Quixote," Rubinstein. The pieces by Sant-Saens, Hartmann and Rubinstein were given for the first time at these concerts. The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. Taken for all in all, the Brahms symphony was given, on this occasion, the most coherent, the most satisfying and the most brilliant reading it has ever had here. Mr. Paur's conception of the work made the music more convincing, at least to us, than we have found it before. The Hartmann overture is a pleasing but not a particularly strong work. It is very much like a fanfare on a vast scale, though a flowing, warm and graceful second theme, finely treated, saves the composition from monotony in effect. It was broadly and impressively played. The "Don Quixote" humoresque seems to be a series of studies in orchestration, rather than any well-connected work. It is exceedingly capricious in design, but is steadily interesting, and often charming in the beauty, novelty and richness of its instrumentation. Now and then a wonderfully sonority is produced by the simplest of means, and the beauty of tone color, as well as the skilful use the composer has made of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments, especially the wood wind are often fascinating. The work was beautifully played. In fact, the performances of the orchestra throughout, left nothing to be looked for. Even the player who wields a Thor hammer on the drums, only obtruded himself once. We have never cared much for the Bruck Romanza, which is a dry, not to say dull bit of work. The Saint-Saëns concert piece, however, is quite another affair. It is true that it is a show piece, but it is full of inspiration, is admirably written for the solo instrument and is charming and interesting generally. Both selections were exquisitely played by Mr. Loeffler, with a purity of intonation, a breadth and finish of style, and a warmth of artistic feeling that were in every way delightful in effect. His performance of the Saint-Saëns piece was especially beautiful, and the cadenza he introduced toward the end is a masterly bit of work. He was vigorously applauded, and four times recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Concerto Grosso, No. 10, Handel; Symphony D, Haydn; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven, and vocal selections. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist.

Music Notes.

The Knesel Quartet gave their sixth concert of the season, in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo. The programme was: Quartet, Op. 32, A. Foote (MS., first time); Quartet, Op. 59, No. 3, Beethoven; Trio, for piano and strings, Op. 112, Raff. Mr. Foote's quartet shows neat workmanship, and bears creditable evidence of the intelligence and the industry with which the composer has studied the fundamental principles of his art. It is not distinguished by any originality in invention, or by any marked individuality in style. There is a strong general leaning toward Grieg, an occasional tinge of Brahms, and now and then a reflection of Mendelssohn. The work is fragmentary in effect; that is, it appears to be made up of little pieces that show clearly the stitches at the joining places. This is particularly noticeable in the opening movement, which is singularly lacking in "oneness," if we may use that word. The themes are tuneful, but are not characterized by fresh ness and their working out is perfunctory rather than spontaneous in effect. The scherzo opens very much in the vein of the first movement, but is bright and interesting, despite the strong impression it makes as music deliberately made. The best movement is the third, a theme with variations. It has some very graceful moments, and is more in the true quartet style than is the rest of the work. The other movements partake largely of the nature of violin solos with accompaniments, and suggest on the whole, orchestral rather than quartet treatment. The finale is weak, not to say frivolous, and is without any central point of interest. The work has so little to say that is new or was worth the saying, that we cannot understand why it should have been written; and after it was written we are quite as much at a loss to understand why it should have been played in the same programme that presented one of the finest and purest examples of the string quartet, extant. There is a certain prettiness in some of the melodies of Mr. Foote's work, but the presence of this quality does not atone for the absence of nearly every other essential quality of a work of this order. It belongs to that long line of well-made and well-intentioned music that makes a bubble on the surface of the sea of art, then bursts and disappears forever. It is highly respectable music, but in common with so much else that may be similarly characterized, it is remarkable for nothing but its respectability. Its syntax is unimpeachable and its prosody is strictly according to rule, but it says nothing except platitudes more or less conventional. The work was well played, and was heartily applauded, until the composer rose and bowed his acknowledgments; but the impression made by it was obliterated by the great Beethoven quartet that followed; a quartet that Mr. Foote might study with advantage, as a model on which quartets should be written. This work was read and played beautifully, the only faults in its performance being the extremely slow and solemn pace at which the introductory andante con moto was taken, and the timidity of style that marked the playing of the second violin part. The Raff Trio was also finely rendered, Mr. Perabo again exemplyfing his skill and artistic discretion as an ensemble player. The piano never obtruded itself unduly, but maintained a just balance with the other instruments. The solo player was never in evidence, and yet the finish and the grace of his playing and the performer's sympathy with the composer were constantly apparent. Mr. Perabo received a very cordial welcome.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1894.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Romanza for violin, with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42.....Bruch
Morceau de Concert for violin, with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62. (First time).....Saint-Saens
"Eine Nordische Heerfahrt," Trauerspiel-Ouverture, in F minor, op. 25. (First time)....Emil Hartmann
"Don Quixote," Musikalisches Charakter-Bild (Humoreske), op. 87. (First time at these concerts).....Rubinstein

The first Symphony of Brahms may be the nobler work, as some claim, but surely the second gives more musical pleasure. It is not cryptic: it goes directly to the senses, and absolute music, of which Brahms is to-day the chief exponent, needs a dash of sensuousness to appeal strongly to the average human being. Brahms, in his sterner moods, sits on a summit and weaves his musical thoughts, careless of men and women struggling, despairing and loving below; the clouds enwrap him, and his song becomes obscure.

But in the D major symphony Brahms is human. He joins in the every-day life. He is in sympathy with the joys of Nature. And in his good-fellowship he borrows a phrase or two from Mendelsshon.

It is true that he is garrulous at times; but how charming is his language in the Scherzo, fresh, graceful, to the point. His thoughtfulness in the second movement does not lead to cudgeling of the brain on the part of the hearer, and the elaboration of the finale is a delight, not a distress. This symphony is among the most genial works of Brahms, and last evening it gave great pleasure to the audience. While the work of the orchestra was to be commended throughout, the performance of the scherzo was the feature of the evening. In the first movement there was a greater display of care than of brilliancy or overwhelming strength in the fantasia and in the coda.

***

Bruch's Romanza was dedicated to Robert Heckmann.

The program book assured the audience that Heckmann "is a prominent violinist."

This statement shows the simple, honest faith of the compiler in the hereafter and its celestial joys.

In old pictures angels are represented playing on violins as well as on harps.

Heckmann is now perhaps pursuing his ancient calling.

But he fiddles no more on earth, for he died at Glasgow, Nov. 29, 1891.

Bruch's piece is without marked character or without any special beauty. It was well played by Mr. Loeffler.

The concert piece by Saint-Saens is only a showpiece, it is true, but how thoroughly musical it is; how delightfully written for solo instrument, and the instrumentation is such as is only imagined by a Frenchman; it is discreet, piquant, poetic, full of color: it is seasoned like an ideal salad. Mr. Loeffler played this show piece most charmingly. There was no calling of the attention to the difficulties, not even in his own ingenious cadenza. Technically and musically his performance was deserving of the highest praise.

***

Hartmann's overture is well made. The themes are not of striking originality, and the recurring fanfare reminds one of the stage directions in old English plays: "Sennet of trumpets without;" "Flourish of trumpets without." It is a "tragic overture;" the Vikings start out on their marauding to a rather jolly tune; some are killed apparently by the drums; and the rest are finished by the gongs; then there is a short lament. Hartmann is a Dane, but in this overture there is apparently little effort to rub in local color. He belongs to the school of Gade, which is Mendelssohn diluted; there is no reflection or suggestion of the new Scandinavian band of which Grieg is the chief.

***

Russian jokes as told in Russian novels are long, and the reader often becomes careless concerning the final point. Rubinstein took our old friend "Don Quixote" as the subject of his musical jesting. The "character-picture" has a description of its significance in a preface of text; but a panorama of different scenes in the Knight's life would be of greater advantage to the audience, if the panorama were judiciously unrolled according to signals given by the conductor.

Zabel, a biographer of Rubinstein, says that this piece should be heard with "Don Quixote" in the hand; but there are many digressions in Cervantes's immortal work, and preparatory lectures and readings would be necessary if Zabel's suggestion were taken seriously.

Rubinstein intended the work as a joke, and would be rude to his genius not to laugh heartily. But comic music without text or action is apt to breed solemnity, surprise, exhaustion, in fact anything but laughter.

Nor is it likely that anyone would imagine the music to be a sketch of Don Quixote's career, unless he were told so before the attack of the orchestra.

It is enough to say that the music as music is often ingenious and original. The instrumentation is interesting, and at times extremely effective.

The hearer may speculate at will; he may find the Knight in the bombastic orchestral utterances; he may discover the sheep, for sheep always gambol in music to certain instruments, and they browse on empty fifths; and any passionate strain announces Dulcinea in whatever disguised form she meets the Knight.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 18, 1894.

Mr. Paur gave the patrons of the Symphony concerts a varied and entertaining programme last evening. It consisted of Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major; Max Bruch's romanza for the violin and orchestra; Saint-Saens's "Morceau de Concert"; Hartmann's "Trauerspeil" overture and Rubinstein's "Don Quixote." The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. The last three pieces were new to these concerts and proved very interesting. The romanza is a beautiful work, brief but artistic, and was ably rendered.

In the "Morceau" the soloist gave some excellent work, playing the intricate numbers with great skill and expression. The cadenza introduced was the composition of Mr. Loeffler, and its rendering called forth repeated applause.

The "Trauerspeil" overture proved to be an inspiring number and was given with fine expression and effect. The main body of the overture was especially good and at times quite inspiring with its brisk trumpet calls and forte effects.

The "Don Quixote," called a musical picture, was a unique bit, at times interesting and then again dull, and there was but little enthusiasm at the close.

At the next rehearsal and concert Friday and Saturday, Feb. 23 and 24, the programme will comprise Handel's "Concerto Grosso" No. 10 in D minor for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony No. 2 in D major, and Beethoven's overture, "Egmont." Max Heinrich, who is to be the soloist, will sing two arias.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 49.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of the 15th of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, was the playing of Mr. C. M. Loeffler as soloist, the success made by this member of the orchestra being the greatest triumph of his entire artistic career.

Mr. Loeffler selected as the works for his appearance two novelties—Max Bruch's romanza for violin with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42, and Camille Saint-Saens' concert piece for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62—both having a first performance on this occasion.

Mr. Loeffler is, in a certain way, a Boston artist. Although he came here a well-schooled musician, his prominence as a solo player has been the result of his studious labors as a member of the Boston orchestra. It is not always easy to gain the favor from those who are acquainted with all the steps attending the progress of an artist, for the element of surprise is lacking in any special success, under such circumstances; and, the certainty that good work may be anticipated, in a way detracts from the interest attending each new appearance.

If, for instance, Mr. Loeffler had been brought before his public last evening as an artist recently from the great concert halls of Europe, he would have had many advantages in gaining the favor of the audience which did not attend his appearance.

It is only a matter of justice to Mr. Loeffler to call attention to this fact, because, despite it, he gained a recognition of his abilities as a soloist which has seldom been exceeded in the appearance here of artists of world wide reputation.

His choice of the compositions named indicated a confidence in his own skill as a player, which was fully justified by the results attending his performance of them, and it is difficult to call to mind any more finished or artistic work in the way of violin solo playing in recent years than that of Mr. Loeffler on this occasion.

He is lacking in the breadth of style and largeness of tone of many soloists of his class, but the beauty of his work in the points of finish, expression, accuracy, delicacy and purity of tone fully offset these shortcomings. His playing of "Romanza," by Max Bruch, was a fit introduction to his masterly triumph in the Saint-Saens' piece, which made a revelation of Mr. Loeffler's skill, and fairly surprised even those best acquainted with his merits as a player.

Both works were highly enjoyable as additions to the somewhat united repertoire for solo violinists, and their merits could hardly have had a better presentation than that given them by Mr. Loeffler.

His fellow-musicians vied with the members of the audience in expressing their delight at the good playing they ha listened to, and Mr. Loeffler's modest recognition of the applause called out by his efforts gave further evidence of his natural avoidance of undue prominence.

Conductor Paur treated the patrons of the concerts to more new things in the way of orchestral compositions, Emil Hartmann's "A Northern Campaign," overture to a tragedy, in F minor, op. 25, and Anton Rubinstein's "Don Quixote," musical character-picture (humoresque), op. 87, both having their first performance here in this programme.

Hartmann is a living Danish composer, and a lineal descendant of musicians well known in his native land. The overture is brimful of tuneful themes, which are treated in a most original and masterly fashion, the uses made of orchestral resources showing the composer to be a thoroughly well equipped musician. The work is full of strong contrasts, and reflects the tone pictures suggested by its title in a marked fashion. It was gloriously played under Mr. Paur's direction, and made a very prominent feature of the evening's programme.

Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" proved as odd a conceit in a musical way as any of the scenes depicted in the marvellous record of the valorous knight whose name it bears, and the bombastic character of the hero of the Cervantes novel was frequently given prominence in the ever shifting themes of the composition. The reading of this "humoresque" was a revelation of the resources of the orchestra, and gave a most enjoyable ending to a programme which was made unnecessarily long by an adherence to the custom of the day in playing the whole of Brahms' second symphony, instead of beginning at the third movement, where its composer's ideas first take on characteristics which make them intelligible.

Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and Haydn's second symphony in D major, the Egmont overture and Handel's concerto grasse, No. 10, in D minor for strings, will be played.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1894.

On Monday night the Kneisel quartet gave an unusually fine concert at Chickering Hall. The interest of the evening centered round the first performance from the manuscript of a Quartet in E major, opus 32, by Arthur Foote. The other selections were Quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3, by Beethoven, and a Trio for piano, violin and 'cello in G major, op. 112, by Raff. Mr. Foote's Quartet made a deep impression. It is in four movements, Allegro commodo; Scherzo, Vivace; Andante, un poco con moto, and Allegro con fuoco. While each movement possesses unmistakable merit the first and third proved deeply interesting, the former for its musicianly consistency of development, and the latter for the brilliancy of its variations. The Quartet was finely played. The other selections were given with great effect, particularly the Raff Trio played by Messrs. Kneisel, Perabo and Schroeder. Mr. Perabo again demonstrated his artistic worth.

[89]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 18, 1894.

THE KNEISEL AND SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The programme for the fifteenth Symphony concert was a trifle long, and it ended tamely at the very last; but it held a great amount of interesting matter, and of its five numbers four were absolute novelties and two were for a solo instrument. The symphony, according to Mr. Paur's usual and excellent disposition, had the first place, and was consequently heard to the best possible advantage in the freshness of the listening. Being a work of Brahms—the second, in D major,—it naturally needed the closest and clearest attention. Yet the scores of Brahms, so complicated and forbidding at first, not only clarify but also endear themselves by repetition. Not the audiences merely, but the players and conductors themselves, are constantly obtaining a better grasp upon his methods and his manners; and there are accordingly a better transference of his ideas and a larger sympathy with his purposes. This second symphony is full of beauties as well as fraught with strength, and the sweet charm of its adagio and the quaint trickery of its scherzo can hardly escape even those who cannot trace the fragments of the themes which pass in and out with changeful form and elusive modulation in the opening allegro or those who fail to follow the impetuous rush of the intermingled motives of the finale. Mr. Paur's clear head and firm hand are well suited to the exposition of Brahms, for his tendency to over elucidate or over-accent the minor phrases in Beethoven, is almost exactly what is needed to help the listener find the wandering sentences which are so nearly lost in the curious and busy counterpoint and full instrumentation of the modern master. The present reading was an excellent one and was thoroughly appreciated.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler followed with two new morceaux for violin, each short and in a single movement. The one was a romance of a generally reposeful and placid character, by Bruch, and the other a Concert Piece by Saint-Saens, fantastic almost to grotesqueness and brilliantly gay, but without levity. Each in its way showed its author's knowledge of the instrument for which he was writing, both in the adaptation of its tone colors to the genre of his composition and in the choice of the technical display and difficulty appointed for the development and embellishment of his themes. At the place indicated for it in the latter piece Mr. Loeffler introduced a long cadenza of his own, quite in keeping with the principal theme and bristling with terrible but not repellent tests of technique. Mr. Loeffler's playing was altogether admirable—delightful in its smoothness and equality of tone, exact in intonation, elegant in phrasing, facile in the delivery of all the perplexities and audacities of the technical execution, sweet and sincere in sentiment. He was very spontaneously and very liberally applauded.

Next came "A Northern Campaign," described as an overture to a tragedy, and credited to Emil Hartmann, a native and resident of Copenhagen, now retired from public life, although less than sixty years of age and devoting himself to composition. This is a brief, but rather impressive work—impressive, rather by its dignified, coherent treatment and its atmosphere, than by any notable originality of melodic form or development, although it has touches of distinct individuality and felicity. It begins with the gloomy gravity of an impassive northern climate and temperament, and then passes,—through a trumpet figure which often reappears later on,—to its main matter in an energetic and excited allegro, which must be accepted as suggesting the outward pressure of military force, with conflict, clangor, exhilaration and courage against and over obstacles. Brilliancy is imparted by the flights of harp chords and mystery is added in the occasional gloomy rattle of the tam-tam. This part of the work is developed with discreet reserve in extent as well as in volume, and a brief return to the theme and spirit of the introduction brings a quiet close.

The Tschaikowsky symphonic poem which had been promised was not forthcoming; but in place of it there was a "Humoresque" about Don Quixote, by Rubinstein. This purports to display symbolically a few of the characteristic episodes in in the career of the notable knight of La Mancha. The sequence of these stands about as follows: The inflammation of his imagination by tales of chivalry and his resolve to set off on a conquering career all "plated in habiliments of war," to do doughty deeds and to win his Dulcinea's favor; his departure on his lumbering steed; his discovery and dispersal of the flock of sheep; his impassioned suit to the village women and their fear of him; his rescue from their escort of the criminals, who in recompense fall upon him and beat him; his lamentations over his bruises and because of the ingratitude and blindness of the world; his return home and his death among his sympathizing relatives and friends. There is a plenty of clever writing in this attempt at musical comedy and some of the minor episodes are really picturesque, particularly the pastoral incidents, the notions of martial pomp and valor and the ponderous onslaughts of knight and charger. But when all is said and done, one cannot set the piece down as very amusing, while it is not at all adapted for the end of a long programme because it dies away into nothingness after a lot of dolorous exclamations and melancholy phrases.

The playing all through the concert was fine, and even the drummer rarely expanded into excess.

Next Saturday's programme names nothing new: Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings, Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing twice.

Mr. Arthur Foote is an assiduous and prolific writer, and hardly a week passes without his making some contributions to the stock of local composition, if only in the shape of a batch of songs or a few anthems. But he is not disposed to limit his ambitions to these narrower and easily worked fields, and therefore he makes frequent essays into that of chamber music, where he has already brought good harvests to maturity. His latest production in this manner is a string quartette which was introduced at the Kneisel concert of Monday evening. This is well thought out and generally well handled, and Mr. Foote's understanding and use of the standard forms in the announcement and development of his themes received new illustration in each movement. Some little smell of the lamp might have been perceived and a sense of effort was at times suggested; but generally the ideas were fresh and their treatment free and diversified, particularly in the andante and its variations. On the programme with this composition were a Beethoven quartette—one of the Rasoumoffsky set—and Raff's pianoforte trio in G major, opus 112, in which Mr. Perabo's earnest, honest and artistic cooperation gave the piano its proper place in the scheme and helped on toward a beautiful and strong interpretation.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 18.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Symphony D, Op. 73, Brahms; Romanza in A minor for violin, Bruck; Concert Piece, E minor, for violin; Saint-Saens; Overture, "A Northern Campaign," Hartmann; "Don Quixote," Rubinstein. The pieces by Sant-Saens, Hartmann and Rubinstein were given for the first time at these concerts. The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. Taken for all in all, the Brahms symphony was given, on this occasion, the most coherent, the most satisfying and the most brilliant reading it has ever had here. Mr. Paur's conception of the work made the music more convincing, at least to us, than we have found it before. The Hartmann overture is a pleasing but not a particularly strong work. It is very much like a fanfare on a vast scale, though a flowing, warm and graceful second theme, finely treated, saves the composition from monotony in effect. It was broadly and impressively played. The "Don Quixote" humoresque seems to be a series of studies in orchestration, rather than any well-connected work. It is exceedingly capricious in design, but is steadily interesting, and often charming in the beauty, novelty and richness of its instrumentation. Now and then a wonderfully sonority is produced by the simplest of means, and the beauty of tone color, as well as the skilful use the composer has made of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments, especially the wood wind are often fascinating. The work was beautifully played. In fact, the performances of the orchestra throughout, left nothing to be looked for. Even the player who wields a Thor hammer on the drums, only obtruded himself once. We have never cared much for the Bruck Romanza, which is a dry, not to say dull bit of work. The Saint-Saëns concert piece, however, is quite another affair. It is true that it is a show piece, but it is full of inspiration, is admirably written for the solo instrument and is charming and interesting generally. Both selections were exquisitely played by Mr. Loeffler, with a purity of intonation, a breadth and finish of style, and a warmth of artistic feeling that were in every way delightful in effect. His performance of the Saint-Saëns piece was especially beautiful, and the cadenza he introduced toward the end is a masterly bit of work. He was vigorously applauded, and four times recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Concerto Grosso, No. 10, Handel; Symphony D, Haydn; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven, and vocal selections. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist.

Music Notes.

The Knesel Quartet gave their sixth concert of the season, in Chickering Hall, on Monday evening, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo. The programme was: Quartet, Op. 32, A. Foote (MS., first time); Quartet, Op. 59, No. 3, Beethoven; Trio, for piano and strings, Op. 112, Raff. Mr. Foote's quartet shows neat workmanship, and bears creditable evidence of the intelligence and the industry with which the composer has studied the fundamental principles of his art. It is not distinguished by any originality in invention, or by any marked individuality in style. There is a strong general leaning toward Grieg, an occasional tinge of Brahms, and now and then a reflection of Mendelssohn. The work is fragmentary in effect; that is, it appears to be made up of little pieces that show clearly the stitches at the joining places. This is particularly noticeable in the opening movement, which is singularly lacking in "oneness," if we may use that word. The themes are tuneful, but are not characterized by freshness and their working out is perfunctory rather than spontaneous in effect. The scherzo opens very much in the vein of the first movement, but is bright and interesting, despite the strong impression it makes as music deliberately made. The best movement is the third, a theme with variations. It has some very graceful moments, and is more in the true quartet style than is the rest of the work. The other movements partake largely of the nature of violin solos with accompaniments, and suggest on the whole, orchestral rather than quartet treatment. The finale is weak, not to say frivolous, and is without any central point of interest. The work has so little to say that is new or was worth the saying, that we cannot understand why it should have been written; and after it was written we are quite as much at a loss to understand why it should have been played in the same programme that presented one of the finest and purest examples of the string quartet, extant. There is a certain prettiness in some of the melodies of Mr. Foote's work, but the presence of this quality does not atone for the absence of nearly every other essential quality of a work of this order. It belongs to that long line of well-made and well-intentioned music that makes a bubble on the surface of the sea of art, then bursts and disappears forever. It is highly respectable music, but in common with so much else that may be similarly characterized, it is remarkable for nothing but its respectability. Its syntax is unimpeachable and its prosody is strictly according to rule, but it says nothing except platitudes more or less conventional. The work was well played, and was heartily applauded, until the composer rose and bowed his acknowledgments; but the impression made by it was obliterated by the great Beethoven quartet that followed; a quartet that Mr. Foote might study with advantage, as a model on which quartets should be written. This work was read and played beautifully, the only faults in its performance being the extremely slow and solemn pace at which the introductory andante con moto was taken, and the timidity of style that marked the playing of the second violin part. The Raff Trio was also finely rendered, Mr. Perabo again exemplyfing his skill and artistic discretion as an ensemble player. The piano never obtruded itself unduly, but maintained a just balance with the other instruments. The solo player was never in evidence, and yet the finish and the grace of his playing and the performer's sympathy with the composer were constantly apparent. Mr. Perabo received a very cordial welcome.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1894.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Romanza for violin, with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42.....Bruch
Morceau de Concert for violin, with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62. (First time).....Saint-Saens
"Eine Nordische Heerfahrt," Trauerspiel-Ouverture, in F minor, op. 25. (First time)....Emil Hartmann
"Don Quixote," Musikalisches Charakter-Bild (Humoreske), op. 87. (First time at these concerts).....Rubinstein

The first Symphony of Brahms may be the nobler work, as some claim, but surely the second gives more musical pleasure. It is not cryptic: it goes directly to the senses, and absolute music, of which Brahms is to-day the chief exponent, needs a dash of sensuousness to appeal strongly to the average human being. Brahms, in his sterner moods, sits on a summit and weaves his musical thoughts, careless of men and women struggling, despairing and loving below; the clouds enwrap him, and his song becomes obscure.

But in the D major symphony Brahms is human. He joins in the every-day life. He is in sympathy with the joys of Nature. And in his good-fellowship he borrows a phrase or two from Mendelssohn.

It is true that he is garrulous at times; but how charming is his language in the Scherzo, fresh, graceful, to the point. His thoughtfulness in the second movement does not lead to cudgeling of the brain on the part of the hearer, and the elaboration of the finale is a delight, not a distress. This symphony is among the most genial works of Brahms, and last evening it gave great pleasure to the audience. While the work of the orchestra was to be commended throughout, the performance of the scherzo was the feature of the evening. In the first movement there was a greater display of care than of brilliancy or overwhelming strength in the fantasia and in the coda.

***

Bruch's Romanza was dedicated to Robert Heckmann.

The program book assured the audience that Heckmann "is a prominent violinist."

This statement shows the simple, honest faith of the compiler in the hereafter and its celestial joys.

In old pictures angels are represented playing on violins as well as on harps.

Heckmann is now perhaps pursuing his ancient calling.

But he fiddles no more on earth, for he died at Glasgow, Nov. 29, 1891.

Bruch's piece is without marked character or without any special beauty. It was well played by Mr. Loeffler.

The concert piece by Saint-Saens is only a showpiece, it is true, but how thoroughly musical it is; how delightfully written for solo instrument, and the instrumentation is such as is only imagined by a Frenchman; it is discreet, piquant, poetic, full of color: it is seasoned like an ideal salad. Mr. Loeffler played this show piece most charmingly. There was no calling of the attention to the difficulties, not even in his own ingenious cadenza. Technically and musically his performance was deserving of the highest praise.

***

Hartmann's overture is well made. The themes are not of striking originality, and the recurring fanfare reminds one of the stage directions in old English plays: "Sennet of trumpets without;" "Flourish of trumpets without." It is a "tragic overture;" the Vikings start out on their marauding to a rather jolly tune; some are killed apparently by the drums; and the rest are finished by the gongs; then there is a short lament. Hartmann is a Dane, but in this overture there is apparently little effort to rub in local color. He belongs to the school of Gade, which is Mendelssohn diluted; there is no reflection or suggestion of the new Scandinavian band of which Grieg is the chief.

***

Russian jokes as told in Russian novels are long, and the reader often becomes careless concerning the final point. Rubinstein took our old friend "Don Quixote" as the subject of his musical jesting. The "character-picture" has a description of its significance in a preface of text; but a panorama of different scenes in the Knight's life would be of greater advantage to the audience, if the panorama were judiciously unrolled according to signals given by the conductor.

Zabel, a biographer of Rubinstein, says that this piece should be heard with "Don Quixote" in the hand; but there are many digressions in Cervantes's immortal work, and preparatory lectures and readings would be necessary if Zabel's suggestion were taken seriously.

Rubinstein intended the work as a joke, and would be rude to his genius not to laugh heartily. But comic music without text or action is apt to breed solemnity, surprise, exhaustion, in fact anything but laughter.

Nor is it likely that anyone would imagine the music to be a sketch of Don Quixote's career, unless he were told so before the attack of the orchestra.

It is enough to say that the music as music is often ingenious and original. The instrumentation is interesting, and at times extremely effective.

The hearer may speculate at will; he may find the Knight in the bombastic orchestral utterances; he may discover the sheep, for sheep always gambol in music to certain instruments, and they browse on empty fifths; and any passionate strain announces Dulcinea in whatever disguised form she meets the Knight.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 18, 1894.

Mr. Paur gave the patrons of the Symphony concerts a varied and entertaining programme last evening. It consisted of Brahms's symphony No. 2 in D major; Max Bruch's romanza for the violin and orchestra: Saint-Saens's "Morceau de Concert"; Hartmann's "Trauerspeil" overture and Rubinstein's "Don Quixote." The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. The last three pieces were new to these concerts and proved very interesting. The romanza is a beautiful work, brief but artistic, and was ably rendered.

In the "Morceau" the soloist gave some excellent work, playing the intricate numbers with great skill and expression. The cadenza introduced was the composition of Mr. Loeffler, and its rendering called forth repeated applause.

The "Trauerspeil" overture proved to be an inspiring number and was given with fine expression and effect. The main body of the overture was especially good and at times quite inspiring with its brisk trumpet calls and forte effects.

The "Don Quixote," called a musical picture, was a unique bit, at times interesting and then again dull, and there was but little enthusiasm at the close.

At the next rehearsal and concert Friday and Saturday, Feb. 23 and 24, the programme will comprise Handel's "Concerto Grosso" No. 10 in D minor for string orchestra; Haydn's symphony No. 2 in D major, and Beethoven's overture, "Egmont." Max Heinrich, who is to be the soloist, will sing two arias.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 49.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of the 15th of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, was the playing of Mr. C. M. Loeffler as soloist, the success made by this member of the orchestra being the greatest triumph of his entire artistic career.

Mr. Loeffler selected as the works for his appearance two novelties—Max Bruch's romanza for violin with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42, and Camille Saint-Saens' concert piece for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62—both having a first performance on this occasion.

Mr. Loeffler is, in a certain way, a Boston artist. Although he came here a well-schooled musician, his prominence as a solo player has been the result of his studious labors as a member of the Boston orchestra. It is not always easy to gain the favor from those who are acquainted with all the steps attending the progress of an artist, for the element of surprise is lacking in any special success, under such circumstances; and, the certainty that good work may be anticipated, in a way detracts from the interest attending each new appearance.

If, for instance, Mr. Loeffler had been brought before his public last evening as an artist recently from the great concert halls of Europe, he would have had many advantages in gaining the favor of the audience which did not attend his appearance.

It is only a matter of justice to Mr. Loeffler to call attention to this fact, because, despite it, he gained a recognition of his abilities as a soloist which has seldom been exceeded in the appearance here of artists of world wide reputation.

His choice of the compositions named indicated a confidence in his own skill as a player, which was fully justified by the results attending his performance of them, and it is difficult to call to mind any more finished or artistic work in the way of violin solo playing in recent years than that of Mr. Loeffler on this occasion.

He is lacking in the breadth of style and largeness of tone of many soloists of his class, but the beauty of his work in the points of finish, expression, accuracy, delicacy and purity of tone fully offset these shortcomings. His playing of "Romanza," by Max Bruch, was a fit introduction to his masterly triumph in the Saint-Saens' piece, which made a revelation of Mr. Loeffler's skill, and fairly surprised even those best acquainted with his merits as a player.

Both works were highly enjoyable as additions to the somewhat united repertoire for solo violinists, and their merits could hardly have had a better presentation than that given them by Mr. Loeffler.

His fellow-musicians vied with the members of the audience in expressing their delight at the good playing they had listened to, and Mr. Loeffler's modest recognition of the applause called out by his efforts gave further evidence of his natural avoidance of undue prominence.

Conductor Paur treated the patrons of the concerts to more new things in the way of orchestral compositions, Emil Hartmann's "A Northern Campaign," overture to a tragedy, in F minor, op. 25, and Anton Rubinstein's "Don Quixote," musical character-picture (humoresque), op. 87, both having their first performance here in this programme.

Hartmann is a living Danish composer, and a lineal descendant of musicians well known in his native land. The overture is brimful of tuneful themes, which are treated in a most original and masterly fashion, the uses made of orchestral resources showing the composer to be a thoroughly well equipped musician. The work is full of strong contrasts, and reflects the tone pictures suggested by its title in a marked fashion. It was gloriously played under Mr. Paur's direction, and made a very prominent feature of the evening's programme.

Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" proved as odd a conceit in a musical way as any of the scenes depicted in the marvellous record of the valorous knight whose name it bears, and the bombastic character of the hero of the Cervantes novel was frequently given prominence in the ever shifting themes of the composition. The reading of this "humoresque" was a revelation of the resources of the orchestra, and gave a most enjoyable ending to a programme which was made unnecessarily long by an adherence to the custom of the day in playing the whole of Brahms' second symphony, instead of beginning at the third movement, where its composer's ideas first take on characteristics which make them intelligible.

Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and Haydn's second symphony in D major, the Egmont overture and Handel's concerto grasse, No. 10, in D minor for strings, will be played.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL

A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1894.

On Monday night the Kneisel quartet gave an unusually fine concert at Chickering Hall. The interest of the evening centered round the first performance from the manuscript of a Quartet in E major, opus 32, by Arthur Foote. The other selections were Quartet in C major, op. 59, No. 3, by Beethoven, and a Trio for piano, violin and 'cello in G major, op. 112, by Raff. Mr. Foote's Quartet made a deep impression. It is in four movements, Allegro commodo; Scherzo, Vivace; Andante, un poco con moto, and Allegro con fuoco. While each movement possesses unmistakable merit the first and third proved deeply interesting, the former for its musicianly consistency of development, and the latter for the brilliancy of its variations. The Quartet was finely played. The other selections were given with great effect, particularly the Raff Trio played by Messrs. Kneisel, Perabo and Schroeder. Mr. Perabo again demonstrated his artistic worth.

[89]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 18, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

Four of the five numbers on the symphony program last week were given in this city for the first time, the Brahms symphony being the only familiar selection. The novelties were a romanza by Bruch and a concert piece by Saint-Saens, both for violin and orchestra; Emil Hartmann's overture to a tragedy, "A Northern Campaign," and Rubinstein's character picture, "Don Quixote."

The idyllic character of the first movement in the Brahms symphony was well preserved throughout, the string contingents playing grandly, and the horn phrases being generally clear and sweet. The elaborate fantasia and the coda were also admirably and sonorously given. The serious themes in the second movement and the contrasting lightness of the third were equally effective. In the latter the wood winds delivered the dainty "landler" with charming expression. The dashing finale, with its Hungarian tone color, was played with the necessary vigor and brilliancy.

The violinist, Mr. Loeffler, played the Bruch and Saint-Saens numbers with artistic precision and seemingly without a flaw in execution. His intonation was sure and clear as a crystal, and even in the rapid runs and choral phrasing the notes were true and harmonious. The latter piece is largely given to the soloist, the orchestra forming the background. The developments are very elaborate, and Mr Loeffler surmounted the musical difficulties with seeming ease.

His tone may be light at times, but it is sure, and the modest manner in which he performs his work as a soloist is an important factor in his success in this city. He interprets the composer's score without exagerating for effects, and his musicianly intelligence is indisputably shown in his artistic conception and execution of any selection allotted him. He received a hearty recognition at the close of each number.

Hartman's overture, "A Northern Campaign," is generally somber, with peculiar rhythms and trumpet calls running through it. The themes are bold and sonorous, and some of them are oddly worked out by the celli, oboes and horns. The composition, though interesting to the musician, is not one that will suit the average auditor. The orchestra gave it with good effect, the stormy coda being the most impressive part of the work.

Rubinstein's "humorous" character piece "Don Quixote" proved disappointing, and was hardly worth a place on the program, excepting as a novelty.

At the concerts this week Max Heinrich will be the vocal soloist, and the program, in addition to his arias, will be Handel's concerto in D minor for strings, Haydn's symphony No. 2, and Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, FEBRUARY 18, 1894.

SYMPHONY SENSATION.

Rumor Says That Emil Paur Will Leave Us at the Close of the Season, and That an Effort Will Be Made to Secure Theodore Thomas in His Place.

Patrons of the Symphony concerts are in something of a twitter as to who shall be the leader of their pet orchestra next year. When Emil Paur was engaged to cater to Boston's esthetic musical tastes it was hoped that the orchestra had a leader who would remain with them for an indefinite period.

The first appearance of Mr. Paur last fall was watched with much interest. As concert succeeded concert, and the style of the programmes offered by Mr. Paur became apparent, there were some furtive glances cast by the so-called leaders of the audience.

The selections went from one extreme to the other. Either the audience was aroused to a pitch of enthusiasm, or else had its soporific senses catered to. Gradually it dawned upon them that this was not what they had been accustomed to, and they began to murmur.

These signs of dissatisfaction, it is said, reached the ears of the blonde-haired leader, and his indignation rose.

It is said that sundry sorrowful missives have been sent to the fatherland, and that it has been given out in that country that Mr. Paur will wend his way across the sea when the season is ended.

Well authenticated gossip has it that Arthur Nikisch, the former leader, has been carefully watching his successor, and has written to friends in Boston confirming the story of Paur's return.

The contract made by Mr. Paur with Henry L. Higginson it is supposed was for five years, this being the time for which the Symphony leaders are usually engaged.

The outcome of this gossip will be watched with close interest, for socially both Mr. Paur and his talented wife have made many friends during their sojourn here who will be sorry to lose them.

Rumor also has it that Theodore Thomas will succeed Mr. Paur, if he can be induced to come to Boston.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday night made rather a heterogeneous impression, spite of the excellence of the performance, for the numbers did not seem to consort well together, and the effect of one composition seemed to be obliterated by the other. Brahms' second symphony began the concert and was finely read and played. Far less ambitious than the composer's first symphony it is yet the more pleasing work and probably contains more absolute beauty than any other of the four symphonies by Brahms. Everything was well shaded and almost every department of the orchestra deserves praise, but the horns were especially excellent, and they have much important work to do in this symphony, Brahms being almost as fond of horn effects as Weber was. The wood wind instruments were also noteworthy in the third movement. In this movement Brahms well combines the old and the new; he follows the contrasts which Beethoven established in the scherzo (originating in the minuet) but does not inflict a full repeat of the body of the work after a trio; the tendency of the so-called "classical epoch" (circa 1775-1825) was toward repetition in music, the whole tendency of the modern age is against it, and Brahms has in his intermezzo found a means of reconciling the two, a method foreshadowed by Mendelssohn in his arias, and copied by Franz in his abbreviations of Handel. Our kettle-drummer still makes strong efforts to convince the public that his instrument was intended for solo work. In the finale of the symphony he bravely held his own against vastly superior numbers. One can only echo the sentiments of the farmer over his ram who was killed in an endeavor to push over an express train, and admire the pluck while condemning the judgment displayed.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist and instead of giving one large, presented two medium-sized, violin works. His performance was commendable. The Bruch romanza was given with pure intonation and broad and fervid style. Yet it is not a work which compares with Bruch's concertos for the same instrument, and one would much rather have heard one of these. Saint-Saens' "Morceau de Concert" followed and was a most brilliant bit of violin pyrotechnics fitting as well to the numbers that surrounded it as a Parisian belle would in a Greek school of philosophy. One may congratulate the artist on the technique displayed. The cadenza which he composed for himself was a combination of all that is difficult in violin work; it was rather longer than would have been allowed in a concerto, but in a work largely devoted to display it was at least permissible. Every difficulty was conquered with ease; double-stopping, rapid chromatic runs, bold skips and other technical thorns were brushed aside in a manner that astonished the auditor, but especially in the playing of harmonics did the artist deserve praise; too often one hears a thin piping tone in such passages, but here there was a full and bird-like quality, such as Wieniawski and a couple of his pupils (Musin and Lichtenberg) attained to perfection. Mr. Loeffler was applauded with an enthusiasm that was most spontaneous and long-continued.

Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt," which might be translated as "The Passing of the Norseman," gave a strong and gloomy picture (in overture form) of a Norse invasion; the shock of combat was often pictured and naturally there were trumpet fanfares galore. These same fanfares cause us once more to urge the necessity of having a pair of natural trumpets in our orchestra; Boston was the first to take the important step from the cornet to the trumpet, and should now make the additional stride from the keyed to the natural instrument; how much the Wagner works would gain were the fanfares given as the composer wrote them, for while Wagner used the keyed instrument freely in the orchestra, all his trumpet calls made upon the stage, all his fanfares, are written for trumpets without keys. Hartmann's overture was impressive, fairly symmetrical in the midst of its dramatic touches, and the picture of the desolation which the Vikings left behind them is strongly drawn.

Rubinstein's humoreske, "Don Quixote," sponged out the impression, however, and gave some solemn fun in a minor manner. If the reviewer objects to the position of this work on the programme, he by no means believes in banishing this school from the concerts. Very recently an eminent New York critic, Mr. Henry T. Finck of the Evening Post, wrote an eloquent plea for the admission of Strauss to our high-class programmes, and no less a classicist than Von Bulow agrees with his views. We need such things to refresh the attention occasionally, as musical appetizers, but they must be carefully placed; one would not desire the Strauss waltz just after a Beethoven symphony; and Rosinante, in this case, seemed out of place, trotting after the Viking procession. Nevertheless there were some good points made in the work, but with the Rubinsteinian prolixity and inequality. The picture of the shepherds by oboe theme and drone-bass was good, the passionate declaration of the Knight of the Woful Countenance, and the ringing laughter of the women, the sorr owful phrases of the bassoon, and the final groans of pain after the drubbing received by the convicts, all these were clear touches and were excellently played, but it was not a good keystone to the musical arch.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 73.
Max Bruch: Romanze for violin with orchestra, in A minor, Opus 42.
Saint-Saëns: Morceau de Concert for violin with orchestra, in E minor, Opus 62.
Emil Hartmann: "Eine nordische Heerfahrt," Overture to a Tragedy, in F minor, Opus 25.
Rubinstein: "Don Quixote," musical character-picture (humoresque), Opus 87.
Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Before saying anything else about the concert let us note one point: Of the five numbers of the programme, four were new, or virtually new, to Boston. Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" was given here many years ago by Mr. Theodore Thomas: but we doubt if anybody in last Saturday evening's audience remembered a note of it, it was practically a novelty. Is not this too much of new things for one evening? Another point worth noting is that, of the three purely orchestral numbers, only one, the Brahms symphony, was a work of any importance; the Hartmann overture and the Rubinstein piece are compositions of a sort that it is worth while hearing once in a while, simply to know what they are like; one listens to them as one reads a newspaper, to find out what is going on in the world. In themselves they do not offer much of interest.

Brahms's second symphony was the first of his great orchestral works that found general favor with the public at large. The first, in C minor, was epoch-making; it was a shot that was heard round the world, and may be said to have created the Brahms party; it was soon dubbed the "Tenth Symphony"—in allusion to Beethoven's nine. But people in general found it a pretty severe dose: unquestionably it shot over the heads of nine-tenths of the public. When the second symphony, in D major, came out, it was hailed with huge delight by every "Brahmsianer," who said "that in it all the obscurity of the first was cured," and soon converted most of the doubting Thomases who had strained at swallowing the one in C minor. It is not a little curious what points first strike the public in a new work. People found the first movement in the C minor symphony so absolutely terrific that the impression it made upon them almost totally effaced that of the beautiful Andante and of the Finale, with its glorious Volkslied theme; whenever the symphony was mentioned, they thought only of the first movement, and judged it by their recollection of that. But the Ländler in the third movement of the D major symphony was found so enchanting, the two leading themes of its first movement so delicious, that these two movements made people forget that the Adagio was to the full as severe and "obscure" as the first movement in the C minor, and that the Finale was, to say the least, no clearer than the average of Brahms's writing. Thus people remembered the first symphony by what they liked least in it, the second by what they liked best.

The performance last Saturday was, to our mind, only pretty good. The work was played earnestly and in the right spirit, the tempi seemed in the main excellent; but there was a general want of smoothness and beauty of tone, many places sounded rather uncouth and ragged, and the changes of rhythm in the last movement were not asserted with much authority. It should be said that the instrumentation of this symphony is of a nature to demand the utmost care in rehearsing the work—quite as much, if not more so than in the C minor—and a good deal of experimentalizing is necessary at rehearsals before the music can be made to sound clear and well. Many of us can remember well enough how horribly the introduction (Un poco sostenuto) of the C minor symphony used to sound in the first years of the work's appearance here, simply from a want of bringing certain parts in the score into due prominence and throwing others comparatively into the background; but, after Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch had worked over it, this once terrible page sounded incomparably grand and beautiful. There is a great deal in the score of the second symphony which calls for just such careful treatment; play the notes merely as they stand on the page, and the result will often be very perplexing indeed. Beethoven's ninth symphony and Schumann's second do not require more care in adjusting the dynamic balance of the several parts of the score.

Hartmann's overture, as coming from a hard-and-fast modern Scandinavian, surprised us by its regularity of structure and persistent development; its title had led us to expect something more in the "programme" vein. There is one rather curious feature in the work: a little two-part trumpet-call that keeps coming in at odd intervals almost all through the Allegro, without ever assuming any real thematic importance or forming a structural part of the composition; the effect is very striking and brilliant. As a whole, one can not call the overture a particularly strong work; its stress and fury seem rather faits à froid, self-conscious and intentional, and none of its themes bear the stamp of recognizable individuality. It is a work that one somehow feels one has exhausted at a single hearing; if it shows talent, that is about all it shows.

Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" is a terror! We could not help recalling the account a notable French dramatic critic once gave of his sensations while witnessing a certain new tragedy; he wrote—

"About the middle of the first act, however, as I was paying closer and closer attention, I began to feel a faint pain round the temples. Little by little, consternation possessed me, for I still could not understand, in spite of my efforts. I opened my ears, gave my whole mind to it, repeated to myself the words I heard, but all to no purpose: the meaning escaped me, the words fell upon my ears like noises that flit away without forming sentences. Now the weight in my temples extended to my cranium and stiffened my neck.

"Then came boredom, moderate at first, a slight yawning hidden behind the fingers, a vague desire to think of something else; then it grew and spread, it became immense, unfathomable, limitless. Oh! boredom without hope, the crushing boredom that descends into every limb, the weight of which you feel in your hands and feet! And no possibility of escaping from this slow trituration; the characters impose themselves upon you, you hate them, you would like to annihilate them, but their voices are like a headstrong wave that beats against, batters, and drowns the hardest heads; even when you cast down your eyes, so as not to see them, you still feel them, you think you have them on your shoulders. A public calamity, mourning, are less heavy."

[90]

Don Quixote" seems to be that Rubinstein [illegible] himself to work to write a humorous piece without having even the faintest touch of humor in his own nature; and the effort to be humorous was so engrossing that all his musical invention left him in the lurch.

Mr. Loeffler's playing of the two pieces by Max Bruch and Saint-Saëns was exceedingly beautiful; the compositions themselves do not seem of any unusual order of merit, but they are pleasant to listen to and not without a certain charm. But his playing showed them in the finest light. The time is long since past for speaking of such matters as technique or intonation in connection with Mr. Loeffler; he has won his spurs and we take these things for granted in him. But last Saturday he played with a rich volume and warmth of tone which we had not associated with him before, with a penetrating sentiment and grace of phrasing that carried everything before them, and, in the Saint-Saëns piece, with immense brilliancy. His cadenza to the latter may stand as the last word of violin virtuosity up to date. In a word, he was superb! The audience felt it, too, and showed that they felt it.

The next programme is—Handel, concerto grosso No. 10, in D minor;——aria: Haydn, symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel and Peters Eds. No. 2);——aria; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont," opus 84. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

THE DAILY GLOBE

THE FALL RIVER DAILY

FEBRUARY 20, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Grand Success of the Great Boston Organization Last Evening.

A large, fashionable and very enthusiastic audience greeted the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy last night. The programme, consisting of six numbers, was opened by a well played symphony in F major, which was liberally applauded. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt took the house by storm with her admirable rendition of Bizet's Aria, "Pearl Fishers." She has a particularly rich and pleasing voice and although she received the greatest ovation ever given a singer in this city she, refused to respond to an encore.

The third number gave Alwin Schroeder an opportunity to show his ability as a 'cellist. He impressed his hearers favorably and undoubtedly ranks equally with any artist who has performed before a Fall River audience on a similar instrument.

The fifth number, Gounod's valse, "Romeo et Juliette," sang by Mme. Blauvelt, was evidently enjoyed more than any other on the programme. Her reappearance was the signal for a tremendous outburst of applause. She held the audience spellbound, and at the conclusion of the selection pandemoniun reigned.

She was called to the front six successive times, and was finally compelled to respond to an encore before the audience would allow the musicians to commence the closing number. Judging from last night's excellent work it is evident that the organization has not deteriorated under the directorship of Emil Paur, who made his debut to a Fall River audience at this concert, and if any change has taken place it is for the better. The orchestra consisted of 72 men.

Mme. Blauvelt's reason for not answering the encore following her first selection was because of the fixed rule of the organization forbidding encores. Her encore following her last selection is the first case this season of a soloist of the orchestra being allowed to repeat. Last night's success must be very gratifying to O. E. Borden, the local manager, and his friends, who have labored unceasingly for several seasons to bring to the realization of Fall River people the pleasure obtained from an evening with the Symphony. The following is the programme:

Symphony in F Major.....Goetz
I. Allegro Moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio Ma Non Troppo Lento.
IV. Finale: Allegro Con Fuoco.
Aria from the "Pearl Fishers".....Bizet
Serenade for Strings, No. 3 in D. Minor.....
Larghetto non troppo.....
.....Volkmann
Violoncello Solo.....
Mr. Alvin Shrœder.
Ballet Music from "Feramors"....Rubinstein
I. Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
Moderato con moto.
II. Dance of the Bayaderes.
Valse. "Romeoet Juliet"te.....Gounod
Overture. "Benvenuto Cellini.....Berlioz

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1894.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Romanza for violin with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42.....Bruch
Morçeau de Concert, for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62. } .....Saint-Saëns
(First time.)
"Eine Nordische Heerfahrt," Trauerspiel Ouverture, in F minor, op. 25. } .....Emil Hartmann
(First time.)
"Don Quixote," op. 87.....Rubinstein
(First time at these concerts.)

Perhaps the first symphony of Brahms is the nobler work, but the second is more human; it has to do more with the senses; it is not cryptic. Brahms in his sterner moods sits on a mountain top and ponders his musical problems, thoughtless of men and women below who struggle, despair and love; the clouds enwrap him and his speech is obscure. But in the Symphony in D major Brahms watches with interest his neighbors. He smiles at the dancers; he lifts his hat as the corpse is carried by. And in his good nature he borrows a phrase or two from Mendelssohn.

* * *

Hartmann's overture is well made, but there is little marked originality. The composer is a Dane of the Gade school; indeed, I believe Gade was his teacher, and Gade was only Mendelssohn wandering, a little enfeebled, out of his own country. There is no trace in this overture of the modern Scandinavian school, with its suggestions of fiords and fish, fog, elves, unearthly nights and white, passionate women.

* * *

"Don Quixote" is as long a joke as any found in Dostoievsky's works. There is a description of its meaning in a preface of text; but a panorama of scenes in the Knight's life would be of greater advantage to the audience, that is if Mr. Paur would give the signals for the proper unrolling, The music is ingenious; the instrumentation is often novel, often effective, and after you are told what the music is all about, you may find the Knight in orchestral bombast, and in the lament of a bassoon; you readily detect the sheep, for sheep in music have well defined habits, such as a partiality for empty fifths as a drone bass, and Dulcinea is any strain of passion.

* * *

The orchestra played well, and Mr. Loeffler, the violinist, gave a most admirable performance of Bruch's commonplace romanza and Saint-Saëns' show piece of exquisite instrumentation. The cadenza in the last was of his own composition.

* * *

BOSTON, February 18, 1894.

THE sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Chickering Hall Monday evening, the 12th. Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, assisted. The program was as follows:

Quartet, E major, op. 32 (MS., first time).....Foote
Allegro comodo. Scherzo (Vivace).
Andante un poco con moto. Allegro con fuoco.
Quartet, C major, op. 59, No. 3.....Beethoven
Piano trio, G major, op. 112.....Raff

Mr. Foote, as you no doubt know, is an industrious, an indefatigable musician. By his industry he reminds you of the stories of the young boy that makes himself indispensable in the lawyer's office or manufacturer's counting room, grows up and eventually controls the business, and marries the daughter or widow of his predecessor.

The industry of Mr. Foote is diversified. If he has taught assiduously, and appeared often in public as a pianist, he has also spent many hours in composition.

Now when I hear a composition by Mr. Foote, for voice or voices, or for instrument or instruments, I recognize the prior composition, i.e., composition, the action of putting together or combining.

I recognize the industry praised above, the high purpose, the laudable ambition, the modern application of rules known to the ancients; but I do not find spontaneity, passion or conviction.

This speech is of Mr. Foote's music in bulk, and of course there are exceptions to the rule, as the piano quartet, which shows more natural musical invention than the greater part of his music, simple or ambitious.

In this quartet, played Monday for the first time, there are pleasing passages, particularly in the third movement, a theme and variations. Some of these variations are made artistically and they are effective. But right in this third movement is shown a lack of the sense of proportion, for in connection with the other movements the third seems unduly swollen, dropsical. The finale is without distinction, and indeed it falls below the general level of the work. The first movement is thematically conventional and it is episodic rather than an inexorable development and a conclusion. The scherzo is agreeable music, although in the trio there is the too evident desire to be original, to be effective, and there are occasional rhythmical hitchings and haltings.

I admit gladly that there is a frequent display of musical amiability in this quartet, but is there any individuality, even such mild individuality as that of John Field?

* * *

Mr. Pinero tells us that it is the duty of a critic to encourage, and that the generous encourager of the dramatist or the play actor is remembered gratefully, even if he is a man of second or third rate capacity.

It is easy for any reviewer to encourage a man like Pinero, but is it the duty of even the most amiable reviewer to encourage a playwright who for ten years has displayed nothing but smooth conventionality in plot and dialogue? Is there to be no discrimination whatever? Would Mr. Pinero be content if the same warm adjectives of praise were awarded his ingenious pieces and the melodramas of the playwrights dear to the great English public, the melodramas in which the family old crusted butler begins with his "Forty years ago, when master was a gay young lad," and the clergyman's daughter baffles the hellish purpose of the fine gentleman from London?

Or is the writing of music to be compared to the making of boots and watches by machinery? The boots are substantial; they are not uglier than the ordinary boot; they keep the feet reasonably dry in wet weather. The watches go, and they tell the time, so that the man is able to keep his appointments, knows mealtime, and does not forget the departure of trains, or the hour for beer or cocktail. You may say of much music that is written in these days, "The composer obeys the rules of traditional form, his modulations are correct, his harmonic or contrapuntal language is free from solecisms; in a word, I can parse the musical sentences." But is such music really music, or to be praised enthusiastically?

Mr. Emerson in his brave language once cried out, "Pope and his school wrote poetry fit to put round frosted cake. What did Walter Scott write without stint?—a rhymed travelers' guide to Scotland. And the libraries of verses they print have this Birmingham character. How many volumes of well bred metre we must jingle through before we can be filled, taught, renewed! We want the miraculous; the beauty which we can manufacture at no mill—can give no account of; the beauty of which Chaucer and Chapman had the secret!"

* * *

It was a great pleasure to hear Mr. Perabo again. He is an excellent ensemble player, so appreciative of the rights of others, so keen in his sense of proportion. With him at the piano a trio becomes endurable, yes, a thing of delight; there is no longer the feeling of a desperate rivalry between unsympathetic instruments.

The playing of the Quartet was excellent throughout the evening, and the performance of the Beethoven quartet was masterly. The reading of the introductory andante con moto might have been excepted to on the ground that the pace was just a little too slow, and there were moments when the second violin seemed too modest; but all in all it was a noble performance.

THE DAILY HERALD
—ISSUED BY—
FEBRUARY 20, 1894

A FINE CONCERT.

Enthusiastic Reception of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

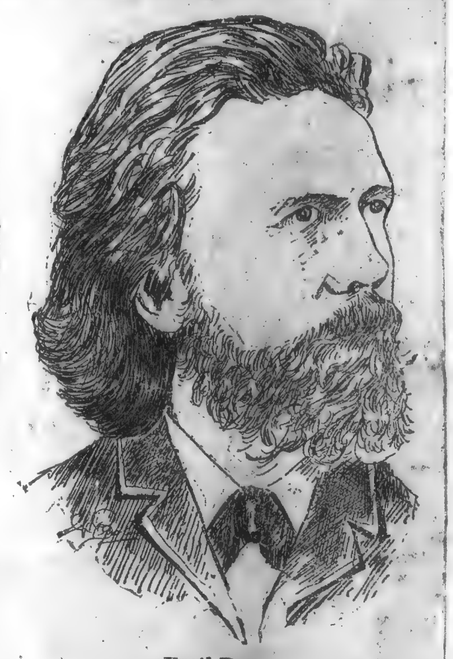
This town is looking up in a musical way, there can be no doubt of that. The Boston Symphony orchestra played to a crowded house last evening, while Cleveland's minstrels caught cold Saturday from the chilly reception it got at two performances. That may not be altogether a convincing argument in itself, but when it is added that last night's crowd clapped its hands sore, pounded with its feet and actually cheered—yes, cheered out loud—when a $100 a night singer slid up to high C, the doubting Thomases will be forced to admit that the town is looking up musically.

There were 72 men in the orchestra, Franz Kneisel occupying his old seat of honor at the head of the strings. As to the orchestra's appearance, of course, the interest centered in the advent of Emil Paur, the much-heralded leader, late of Leipsic, who seems to be running hare and hounds with Arthur Nikisch along the road to musical fame.

At the end of two selections, even a person untaught in the mysteries of counterpoint could see that Mr. Paur knew his business, and before the concert was half over, the celebrated leader had won his way to the hearts of his hearers, not least by the wonderful mile that wreathed itself among the wrinkles of his expressive face, to a degree no leader of the Symphony orchestra has ever been able to do before. Emil Paur owned the musical part of Fall River last night.

The program of the concert was as follows:

SYMPHONY IN F MAJOR.....Goetz
I. Allegoro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento.
VI. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
ARIA, from the "Pearl Fishers".....Bizet
MME. BLAUVELT.
SERENADE FOR STRINGS, No. 3, in D minor.....Volkmann
VIOLONCELLO SOLO,
MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
BALLET MUSIC from "Feramor's".....Rubinstein
I. Candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
II. Dance of the Bayaderes.
VALSE, "Romeo and Juliette".....Gounod
OVERTURE, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz



Emil Paur.

A critical review of the music is the work of a musical expert. To the ordinary listener it was perfect—the Boston Symphony is always that. Perhaps the ordinary listener would have been a little more pleased to have detected a familiar strain or two now and then. The program could hardly be called a popular one. It was a very musical one, however, and had plenty of variety of movement. Mr. Schroeder was a revelation on the violoncello. His solo was a rare effort, and the entire number for the strings was a gem.

It was said above that Mr. Paur owned the musical town last night. That is not correct; the title belongs to a partnership. Lillian Blauvelt is in no sense the silent partner either. Her first song caught the house, and such an ovation followed the end that no songster has ever received in Fall River before. Six times she was called from the wings to acknowledge the continued applause. That vouches for the statement that her singing pleased the vast audience. It remained for the close of her number later in the program for the people to assert themselves, however.

There is an iron-clad rule of the organization that forbids any artist responding to an encore. Mrs. Blauvelt wished the manager to assure the public that she was deeply moved by their generous applause, and was grateful for it. Iron-clad rules could not withstand the ovation that followed the second number. When a Fall River audience gets to actually cheering a singer, the director who knows anything will be justified in laying out his entire repertoire for their edification. Paur seemed to appreciate this fact, and Mrs. Blauvelt was permitted to repeat the Romeo and Juliet waltz song.

If the audience did the town proud, it was no less a compliment to the efforts of O. Elton Borden, who has succeeded in building up a reputation for Fall River among the managers of the orchestra that no other city of its size in the country enjoys.

MRS. BLAUVELT does not pretend to be a rival of Mrs. Patti, but in the estimation of those who were enthralled by her singing at the academy Monday night the "queen of song" is apt to be shorn of her laurels.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1894.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Romanza for violin with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42.....Bruch
Morçeau de Concert, for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62. (First time.).....Saint-Saëns
"Eine Nordische Heerfahrt," Trauerspiel Ouverture, in F minor, op. 25. (First time.).....Emil Hartmann
"Don Quixote," op. 87. (First time at these concerts.).....Rubinstein

Perhaps the first symphony of Brahms is the nobler work, but the second is more human; it has to do more with the senses; it is not cryptic. Brahms in his sterner moods sits on a mountain top and ponders his musical problems, thoughtless of men and women below who struggle, despair and love; the clouds enwrap him and his speech is obscure. But in the Symphony in D major Brahms watches with interest his neighbors. He smiles at the dancers; he lifts his hat as the corpse is carried by. And in his good nature he borrows a phrase or two from Mendelssohn.

* * *

Hartmann's overture is well made, but there is little marked originality. The composer is a Dane of the Gade school; indeed, I believe Gade was his teacher, and Gade was only Mendelssohn wandering, a little enfeebled, out of his own country. There is no trace in this overture of the modern Scandinavian school, with its suggestions of fiords and fish, fog, elves, unearthly nights and white, passionate women.

* * *

"Don Quixote" is as long a joke as any found in Dostoievsky's works. There is a description of its meaning in a preface of text; but a panorama of scenes in the Knight's life would be of greater advantage to the audience, that is if Mr. Paur would give the signals for the proper unrolling. The music is ingenious; the instrumentation is often novel, often effective, and after you are told what the music is all about, you may find the Knight in orchestral bombast, and in the lament of a bassoon; you readily detect the sheep, for sheep in music have well defined habits, such as a partiality for empty fifths as a drone bass, and Dulcinea is any strain of passion.

* * *

The orchestra played well, and Mr. Loeffler, the violinist, gave a most admirable performance of Bruch's commonplace romanza and Saint-Saëns' show piece of exquisite instrumentation. The cadenza in the last was of his own composition.

* * *

BOSTON, February 18, 1894.

THE sixth concert of the Kneisel Quartet series was given in Chickering Hall Monday evening, the 12th. Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, assisted. The program was as follows:

Quartet, E major, op. 32 (MS., first time).....Foote
Allegro comodo. Scherzo (Vivace).
Andante un poco con moto. Allegro con fuoco.
Quartet, C major, op. 59, No. 3.....Beethoven
Piano trio, G major, op. 112.....Raff

Mr. Foote, as you no doubt know, is an industrious, an indefatigable musician. By his industry he reminds you of the stories of the young boy that makes himself indispensable in the lawyer's office or manufacturer's counting room, grows up and eventually controls the business, and marries the daughter or widow of his predecessor.

The industry of Mr. Foote is diversified. If he has taught assiduously, and appeared often in public as a pianist, he has also spent many hours in composition.

Now when I hear a composition by Mr. Foote, for voice or voices, or for instrument or instruments, I recognize the prior composition, i.e., composition, the action of putting together or combining.

I recognize the industry praised above, the high purpose, the laudable ambition, the modern application of rules known to the ancients; but I do not find spontaneity, passion or conviction.

This speech is of Mr. Foote's music in bulk, and of course there are exceptions to the rule, as the piano quartet, which shows more natural musical invention than the greater part of his music, simple or ambitious.

In this quartet, played Monday for the first time, there are pleasing passages, particularly in the third movement, a theme and variations. Some of these variations are made artistically and they are effective. But right in this third movement is shown a lack of the sense of proportion, for in connection with the other movements the third seems unduly swollen, dropsical. The finale is without distinction, and indeed it falls below the general level of the work. The first movement is thematically conventional and it is episodic rather than an inexorable development and a conclusion. The scherzo is agreeable music, although in the trio there is the too evident desire to be original, to be effective, and there are occasional rhythmical hitchings and haltings.

I admit gladly that there is a frequent display of musical amiability in this quartet, but is there any individuality, even such mild individuality as that of John Field?

* * *

Mr. Pinero tells us that it is the duty of a critic to encourage, and that the generous encourager of the dramatist or the play actor is remembered gratefully, even if he is a man of second or third rate capacity.

It is easy for any reviewer to encourage a man like Pinero, but is it the duty of even the most amiable reviewer to encourage a playwright who for ten years has displayed nothing but smooth conventionality in plot and dialogue? Is there to be no discrimination whatever? Would Mr. Pinero be content if the same warm adjectives of praise were awarded his ingenious pieces and the melodramas of the playwrights dear to the great English public, the melodramas in which the family old crusted butler begins with his "Forty years ago, when master was a gay young lad," and the clergyman's daughter baffles the hellish purpose of the fine gentleman from London?

Or is the writing of music to be compared to the making of boots and watches by machinery? The boots are substantial; they are not uglier than the ordinary boot; they keep the feet reasonably dry in wet weather. The watches go, and they tell the time, so that the man is able to keep his appointments, knows mealtime, and does not forget the departure of trains, or the hour for beer or cocktail. You may say of much music that is written in these days, "The composer obeys the rules of traditional form, his modulations are correct, his harmonic or contrapuntal language is free from solecisms; in a word, I can parse the musical sentences." But is such music really music, or to be praised enthusiastically?

Mr. Emerson in his brave language once cried out, "Pope and his school wrote poetry fit to put round frosted cake. What did Walter Scott write without stint?—a rhymed travelers' guide to Scotland. And the libraries of verses they print have this Birmingham character. How many volumes of well bred metre we must jingle through before we can be filled, taught, renewed! We want the miraculous; the beauty which we can manufacture at no mill—can give no account of; the beauty of which Chaucer and Chapman had the secret!"

* * *

It was a great pleasure to hear Mr. Perabo again. He is an excellent ensemble player, so appreciative of the rights of others, so keen in his sense of proportion. With him at the piano a trio becomes endurable, yes, a thing of delight; there is no longer the feeling of a desperate rivalry between unsympathetic instruments.

The playing of the Quartet was excellent throughout the evening, and the performance of the Beethoven quartet was masterly. The reading of the introductory andante con moto might have been excepted to on the ground that the pace was just a little too slow, and there were moments when the second violin seemed too modest; but all in all it was a noble performance.

*

THE DAILY HERALD

—ISSUED BY—

FEBRUARY 20, 1894

A FINE CONCERT.

Enthusiastic Reception of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

This town is looking up in a musical way, there can be no doubt of that. The Boston Symphony orchestra played to a crowded house last evening, while Cleveland's minstrels caught cold Saturday from the chilly reception it got at two performances. That may not be altogether a convincing argument in itself, but when it is added that last night's crowd clapped its hands sore, pounded with its feet and actually cheered—yes, cheered out loud—when a $100 a night singer slid up to high C, the doubting Thomases will be forced to admit that the town is looking up musically.

There were 72 men in the orchestra, Franz Kneisel occupying his old seat of honor at the head of the strings. As to the orchestra's appearance, of course, the interest centered in the advent of Emil Paur, the much-heralded leader, late of Leipsic, who seems to be running hare and hounds with Arthur Nikisch along the road to musical fame.

At the end of two selections, even a person untaught in the mysteries of counterpoint could see that Mr. Paur knew his business, and before the concert was half over, the celebrated leader had won his way to the hearts of his hearers, not least by the wonderful mile that wreathed itself among the wrinkles of his expressive face, to a degree no leader of the Symphony orchestra has ever been able to do before. Emil Paur owned the musical part of Fall River last night.

The program of the concert was as follows:

SYMPHONY IN F MAJOR.....Goetz
I. Allegoro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento.
VI. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
ARIA, from the "Pearl Fishers".....Bizet
MME. BLAUVELT.
SERENADE FOR STRINGS, No. 3, in D minor.....Volkmann
VIOLONCELLO SOLO,
MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
BALLET MUSIC from "Feramor's"..Rubinstein
I. Candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
II. Dance of the Bayaderes.
VALSE, "Romeo and Juliette".....Gounod
OVERTURE, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz

Emil Paur.

A critical review of the music is the work of a musical expert. To the ordinary listener it was perfect—the Boston Symphony is always that. Perhaps the ordinary listener would have been a little more pleased to have detected a familiar strain or two now and then. The program could hardly be called a popular one. It was a very musical one, however, and had plenty of variety of movement. Mr. Schroeder was a revelation on the violoncello. His solo was a rare effort, and the entire number for the strings was a gem.

It was said above that Mr. Paur owned the musical town last night. That is not correct; the title belongs to a partnership. Lillian Blauvelt is in no sense the silent partner either. Her first song caught the house, and such an ovation followed the end that no songster has ever received in Fall River before. Six times she was called from the wings to acknowledge the continued applause. That vouches for the statement that her singing pleased the vast audience. It remained for the close of her number later in the program for the people to assert themselves, however.

There is an iron-clad rule of the organization that forbids any artist responding to an encore. Mrs. Blauvelt wished the manager to assure the public that she was deeply moved by their generous applause, and was grateful for it. Iron-clad rules could not withstand the ovation that followed the second number. When a Fall River audience gets to actually cheering a singer, the director who knows anything will be justified in laying out his entire repertoire for their edification. Paur seemed to appreciate this fact, and Mrs. Blauvelt was permitted to repeat the Romeo and Juliet waltz song.

If the audience did the town proud, it was no less a compliment to the efforts of O. Elton Borden, who has succeeded in building up a reputation for Fall River among the managers of the orchestra that no other city of its size in the country enjoys.

MRS. BLAUVELT does not pretend to be a rival of Mrs. Patti, but in the estimation of those who were enthralled by her singing at the academy Monday night the "queen of song" is apt to be shorn of her laurels.

[illegible]

[illegible], Mass.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 21.

THE SYMPHONY.

The Symphony Concert, at the Academy, Monday night, has never been surpassed, and with the possible exception of three years ago, has never been equalled in orchestra work in this city. Everything about it, excepting some familiar faces in the orchestra, was new. Conductor Emil Paur made a modest entrance, was hesitatingly received, and wound up his evening's work with applause from the entire audience, showing that he had won a friend and admirer in every one. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt charmed every one with her winsome entree, her sweet and modest dress, her magnificent singing. Never has the Academy heard such applause as was given to her, and she has the satisfaction of scoring the biggest triumph and grandest ovation ever given to any stage artist in this city. The program, with the exception of Volkmann's serenade for strings, with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as cello soloist, was entirely new to a Fall River audience. Even this selection had been given before only at one of Mr. Deane's organ recitals, at the Central church, Mr. Swan of New Bedford, giving the interpretation. He was one of the most delighted of the auditors at its presentation by the Symphony.

The concert opened with H. Gortz' symphony in F major, op. 9. It was charmingly sweet and classic, and yet of such tuneful melodies that the audience was delighted. From the first it was evident that Conductor Paur was playing the orchestra with a careful study, complete mastery, and a delightful interpretation of the symphony. He is a soulful conductor, and his wand and hand were upon every instrument. The violins were lifted with a delicacy and finish that were astonishing, and the brasses were clear, soft and subdued, yet as sweet as a human voice. His use of his left hand was an interesting study, the baton being wielded by his right. The left, in repose, hung gracefully at his side, but it seemed as if filled with little pebbles, which he tossed here and there, as occasion required, to indicate to certain parts of the orchestra just what was required of them. Every movement of the fingers appeared to be a sign, and the response that never failed during the evening's entertainment was simply wonderful. We never expect to realize more perfect accord between leader and men than was evidenced throughout the evening. The Symphony of 1894 will be one of delightful memory.

At the conclusion of the first movement Conductor Paur and the house were friends, and the applause that was given told him so. But in the intermezzo that followed he received a mark of attention that was but once repeated during the evening. During the rendering of the madrigal or choral part, a stillness pervaded the house that rarely obtains in so large an audience; and when the part was concluded Conductor Paur's strong and thoughful face was ablaze with happiness, as he turned and received the more demonstrative but less certain applause than the attention which had been given during its execution.

Mme. Blauvelt followed the Symphony, singing Bizet's aria "Pearl Fishers." Her voice was large and sweet, her execution almost perfection. Four, five times she returned to bow her acknowledgments to the enraptured and enthusiastic house.

Then came the Volkmann serenade, and the delightful cello solo by Mr. Schroeder. No more delicate, true and tuneful tones have been heard in this city than the artist drew from his strings. There was never a false tone, nor an unpleasantness in the accompaniment. Admiration for Mr. Paur was indisputable after this and the appreciative applause for Mr. Schroeder was well merited.

Following came one of the gems of the evening, the delicate ballet music from Rubenstein's Feramor. You will find a few who do not enjoy symphonies, but you will not find one, with any music whatsoever, who did not enjoy these dances. Evidently, Paur and his musicians can dance as well as sing and both, to perfection.

Again Mme. Blauvelt, in one of the principal arias from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliette," the "Valse." It was sweet, brilliant and if it had not been repeated we should have said it was perfect. It was on its completion that an ovation, never before equalled in Fall River was given. Repeatedly the singer re-appeared to bow and retire. Mr. Paur and his men joined in the applause and helped to give the audience, in encouraging the singer to appear, an impression that she was ungracious. But the applause was over-powering. Again "the people" [illegible] over "unchangeable" [illegible] "can she sing again?" the conductor was [illegible] to ask of a half-dozen [illegible] breaking rule of the [illegible] she could not. [illegible] exceptional [illegible] the first time [illegible] allowed [illegible]

[illegible] the entertainment closed with Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," but we do not remember much about it. The song and its wonderful accompaniment are still uppermost in memory.

For a strictly classical program, so selected and so interpreted as to present great composers as writers of sweet and pleasing melodies, enlisting the sympathies and hearts of the common people, the audience of Monday night is under obligation to Conductor Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 25.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was chronological in order, beginning with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor, and followed by the air, "Honor and Arms," from the same composer's "Samson." Then came Haydn's Symphony, in D (B. & H. No. 2), which was succeeded, in turn, by the air, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from Mozart's "Escape from the Seraglio," the whole concluding with Beethoven's "Egmont', overture. It was an interesting and well-arranged programme, and its performance was characterized throughout, by a fine feeling, on the part of Mr. Paur, for the distinctive individualities of the various composers. The Handel Concerto, consisting of five movements, is not over-long, and is less monotonous than such works generally are. The slow movement, is very beautiful, and the three succeeding allegros are delightfully fresh and vivacious, the closing one having a fascinating piquancy. The Hadyn Symphony was read in a masterly manner throughout, and was beautifully played, the interpretation being in the true Haydn vein, frank and free from affectation. The "Egmont" overture received a noble reading, and the closing portion was given with splendid fire, the final climax being led up to magnificently. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist, and his appearance was the signal for a cordial welcome. He sang the Handel air broadly and dramatically and in a thoroughly artistic spirit, winning a hearty recognition of his performance in the warm applause and the two recalls that rewarded it. His interpretation of the Mozart selection was an admirable example of chaste buffo singing, and was a musicianly effort generally, notably in its thorough sympathy with the character of the air. For this, Mr. Heinrich was also vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is as follows: "Symphony Fantastique," Berlioz; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus," Liszt; "Komarinskaja," a fantasie for orchestra, Glinka; and overture, "Russlau and Ludmilla," Glinka. There will be no soloist.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Pleasing Concert at Music Hall---Music Notes.

The sixteenth Symphony concert last night presented no special novelty. Two of the numbers were by Handel, a third by Haydn, while the two arias, with their rich orchestral accompaniments, were by Mozart and Beethoven.

The programme began with the Handel concerto in D minor, and it received a delightful rendering at the hands of Conductor Paur's musicians, and the same may be said of the Haydn symphony in D, the third movement of which, a pretty minuet, was played in true, stately fashion. Both of these numbers have been repeatedly heard by Symphony audiences and there is, therefore, scarcely anything that can be said of them other than that they proved as enjoyable as at any of their previous hearings. The other selection, with which the programme closed, was Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," which at times is very heavy and intensely dramatic from beginning to end.

The vocal work of the evening was entrusted to Mr. Max Heinrich, whose heavy, full bass voice was heard to excellent advantage in two arias, one from Handel's "Samson" and the other Mozart's "Die Eutfuhrung aus dem Serail." The latter gave the singer an opportunity to indulge in some difficult passages, which he did in masterly fashion. After both selections he was given a flattering amount of applause.

At the next concert a novelty will be heard in the overture from Glinka's opera, "Russlan et Ludmilla."

SUNDAY, FEB. 25, [illegible]

Echoes From the Symphony --- People's Concert Today---Preludes.

Mr Paur offered a grand program at last week's symphony, selections from Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven forming the musical pabulum. The performance was one of the best given by the orchestra this season, and the adherents to the strictly classic in program making probably were satisfied, or should have been. Mr Max Heinrich appeared as soloist and sang arias from Handel's "Samson," and Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio."

When an artist is equally successful in singing such contrasting styles of compositions he must be possessed of unusual dramatic as well as musical abilities, and Mr Heinrich's certainly was successful. The heroic, declamatory delivery of Samson's aria was thoroughly in keeping with the character and the long sustained runs on the vowels, a vocal exercise one might call it, were clear, rich, resonant and sweet.

The humor of the Mozart number was capitally illustrated and "Your cunning, your wiles, your pranks," etc, was sung in the vein of a true comedian. The singer appeared to enjoy his work as much as did the audience and although a hypercritical concert devotee might object to dramatic action in a concert number, no doubt Mr Heinrich added much to the general enjoyment by his slight suggestions of the operatic stage. He was enthusiastically applauded for his fine work.

Handel's concerto for string instruments began the program. The special features of the delightful interpretation were the odd fugue for three instruments, the work of the first and second violins in the fourth movement, and the closing allegro in which the solo and accompanying instruments play the same parts.

Haydn's symphony in D major was rendered grandly, the strong passages in adagio being notably broad and sonorous. The slow and graceful rondo and the minuet, stately and melodious, were played with exquisite delicacy and tone color. The fantasia in the finale was also delightfully given.

Beethoven's dramatic overture to "Egmont," which closed the concert, showed but few marked changes from the traditional readings, and was artistically and conservatively performed.

The program for this week's rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Glinka, "Komarinskaja" and overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1894.

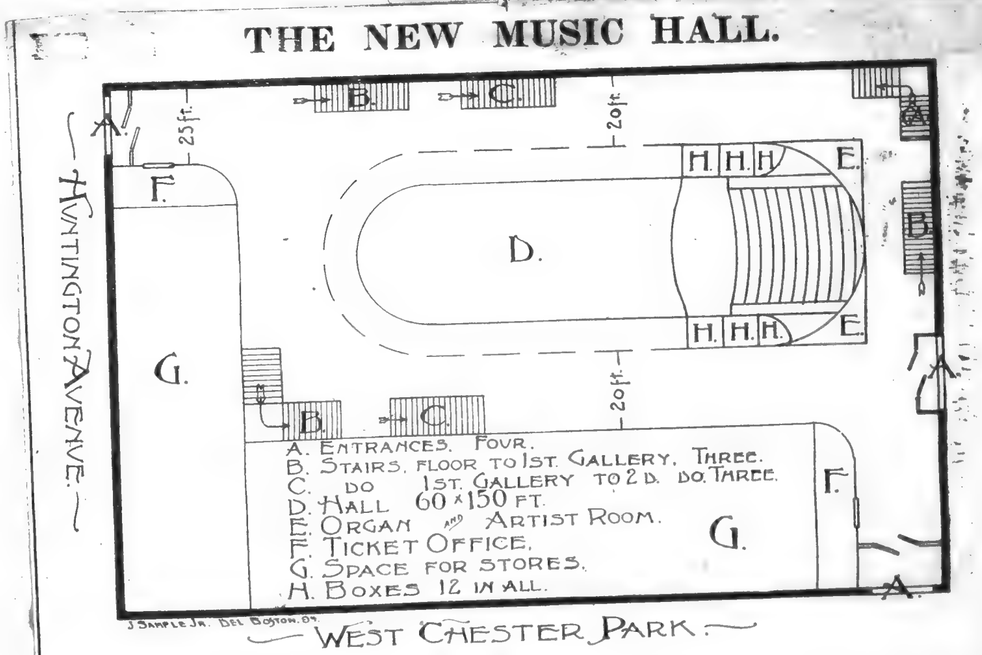
Having put so many novelties on his fifteenth programme, Mr. Paur evidently thought that he had best give both audience and orchestra a little rest when he came to the sixteenth. Consequently the orchestral music heard last night was all familiar—Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings; Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Nor did Mr. Max Heinrich, who appeared as the soloist, add anything of fresh interest in his selections; for he calmly chose for his first number that stand-by of country bass singers for a century past and that delight of musical conventions ever since they were invented—"Honor and Arms," from Handel's "Samson." His other song was not quite so worn-out, although pretty nearly entitled to be relegated to the category of the hackneyed—Osmin's air from Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio," beginning in the original text with the words, "Solche hergelauf 'ne Laffen."

The interest of the concert then depended chiefly on the performance, only the Beethoven having the true assurance of perennial life and authority in its pathos and passion. The orchestral work was generally excellent, and Mr. Paur was delightfully clear in his announcement and pursuit of the themes and secondary figures in the concerto. The little solo passages therein were charmingly put in, and one could only note unfavorably an occasional disposition on the part of some players to force the pace, which caused a little transitory clouding of the texture. The symphony was sweetly and kindly done,—usually with respect to its author's simplicity of style, but with some unnecessary and (to our thinking) incongruous relaxations of tempo and sophistications of expression, particularly in the opening allegro. The trio of the minuet was admirably marked, and so were the odd accents and rustic beat of the landler-like theme of the finale. The great overture was dramatically read, and its great chords had their due snap and thrill; of course the drummer, thereto incited by Mr. Paur, was often too much in evidence and displaced the symmetry of the stronger passages.

Mr. Heinrich was by no means at his best in "Honor and Arms," which we have often heard sung better. It needs a voice of solid, even and true bass quality, which his is not, and the singer's execution should be equal to delivering the long roulades, especially on the word "glory," without slackening the time as he did. The Mozart scene, with its petulant determination, suited him far better, and he tossed it off with vigor, animation and point.

Next Saturday's programme is thus appointed: From Berlioz the "Fantastic" Symphony, from Liszt, the "Orpheus" symphonic poem; from Glinka, the "Komarins kaja," and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," which latter is new.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.



SUGGESTIONS FOR A PLAN.

The COURIER has not been backward in expressing its dislike for the model submitted by a New York architect to the subscribers to the stock in the new Music Hall to be built on Huntington avenue. The reasons for that dislike need not be repeated here, but it may be said that they are based on practical grounds and are in accordance with the experience that has been acquired in every city where there has been in use a concert hall capable of holding an audience of two thousand or more with a choral force of not less than three hundred and an orchestra of eighty. Our own experience should have taught us something, but if the absurd plan that has been offered from New York shall be accepted, we shall have to submit in silence to the rebuke that we have learned nothing in forty years, either from what has been set directly before us or from the examples that have been furnished in other cities. Simply to show the possibilities with the means at the command of the directors of the new enterprise, the sketch of a plan has been prepared for the COURIER and is herewith presented. The general scheme for the lobbies, staircases and the hall itself is shown in the drawing, the references aiding in a comprehension of the details so far as they are set forth. It will be seen that the plan provides for a continuous lobby around the hall so that access from one part to any other will be possible without crossing the hall. The lobbies are all of the same width—twenty feet—and the turns are at right angles, with the corners rounded, thus aiding the outward movement of a throng. The staircases are continuous, that is, they are not set one over another. In the lobbies there is ample room for cloak rooms and other offices, and in the second and third stories, there can be placed at the back of the stage, in the twenty foot space, apartments for orchestra and chorus where they can assemble for a concert, access to the stage being provided by means of a circular staircase within the walls of the apartments. Two galleries are considered in this scheme, but there can easily be three, and the approaches to them can be arranged so as to keep them, or any of them, distinct from the other parts of the house. The galleries should recede say the width of one seat as they ascend, thus making the lower gallery four seats deep, the second three and so on. This will aid in relieving the hall of a boxed appearance. Beneath the first gallery, at the stage end, there would be space for dressing rooms as in the present hall.

The hall is 60 by 150 feet, the length being twice and a half the width; the present hall is twice as long as it is wide—63 by 126 feet. In this plan the effect of undue length is avoided by curving the ends. This curvature at the end opposite the stage also permits the rounded corners in the lobbies, for the purpose already noted. The shape is that of the hall of the Conservatory at Paris, admitted by all who have had opportunities to study the matter to be the best concert hall in the world in its acoustics, the paramount problem in a room devoted to diversions and delights for the ear. The floor of the hall should be on an incline and there should be an abundance of doors opening from the lobbies, as indicated.

The spaces set apart for stores give a depth of thirty-five feet on Huntington avenue and of fifty feet on West Chester Park, less, in each instance, the thickness of the several walls on the exterior and intervening. These calculations are based on the reported dimensions of the lot of land—150 by 225 feet. In the second story on the West Chester Park side there will be room for an apartment that can be used for choral rehearsals and chamber concerts. The remainder of the buildings outside of the space consumed for the hall and dependencies can be devoted to various business purposes or can be fitted for teaching.

There is no purpose on the part of the COURIER to dictate to the gentlemen who have the new venture in charge. The only motive is to suggest a practicable disposition of the lot of land on which the new hall will be built, a disposition that shall be for the best interest of the art that is to be fostered here and of the stockholders as well. A hundred modifications can be made in this plan but the general thought is worthy of careful consideration by those who are capable of thinking for themselves and are not readily persuaded by a plausible manner or dazed by a model that happens to have a brilliant appearance, but which is devised without regard for the essential elements of a concert hall. If the model that has been so widely discussed—always unfavorably by those who through experience or trained observation have a knowledge of the requirements of a music hall—had come from an architect who had already been successful in the construction of an apartment for a similar purpose, there might be some reason in hesitating to criticise; but there is no reason in accepting it as the only model that can be followed.

[92]

Daily News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 21.

THE SYMPHONY.

The Symphony Concert, at the Academy, Monday night, has never been surpassed, and with the possible exception of three years ago, has never been equalled in orchestra work in this city. Everything about it, excepting some familiar faces in the orchestra, was new. Conductor Emil Paur made a modest entrance, was hesitatingly received, and wound up his evening's work with applause from the entire audience, showing that he had won a friend and admirer in every one. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt charmed every one with her winsome entree, her sweet and modest dress, her magnificent singing. Never has the Academy heard such applause as was given to her, and she has the satisfaction of scoring the biggest triumph and grandest ovation ever given to any stage artist in this city. The program, with the exception of Volkmann's serenade for strings, with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as cello soloist, was entirely new to a Fall River audience. Even this selection had been given before only at one of Mr. Deane's organ recitals, at the Central church, Mr. Swan of New Bedford, giving the interpretation. He was one of the most delighted of the auditors at its presentation by the Symphony.

The concert opened with H. Gortz' symphony in F major, op. 9. It was charmingly sweet and classic, and yet of such tuneful melodies that the audience was delighted. From the first it was evident that Conductor Paur was playing the orchestra with a careful study, complete mastery, and a delightful interpretation of the symphony. He is a soulful conductor, and his wand and hand were upon every instrument. The violins were lifted with a delicacy and finish that were astonishing, and the brasses were clear, soft and subdued, yet as sweet as a human voice. His use of his left hand was an interesting study, the baton being wielded by his right. The left, in repose, hung gracefully at his side, but it seemed as if filled with little pebbles, which he tossed here and there, as occasion required, to indicate to certain parts of the orchestra just what was required of them. Every movement of the fingers appeared to be a sign, and the response that never failed during the evening's entertainment was simply wonderful. We never expect to realize more perfect accord between leader and men than was evidenced throughout the evening. The Symphony of 1894 will be one of delightful memory.

At the conclusion of the first movement Conductor Paur and the house were friends, and the applause that was given told him so. But in the intermezzo that followed he received a mark of attention that was but once repeated during the evening. During the rendering of the madrigal or choral part, a stillness pervaded the house that rarely obtains in so large an audience; and when the part was concluded Conductor Paur's strong and thoughful face was ablaze with happiness, as he turned and received the more demonstrative but less certain applause than the attention which had been given during its execution.

Mme. Blauvelt followed the Symphony, singing Bizet's aria "Pearl Fishers." Her voice was large and sweet, her execution almost perfection. Four, five times she returned to bow her acknowledgments to the enraptured and enthuiastic house.

Then came the Volkmann serenade, and the delightful cello solo by Mr. Schroeder. No more delicate, true and tuneful tones have been heard in this city than the artist drew from his strings. There was never a false tone, nor an unpleasantness in the accompaniment. Admiration for Mr. Paur was indisputable after this and the appreciative applause for Mr. Schroeder was well merited.

Following came one of the gems of the evening, the delicate ballet music from Rubenstein's Feramor. You will find a few who do not enjoy symphonies, but you will not find one, with any music whatsoever, who did not enjoy these dances. Evidently, Paur and his musicians can dance as well as sing and both, to perfection.

Again Mme. Blauvelt, in one of the principal arias from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliette," the "Valse." It was sweet, brilliant and if it had not been repeated we should have said it was perfect. It was on its completion that an ovation, never before equalled in Fall River was given. Repeatedly the singer re-appeared to bow and retire. Mr. Paur and his men joined in the applause and helped to give the audience, in encouraging the singer to appear, an impression that she was ungracious. But the applause was over-powering. Again "the people" triumphed over "unchangeable laws." "Can she sing again?" the conductor was heard to ask of a half-dozen or the men, the unswerving rule of the Symphony being that she could not. "Yes, let her," was the unexceptional reply; and she sang, for the first time this season an encore has been allowed by the management, glad of the opportunity and happy at being privileged to find herself right among her new found [illegible] for a simple English ballad, but evidently she and the orchestra were not prepared except for the concert program. She repeated the "Valse," singing with an abandon and self that made the song a new creation. Then did Paur and his men work as never before to make the accompaniment perfect; nor once did they fail. It was a delight. Perfect. The encore cost Mme. Blauvelt a train to New York, but she did not mind. She returned by the special to Boston and took a later train for the metropolis.

The entertainment closed with Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," but we do not remember much about it. The song and its wonderful accompaniment are still uppermost in memory.

For a strictly classical program, so selected and so interpreted as to present great composers as writers of sweet and pleasing melodies, enlisting the sympathies and hearts of the common people, the audience of Monday night is under obligation to Conductor Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 25.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was chronological in order, beginning with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D-minor, and followed by the air, "Honor and Arms," from the same composer's "Samson." Then came Haydn's Symphony, in D (B. & H. No. 2), which was succeeded, in turn, by the air, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from Mozart's "Escape from the Seraglio," the whole concluding with Beethoven's "Egmont', overture. It was an interesting and well-arranged programme, and its performance was characterized throughout, by a fine feeling, on the part of Mr. Paur, for the distinctive individualities of the various composers. The Handel Concerto, consisting of five movements, is not over-long, and is less monotonous than such works generally are. The slow movement, is very beautiful, and the three succeeding allegros are delightfully fresh and vivacious, the closing one having a fascinating piquancy. The Hadyn Symphony was read in a masterly manner throughout, and was beautifully played, the interpretation being in the true Haydn vein, frank and free from affectation. The "Egmont" overture received a noble reading, and the closing portion was given with splendid fire, the final climax being led up to magnificently. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist, and his appearance was the signal for a cordial welcome. He sang the Handel air broadly and dramatically and in a thoroughly artistic spirit, winning a hearty recognition of his performance in the warm applause and the two recalls that rewarded it. His interpretation of the Mozart selection was an admirable example of chaste buffo singing, and was a musicianly effort generally, notably in its thorough sympathy with the character of the air. For this, Mr. Heinrich was also vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is as follows: "Symphony Fantastique," Berlioz; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus," Liszt; "Komarinskaja," a fantasie for orchestra, Glinka; and overture, "Russlau and Ludmilla," Glinka. There will be no soloist.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Pleasing Concert at Music Hall---Music Notes.

The sixteenth Symphony concert last night presented no special novelty. Two of the numbers were by Handel, a third by Haydn, while the two arias, with their rich orchestral accompaniments, were by Mozart and Beethoven.

The programme began with the Handel concerto in D minor, and it received a delightful rendering at the hands of Conductor Paur's musicians, and the same may be said of the Haydn symphony in D, the third movement of which, a pretty minuet, was played in true, stately fashion. Both of these numbers have been repeatedly heard by Symphony audiences and there is, therefore, scarcely anything that can be said of them other than that they proved as enjoyable as at any of their previous hearings. The other selection, with which the programme closed, was Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," which at times is very heavy and intensely dramatic from beginning to end.

The vocal work of the evening was entrusted to Mr. Max Heinrich, whose heavy, full bass voice was heard to excellent advantage in two arias, one from Handel's "Samson" and the other Mozart's "Die Eutfuhrung aus dem Serail." The latter gave the singer an opportunity to indulge in some difficult passages, which he did in masterly fashion. After both selections he was given a flattering amount of applause.

At the next concert a novelty will be heard in the overture from Glinka's opera, "Russlan et Ludmilla."

.....

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 25, 1894.

Echoes From the Sixteenth Symphony---People's Concert Today---Preludes.

Mr Paur offered a grand program at last week's symphony, selections from Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven forming the musical pabulum. The performance was one of the best given by the orchestra this season, and the adherents to the strictly classic in program making probably were satisfied, or should have been. Mr Max Heinrich appeared as soloist and sang arias from Handel's "Samson," and Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio."

When an artist is equally successful in singing such contrasting styles of compositions he must be possessed of unusual dramatic as well as musical abilities, and Mr Heinrich's certainly was successful. The heroic, declamatory delivery of Samson's aria was thoroughly in keeping with the character and the long sustained runs on the vowels, a vocal exercise one might call it, were clear, rich, resonant and sweet.

The humor of the Mozart number was capitally illustrated and "Your cunning, your wiles, your pranks," etc, was sung in the vein of a true comedian. The singer appeared to enjoy his work as much as did the audience and although a hypercritical concert devotee might object to dramatic action in a concert number, no doubt Mr Heinrich added much to the general enjoyment by his slight suggestions of the operatic stage. He was enthusiastically applauded for his fine work.

Handel's concerto for string instruments began the program. The special features of the delightful interpretation were the odd fugue for three instruments, the work of the first and second violins in the fourth movement, and the closing allegro in which the solo and accompanying instruments play the same parts.

Haydn's symphony in D major was rendered grandly, the strong passages in adagio being notably broad and sonorous. The slow and graceful rondo and the minuet, stately and melodious, were played with exquisite delicacy and tone color. The fantasia in the finale was also delightfully given.

Beethoven's dramatic overture to "Egmont," which closed the concert, showed but few marked changes from the traditional readings, and was artistically and conservatively performed.

The program for this week's rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Glinka, "Komarinskaja" and overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 25, 1894.

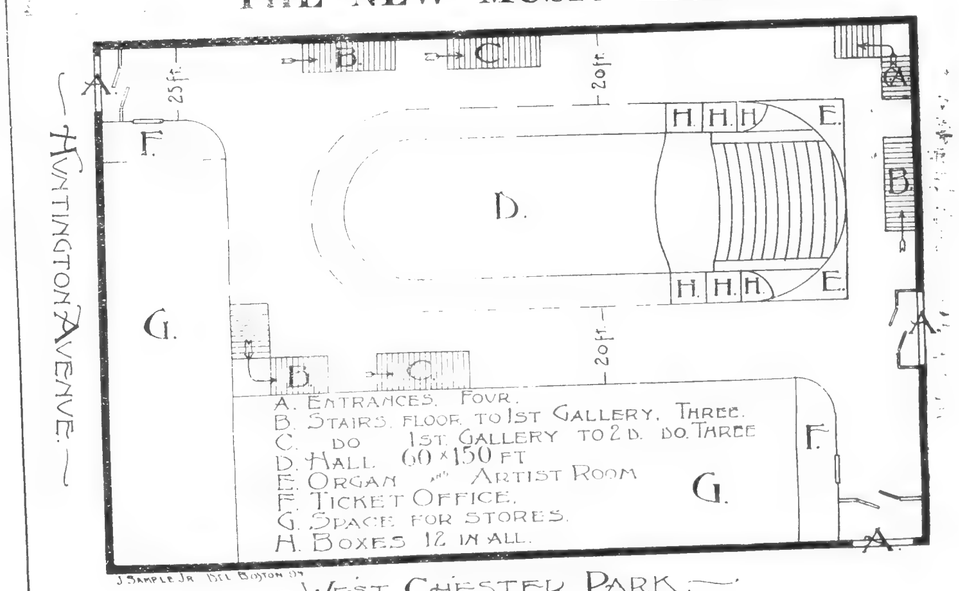
Having put so many novelties on his fifteenth programme, Mr. Paur evidently thought that he had best give both audience and orchestra a little rest when he came to the sixteenth. Consequently the orchestral music heard last night was all familiar—Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings; Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Nor did Mr. Max Heinrich, who appeared as the soloist, add anything of fresh interest in his selections; for he calmly chose for his first number that stand-by of country bass singers for a century past and that delight of musical conventions ever since they were invented—"Honor and Arms," from Handel's "Samson." His other song was not quite so worn-out, although pretty nearly entitled to be relegated to the category of the hackneyed—Osmin's air from Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio," beginning in the original text with the words, "Solche hergelauf 'ne Laffen."

The interest of the concert then depended chiefly on the performance, only the Beethoven having the true assurance of perennial life and authority in its pathos and passion. The orchestral work was generally excellent, and Mr. Paur was delightfully clear in his announcement and pursuit of the themes and secondary figures in the concerto. The little solo passages therein were charmingly put in, and one could only note unfavorably an occasional disposition on the part of some players to force the pace, which caused a little transitory clouding of the texture. The symphony was sweetly and kindly done,—usually with respect to its author's simplicity of style, but with some unnecessary and (to our thinking) incongruous relaxations of tempo and sophistications of expression, particularly in the opening allegro. The trio of the minuet was admirably marked, and so were the odd accents and rustic beat of the landler-like theme of the finale. The great overture was dramatically read, and its great chords had their due snap and thrill; of course the drummer, thereto incited by Mr. Paur, was often too much in evidence and displaced the symmetry of the stronger passages.

Mr. Heinrich was by no means at his best in "Honor and Arms," which we have often heard sung better. It needs a voice of solid, even and true bass quality, which his is not, and the singer's execution should be equal to delivering the long roulades, especially on the word "glory," without slackening the time as he did. The Mozart scene, with its petulant determination, suited him far better, and he tossed it off with vigor, animation and point.

Next Saturday's programme is thus appointed: From Berlioz the "Fantastic" Symphony, from Liszt, the "Orpheus" symphonic poem; from Glinka, the "Komarins kaja," and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," which latter is new.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.



SUGGESTIONS FOR A PLAN.

The COURIER has not been backward in expressing its dislike for the model submitted by a New York architect to the subscribers to the stock in the new Music Hall to be built on Huntington avenue. The reasons for that dislike need not be repeated here, but it may be said that they are based on practical grounds and are in accordance with the experience that has been acquired in every city where there has been in use a concert hall capable of holding an audience of two thousand or more with a choral force of not less than three hundred and an orchestra of eighty. Our own experience should have taught us something, but if the absurd plan that has been offered from New York shall be accepted, we shall have to submit in silence to the rebuke that we have learned nothing in forty years, either from what has been set directly before us or from the examples that have been furnished in other cities. Simply to show the possibilities with the means at the command of the directors of the new enterprise, the sketch of a plan has been prepared for the COURIER and is herewith presented. The general scheme for the lobbies, staircases and the hall itself is shown in the drawing, the references aiding in a comprehension of the details so far as they are set forth. It will be seen that the plan provides for a continuous lobby around the hall so that access from one part to any other will be possible without crossing the hall. The lobbies are all of the same width—twenty feet—and the turns are at right angles, with the corners rounded, thus aiding the outward movement of a throng. The staircases are continuous, that is, they are not set one over another. In the lobbies there is ample room for cloak rooms and other offices, and in the second and third stories, there can be placed at the back of the stage, in the twenty foot space, apartments for orchestra and chorus where they can assemble for a concert, access to the stage being provided by means of a circular staircase within the walls of the apartments. Two galleries are considered in this scheme, but there can easily be three, and the approaches to them can be arranged so as to keep them, or any of them, distinct from the other parts of the house. The galleries should recede say the width of one seat, as they ascend, thus making the lower gallery four seats deep, the second three and so on. This will aid in achieving the hall of a boxed appearance. Beneath the first gallery, at the stage end, there would be space for dressing rooms as in the present hall.

The hall is 60 by 150 feet, the length being twice and a half the width; the present hall is twice as long as it is wide—63 by 126 feet. In this plan the effect of undue length is avoided by curving the ends. This curvature at the end opposite the stage also permits the rounded corners in the lobbies, for the purpose already noted. The shape is that of the hall of the Conservatory at Paris, admitted by all who have had opportunities to study the matter to be the best concert hall in the world in its acoustics, the paramount problem in a room devoted to diversions and delights for the ear. The floor of the hall should be on an incline and there should be an abundance of doors opening from the lobbies, as indicated.

The spaces set apart for stores give a depth of thirty-five feet on Huntington avenue and of fifty feet on West Chester Park, less, in each instance, the thickness of the several walls on the exterior and intervening. These calculations are based on the reported dimensions of the lot of land—150 by 225 feet. In the second story on the West Chester Park side there will be room for an apartment that can be used for choral rehearsals and chamber concerts. The remainder of the buildings outside of the space consumed for the hall and dependencies can be devoted to various business purposes or can be fitted for teaching.

There is no purpose on the part of the COURIER to dictate to the gentlemen who have the new venture in charge. The only motive is to suggest a practicable disposition of the lot of land on which the new hall will be built, a disposition that shall be for the best interest of the art that is to be fostered here and of the stockholders as well. A hundred modifications can be made in this plan but the general thought is worthy of careful consideration by those who are capable of thinking for themselves and are not readily persuaded by a plausible manner or dazed by a model that happens to have a brilliant appearance, but which is devised without regard for the essential elements of a concert hall. If the model that has been so widely discussed—always unfavorably by those who through experience or trained observation have a knowledge of the requirements of a music hall—had come from an architect who had already been successful in the construction of an apartment for a similar purpose, there might be some reason in hesitating to criticise; but there is no reason in accepting it as the only model that can be followed.

[92]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 26, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday presented a rather conservative programme, with nothing of the modern school to contrast with the classical numbers of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Next Saturday the moderns will have their innings, and Liszt and Berlioz will rule.

One can cordially coincide with the readings of the old masters which Mr. Paur gave at this concert; Handel was not made prosy nor Haydn childishly simple. The Concerto Grosso began with an overture in the old form established by Lulli, having two movements of contrasted style, the first simple and slow, the second rapid and contrapuntally developed. Through this work and in the Haydn symphony which came later on the programme, the conductor showed plainly that he understood the moderate and conservative manner in which the terms of Tempo were used in the classical epoch. The allegro movements were made allegro giusto, the slow ones were not given in the extreme adagio which is in vogue at present. The strings played with fine shading and absolute clearness in the concerto; this department of our orchestra is equal to any organization of its kind in the world and is now regaining something of that precision which was blurred for a season. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist of the concert and sang like the cultured musician that he is; there no mellower bass voices in existence, but one could never hear a clearer, better phrased performance than was given of Handel's "Honor and Arms." After all, one may set against the old Italian saying that three things are necessary to make a singer,—"first, voice, second, voice, and third, voice," the fact that one would rather hear a great art st on a lesser instrument than a weak artist on a better one. The timbre of the voice in "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen" from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" was not that of an Edouard de Reszke, but the number was effective in a superlative degree. Many recalls were given to Mr. Heinrich, and the enthusiasm was justified.

The Haydn symphony (Breitkopf & Haertel ed. No. 2, D major) was something to praise unstintedly. There was sufficient caprice in the Minuet, there was sturdiness and vigor in the finale with its Drone bass, there was fiery treatment in the Allegro. Such a performance must have been a lesson to those who find only formality and periwigs in the early symphonies. The ensemble was excellent throughout and the work received appreciative applause.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture gave a dramatic tinge to the concert without being formless or vague, or indulging in modern musical hysterics. Great brilliancy characterized the performance. The work is one that Beethoven wrote with enthusiasm, for he was the red republican among composers. Liberty was his religion, and this was the keynote of the heroic symphony, the finale of the ninth symphony and the "Egmont" overture. There had been no Motley to show that Egmont was not a great hero, there had been no calm abolition of Claerchen and the love episode, so that Goethe's picture stood for Love and Heroism, and the overture reflected that picture. Right fiercely did the piccolo and flute gi ve the representation of the uprising of the Dutch people, and those wonderful whipsnap phrases of the final cadences were forcible enough (they are probably the most charscteristic notes ever written for the piccolo), while the entire second portion of the work was massive and energetic as heart could wish. A noble ending of a most worthy concert. LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 56.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A singularly monotonous programme excellently performed states concisely the facts regarding the 16th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given under Emil Paur's direction, at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, was the soloist, and the selections were: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor; Handel's aria, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson," act 2, scene 4; Haydn's Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 2); Mozart's aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," act 1, scene 3, and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," in F minor, Op. 84.

All compositions demand a contrast to be fully enjoyed, when included in a concert programme, and the striking similarity in style in these several numbers made the concert less interesting than many others of the season.

The singing of Mr. Heinrich was even more enjoyable than usual, under the circumstances, and he has seldom gained a greater vocal triumph than on this occasion. The great Handel aria was delivered in magnificent style, the singer's phrasing of the number showing a consummate mastery of the composer's style, and his voice responded to the demands of the aria with telling effect. His grand vocal work aroused the enthusiasm of the audience so that repeated recalls rewarded the singer. The Beethoven aria was an equally successful effort, and its character was fully realized in the interpretation given it by Mr. Heinrich.

Handel's concerto displayed the work of the string players of the band to excellent advantage, and the merits of this section of the orchestra have not been more apparent in any of the season's concerts. Mr. Paur's reading of the Haydn symphony was full of interesting characteristics, and the men of the orchestra gave their best work in bringing out his ideas of the several movements. A most impressive performance of the great "Egmont" overture ended the programme in a way to leave a most favorable impression of the evening's work despite the character and make-up of the programme. Next Saturday selections are Berlioz' symphony fantastique; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Glinka's Kamarinskaja, a fantasie for orchestra on two Russian folk songs, and Glinka's overture from the opera "Russlan et Ludmilla."

Boston Herald.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1894.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Were the men of the last century another race, such as might inhabit another planet, that they spoke in music with such confidence and such serenity? Their lives were often vexed and troubled; they knew passion and poverty; they were not averse to the sweet sex, and poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue that, knowing Xantipre, began with Socrates and will not end with your estimable friend Brown. They hung on prince's favors; nor were the times always of piping peace. But their music has not the vague restlessness of this tired and dying century; it is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gayety is not haunted with the thought of death; the music might have come down to us from the childhood of the world. Handel, Mozart, Haydn knew full well the art of art, which is simplicity. Furthermore, they were masters of their trade.

Was not such music, finely played under Mr. Paur's direction, a delight? Yes, and no. However much the man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the musical spirit and knowledge of the makers, the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and he finds himself longing for the musical atmosphere that is surcharged with dissonances which fret his nerves and irritate. The poultice has done its work; he would fain apply a blister. He would like to listen to wails and groans, threats and imprecations, blatant defiance and even blasphemy itself, with alternating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or the promise of happiness. For such music is more in keeping with the spirit of this age. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

* * *

Mr. Max Heinrich sang Osmin's air with dramatic intelligence and made thereby a marked effect. He was not as successful in the familiar air by Handel, although he sang it with spirit. When did the custom of singing this air in a broken, spasmodic, jerky manner first come upon the stage? For surely in Handel's day the roulades were sung smoothly and with great volubility, as any other roulade. The modern practice in mistaken realism. And as for realism, it is not likely that Harapha, the giant of Philistia, could sing roulades at all.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1894

Perfectly balanced was the Fourteenth Symphony Concert. In the line of the old, there was Beethoven's wonderful Eighth Symphony, with its metronomic rhythm. In the line of popularity were two ballet numbers from Rubinstein's Feramors. In the modern classic line we had, for the first time, Eugen D'Albert's op. 8, written for Grillparzer's Esther. In the line of locality was, also for the first time, a work by C. M. Loeffler, which he calls a Fantastic Concerto, in D, for full orchestra and cello. The composer was at his customary violin place, where he could easily rise to receive deserved applause, the solo part being sustained by Schroeder. The five parts, including the Russian theme in the fourth (allegretto) were given without pause between. Some of this music is Oriental in character, and all of it most enjoyable, especially a long harp passage. The program has wisely dropped the phrase "wooden wind instruments" and returned to "wood-wind."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1894.

THE SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY.

A Selection of Numbers from Works of Old Masters.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall Saturday evening, presented the following programme:

Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Aria, Honor and Arms, from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D minor, No. 2.....Haydn
Aria from "The Elopement from the Seraglio".....Mozart
Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven

Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist.

It will be seen that this programme is a selection of numbers from the works of the older masters, arranged in a somewhat chronological order. It seems to be Mr. Paur's plan to not mix the sheep and goats, the ancient and modern, in his arrangement of programmes.

Now this preservation of unity as regards chronologic arrangement is all very well if scope enough is given to the periods of time, but to restrict it to the limit of what is really the same school in musical composition admits of much doubt as regards its advisability. The fact is, to the eclectic musician and the advanced listener such a programme as that of Saturday evening is monotonous in its effect, however well it may be performed, and undoubtedly a majority of the patrons of the symphony concerts would much prefer a happy contrasting of the older and newer schools of orchestral music. Theodore Thomas's programmes are a model in this direction, and Mr. Paur could profitably study Conductor Thomas's ideas in this respect.

The Handel suite, which, in the score, is almost barren of indicated dynamics, was finely read by Mr. Paur and perfectly played by the orchestra under his decided and intelligent conducting.

The Haydn symphony was also played with delicacy and generally good precision. The effect of the andante, however, was not improved by the acutely staccato playing of the third and fourth eights of the measures that occur so often. The notes are marked half staccato, probably, merely to indicate that they must not be dragged togther. Mr. Paur had them played a full staccato, thereby giving a jerky effect to passages that should be only defined, not sharply marked, in the execution. Wonderful to relate, twice during the performance of this andante, the always perfect unity of the first violins was marred by some careless player coming in before the time.

It is an accepted fact now that whatever of Beethoven is offered it will be superbly read by Mr. Paur, and the "Egmont" overture was no exception to this rule. The climax towards the end was wonderfully powerful in its effect. The drummer is still too much in evidence at times, although the violence of his efforts has been somewhat modified of late. His drums, however, are still as badly out of tune as ever.

The coarseness and vulgarity of performance that Nikisch engrafted upon the orchestra is fast disappearing. In fact, it is well nigh eliminated through the refinement and sensitiveness of Mr. Paur's musical feeling and the careful and exacting discipline he has instituted. The playing of this programme of older works was an evidence of this great improvement.

Mr. Max Heinrich in his efforts shows that he is a musician of fine qualities, but one can disagree with his jerky manner of executing the roulade passages in the Handel aria. He sang the Mozart number with admirable spirit and dramatic delineation. He has not, however, a voice of mellifluous quality; on the contrary, it is dry in tone and was often produced in a "throaty" manner. He was well received and enthusiastically applauded, being recalled several times after singing the Mozart aria.

The programme for next Saturday evening will be: Symphony Fantastique; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Komarinskaja, fantasie for orchestra, Glinka; overture to the opera, "Russlau et Ludmilla," Glinka. Quite a long step from the character of the programme of last Saturday's concert.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Handel: Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Air, "Honor and arms," from Samson," Act ii., scene 4.
Haydn: Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel edition, No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," act i., scene 3.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, op. 84.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

Mr. Paur could hardly have selected five pieces that, considered in the lump, would make up a programme in more violent contrast with that of the preceding concert. It was just such a programme as would suit those eminently conservative gentlemen who hold that the development of music stopped in the first quarter of the century and that all since then has been as so much over-ripening, not to say rottenness. Two numbers were unfamiliar to nine-tenths of the hearers—the Handel concerto and the Mozart aria—but each was so entirely in the style of its author that one might easily persuade himself into the belief that he had heard it hundreds of times. The series of movements by Handel, for instance, starts off with a vivid reminder of the opening measures of the overture to "The Messiah," while the aria from Mozart's early opera sounds for all the world as if it were a bit from Figaro's part in that wonderful opera built on the story of the wedding of Beaumarchais's incomparable valet-de-chambre. On the whole the concert may be characterized as reposeful, with no intention to use the term as a euphemism for soporific. Nevertheless, but for the splendid work of the orchestra, or rather its string contingents, the concerto might have set some heads to nodding—and no wonder, with four succeeding movements in one key, and that a minor, even if there is a major for the close.

Mr. Heinrich sang with care and judgment, but was not always happy in his execution of the Handel roulades. The buffo aria was better fitted to the singer's voice and manner. The audience testified to a satisfaction with his efforts by hearty recalls.

This is the programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday night: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Glinka, "Komarinskaja" and overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla."

The Musical Courier.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1894.

The program of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Händel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Händel
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

The makers of music in the eighteenth century were not free from the insect vexations, the burdens of everyday life. They often hung on princes' favors; nor were the times always those of piping peace. They knew the chills and the sweats of passion. Poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue of men that knew and know Xantippe, from Socrates to your neighbor Jones, or Brown, or Robinson. Haydn also knew the charms of Luigia Moreschi Polzelli, the mezzo-soprano; Mrs. Shaw divided with Mrs. Hodges the honor of being "the most beautiful woman he ever saw;" and we may read to-day the amorous words that told of the heart flutters of Mistress Schroeter, 6 James street, Buckingham Gate.

But the men of the last century spoke in music with a confidence and a serenity unknown to us. Their music has not the restlessness of the last years of this dying century. Their music is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gaiety is not haunted by the thought and the shudder of death.

Was not, then, such music well played under Mr. Paur's direction a relief and a delight? Yes, and then again, No. The man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the spirit and the knowledge of the makers; but the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and the man longs for dissonances that fret the nerves, irritate and stab. He would fain hear groans and imprecations, threats, yea, blasphemy itself, with alternating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or vague hints at happiness. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang "Osmin's" air with dramatic intelligence, and made thereby a marked effect. I did not care for his version of "Honor and Arms." He sang it with over accentuation in the roulades, often spasmodically and without any thought of a possible legato. I admit that such a performance of this air is the fashion to-day. But surely in Händel's time the roulades were sung smoothly, nor was there any thought of mistaken realism. As for the realism, it is not probable that Harapha, the Philistine giant, sang roulades at all.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert this week will be as follows:

Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
"Kamarinskaja".....Glinka
Overture from the opera, "Russlan et Ludmilla".....Glinka
(First time.)

PHILIP HALE.

[93]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 26, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday presented a rather conservative programme, with nothing of the modern school to contrast with the classical numbers of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Next Saturday the moderns will have their innings, and Liszt and Berlioz will rule.

One can cordially coincide with the readings of the old masters which Mr. Paur gave at this concert; Handel was not made prosy nor Haydn childishly simple. The Concerto Grosso began with an overture in the old form established by Lulli, having two movements of contrasted style, the first simple and slow, the second rapid and contrapuntally developed. Through this work and in the Haydn symphony which came later on the programme, the conductor showed plainly that he understood the moderate and conservative manner in which the terms of Tempo were used in the classical epoch. The allegro movements were made allegro giusto, the slow ones were not given in the extreme adagio which is in vogue at present. The strings played with fine shading and absolute clearness in the concerto; this department of our orchestra is equal to any organization of its kind in the world and is now regaining something of that precision which was blurred for a season. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist of the concert and sang like the cultured musician that he is; there no mellower bass voices in existence, but one could never hear a clearer, better phrased performance than was given of Handel's "Honor and Arms." After all, one may set against the old Italian saying that three things are necessary to make a singer,—"first, voice, second, voice, and third, voice," the fact that one would rather hear a great artist on a lesser instrument than a weak artist on a better one. The timbre of the voice in "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen" from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" was not that of an Edouard de Reszke, but the number was effective in a superlative degree. Many recalls were given to Mr. Heinrich, and the enthusiasm was justified.

The Haydn symphony (Breitkopf & Haertel ed. No. 2, D major) was something to praise unstintedly. There was sufficient caprice in the Minuet, there was sturdiness and vigor in the finale with its Drone bass, there was fiery treatment in the Allegro. Such a performance must have been a lesson to those who find only formality and periwigs in the early symphonies. The ensemble was excellent throughout and the work received appreciative applause.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture gave a dramatic tinge to the concert without being formless or vague, or indulging in modern musical hysterics. Great brilliancy characterized the performance. The work is one that Beethoven wrote with enthusiasm, for he was the red republican among composers. Liberty was his religion, and this was the keynote of the heroic symphony, the finale of the ninth symphony and the "Egmont" overture. There had been no Motley to show that Egmont was not a great hero, there had been no calm abolition of Claerchen and the love episode, so that Goethe's picture stood for Love and Heroism, and the overture reflected that picture. Right fiercely did the piccolo and flute give the representation of the uprising of the Dutch people, and those wonderful whipsnap phrases of the final cadences were forcible enough (they are probably the most characteristic notes ever written for the piccolo), while the entire second portion of the work was massive and energetic as heart could wish. A noble ending of a most worthy concert. LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 56.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A singularly monotonous programme excellently performed states concisely the facts regarding the 16th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given under Emil Paur's direction, at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, was the soloist, and the selections were: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor; Handel's aria, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson," act 2, scene 4; Haydn's Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 2); Mozart's aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail," act 1, scene 3, and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," in F minor, Op. 84.

All compositions demand a contrast to be fully enjoyed, when included in a concert programme, and the striking similarity in style in these several numbers made the concert less interesting than many others of the season.

The singing of Mr. Heinrich was even more enjoyable than usual, under the circumstances, and he has seldom gained a greater vocal triumph than on this occasion. The great Handel aria was delivered in magnificent style, the singer's phrasing of the number showing a consummate mastery of the composer's style, and his voice responded to the demands of the aria with telling effect. His grand vocal work aroused the enthusiasm of the audience so that repeated recalls rewarded the singer. The Beethoven aria was an equally successful effort, and its character was fully realized in the interpretation given it by Mr. Heinrich.

Handel's concerto displayed the work of the string players of the band to excellent advantage, and the merits of this section of the orchestra have not been more apparent in any of the season's concerts. Mr. Paur's reading of the Haydn symphony was full of interesting characteristics, and the men of the orchestra gave their best work in bringing out his ideas of the several movements. A most impressive performance of the great "Egmont" overture ended the programme in a way to leave a most favorable impression of the evening's work despite the character and make-up of the programme. Next Saturday selections are Berlioz' symphony fantastique; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Glinka's Komarinskaja, a fantasie for orchestra on two Russian folk songs, and Glinka's overture from the opera "Russlan et Ludmilla."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1894.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Were the men of the last century another race, such as might inhabit another planet, that they spoke in music with such confidence and such serenity? Their lives were often vexed and troubled; they knew passion and poverty; they were not averse to the sweet sex, and poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue that, knowing Xantipre, began with Socrates and will not end with your estimable friend Brown. They hung on prince's favors; nor were the times always of piping peace. But their music has not the vague restlessness of this tired and dying century; it is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gayety is not haunted with the thought of death; the music might have come down to us from the childhood of the world. Handel, Mozart, Haydn knew full well the art of art, which is simplicity. Furthermore, they were masters of their trade.

Was not such music, finely played under Mr. Paur's direction, a delight? Yes, and no. However much the man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the musical spirit and knowledge of the makers, the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and he finds himself longing for the musical atmosphere that is surcharged with dissonances which fret his nerves and irritate. The poultice has done its work; he would fain apply a blister. He would like to listen to wails and groans, threats and imprecations, blatant defiance and even blasphemy itself, with alternating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or the promise of happiness. For such music is more in keeping with the spirit of this age. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

* * *

Mr. Max Heinrich sang Osmin's air with dramatic intelligence and made thereby a marked effect. He was not as successful in the familiar air by Handel, although he sang it with spirit. When did the custom of singing this air in a broken, spasmodic, jerky manner first come upon the stage? For surely in Handel's day the roulades were sung smoothly and with great volubility, as any other roulade. The modern practice in mistaken realism. And as for realism, it is not likely that Harapha, the giant of Philistia, could sing roulades at all.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1894

Perfectly balanced was the Fourteenth Symphony Concert. In the line of the old, there was Beethoven's wonderful Eighth Symphony, with its metronomic rhythm. In the line of popularity were two ballet numbers from Rubinstein's Feramors. In the modern classic line we had, for the first time, Eugen D'Albert's op. 8, written for Grillparzer's Esther. In the line of locality was, also for the first time, a work by C. M. Loeffler, which he calls a Fantastic Concerto, in D, for full orchestra and cello. The composer was at his customary violin place, where he could easily rise to receive deserved applause, the solo part being sustained by Schroeder. The five parts, including the Russian theme in the fourth (allegretto) were given without pause between. Some of this music is Oriental in character, and all of it most enjoyable, especially a long harp passage. The program has wisely dropped the phrase "wooden wind instruments" and returned to "wood-wind."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1894.

THE SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY.

A Selection of Numbers from Works of Old Masters.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall Saturday evening, presented the following programme:

Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Aria, Honor and Arms, from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D minor, No. 2.....Haydn
Aria from "The Elopement from the Seraglio".....Mozart
Overture to Egmont.....Beethoven

Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist.

It will be seen that this programme is a selection of numbers from the works of the older masters, arranged in a somewhat chronological order. It seems to be Mr. Paur's plan to not mix the sheep and goats, the ancient and modern, in his arrangement of programmes.

Now this preservation of unity as regards chronologic arrangement is all very well if scope enough is given to the periods of time, but to restrict it to the limit of what is really the same school in musical composition admits of much doubt as regards its advisability. The fact is, to the eclectic musician and the advanced listener such a programme as that of Saturday evening is monotonous in its effect, however well it may be performed, and undoubtedly a majority of the patrons of the symphony concerts would much prefer a happy contrasting of the older and newer schools of orchestral music. Theodore Thomas's programmes are a model in this direction, and Mr. Paur could profitably study Conductor Thomas's ideas in this respect.

The Handel suite, which, in the score, is almost barren of indicated dynamics, was finely read by Mr. Paur and perfectly played by the orchestra under his decided and intelligent conducting.

The Haydn symphony was also played with delicacy and generally good precision. The effect of the andante, however, was not improved by the acutely staccato playing of the third and fourth eights of the measures that occur so often. The notes are marked half staccato, probably, merely to indicate that they must not be dragged togther. Mr. Paur had them played a full staccato, thereby giving a jerky effect to passages that should be only defined, not sharply marked, in the execution. Wonderful to relate, twice during the performance of this andante, the always perfect unity of the first violins was marred by some careless player coming in before the time.

It is an accepted fact now that whatever of Beethoven is offered it will be superbly read by Mr. Paur, and the "Egmont" overture was no exception to this rule. The climax towards the end was wonderfully powerful in its effect. The drummer is still too much in evidence at times, although the violence of his efforts has been somewhat modified of late. His drums, however, are still as badly out of tune as ever.

The coarseness and vulgarity of performance that Nikisch engrafted upon the orchestra is fast disappearing. In fact, it is well nigh eliminated through the refinement and sensitiveness of Mr. Paur's musical feeling and the careful and exacting discipline he has instituted. The playing of this programme of older works was an evidence of this great improvement.

Mr. Max Heinrich in his efforts shows that he is a musician of fine qualities, but one can disagree with his jerky manner of executing the roulade passages in the Handel aria. He sang the Mozart number with admirable spirit and dramatic delineation. He has not, however, a voice of mellifuous quality; on the contrary, it is dry in tone and was often produced in a "throaty" manner. He was well received and enthusiastically applauded, being recalled several times after singing the Mozart aria.

The programme for next Saturday evening will be: Symphony Fantastique; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Komarinskaja, fantasie for orchestra, Glinka; overture to the opera "Russlau et Ludmilla," Glinka. Quite a long step from the character of the programme of last Saturday's concert.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Handel: Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Air, "Honor and arms," from Samson," Act ii., scene 4.
Haydn: Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel edition, No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," act 1., scene 3.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, op. 84.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

Mr. Paur could hardly have selected five pieces that, considered in the lump, would make up a programme in more violent contrast with that of the preceding concert. It was just such a programme as would suit those eminently conservative gentlemen who hold that the development of music stopped in the first quarter of the century and that all since then has been as so much over-ripening, not to say rottenness. Two numbers were unfamiliar to nine-tenths of the hearers—the Handel concerto and the Mozart aria—but each was so entirely in the style of its author that one might easily persuade himself into the belief that he had heard it hundreds of times. The series of movements by Handel, for instance, starts off with a vivid reminder of the opening measures of the overture to "The Messiah," while the aria from Mozart's early opera sounds for all the world as if it were a bit from Figaro's part in that wonderful opera built on the story of the wedding of Beaumarchais's incomparable valet-de-chambre. On the whole the concert may be characterized as reposeful, with no intention to use the term as a euphemism for soporific. Nevertheless, but for the splendid work of the orchestra, or rather its string contingents, the concerto might have set some heads to nodding—and no wonder, with four succeeding movements in one key, and that a minor, even if there is a major for the close.

Mr. Heinrich sang with care and judgment, but was not always happy in his execution of the Handel roulades. The buffo aria was better fitted to the singer's voice and manner. The audience testified to a satisfaction with his efforts by hearty recalls.

This is the programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday night: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Glinka, "Komarinskaja" and overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla."

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1894.

The program of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Händel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Händel
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

The makers of music in the eighteenth century were not free from the insect vexations, the burdens of everyday life. They often hung on princes' favors; nor were the times always those of piping peace. They knew the chills and the sweats of passion. Poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue of men that knew and know Xantippe, from Socrates to your neighbor Jones, or Brown, or Robinson. Haydn also knew the charms of Luigia Moreschi Polzelli, the mezzo-soprano; Mrs. Shaw divided with Mrs. Hodges the honor of being "the most beautiful woman he ever saw;" and we may read to-day the amorous words that told of the heart flutters of Mistress Schroeter, 6 James street, Buckingham Gate.

But the men of the last century spoke in music with a confidence and a serenity unknown to us. Their music has not the restlessness of the last years of this dying century. Their music is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gaiety is not haunted by the thought and the shudder of death.

Was not, then, such music well played under Mr. Paur's direction a relief and a delight? Yes, and then again, No. The man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the spirit and the knowledge of the makers; but the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and the man longs for dissonances that fret the nerves, irritate and stab. He would fain hear groans and imprecations, threats, yea, blasphemy itself, with alternating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or vague hints at happiness. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang "Osmin's" air with dramatic intelligence, and made thereby a marked effect. I did not care for his version of "Honor and Arms." He sang it with over accentuation in the roulades, often spasmodically and without any thought of a possible legato. I admit that such a performance of this air is the fashion to-day. But surely in Händel's time the roulades were sung smoothly, nor was there any thought of mistaken realism. As for the realism, it is not probable that Harapha, the Philistine giant, sang roulades at all.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert this week will be as follows:

Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
"Kamarinskaja".....Glinka
Overture from the opera, "Russlan et Ludmilla".....Glinka
(First time.)

PHILIP HALE.

[93]

FADED TEXT

[illegible] JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Programme of Unusual Brilliancy Executed in Matchless Style.

The fifth concert of the Boston Orchestra took place last evening at Infantry Hall. A programme of exceptional brilliancy was offered, and the playing was marked with a dash and fire unusual even with this first of orchestras. Another feature not seen at every concert was the remarkable performance of Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, the solo pianist, who gave such a display of astounding virtuosity, tempered with artistic feeling, as has seldom been heard in this city. Four recalls after each appearance testified to the genuine enthusiasm evoked by his marvellous playing. The programme follows:

Brahms....Akademische Fest-Ouverture, in C-minor, Op. 80

Karl Maria von Weber, Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F-minor, Op. 79
I. Larghetto affettuoso (F-minor).
Allegro passionato (F-minor).
II. Tempo di Marcia (C-major).
III. Presto giojoso (F-major).

Robert Schumann.....Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, Op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D-minor). Lebhaft (D-minor).
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A-minor).
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D-minor). Trio (B-flat major).
IV. Langsam (D-minor). Lebhaft (D-major).

Franz Liszt.....Spanish Rhapsody (Rearranged as a concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni.)

Hector Berlioz.....Rakoczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24

Brahms, Weber, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz—these be names to conjure by in the world of music, and few indeed are those writ higher on the scroll of fame. If the programme had a fault, it was in lacking something quiet, something of a more sober color, to contrast with the gorgeous hues here displayed from beginning to end. But it was magnificent music.

The overture of Brahms's, which headed the list, is free from all reproach of diffuseness or over-profundity, and is as bright and sunny as a spring day. Every phrase is concisely and happily expressed, while the orchestral coloring is laid on with the brush of a master. And it is solid and massive withal, as becomes Brahms. Herr Paur conducted with evident appreciation, and the orchestra played it with superb élan and vigor.

Schumann's D Minor Symphony, though by no means the best of the four he wrote, is yet a pregnant and powerful work. The two middle movements are the most interesting to the listener, while the others are of equal interest to the student from their display of Schumann's tendency to mould his musical material without regard to set rules, and also of his fondness for certain peculiar orchestral combinations. There are two versions of this symphony, of which the second (and best) was the one played last night. The other strictly orchestral number—Berlioz's famous "Rakoczy" march—is a Hungarian national air dressed up with all Berlioz's wonderful skill in instrumentation, and made a brilliant ending to a stirring and powerful programme.

The two numbers in which Mr. Busoni elected to appear, while hardly of equal merit, both served to display his unusual abilities in an equal degree. Weber's "Concertstuck" is a trial piece in more senses than one—for any pianist who undertakes it. It presents great difficultics on the mere side of technique, and none the less does it call for sound musical taste and poetic feeling on the part of the performer. Mr. Busoni's performance can only be characterized as a remarkable one from either point of view. The spontaneous character of the greeting which he received at its close showed clearly that the audience appreciated fully the fact that they had been listening to a great artist. It is said that Mr. Busoni was recalled no less than ten times after playing this piece in Boston recently. Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," as arranged by Mr. Busoni for piano and orchestra, seems to have lost something of the Lisztian flavor. The orchestration seemed to be in the main effectively done, though rather fragmentary in spots. But enough remained of the piano part to afford room for such a display of virtuosity as one rarely listens to, and it met the same reward as his playing of the "Concertstuck." Mr. Busoni is a pleasant player to see as well as to hear. He does not make technical difficulties an excuse for platform gymnastics, but, like Paderewski, surmounts them with comparatively little apparent physical effort. He is unquestionably an artist of the very first rank.

A gap of over a month intervenes before the next (and last) Symphony concert for this season, and the lovers of the higher forms of music regretfully see the season drawing to a close. Whatever we may be favored with next time, the concert of last night will be remembered as not only one of the best of the series, but one of the best we have ever had.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1894.

The grand opera did not seem to have any effect on the attendance at the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last evening. The programme was a brilliant one, but poorly arranged, only the maghificent work of the orchestra saving it from being uninteresting. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony in C major, five movements, was a wild and weird but beautiful composition of the most romantic and dramatic order. It was rendered in a masterly manner and Mr. Paur was heartily applauded at the end of the fifth movement. Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus," seemed out of place following Berlioz's erotic work, and, while played in an exquisite style, the transition was too abrupt. The concert closed with Michail Ivanovitch Glinka's "Komarinskaja," and the overture to Ruszlan and Ludmilla in D major, by the same composer, the latter being given for the first time in Boston.

The rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will consist of Mozart's overture, "Marriage of Figaro." Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Mendelssohn's overture "Hebrides," and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1894.

Hector Berlioz' fantastic symphony in C major; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Glinka's Russian dance and overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," the latter for the first time here, was the program for the 17th symphony rehearsal and concert last week. The attendance was not up to the usual standard, probably on account of the great musical attractions elsewhere. Berlioz' composition, founded on incidents in his own life, tells the story of a young composer who, being unsuccessful in his love affairs, attempts to kill himself with a narcotic, which only throws him into a slumber, in which strange visions appear to him.

The magnificent precision and harmony in execution of the orchestra was splendidly illustrated in the fantastic work. The principal, and in reality the only theme in the first movement, a melody called by the composer, "The Fixed Idea," was charmingly played in unison by the violins and flutes, the two contingents blending perfectly. In the waltz movements of the second part the sensuous swing and rhythm of the dance music was perfectly preserved, the harp part adding greatly to the beautiful waltz melody.

The contrast in the third tone picture, which is distinctly pastoral, is marked, but built upon the traditional rural plan. Here Berlioz introduces extra kettle drums with telling effect, and the simulations of a thunder storm are very striking. In this movement all the rural "accessories" have a thematic significance, and the melodic theme of love, introduced with the first notes of the opening allegro, are skilfully interwoven at oft-occurring intervals.

The peculiarities in the orchestration were carefully observed by Mr Paur, who retained throughout a poetic interpretation which was not obscured by the realisms conceived by the composer. "The March to the Scaffold" was given with grand sonorousness and breadth of tone color, the gruesome themes by the bassoons being notably solemn and suggestive of the monks' prayers for a prisoner. The brasses lagged a little in some of the measures, but the number as a whole was finely played. Diabolism reigned in the closing movement as the composer scores it, and the manner in which the conductor held his forces together was very commendable for the temptation to a chaotic hurly-burly here is very great.

The symphony poem by Liszt was gracefully interpreted. The Russian songs and dances by Glinka is one of those compositions characteristic with so many writers educated in the land of the czar, and aside from its odd reiteration of a theme by the violins, played about 100 times, calls for no special commendation.

The overture by the same composer given for the first time here, is a well-conceived and admirably orchestrated composition. It is brilliant, and abounds in strong passage work for the violins which is exceedingly difficult. The strings accomplished their work magnificently with the themes in the fantasia, their playing being clear and brilliant, and the brass contingent redeemed itself by the excellence of its harmony and tempo in the concluding coda.

The program for the rehearsal and concert this week will be the overture from "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Mendelssohn's overture, "Hebrides," and a Schumann overture, scherzo and finale.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1894.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
Kamarinskaja.....Glinka
Overture, "Rousslan and Ludmila".....Glinka

After the fire and the fury, the red pepper and the fireworks of the operas of the week, the Symphony audience might well have been pleased with something cooling, something refreshing, something green. The program of the week before might well have served as an antidote. But here was a program of the wildly romantic school.

It is doubtful whether it is a good thing to present a program devoted exclusively to classical music (so-called) or exclusively to the romantic school. A judicious mixture of numbers that contrast is better calculated to fix the attention and even point a musical moral.

The great symphony of Berlioz totters constantly between the sublime and the ridiculous. There's no use denying its power, its imaginative spirit, its wonderful instrumentation; it is also useless to deny that there are dreary stretches in the work. How seldom do you find one large, beautiful, spontaneous theme in the works of Berlioz. His tunes are generally brought into the world by means of the Cæsarian operation. But the march to the scaffold could not have been written by anybody but the great Frenchman. Other portions of this symphony may pall or offend, but this number must be immortal for its tragic, unearthly, demoniac spirit.

Liszt's "Orpheus" reminds one of the legend that Orpheus, the first wandering giver of recitals in Thrace, was torn in pieces finally by the women who heard the concerts. Offenbach's treatment of the myth is not as pretentious; and it is a masterpiece of fun and jingle; but the wittiest lines of the librettist Hector Crémieux are dull saws compared with the solemn unconscious humor of Liszt's bifalutin preface to his music.

Glinka's delightful jig is always welcome. His overture to the opera that is now regarded by his countrymen as far more national than "A Life for the Czar" is theatre music; it is neither of special interest nor of such fine workmanship as to warrant its introduction on a Symphony concert stage. Any one of the better overtures of Auber or Rossini would be more becoming to such an occasion.

The program of next Saturday's concert will be as follows: Mozart's Overture, "Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven's Symphony No. 4; Mendelssohn's Overture, "Hebrides;" Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1894.

If Mr. Paur's sixteenth programme was all conservative, his seventeenth, played last night, was thoroughly modern, and gave the best of chances for seeing how this conductor—charged at first with being a man of wood and a pedant—could yield to the influences of Berlioz, Liszt and Glinka, and play them as if his soul were in the rendering. It is safe to declare that such a superb presentation of the "Fantastic" symphony is rarely heard anywhere, and has never been heard in Boston. The orchestra was magnified, according to Berlioz's wishes, if not to his full demands. There were the four trumpets, the four bassoons, the squeaking rough little clarinets, the four kettle drums, the opheiclide, the harp, the bells of the chime, the gong and all the rest. And this little army Mr. Paur led with enthusiasm and energy to triumph, the extra men following his lead with the readiness of his elder troops. As orchestral virtuosity, the performance was superb; and as romance, legend, vision and passion in music it was almost wonderful. Master of moods no less than of the mysteries of orchestration, Berlioz would surely have applauded this reading, with its tender grace, its devotion, its terrors, its awe and its diabolism and effrontery. The symphony, which is more than an hour long, played with the intensity which the men threw into their work, would have almost made a concert of itself; but Mr. Paur had three numbers to append. These were, the generally placid and pleasant "Orpheus" idyl of Liszt, the merry, buoyant "Komarinskaja" of Glinka and the same author's overture to his "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," a brief but tremendously animated composition, which was played (especially by the violins) with a dash and a brilliancy such as have not been heard before since Mr. Gericke's palmy time. Through all the programme the men played with remarkable spirit, vigor and enjoyment, to which the audience responded quickly and warmly.

For next Saturday this is the array:—Beethoven's fourth symphony and two overtures—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Mendelssohn's "Hebrides," followed by the Overture, Scherzo and Finale of Schumann.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 4.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert last night, in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Symphonie Fantastique, op 14, Berlioz; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus," Liszt; "Komarinskaja," Glinka; Overture "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," Glinka. The symphony is growing aged, despite the many fine things in it, though the march remains as strong and impressive as ever, and the beauty of the "Scene in the fields" is still fresh. Dazzled no longer by the brilliancy of Berlioz's orchestration, which now seems extremely old fashioned in comparison with that of Leoncavallo in "Il Pagliacci," one can easily see how much the work is padded. It was finely interpreted by Mr. Paur, and with a clearness that left nothing in doubt, or to be wished for. The "Orpheus" is, as it always was, pretentious, without any compensating musical results of value, for the labor expended on it. As it seems to us, it is an excellent provocative to somnolency. It was beautifully read and played, nevertheless. The Glinka "Komarinskaja" is quaintly piquant, and inspiriting in the hearing, and is scored effectively, if coarsely. The overture does not rise above the conventional theatre overture, except in its ambitious and not always felicitous flights into imitative counterpoint; but it is tuneful. It was played, especially by the strings, with great brilliancy. Still there are overtures by Auber and Rossini that are far more worth listening to. The selections for the next concert are: Overture, "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Schumann.

Sonnabend, den 3. März 1894.

Redakteur: EMIL JASPER.

Das fünfte und vorletzte Concert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters fand gestern Abend statt und trat in diesem Concert ein Klavierspieler und zwar Herr F. B. Busoni als Solist auf, zu welcher Wahl sich wohl Herr Ellis, der Manager der Concerte, durch die kritischen und nicht sehr schmeichelhaften Bemerkungen in den hiesigen täglichen Zeitungen, daß man nicht nur immer Orchestermitglieder als Solisten hören will, veranlaßt gesehen hat. Das Orchester unter Paur's Leitung war sicher und taktfest und zeigte sich von der besten Seite. —

The Musical and Dramatic World.

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, MARCH 3, 1894.

BOSTON LETTER.

The Symphony Concert programme on Friday, February 16, and Saturday, February 17, was of excellent parts. It included Brahms' D major symphony, Max Bruch's romanza for violin and orchestra (in A minor), Saint-Saëns' concert piece for violin with orchestra (in E minor), Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt" overture, and Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" humoresque.

Mr. Paur never works you up to any great pitch of enthusiasm in his reading of Brahms, but there is much dignity and a good balance of power in all he does, which is far more wholesome than brilliancy without his good points.

The adagio was beautifully played. The contrapuntal passage-work clearly defined, and with grace, too. The fourth movement, a brilliant rondo upon four themes, with an unmistakable Hungarian character, was carried through with brilliancy and dash.

The Bruch romanza for violin and orchestra did not impress me as equal to his famous concerto in G minor, although it is more finished in some respects. The Saint-Saëns piece, however, is one of the best of that clever writer's compositions.

There is evident maturity in the material and treatment of the Hartmann overture, but it is reminiscent. It has dignity and point. The Rubinstein humoresque, "Don Quixote," is a clever but eccentric work.

Mr. Loeffler played the solos allotted to him with consummate grace and finish.

On Monday evening, at Chickering Hall, we had another concert by the Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo. The ensemble was more satisfactory than at the previous concert.

The programme included Arthur Foote's quartette in E major, Beethoven's quartette in C major, and Raff's piano trio in G major.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 63.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

With the devil at one end of the town and duty at the other the musical public of Boston had a severe test of its loyalty to its pet home institution last evening.

It is gratifying to say, however, that despite the blandishments of even such a magnificent representative of his satanic majesty as Edouard de Reszke duty prevailed, and Music Hall was as densely filled with the symphony patrons as usual.

A glance at the programme justifies a strong suspicion that Mr. Emil Paur appreciated the situation, and prepared as strong a counter attraction as was possible by the use of all the modern orchestral forces placed at his command.

He began his programme with the fantastic symphony by Berlioz, and he gave such a performance of this work as has seldom, if ever, been heard here before. The demands of the composer were very nearly met, and little short of a hundred musicians were called together for the occasion. Mr. Paur's reading of this most remarkable composition was one that would have delighted even its composer, for it is difficult to imagine a better interpretation of its several fascinating movements. The reveries with which the symphony opens were played in a delightful fashion, and all the varying emotions through which the sleeper is supposed to pass were given with exquisite effect. The men of the band were entirely under the control of the conductor's baton, and the effects of the many charming combinations of instruments were wonderfully pleasing. In the second movement the love valse was performed with a swing and rhythm that was indicative of a perfect mastery of this class of compositions by the conductor, and the tone picture of the movement was realized in the happiest fashion. The scene in the fields following was brought out in fine contrast with the preceding movement, and the great march to the scaffold was played with stupendous effect. In the final movement, in which the revels of the Walpurgis night are pictured, the marvellous work of the composer was realized in the fullest degree, and if anything more fascinating in the way of tone pictures is to be experienced in the lower regions of the future, that place will have a strong attraction for those who listened to last night's performance of this symphony. The audience was carried from one state of excitement to another, and left in a condition of semi-delirium as the final movement was ended.

Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus" was the next composition and the poetical ideas which are so beautifully expressed in it were made distinctly prominent throughout its reading by Mr. Paur. The odd "Komarinskaja" by Glinka was then given a fine performance, and the programme was ended with the same composer's overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," which had its first performance here on this occasion. A more tuneful and brilliant ending to this decidedly remarkable programme could hardly have been chosen, and it left the audience entirely satisfied with having followed the general rule and attended to the symphony like good Boston citizens as they were.

Next Saturday night's programme has Beethoven's fourth symphony, "The Hebrides" and "Marriage of Figaro" overtures and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale as its number.

[94]

FADED TEXT

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Programme of Unusual Brilliancy Executed in Matchless Style.

The fifth concert of the Boston Orchestra took place last evening at Infantry Hall. A programme of exceptional brilliancy was offered, and the playing was marked with a dash and fire unusual even with this first of orchestras. Another feature not seen at every concert was the remarkable performance of Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, the solo pianist, who gave such a display of astounding virtuosity, tempered with artistic feeling, as has seldom been heard in this city. Four recalls after each appearance testified to the genuine enthusiasm evoked by his marvellous playing. The programme follows:

Brahms....Akademische Fest-Ouverture, in .....C-minor, Op. 80
Karl Maria von Weber, Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F-minor, Op. 79
I. Larghetto affettuoso (F-minor).
Allegro passionato (F-minor).
II. Tempo di Marcia (C-major).
III. Presto giojoso (F-major).
Robert Schumann.....
.....Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, Op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D-minor).
Lebhaft (D-minor).
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A-minor).
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D-minor).
Trio (B-flat major).
IV. Langsam (D-minor).
Lebhaft (D-major).
Franz Liszt.....Spanish Rhapsody
(Rearranged as a concert piece for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni.)
Hector Berlioz.....Rakoczy March, from .....“The Damnation of Faust,” Op. 24

Brahms, Weber, Schumann, Liszt, Berlioz—these be names to conjure by in the world of music, and few indeed are those writ higher on the scroll of fame. If the programme had a fault, it was in lacking something quiet, something of a more sober color, to contrast with the gorgeous hues here displayed from beginning to end. But it was magnificent music.

The overture of Brahms's, which headed the list, is free from all reproach of diffuseness or over-profundity, and is as bright and sunny as a spring day. Every phrase is concisely and happily expressed, while the orchestral coloring is laid on with the brush of a master. And it is solid and massive withal, as becomes Brahms. Herr Paur conducted with evident appreciation, and the orchestra played it with superb elan and vigor.

Schumann's D Minor Symphony, though by no means the best of the four he wrote, is yet a pregnant and powerful work. The two middle movements are the most interesting to the listener, while the others are of equal interest to the student from their display of Schumann's tendency to mould his musical material without regard to set rules, and also of his fondness for certain peculiar orchestral combinations. There are two versions of this symphony, of which the second (and best) was the one played last night. The other strictly orchestral number—Berlioz's famous “Rakoczy” march—is a Hungarian national air dressed up with all Berlioz's wonderful skill in instrumentation, and made a brilliant ending to a stirring and powerful programme.

The two numbers in which Mr. Busoni elected to appear, while hardly of equal merit, both served to display his unusual abilities in an equal degree. Weber's “Concertstuck” is a trial piece—in more senses than one—for any pianist who undertakes it. It presents great difficulties on the mere side of technique, and none the less does it call for sound musical taste and poetic feeling on the part of the performer. Mr. Busoni's performance can only be characterized as a remarkable one from either point of view. The spontaneous character of the greeting which he received at its close showed clearly that the audience appreciated fully the fact that they had been listening to a great artist. It is said that Mr. Busoni was recalled no less than ten times after playing this piece in Boston recently. Liszt's “Spanish Rhapsody,” as arranged by Mr. Busoni for piano and orchestra, seems to have lost something of the Lisztian flavor. The orchestration seemed to be in the main effectively done, though rather fragmentary in spots. But enough remained of the piano part to afford room for such a display of virtuosity as one rarely listens to, and it met the same reward as his playing of the “Concertstuck.” Mr. Busoni is a pleasant player to see as well as to hear. He does not make technical difficulties an excuse for platform gymnastics, but, like Paderewski, surmounts them with comparatively little apparent physical effort. He is unquestionably an artist of the very first rank.

A gap of over a month intervenes before the next (and last) Symphony concert for this season, and the lovers of the higher forms of music regretfully see the season drawing to a close. Whatever we may be favored with next time, the concert of last night will be remembered as not only one of the best of the series, but one of the best we have ever had.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1894.

The grand opera did not seem to have any effect on the attendance at the seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last evening. The programme was a brilliant one, but poorly arranged, only the maghificent work of the orchestra saving it from being uninteresting. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony in C major, five movements, was a wild and weird but beautiful composition of the most romantic and dramatic order. It was rendered in a masterly manner and Mr. Paur was heartily applauded at the end of the fifth movement. Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 4, “Orpheus,” seemed out of place following Berlios's erotic work, and, while played in an exquisite style, the transition was too abrupt. The concert closed with Michail Ivanovitch Glinka's “Komarinskaja,” and the overture to Ruszlan and Ludmilla in D major, by the same composer, the latter being given for the first time in Boston.

The rehearsal and concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will consist of Mozart's overture, “Marriage of Figaro,” Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, Mendelssohn's overture “Hebrides,” and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1894.

Hector Berlioz' fantastic symphony in C major; Liszt's symphonic poem, “Orpheus,” and Glinka's Russian dance and overture to “Ruszlan and Ludmilla,” the latter for the first time here, was the program for the 17th symphony rehearsal and concert last week. The attendance was not up to the usual standard, probably on account of the great musical attractions elsewhere. Berlioz' composition, founded on incidents in his own life, tells the story of a young composer who, being unsuccessful in his love affairs, attempts to kill himself with a narcotic, which only throws him into a slumber, in which strange visions appear to him.

The magnificent precision and harmony in execution of the orchestra was splendidly illustrated in the fantastic work. The principal, and in reality the only theme in the first movement, a melody called by the composer, “The Fixed Idea,” was charmingly played in unison by the violins and flutes, the two contingents blending perfectly. In the waltz movements of the second part the sensuous swing and rhythm of the dance music was perfectly preserved, the harp part adding greatly to the beautiful waltz melody.

The contrast in the third tone picture, which is distinctly pastoral, is marked, but built upon the traditional rural plan. Here Berlioz introduces extra kettle drums with telling effect, and the simulations of a thunder storm are very striking. In this movement all the rural “accessories” have a thematic significance, and the melodic theme of love, introduced with the first notes of the opening allegro, are skilfully interwoven at oft-occurring intervals.

The peculiarities in the orchestration were carefully observed by Mr Paur, who retained throughout a poetic interpretation which was not obscured by the realisms conceived by the composer. “The March to the Scaffold” was given with grand sonorousness and breadth of tone color, the gruesome themes by the bassoons being notably solemn and suggestive of the monks' prayers for a prisoner. The brasses lagged a little in some of the measures, but the number as a whole was finely played. Diabolism reigned in the closing movement as the composer scores it, and the manner in which the conductor held his forces together was very commendable for the temptation to a chaotic hurly-burly here is very great.

The symphony poem by Liszt was gracefully interpreted. The Russian songs and dances by Glinka is one of those compositions characteristic with so many writers educated in the land of the czar, and aside from its odd reiteration of a theme by the violins, played about 100 times, calls for no special commendation.

The overture by the same composer, given for the first time here, is a well-conceived and admirably orchestrated composition. It is brilliant, and abounds in strong passage work for the violins which is exceedingly difficult. The strings accomplished their work magnificently with the themes in the fantasia, their playing being clear and brilliant, and the brass contingent redeemed itself by the excellence of its harmony and tempo in the concluding coda.

The program for the rehearsal and concert this week will be the overture from “The Marriage of Figaro,” Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Mendelssohn's overture, “Hebrides,” and a Schumann overture, scherzo and finale.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1894.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, “Orpheus”.....Liszt
Kamarinskaja.....Glinka
Overture, “Roussian and Ludmilla”.....Glinka

After the fire and the fury, the red pepper and the fireworks of the operas of the week, the Symphony audience might well have been pleased with something cooling, something refreshing, something green. The program of the week before might well have served as an antidote. But here was a program of the wildly romantic school.

It is doubtful whether it is a good thing to present a program devoted exclusively to classical music (so-called) or exclusively to the romantic school. A judicious mixture of numbers that contrast is better calculated to fix the attention and even point a musical moral.

The great symphony of Berlioz totters constantly between the sublime and the ridiculous. There's no use denying its power, its imaginative spirit, its wonderful instrumentation; it is also useless to deny that there are dreary stretches in the work. How seldom do you find one large, beautiful, spontaneous theme in the works of Berlioz. His tunes are generally brought into the world by means of the Cæsarian operation. But the march to the scaffold could not have been written by anybody but the great Frenchman. Other portions of this symphony may pall or offend, but this number must be immortal for its tragic, unearthly, demoniac spirit.

Liszt's “Orpheus” reminds one of the legend that Orpheus, the first wandering giver of recitals in Thrace, was torn in pieces finally by the women who heard the concerts. Offenbach's treatment of the myth is not as pretentious; and it is a masterpiece of fun and jingle; but the wittiest lines of the librettist Hector Crémieux are dull saws compared with the solemn unconscious humor of Liszt's hifalutin preface to his music.

Glinka's delightful jig is always welcome. His overture to the opera that is now regarded by his countrymen as far more national than “A Life for the Czar” is theatre music: it is neither of special interest nor of such fine workmanship as to warrant its introduction on a Symphony concert stage. Any one of the better overtures of Auber or Rossini would be more becoming to such an occasion.

The program of next Saturday's concert will be as follows: Mozart's Overture, “Marriage of Figaro;” Beethoven's Symphony No. 4; Mendelssohn's Overture, “Hebrides;” Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 4, 1894.

If Mr. Paur's sixteenth programme was all conservative, his seventeenth, played last night, was thoroughly modern, and gave the best of chances for seeing how this conductor—charged at first with being a man of wood and a pedant—could yield to the influences of Berlioz, Liszt and Glinka, and play them as if his soul were in the rendering. It is safe to declare that such a superb presentation of the “Fantastic” symphony is rarely heard anywhere, and has never been heard in Boston. The orchestra was magnified, according to Berlioz's wishes, if not to his full demands. There were the four trumpets, the four bassoons, the squeaking rough little clarinets, the four kettle drums, the opheiclide, the harp, the bells of the chime, the gong and all the rest. And this little army Mr. Paur led with enthusiasm and energy to triumph, the extra men following his lead with the readiness of his elder troops. As orchestral virtuosity, the performance was superb; and as romance, legend, vision and passion in music it was almost wonderful. Master of moods no less than of the mysteries of orchestration, Berlioz would surely have applauded this reading, with its tender grace, its devotion, its terrors, its awe and its diabolism and effrontery. The symphony, which is more than an hour long, played with the intensity which the men threw into their work, would have almost made a concert of itself; but Mr. Paur had three numbers to append. These were, the generally placid and pleasant “Orpheus” idyl of Liszt, the merry, buoyant “Komarinskaja” of Glinka and the same author's overture to his “Ruszlan and Ludmilla,” a brief but tremendously animated composition, which was played (especially by the violins) with a dash and a brilliancy such as have not been heard before since Mr. Gericke's palmy time. Through all the programme the men played with remarkable spirit, vigor and enjoyment, to which the audience responded quickly and warmly.

For next Saturday this is the array:—Beethoven's fourth symphony and two overtures—Mozart's “Marriage of Figaro,” Mendelssohn's “Hebrides,” followed by the Overture, Scherzo and Finale of Schumann.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 4.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert last night, in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Symphonie Fantastique, op 14, Berlioz; Symphonic poem, “Orpheus,” Liszt; “Komarinskaja,” Glinka; Overture “Ruszlan and Ludmilla,” Glinka. The symphony is growing aged, despite the many fine things in it, though the march remains as strong and impressive as ever, and the beauty of the “Scene in the fields” is still fresh. Dazzled no longer by the brilliancy of Berlioz's orchestration, which now seems extremely old fashioned in comparison with that of Leoncavallo in “Il Pagliacci,” one can easily see how much the work is padded. It was finely interpreted by Mr. Paur, and with a clearness that left nothing in doubt, or to be wished for. The “Orpheus” is, as it always was, pretentious, without any compensating musical results of value, for the labor expended on it. As it seems to us, it is an excellent provocative to somnolency. It was beautifully read and played, nevertheless. The Glinka “Komarinskaja” is quaintly piquant, and inspiriting in the hearing, and is scored effectively, if coarsely. The overture does not rise above the conventional theatre overture, except in its ambitious and not always felicitous flights into imitative counterpoint; but it is tuneful. It was played, especially by the strings, with great brilliancy. Still there are overtures by Auber and Rossini that are far more worth listening to. The selections for the next concert are: Overture, “Marriage of Figaro,” Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Overture, “Hebrides,” Mendelssohn; Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Schumann.

NEW-YORK FIGARO.

Sonnabend, den 3. März 1894.

Redakteur: EMIL JASPER.

Das fünfte und vorletzte Concert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters fand gestern Abend statt und trat in diesem Concert ein Klavierspieler und zwar Herr F. B. Busoni als Solist auf, zu welcher Wahl sich wohl Herr Ellis, der Manager der Concerte, durch die kritischen und nicht sehr schmeichelhaften Bemerkungen in den hiesigen täglichen Zeitungen, daß man nicht nur immer Orchestermitglieder als Solisten hören will, veranlaßt gesehen hat. Das Orchester unter Paur's Leitung war sicher und taktfest und zeigte sich von der besten Seite. —

The Musical and Dramatic World.

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, MARCH 3, 1894.

BOSTON LETTER.

The Symphony Concert programme on Friday, February 16, and Saturday, February 17, was of excellent parts. It included Brahms' D major symphony, Max Bruch's romanza for violin and orchestra (in A minor), Saint-Saëns' concert piece for violin with orchestra (in E minor), Hartmann's “Nordische Heerfahrt” overture, and Rubinstein's “Don Quixote” humoresque.

Mr. Paur never works you up to any great pitch of enthusiasm in his reading of Brahms, but there is much dignity and a good balance of power in all he does, which is far more wholesome than brilliancy without his good points.

The adagio was beautifully played. The contrapuntal passage-work clearly defined, and with grace, too. The fourth movement, a brilliant rondo upon four themes, with an unmistakable Hungarian character, was carried through with brilliancy and dash.

The Bruch romanza for violin and orchestra did not impress me as equal to his famous concerto in G minor, although it is more finished in some respects. The Saint-Saëns piece, however, is one of the best of that clever writer's compositions.

There is evident maturity in the material and treatment of the Hartmann overture, but it is reminiscent. It has dignity and point. The Rubinstein humoresque, “Don Quixote,” is a clever but eccentric work.

Mr Loeffler played the solos allotted to him with consummate grace and finish.

On Monday evening, at Chickering Hall, we had another concert by the Kneisel Quartette, assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo. The ensemble was more satisfactory than at the previous concert.

The programme included Arthur Foote's quartette in E major, Beethoven's quartette in C major, and Raff's piano trio in G major.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV. NO. 63.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

With the devil at one end of the town and duty at the other the musical public of Boston had a severe test of its loyalty to its pet home institution last evening.

It is gratifying to say, however, that despite the blandishments of even such a magnificent representative of his satanic majesty as Edouard de Reszke duty prevailed, and Music Hall was as densely filled with the symphony patrons as usual.

A glance at the programme justifies a strong suspicion that Mr. Emil Paur appreciated the situation, and prepared as strong a counter attraction as was possible by the use of all the modern orchestral forces placed at his command.

He began his programme with the fantastic symphony by Berlioz, and he gave such a performance of this work as has seldom, if ever, been heard here before. The demands of the composer were very nearly met, and little short of a hundred musicians were called together for the occasion. Mr. Paur's reading of this most remarkable composition was one that would have delighted even its composer, for it is difficult to imagine a better interpretation of its several fascinating movements. The reveries with which the symphony opens were played in a delightful fashion, and all the varying emotions through which the sleeper is supposed to pass were given with exquisite effect. The men of the band were entirely under the control of the conductor's baton, and the effects of the many charming combinations of instruments were wonderfully pleasing. In the second movement the love valse was performed with a swing and rhythm that was indicative of a perfect mastery of this class of compositions by the conductor, and the tone picture of the movement was realized in the happiest fashion. The scene in the fields following was brought out in fine contrast with the preceding movement, and the great march to the scaffold was played with stupendous effect. In the final movement, in which the revels of the Walpurgis night are pictured, the marvellous work of the composer was realized in the fullest degree, and if anything more fascinating in the way of tone pictures is to be experienced in the lower regions of the future, that place will have a strong attraction for those who listened to last night's performance of this symphony. The audience was carried from one state of excitement to another, and left in a condition of semi-delirium as the final movement was ended.

Liszt's symphonic poem “Orpheus” was the next composition and the poetical ideas which are so beautifully expressed in it were made distinctly prominent throughout its reading by Mr. Paur. The odd “Komarinskaja” by Glinka was then given a fine performance, and the programme was ended with the same composer's overture to “Russlan and Ludmilla,” which had its first performance here on this occasion. A more tuneful and brilliant ending to this decidedly remarkable programme could hardly have been chosen, and it left the audience entirely satisfied with having followed the general rule and attended to the symphony like good Boston citizens as they were.

Next Saturday night's programme has Beethoven's fourth symphony, “The Hebrides” and “Marriage of Figaro” overtures and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale as its number.

[94]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 5, 1894.

TO THE SYMPHONY.

"On revient toujours, a ses premiers amours." Spite of the operatic banquet, the symphonic table was thronged as usual on Saturday, and it was a pleasant change to turn from the vocal to the instrumental school, as it was a pleasant thought to remember that while the opera is an exotic, the Symphony Orchestra at least, is indigenous to Boston soil.

Yet there was something left to be desired in the present concert. The following of Berlioz's fantastic symphony with Liszt's "Orpheus" (which might better have been called "Morpheus") was a strong instance of unfitness of juxtaposition, and made as marked an anti-climax as was ever heard.

The Symphonie Fantastique was never played more clearly, and seldom less satisfactorily, in its first two movements, than on this occasion. The vagueness of the first movement and the elasticity of the second were but slightly indicated, and the extreme exactitude with which the love-theme was played in this portion of the composition would have been commendable if love were a mathematical problem. But in the third movement matters changed for the better; the beautiful dialogue between the English horn and the oboe was excellently rendered, while the clarinette theme against the striking pizzicato accompaniment was also a noble feature of the performance. For once the kettledrums were worthy of praise: Berlioz has given a wonderful touch here, when the shepherd calls to his love and is answered by a dreadful silence, followed by a thunder peal that tells plainly enough of the fate of the shepherdess. The English horn was especially effective in the lonely phrases which closed the movement.

The march to execution was splendidly read and superbly played. In some of the ancient Ionian cities human victims were led to execution by a procession headed by flute players, and it is recorded that the effect of the music (called the "Nome of Kradias") was peculiarly depressing. Such a feeling of depression has Berlioz produced in this movement by his mutterings of the bassoons. Only one other bassoon passage rivals this in strange and uncanny tone-color,—the theme (in the dull middle register of the instrument) with which Meyerbeer brings the nuns from their graves, in "Robert le Diable." But these bassoons do not head the procession as in Ionia; Berlioz has pictured by their agency the footsteps of the crowd pressing along with the tumbril to the place of execution. The composer probably never read Dickens, yet if one were to choose a heading for this morbid bassoon theme it would certainly come from "The Tale of Two Cities," and would read—"Headlong, mad, and dangerous footsteps to force their way into anybody's life, footsteps not easily made clean again if once stained red." But this is not the only weird point which the Edgar Allan Poe of music has introduced in this fearful march, for the pizzicato chords upon the contrabasses are a most impressive touch and one which was entirely new at the time it was written. Probably the most dramatic touch in the work, or possibly in the whole domain of programme-music, is the appearance of the love-theme on flute and clarinette, unaccompanied, which pictures the murderer at the supreme moment; before this thought is completed the axe falls, and, at least to the reviewer, the few remaining measures portray a quivering corpse.

But Berlioz revelled chiefly in his finales, and never enjoyed himself so well as when he ended with an orgie of fiends, human or otherwise. "Faust," "Childe Harold," and this symphony, all end with this demoniacal touch. Every detail of the finale was well attended to. The bells would have been improved by the addition of a soft stroke of Tantam, but from the entrance of the love-theme, now dragged in the mire of mockery and derision, the effect was most exciting. Berlioz found even the impish piccolo insufficient for his purpose in this picture, and adopted the most unusual device of introducing an E flat clarinette to the orchestra. The first phrases of this instrument were rather too mellow, as if they were blown on a B flat clarinette, but the later measures were shrieking enough. From the third movement to the end of the symphony was a great success.

Liszt's "Orpheus" needs no long description. The harp preluding which appropriately began the work was finely done, and there was no fault to be found with the execution, but the composition seemed to have very little to say, after the power of Berlioz's symphony.

The "Kamarinskaia" (a Russian song-dance for men alone) by Glinka was an interesting number. It had a certain monotony of repetition which is not a fault in the folk-dance. There is an excellent vocal setting of a similar subject, by the nervous little Laurent de Rillé of Paris, which deserves to cross the water some day.

Glinka followed Glinka in this oddly assorted programme, and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" brought the concert to a close. This was rollicking and hearty music, and was in the good, classical form which Mozart established for the overture, from which most modern composers have strayed. It was finely performed.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Despite the many counter-attractions advertised, the concert given by the Kneisel Quartette in Chickering Hall last evening was exceedingly well attended. The first number, Beethoven's serenade for flute, violin and viola in D major, proved the gem of the evening, which fact was partly due to the admirable work of Mr. Charles Molé as flutist.

Brahms quartette in A minor followed: its stately movements and impressive character forming a striking contrast to the airy grace and dainty embellishments of the preceding number.

The quartette in C major by Haydn was a happy choice as the closing number, with its warmth of coloring, bright movements and tender melody. In the last two numbers the work of the Kneisel Quartette reached its usual high standard, the last re-

Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert was given in Sanders Theatre, on Thursday evening, with this programme: Bach, Suite in B minor, for string orchestra and flute. Haydn, Symphony No. 2 in D major (B. and H.) Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for violincello and orchestra, Op. 47. Weber. Overture, Euryanthe. Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist. This was a fine programme, carried out with great skill and spirit. The Bach Suite is the second in a set of four orchestral Overtures and one Sinfonia, and is a thoroughly delightful work. It has seven movements, of which the first is by far the longest, and a beautiful introduction to the others. The second is a four-part fugue, in which the flute has some dainty solo passages, exquisitely played by Mr. Molé This leads to a movement marked "Lentement" in the score, followed by the short and brilliant Rondeau. The third movement is a stately Sarabande, so much in vogue with the old masters as a slow movement in their suites and partitas. The fourth consists of two Bourrees, the first repeated, after the second one has been played, producing the effect of a Minuet and Trio. The fifth movement is a Polonaise, with a brilliant solo for the flute in the Trio. Next comes a fascinating Minuet, which was not indicated on the programme, the "Double" which was given as the sixth movement, simply being the Trio of the Polonaise, The seventh is a "Badineire," (French for Trifle) in which the flute takes the lead throughout. The entire suite was beautifully played, and received with the warmest expression of approval by the audience, who compelled Mr. Paur to bow his acknowledgements several times. The Haydn symphony is an old friend whose acquaintance one is always glad to renew. The opening Adagio is full of promise for the rest of the symphony, with its grand chords for strings and wind, accompanied by the roll of the drum. The Allegro and Andante show Haydn at his very best, and the Minuet, a form of writing in which he particularly shines, is captivating in its cheerfulness. The concluding trill for the wind and strings is as near a gurgling laugh, as can well be imagined. The Finale too, with its rapid transitions of mood, from grave to gay, rivets the attention, and was superbly played. It is a noteworthy fact, that the virtuosity of the orchestra never seemed so great as at the present time. The symphony was heartily applauded at the conclusion.

Mr. Leo Schulz, the soloist of the evening, was the recipient of a most cordial welcome, as he stepped from his seat to the front of the platform. Max Bruch's setting of the old Hebrew hymn, "Kol Nidrei," probably one of the oldest in existence, for 'cello and orchestra, is wonderfully effective. He seemed to have divined the limitations as well as the capabilities of the violoncello, as he makes it the medium of transmitting the richest, fullest tones without the embroidery of fioriture. To be sure, the subject does not admit of any very airy flights of virtuosity, but many of our modern composers could not have resisted the temptation to indulge in modern technique. Bruch has a wealth of melodic invention, which he expresses with a brilliancy of coloring which always make a vivid impression. The work was very finely played by Mr. Schulz, to whose style it is exactly suited. He is much surer in intonation, and has gained immensely in breadth of style since we last heard him. Mr. Schulz's efforts were rewarded by an ovation from the audience, who recalled him again and again. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Weber's Euryanthe Overture. The themes were given out with tremendous energy, the brilliant climax of the second being worked up with great fire and verve. The following soft passages for the violins and violas, imitating the whispering of trees in the forest, taken from the second act of the opera, are wonderfully poetical in effect, and left nothing to be desired in point of performance. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, March 8.

C. R.

Cambridge Tribune

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Even grand opera was not enough last night to keep the patrons and friends of the Kneisel quartet away from its seventh concert, and Chickering hall contained almost as many people as ever when Mr Kneisel opened the door at the back of the stage and walked to his seat.

The few who did stay away missed a splendid concert, the first number of which was in itself worth going a long way to hear. It was the Beethoven Serenade in D for flute. violin and viola. The players were Messrs Mole, Kneisel and Svecenski. Of this performance it is almost impossible to speak too highly. The precision, balance of tone, expression and general artistic merit were remarkable. Mr Mole especially deserves great praise for his exquisite playing. The audience was extremely enthusiastic, and not only applauded warmly after each movement, but also twice recalled the performers at the end of the number.

The Brahms quartet in A minor and the Haydn quartet in C major made up the rest of the program. The Brahms number was long and somewhat wearying, although it was excellently played. The great C major quartet was splendidly done.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1894.

Chickering Hall was well filled last evening at the seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet. The program was: Beethoven, serenade for flute, violin and viola in D major, op. 25; Brahms, quartet in A minor, op. 51; Haydn, quartet in C major, op. 33, No. 3. The serenade, in which Mr. Charles Mole assisted, was particularly well received. The eighth concert will be March 19.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique in C major, Opus 14 a.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus."
Glinka: Komarinskaja.
Glinka: Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," in D major.
(First time.)

It is not uninteresting to compare this programme with those of the preceding and next following concerts, for each one of the three seems to form a part of a definite scheme. The sixteenth programme was:

Handel: Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Aria, "Honor and arms," from "Samson."
Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergelaufne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, opus 84.

The eighteenth programme is to be:

Mozart: Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro, in D major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Hebriden," in B minor, opus 26.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, opus 52.

Here we have three successive programmes, each one of which illustrates the development of a particular tendency—Richtung, as the Germans have it—in the art of music. The sixteenth begins with Handel, and then passes on through Haydn (the father of the symphony) and Mozart to Beethoven in his second manner. The seventeenth illustrates in a way the Liszt-Berlioz idea in composition, the programme-symphony and the symphonic poem, and then gives two characteristic examples of the Russian school, as it was specifically influenced by Berlioz. And it may be noted here that the Russian school of composition, in so far as it shows the effect of any foreign influence, owed more to Berlioz than to any other un-Russian composer until it began, through Tschaikowsky, to feel the very different influence of Schumann. Thus Glinka belongs with Berlioz quite as much, if in a somewhat different way, as Liszt does. The eighteenth programme illustrates what was once known as the "modern romantic" direction in German music. It shows Mendelssohn and Schumann as the outgrowth of Mozart (the opera composer, and hence the romanticist) and Beethoven. The scheme would have been more complete had Schubert and Weber been included in it; but, even as it is, it has a certain unmistakable definiteness of purpose.

The performance on Saturday evening of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was one of the finest we have yet heard; it was played with all the fire, delicacy, and nice attention to detail that Berlioz's writing demands. For once, we have had the symphony given exactly according to the original score; even the bells in the last movement were there.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was also capitally played; Glinka's humorous "Komarinskaja," with its hundred and three consecutive measures of the same thing over and over again, was played with great precision and spirit and evidently much enjoyed by the audience. The audience, by the way, had shown, in the Fantastic Symphony, a peculiar preference, probably unique in the annals of concert-giving; it seemed to care little for either the "Scene in the Fields" or the "March to the Scaffold" (usually the most applauded movements), but fairly went into raptures over the "Walpurgis-Night's Dream!" Explain this who can.

Glinka's overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla" is a brilliant work, on the border-line between the serious and the light opera overture. It was admirably played. The next programme has already been given, and need not be repeated here.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1894.

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY.

An Interesting Programme Given with Excellent Taste.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall Saturday evening with the following programme:

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
Kamarinska a .....Glinka
Overture, "Rousslau and Ludmila"...Glinkz

The Berlioz Symphonie, which is one hour and ten minutes long in its performance and engaged the services of 91 players, is a work of varying interest, dragging upon the attention at one time and exciting the listener at another. Within its scope are displayed the ample resources of its famous composer, both as regards imagination in its design and the ability to work out the detail through a marvellous variety of instrumental effects. It was faultlessly played, and Mr. Paur added new laurels to his already enviable reputation as an efficient conductor and a musician of a broad and sensitive spirit.

The "Orpheus" of Liszt is not an inspired work by any means, and the wonderful invention of its author does not succeed in provoking interest sufficient to save its effect from dulness. It was finely played by the orchestra.

The Glinka numbers do not rise above mediocrity. The first one we are familiar with in these concerts, but the overture I have never heard before. It is a simple theatric affair, that has a lively theme for the violins, and some tremendous rapid scale passages for the strings. It did not seem hardly worthy a place on the programme. Both numbers were played in the most brilliant manner.

Conductor Paur seems to improve with each succeeding performance, and the patrons of these concerts can thank some lucky stars that brought to Boston so earnest, so able, and so unpartisan a musician as is Conductor Paur. If he would only constrast his programmes between the old and new schools of writing, the interest of the listeners would be enhanced thereby. Next Saturday evening the selections will be: Overture to "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann. This programme, it will be seen, is the opposite swing of the pendulum from the one criticized above.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The seventh concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening was attended by a fair-sized and enthusiastic audience. The programme was inclined to be prosy and dull, but was beautifully played. Beethoven's "Serenade" for flute, violin and viola was rendered in an exquisite manner. Mr. Mole, who assisted, played in his usual artistic style, his tones being particularly pure. Brahms's quartet in A minor, four movements, was uninteresting. Haydn's quartet in C major, four movements, was received with great enthusiasm. The fourth movement, finale presto, was a most dainty gem, and was executed in a dainty and dashing manner.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Charles Molé, gave the seventh concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Serenade for flute, violin, and viola, in D major, Opus 25.
Brahms: Quartet in A minor, Opus 51, No. 2.
Haydn: Quartet in D major.

The Beethoven serenade is one of those charming works in the composer's first manner that have generally escaped public notice. It was first given here a few years ago by the club formed by Mr. Molé for the performance of chamber-music for wind instruments, and has not been heard since. Indeed, the work has been rather used to neglect from the beginning, for there is a story that a certain publisher, when the score was offered him, said contemptuously that "he would not give twenty-five Gulden for Beethoven's opus 25!" It is for the most part in the vein of light badinage, and contains many strokes of peculiarly Beethovenish humor; one wonders how the composer could do so much with his three slight instruments. The thing is infinitely charming, full of exquisite grace and tricksy vivacity. It was admirably played, Mr. Molé's tone and phrasing in the flute part being especially fine.

Brahms's A-minor quartet is a horse of another color, but none the less delightful for that. It seems, upon the whole, to be among the compositions best adapted to lead the general music-loving public up to a comprehension of the composer's style, to act as the thin end of the wedge of a Brahms propaganda. Its beauty of form and sentiment are quite equalled by its clearness of style, while it is unmistakably Brahms, and nothing but Brahms, from beginning to end. The quartet was beautifully played, with that finish of detail and unanimity of ensemble—not, however, precluding a certain tendency to individualize the expression of each one of the four parts—which belongs to the best chamber playing.

With the Haydn quartet one got back once more to the general atmosphere of the first number on the programme, to Father Haydn's "eternal sunshine." Here, too, the playing was admirable at every point, and showed the beautiful music for just what it was.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1894.

The program of the seventeenth symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphonie fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus.....Liszt
Kamarinskaja.....Glinka
Overture, "Rousslan and Ludmila".....Glinka

After the fire and the fury. the red pepper and the fireworks of the operas of the week, the symphony audience might well have been pleased with something cooling, something refreshing, something green. The program of the week before might well have served as an antidote. But here was a program of the widely romantic school.

And it was of the romantic school I found myself in the concert thinking of the face of "Canio." I heard neither the demoniac, terrible "March to the Scaffold," nor the bombastic, empty machine of Liszt, nor the cheap theatre overture of Glinka. I heard only the wild lament of a heart broken, vagabond player.

"Vesti la giubba e la faccia in farina. * * * Ridi Pagliaccio, sul tuo amore infanta! Ridi del duol che t'avvelena il cor!"

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 11.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert, in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Overture, "Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; and Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann. It was an interesting concert, and the performances were of that high order that Mr. Paur has taught us to expect from him. The works played are all familiar here, and there is nothing new to be said of them. The Beethoven symphony received a particularly fine interpretation. The programme for the next concert is; Symphony G minor, Mozart; Adagio and Scherzo from symphony No. 9, Beethoven; and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mlle. Lillian Blauvelt will be the soloist and will sing an aria from "The Creation," and an aria by Mozart.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 5, 1894.

TO THE SYMPHONY.

"On revient toujours, a ses premiers amours." Spite of the operatic banquet, the symphonic table was thronged as usual on Saturday, and it was a pleasant change to turn from the vocal to the instrumental school, as it was a pleasant thought to remember that while the opera is an exotic, the Symphony Orchestra at least, is indigenous to Boston soil.

Yet there was something left to be desired in the present concert. The following of Berlioz's fantastic symphony with Liszt's "Orpheus" (which might better have been called "Morpheus") was a strong instance of unfitness of juxtaposition, and made as marked an anti-climax as was ever heard.

The Symphonie Fantastique was never played more clearly, and seldom less satisfactorily, in its first two movements, than on this occasion. The vagueness of the first movement and the elasticity of the second were but slightly indicated, and the extreme exactitude with which the love-theme was played in this portion of the composition would have been commendable if love were a mathematical problem. But in the third movement matters changed for the better; the beautiful dialogue between the English horn and the oboe was excellently rendered, while the clarinette theme against the striking pizzicato accompaniment was also a noble feature of the performance. For once the kettledrums were worthy of praise: Berlioz has given a wonderful touch here, when the shepherd calls to his love and is answered by a dreadful silence, followed by a thunder peal that tells plainly enough of the fate of the shepherdess. The English horn was especially effective in the lonely phrases which closed the movement.

The march to execution was splendidly read and superbly played. In some of the ancient Ionian cities human victims were led to execution by a procession headed by flute players, and it is recorded that the effect of the music (called the "Nome of Kradias") was peculiarly depressing. Such a feeling of depression has Berlioz produced in this movement by his mutterings of the bassoons. Only one other bassoon passage rivals this in strange and uncanny tone-color,—the theme (in the dull middle register of the instrument) with which Meyerbeer brings the nuns from their graves, in "Robert le Diable." But these bassoons do not head the procession as in Ionia; Berlioz has pictured by their agency the footsteps of the crowd pressing along with the tumbril to the place of execution. The composer probably never read Dickens, yet if one were to choose a heading for this morbid bassoon theme it would certainly come from "The Tale of Two Cities," and would read—"Headlong, mad, and dangerous footsteps to force their way into anybody's life, footsteps not easily made clean again if once stained red." But this is not the only weird point which the Edgar Allan Poe of music has introduced in this fearful march, for the pizzicato chords upon the contrabasses are a most impressive touch and one which was entirely new at the time it was written. Probably the most dramatic touch in the work, or possibly in the whole domain of programme-music, is the appearance of the love-theme on flute and clarinette, unaccompanied, which pictures the murderer at the supreme moment; before this thought is completed the axe falls, and, at least to the reviewer, the few remaining measures portray a quivering corpse.

But Berlioz revelled chiefly in his finales, and never enjoyed himself so well as when he ended with an orgie of fiends, human or otherwise. "Faust," "Childe Harold," and this symphony, all end with this demoniacal touch. Every detail of the finale was well attended to. The bells would have been improved by the addition of a soft stroke of Tamtam, but from the entrance of the love-theme, now dragged in the mire of mockery and derision, the effect was most exciting. Berlioz found even the impish piccolo insufficient for his purpose in this picture, and adopted the most unusual device of introducing an E flat clarinette to the orchestra. The first phrases of this instrument were rather too mellow, as if they were blown on a B flat clarinette, but the later measures were shrieking enough. From the third movement to the end of the symphony was a great success.

Liszt's "Orpheus" needs no long description. The harp preluding which appropriately began the work was finely done, and there was no fault to be found with the execution, but the composition seemed to have very little to say, after the power of Berlioz's symphony.

The "Kamarinskaia" (a Russian song-dance for men alone) by Glinka was an interesting number. It had a certain monotony or repetition which is not a fault in the folk-dance. There is an excellent vocal setting of a similar subject, by the nervous little Laurent de Rillé of Paris, which deserves to cross the water some day.

Glinka followed Glinka in this oddly assorted programme, and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" brought the concert to a close. This was rollicking and hearty music, and was in the good, classical form which Mozart established for the overture, from which most modern composers have strayed. It was finely performed.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 6, 1894.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE CONCERT.

Despite the many counter-attractions advertised, the concert given by the Kneisel Quartette in Chickering Hall last evening was exceedingly well attended. The first number, Beethoven's serenade for flute, violin and viola in D major, proved the gem of the evening, which fact was partly due to the admirable work of Mr. Charles Molé as flutist.

Brahms quartette in A minor followed: its stately movements and impressive character forming a striking contrast to the airy grace and dainty embellishments of the preceding number.

The quartette in C major by Haydn was a happy choice as the closing number, with its warmth of coloring, bright movements and tender melody. In the last two numbers the work of the Kneisel Quartette reached its usual high standard, the last receiving one extra mark.

Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert was given in Sanders Theatre, on Thursday evening, with this programme: Bach, Suite in B minor, for string orchestra and flute. Haydn, Symphony No. 2 in D major (B. and H.) Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for violincello and orchestra, Op. 47. Weber. Overture, Euryanthe. Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist. This was a fine programme, carried out with great skill and spirit. The Bach Suite is the second in a set of four orchestral Overtures and one Sinfonia, and is a thoroughly delightful work. It has seven movements, of which the first is by far the longest, and a beautiful introduction to the others. The second is a four-part fugue, in which the flute has some dainty solo passages, exquisitely played by Mr. Molé This leads to a movement marked "Lentement" in the score, followed by the short and brilliant Rondeau. The third movement is a stately Sarabande, so much in vogue with the old masters as a slow movement in their suites and partitas. The fourth consists of two Bourrees, the first repeated, after the second one has been played, producing the effect of a Minuet and Trio. The fifth movement is a Polonaise, with a brilliant solo for the flute in the Trio. Next comes a fascinating Minuet, which was not indicated on the programme, the "Double" which was given as the sixth movement, simply being the Trio of the Polonaise, The seventh is a "Badinerie," (French for Trifle) in which the flute takes the lead throughout. The entire suite was beautifully played, and received with the warmest expression of approval by the audience, who compelled Mr. Paur to bow his acknowledgements several times. The Haydn symphony is an old friend whose acquaintance one is always glad to renew. The opening Adagio is full of promise for the rest of the symphony, with its grand chords for strings and wind, accompanied by the roll of the drum. The Allegro and Andante show Haydn at his very best, and the Minuet, a form of writing in which he particularly shines, is captivating in its cheerfulness. The concluding trill for the wind and strings is as near a gurgling laugh, as can well be imagined. The Finale too, with its rapid transitions of mood, from grave to gay, rivets the attention, and was superbly played. It is a noteworthy fact, that the virtuosity of the orchestra never seemed so great as at the present time. The symphony was heartily applauded at the conclusion.

Mr. Leo Schulz, the soloist of the evening, was the recipient of a most cordial welcome, as he stepped from his seat to the front of the platform. Max Bruch's setting of the old Hebrew hymn, "Kol Nidrei," probably one of the oldest in existence, for 'cello and orchestra, is wonderfully effective. He seemed to have divined the limitations as well as the capabilties of the violoncello, as he makes it the medium of transmitting the richest, fullest tones without the embroidery of fioriture. To be sure, the subject does not admit of any very airy flights of virtuosity, but many of our modern composers could not have resisted the temptation to indulge in modern technique. Bruch has a wealth of melodic invention, which he expresses with a brilliancy of coloring which always make a vivid impression. The work was very finely played by Mr. Schulz, to whose style it is exactly suited. He is much surer in intonation, and has gained immensely in breadth of style since we last heard him. Mr. Schulz's efforts were rewarded by an ovation from the audience, who recalled him again and again. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Weber's Euryanthe Overture. The themes were given out with tremendous energy, the brilliant climax of the second being worked up with great fire and verve. The following soft passages for the violins and violas, imitating the whispering of trees in the forest, taken from the second act of the opera, are wonderfully poetical in effect, and left nothing to be desired in point of performance. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, March 8.

C. R.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet Concert.

Even grand opera was not enough last night to keep the patrons and friends of the Kneisel quartet away from its seventh concert, and Chickering hall contained almost as many people as ever when Mr Kneisel opened the door at the back of the stage and walked to his seat.

The few who did stay away missed a splendid concert, the first number of which was in itself worth going a long way to hear. It was the Beethoven Serenade in D for flute, violin and viola. The players were Messrs Mole, Kneisel and Svecenski. Of this performance it is almost impossible to speak too highly. The precision, balance of tone, expression and general artistic merit were remarkable. Mr Mole especially deserves great praise for his exquisite playing. The audience was extremely enthusiastic, and not only applauded warmly after each movement, but also twice recalled the performers at the end of the number.

The Brahms quartet in A minor and the Haydn quartet in C major made up the rest of the program. The Brahms number was long and somewhat wearying, although it was excellently played. The great C major quartet was splendidly done.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1894.

Chickering Hall was well filled last evening at the seventh concert of the Kneisel Quartet. The program was: Beethoven, serenade for flute, violin and viola in D major, op. 25; Brahms, quartet in A minor, op. 51; Haydn, quartet in C major, op. 33, No. 3. The serenade, in which Mr. Charles Mole assisted, was particularly well received. The eighth concert will be March 19.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Symphonic Fantastique in C major, Opus 14 a.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus."
Glinka: Komarinskaja.
Glinka: Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," in D major.
(First time.)

It is not uninteresting to compare this programme with those of the preceding and next following concerts, for each one of the three seems to form a part of a definite scheme. The sixteenth programme was:

Handel: Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Aria, "Honor and arms," from "Samson."
Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergelaut'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, opus 84.

The eighteenth programme is to be:

Mozart: Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro, in D major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Hebriden," in B minor, opus 26.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, opus 52.

Here we have three successive programmes, each one of which illustrates the development of a particular tendency—Richtung, as the Germans have it—in the art of music. The sixteenth begins with Handel, and then passes on through Haydn (the father of the symphony) and Mozart to Beethoven in his second manner. The seventeenth illustrates in a way the Liszt-Berlioz idea in composition, the programme-symphony and the symphonic poem, and then gives two characteristic examples of the Russian school, as it was specifically influenced by Berlioz. And it may be noted here that the Russian school of composition, in so far as it shows the effect of any foreign influence, owed more to Berlioz than to any other un-Russian composer until it began, through Tschaikowsky, to feel the very different influence of Schumann. Thus Glinka belongs with Berlioz quite as much, if in a somewhat different way, as Liszt does. The eighteenth programme illustrates what was once known as the "modern romantic" direction in German music. It shows Mendelssohn and Schumann as the outgrowth of Mozart (the opera composer, and hence the romanticist) and Beethoven. The scheme would have been more complete had Schubert and Weber been included in it; but, even as it is, it has a certain unmistakable definiteness of purpose.

The performance on Saturday evening of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was one of the finest we have yet heard; it was played with all the fire, delicacy, and nice attention to detail that Berlioz's writing demands. For once, we have had the symphony given exactly according to the original score; even the bells in the last movement were there.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was also capitally played; Glinka's humorous "Komarinskaja," with its hundred and three consecutive measures of the same thing over and over again, was played with great precision and spirit and evidently much enjoyed by the audience. The audience, by the way, had shown, in the Fantastic Symphony, a peculiar preference, probably unique in the annals of concert-giving; it seemed to care little for either the "Scene in the Fields" or the "March to the Scaffold" (usually the most applauded movements), but fairly went into raptures over the "Walpurgis-Night's Dream!" Explain this who can.

Glinka's overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla" is a brilliant work, on the border-line between the serious and the light opera overture. It was admirably played. The next programme has already been given, and need not be repeated here.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1894.

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY.

An Interesting Programme Given with Excellent Taste.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall Saturday evening with the following programme:

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
Kamarinska a .....Glinka
Overture, "Ronsslau and Ludmila"...Glinkz

The Berlioz Symphonie, which is one hour and ten minutes long in its performance and engaged the services of 91 players, is a work of varying interest, dragging upon the attention at one time and exciting the listener at another. Within its scope are displayed the ample resources of its famous composer, both as regards imagination in its design and the ability to work out the detail through a marvellous variety of instrumental effects. It was faultlessly played, and Mr. Paur added new laurels to his already enviable reputation as an efficient conductor and a musician of a broad and sensitive spirit.

The "Orpheus" of Liszt is not an inspired work by any means, and the wonderful invention of its author does not succeed in provoking interest sufficient to save its effect from dulness. It was finely played by the orchestra.

The Glinka numbers do not rise above mediocrity. The first one we are familiar with in these concerts, but the overture I have never heard before. It is a simple theatric affair, that has a lively theme for the violins, and some tremendous rapid scale passages for the strings. It did not seem hardly worthy a place on the programme. Both numbers were played in the most brilliant manner.

Conductor Paur seems to improve with each succeeding performance, and the patrons of these concerts can thank some lucky stars that brought to Boston so earnest, so able, and so unpartisan a musician as is Conductor Paur. If he would only constrast his programmes between the old and new schools of writing, the interest of the listeners would be enhanced thereby. Next Saturday evening the selections will be: Overture to "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann. This programme, it will be seen, is the opposite swing of the pendulum from the one criticized above.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper of NEW ENGLAND.
TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The seventh concert by the Kneisel Quartet at Chickering Hall last evening was attended by a fair-sized and enthusiastic audience. The programme was inclined to be prosy and dull, but was beautifully played. Beethoven's "Serenade" for flute, violin and viola was rendered in an exquisite manner. Mr. Mole, who assisted, played in his usual artistic style, his tones being particularly pure. Brahms's quartet in A minor, four movements, was uninteresting. Haydn's quartet in C major, four movements, was received with great enthusiasm. The fourth movement, finale presto, was a most dainty gem, and was executed in a dainty and dashing manner.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Charles Molé, gave the seventh concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Serenade for flute, violin, and viola, in D major, Opus 25.
Brahms: Quartet in A minor, Opus 51, No. 2.
Haydn: Quartet in D major.

The Beethoven serenade is one of those charming works in the composer's first manner that have generally escaped public notice. It was first given here a few years ago by the club formed by Mr. Molé for the performance of chamber-music for wind instruments, and has not been heard since. Indeed, the work has been rather used to neglect from the beginning, for there is a story that a certain publisher, when the score was offered him, said contemptuously that "he would not give twenty-five Gulden for Beethoven's opus 25!" It is for the most part in the vein of light badinage, and contains many strokes of peculiarly Beethovenish humor; one wonders how the composer could do so much with his three slight instruments. The thing is infinitely charming, full of exquisite grace and tricksy vivacity. It was admirably played, Mr. Molé's tone and phrasing in the flute part being especially fine.

Brahms's A-minor quartet is a horse of another color, but none the less delightful for that. It seems, upon the whole, to be among the compositions best adapted to lead the general music-loving public up to a comprehension of the composer's style, to act as the thin end of the wedge of a Brahms propaganda. Its beauty of form and sentiment are quite equalled by its clearness of style, while it is unmistakably Brahms, and nothing but Brahms, from beginning to end. The quartet was beautifully played, with that finish of detail and unanimity of ensemble—not, however, precluding a certain tendency to individualize the expression of each one of the four parts—which belongs to the best chamber playing.

With the Haydn quartet one got back once more to the general atmosphere of the first number on the programme, to Father Haydn's "eternal sunshine." Here, too, the playing was admirable at every point, and showed the beautiful music for just what it was.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1894.

The program of the seventeenth symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphonic fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
Kamarinskaja.....Glinka
Overture, "Rousslan and Ludmila".....Glinka

After the fire and the fury. the red pepper and the fireworks of the operas of the week, the symphony audience might well have been pleased with something cooling, something refreshing, something green. The program of the week before might well have served as an antidote. But here was a program of the widely romantic school.

And it was of the romantic school I found myself in the concert thinking of the face of "Canio." I heard neither the demoniac, terrible "March to the Scaffold," nor the bombastic, empty machine of Liszt, nor the cheap theatre overture of Glinka. I heard only the wild lament of a heart broken, vagabond player.

"Vesti la giubba e la faccia in farina. * * * Ridi Pagliaccio, sul tuo amore infanta! Ridi del duol che t'avvelena il cor!"

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 11.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert, in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Overture, "Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; and Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann. It was an interesting concert, and the performances were of that high order that Mr. Paur has taught us to expect from him. The works played are all familiar here, and there is nothing new to be said of them. The Beethoven symphony received a particularly fine interpretation. The programme for the next concert is; Symphony G-minor, Mozart; Adagio and Scherzo from symphony No. 9, Beethoven; and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mlle. Lillian Blauvelt will be the soloist and will sing an aria from "The Creation," and an aria by Mozart.

THE MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC WORLD

NEW YORK, MARCH 10, 1894.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert presented the following programme:

HECTOR BERLIOZ,
Fantastic Symphony, in C major, Op. 14a
I. Reveries—Passions: Largo (C minor) 4–4
Allegro agitato e appassionato assai (C major) 4–4
II. A Ball: Valse, Allegro non troppo (A major) 3–8
III. Scene in the Fields: Adagio (F major) 6–8
IV. March to the Scaffold: Allegretto non troppo (C minor) 4–4
V. A Walpurgis-Night's Dream: Larghetto (C major) 4–4
Allegro (C minor and C major) . 6–8
FRANZ LISZT, Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus"
MICHAIL IVANOVITCH GLINKA . . Komarinskaja
MICHAIL IVANOVITCH GLINKA,
Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," in D major (First Time.)

Berlioz's Op. 14, An Episode in the Life of an Artist, consists of two parts, viz: Part I., Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a; Part II., Lelio; or, The Return to Life, Lyric Monodrama, Op. 14b.

Dramatically and poetically considered, the young composer tries to kill himself with laudanum, but does not take enough to produce death, but in the stupor which follows, sees strange visions which form the subject-matter of the symphony.

At thirteen years of age Berlioz fell in love with the daughter of a neighbor, and to her he is said to have inscribed a song, the melody of which he afterward chose for the principal theme in this symphony, the several movements of which represent: I. The musical incarnation of the beloved woman, whose image appears to the dreamer, indicated by a theme resembling Wagner's Leitmotif. II. The image of his love appears at a ball surrounded by a gay crowd. III. The unhappy lover seeks repose in the quiet country. IV. is a march to the scaffold (perhaps the most famous movement of all). V. A Walpurgis-Night's Dream. In this the dreamer sees his damned soul among witches and lost spirits. The spotless virgin has become a common courtesan. Pandemonium ensues. There is a fugue dance of demons, shrieks, groans, ribald laughter, peals of thunder. Then, with a crash, the dreamer wakes. Who beside a Frenchman, and that Frenchman Berlioz, could treat such a subject as this is treated?

Consummate mastery over all tone effects, vitality, daring, tenacity of purpose. These are the elements that this genius brought to bear, and the result cannot be described in words.

The orchestra never played better. Its work, from the conductor down, was electrifying. I have never before heard such a performance of a Berlioz composition.

The Liszt symphonic poem, "Orpheus," (first performed at Weimar as overture to Gluck's "Orpheus," February 16, 1854), was smoothly played, but after such work as that which preceded it it sounded somewhat tame.

The two numbers by Glinka were interesting, and were evidently written under Berlioz's influence—indeed, the title page of the score of "Ruszlan and Ludmilla" bears the following: "Edited and dedicated to Mr. H. Berlioz by the composer's sister, L. Shestakof.

The compositions, at first hearing, impress one as coming from the pen of a student of the school created by Berlioz rather than meriting any special commendation for originality. They are formed by no unskilful hand, however.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 11, 1894.

The eighteenth Symphony programme was altogether a standard one, and represented a return to the classical after the excursion into the region of romance and rhapsody which was made in the preceding concert. The works chosen were these: Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture; Beethoven's fourth symphony; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, and from Schumann the overture, scherzo and finale which stand as his opus 52. Of these compositions as such, nothing surely needs to be said. It only remains to record briefly that they were all played in masterly fashion, each accordingly to its form and color. Much of the detail was instinct with beauty and finished with the nicety of the Gericke period, while again the ensembles were worked at times to bursts of speed and enthusiastic expression scarcely less than wonderful for their flawless unity.

The next programme will begin with Mozart's G minor symphony, and follow on with the adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony, ending with the "Oberon" overture. Mme. Lilian Blauvelt will sing twice.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette gave their regular concert with a programme of three numbers, of which all were beautifully and symmetrically presented. The first was the lovely and rarely heard serenade of Beethoven for flute, violin and viola, in D major, opus 25, M. Mole assisting. The second was that quartette of Brahms in A minor, opus 51, in which he had not forgotten to be melodious and interesting, although he had begun to be learned and deliberative, and the other was Haydn's charmingly genial quartette in C major, opus 33, No. 3.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1894

Max Heinrich was the soloist at the 16th Symphony Concert, and sang Handel's Honor and Arms, and Osmin's comic song in Mozart's Seraglio Elopement,—the latter a novelty. The Symphony was Haydn's Second, in D; the Overture, Beethoven's Egmont; while a still rarer composition was Handel's Tenth Concerto Grosso, in D-minor. It would be well if in his excellent programs Mr. Apthorp would give more information as to the number of performances of each piece here and elsewhere in America. In the pamphlet for this concert he gives a valuable list, his own compilation, of the 99 operas made from Shakespeare's plays: 14 from the Tempest; 8 from Merry Wives; 7 from Henry Fourth; 13 from Coriolanus; 17 from Romeo and Juliet; 4 from Othello; 12 from Hamlet; 3 from Lear; 3 from Macbeth; 4 from Midsummer Night; 3 from Richard Third; 2 each from Twelfth Night and Petruchio; one each from Measure for Measure, Comedy of Errors, Much Ado, Winter's Tale, Henry Eighth, Timon, Andronicus.

Arthur Foote's New String Quartet.

It is in E, his opus 32, and thus divided: Allegro comodo; Scherzo (vivace); Andante un polo con moto; Allegro con fuoco.

Listening to the first movement, one could fancy it written in autumn, and hear the raindrops pattering on the joyous dying leaves; but as the composer tells me he wrote it last summer, the picture must change to a July shower, recalling the couplet from that lovely old poem, whose authorship nobody has discovered:

> Small drops, but thick and fast they fell,
> Down straight into the ground.

In the second movement you could imagine the satisfactory mirth of the yellow corn, mingled with sadder remembrances, and an expiring sigh at the close, when the applause came; only this was not the close of that movement, but only a resting breath; and as the tales ran on you could dream the music chanted, the requiem of the Old Year, and the bucolic Yankee gayeties of the New, fusing into Will-o'-the-wisps, and finally ending with the glow of awakened life. Perhaps none of these notions may have been in Mr. Foote's brain, yet one liked to weave them about his melodies, as they had their first production at the sixth Kneisel Quartet Concert, in Chickering Hall. Of course the composer had to bow his acknowledgments of the applause from his seat in the audience.

Almost an equal novelty was Raff's second grand Trio in G, for piano, violin, and cello, in which Mr. Perabo beautifully sustained the piano part, which blended wonderfully with the other instruments.

The third selection was of Beethoven's three Rasoumoffsky quartets,—and an aggregation of loveliness.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Among the works of Beethoven few are more rarely performed than the charming trios of which there are several among his earlier compositions. Yet these trios are certainly no less interesting than the early quartettes, of which we often enough have specimens rendered by professional players, who seem to consider the trios as proper for private study by amateur players.

Last Monday evening Mr. Molé, flutist of the Symphony orchestra, assisted Messrs. Kneisel and Svecenski in the rendering of the serenade for flute, violin and viola, op. 25. The performance was a masterly one; and, notwithstanding the length of the work—of which only one movement was omitted—the audience gave unmistakable signs of lively interest and enjoyment from beginning to end.

The second number on the programme was the second of Brahm's quartettes, op. 5. It is a remarkable work, but hardly merits the prominence which has been given to it among the similar works of the same composer, and we wish that the quartette might have chosen another of Brahm's few compositions in this form. No exception can be taken, however, to the manner of performance. It was perfect in every detail, and well merited the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience.

A fine rendering of Haydn's C major quartette, op. 33, ended the concert, which—doubtless on account of the opera season's attractions—was less well attended than has been usual during this season.

The closing concert of the series will take place on March 19.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XXV. NO. 70.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur seems to have a preference for arranging programmes which shall contrast each, others rather than planning individual lists of selections which shall afford the desired contrast within their own limits. In the record of a season possibly his system has its advantages, but for the attendant upon a single concert, the result of his plan is oftentimes wearisome.

Such was the result last evening.

The programme for this occasion had as its numbers "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Fingal's Cave" overtures, the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies and Schuman's overture, scherzo and finale, opus 52.

Now, no one can take exception to the choice of such compositions in a programme for a concert of a class given under Conductor Paur's direction. All these numbers are well worthy a hearing, and eminently suited to create a desire for the better forms of compositions in the line of ochestral works. It is, however, questionable whether a programme of so monotonous a character tends to create the desire for this class of music which would result from presenting it in contrast with less severe and more popular selections.

Mr. William F. Apthorp, who has done so much to enlighten the public who attend these concerts through the preparation of the analytical matter which accompanies each programme, may be supposed to be acquainted with the purposes of the conductor in his general conduct of the season's concerts. This being the case, it is to be presumed that he represents Conductor Paur when he intimates that the concert of last evening was intended "to illustrate the growth of that phase of German musical romanticism that was firmly based on the preceding classic period in instrumental compositions—on Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, and was specially represented by Felix Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann." The same authority states that "the preceding programme illustrated the other and freer and more irresponsible romanticism which sprang up almost contemporaneously in France under Hector Berlioz and in Germany under Franz Liszt, and to which the Russian school of composition soon allied itself."

Admitting the desirability of these illustrative programmes (which is a large admission), Conductor Paur is to be complimented for the skill and taste shown in the arrangement of the last two concerts. The performance of the selections last evening demands no extended comment. Mr. Paur's reading of the several selections was in keeping with the reputation he has already gained here of being an eminently intelligent and conservative interpreter of standard compositions. The symphony was played throughout with admirable taste. "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Fingal's Cave" overtures were brilliantly interpreted, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale were given a thoroughly satisfying performance. Despite the good taste shown by Conductor Paur it does seem desirable that his programme should be interesting as well as instructive, and a greater effort to arrange them with this end in view will be fully appreciated by the patrons of the symphony concert.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano, will be the soloist, and Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Weber will be drawn upon for the programme.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894

Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's symphony program last week was a continuation of his scheme to illustrate the different periods of musical composition, and comprised selections showing the epoch of romanticism, which was founded upon and followed the classic period, selections from the latter era having been given in the preceding concert. There were no soloists, the numbers being Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's fourth symphony, Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

The joyous Mozart overture was given with a grace and delicacy which captivated from the beginning. Devoid of stateliness and pomp, the melodic form conceived by Mozart appeal irresistibly to the humorous side of the auditor, and the odd, elf-like conceits given to the violins and wood winds are delightful examples of musical humor. These episodes were delightfully played, and in fact the whole overture was interpreted in a brilliant and dashing manner.

Beethoven's symphony No. 4 formed an excellent contrast to the Mozart number, and save a somewhat retarded tempo in the first movement the performance was highly satisfactory. A notably prominent part of the second movement was the beautiful effect of the arpeggios by the violins, which alternate with the diminuendo passages of the wood winds. The phrases seemed the perfection of harmony and sentiment. The figure given to the various instruments in sequence in the fantasia was also effective in a unique way. The running passages in the finale were deftly presented by the different contingents.

The restless, undulation themes of the "Fingal's Cave" overture brought out the ensemble precision of the orchestra in bold relief, the band presenting the Mendelssohn tone picture with great effect. The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale, with its contrast of dancing figures with a background of "sighs" received a thoroughly Schumannesque interpretation. The peculiar rhythm of the second part was perfectly preserved, the energetic theme in the finale was not made too prominent and the concluding coda was given with smoothness and rapidity and without scurrying by the violins.

The program for the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, includes Mozart's symphony in G minor, the adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing an aria from "The Creation" and an aria by Mozart.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 12, 1894.

A CLASSICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Two Overtures and Two Symphonies Finely Performed—Marriage of Figaro Contrasted With a Recent Rendition—Jerome's New Comedy, "The Way to Win a Woman."

When the hilarious student in Germany has indulged in a wild round of dissipation, and when, on the succeeding morning, that period of deep depression known to him as "hair-ache" (far more intense and complicated than mere headache) has set in, his faithful servitor brings to him a meal composed chiefly of herring. Boston has had its round of operatic dissipation, possibly fearing that an epoch of tonal Katzenjammer had set in, our symphonic conductor had presented a musical herring in the shape of a severely classical programme on Saturday. Nothing that had not the sonata form was upon the programme; two symphonies and two classical overtures formed the penitential meal. Yet it would be wrong to give the impression that dulness ensued. A certain connection with the operatic season was established by the performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" overture as the first number, and nothing could teach the difference between music at wholesale and music heard under proper conditions than the execution of this number. It was well played in Mechanics' Hall, it was somewhat better performed at this concert, but the overwhelming difference lay in the fact that in the former case all its fragrance and delicacy was lost, while in this concert every point intended by the composer was conserved. It was perfect in performance and was not taken at the helter-skelter pace that is sometimes given to it.

Beethoven's fourth symphony was superbly played, with a clearness that shows in what fine training our orchestra is at present. One might dissent from the extreme slowness of the introduction, but that is a minor point, as a whole the reading and execution call only for unmitigated praise. The woodwind was especially excellent in the second theme of the first movement, and the little canon here was charmingly phrased and balanced. Even the kettle-drummer deserves praise for his discretion in the closing part of the adagio, and the furiously difficult passage for the contra-basses at the coda of the finale (for this symphony bears its sting in its tail) was played with a decision and surety that spoke of earnest rehearsals. This contra-bass passage, founded on the chief theme of the movement, was at the time that it was written the most difficult orchestral bit ever composed for these instruments and aroused the wittiest sarcasm on the part of Weber, who denounced it in the "Caecilia" (a musical journal of the time) with so little result that the composer duplicated his contra-bass difficulties in the Scherzo (trio part) of his next symphony. To our contra-bass players then, who so thoroughly conquered the passage on this occasion, belongs the chief praise; Palmam qui meruit ferat.

Although the rhapsodical modern school was banished from this programme, Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture (or "Fingal's Cave," as it is often called) gave something of the modern flavor to the list, and added sufficient contrast. If ever there was spontaneity in music it was in the case of the chief theme of this overture. This theme was written first as a letter (August 7, 1829) to his sister Fanny. In the letter he says: "In order to show you what a strange sensation has come to me on the Hebrides, I jotted down the following which came into my mind," and then follows the theme fully scored for orchestra as he afterwards employed it, a splendid instance of turning from words to a less tangible but more expressive language, to convey an impression from one musician to another.

One may fairly grow enthusiastic over Mr. Paur's reading of the work: he gave it clearness without formality, brilliancy without sensationalism. The development was full of power, the plash of the waves in that wonderful chief figure ever present. The clarinette work in the recapitulation was simply magnificent; so fine and rich a tone has seldom been heard. Mendelssohn intended some prominence for the clarinette; he and Weber may be called the discoverers of the clarinette, spite of the fact that Mozart first brought it into symphony and gave it some good passages in his rescoring of the "Messiah," for it was these two composers who first appreciated the cold spectral color of the "chalumeau" (deepest register) of the instrument, and not only this work, but the introduction to the "Scotch" symphony, the first part of "Elijah" and the incantation scene in Weber's "Freischuetz" show the skill of these masters in using this strong touch of tone-color.

Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" is a symphony of three movements, quite as definite in form as his other symphonies, which never became so shapely as Beethoven's. The work received a strong performance, perhaps a little heavy and rigid in the Scherzo, but certainly most effective in the finale. Altogether such a concert is a reassurance as to the standing of our orchestra; if the performances are less spicy than in the past, they are also less flippant, less sensational, decidedly more educational. One might, however, advise a more carefully prepared variety of programme. This concert was entirely classical, the next programme also ignores the most modern school, the programme of March 3 was wholly modern without any classicality whatever. There may be method in this, but one may doubt the wisdom of it. One may agree with the boarder who desired the hairs and the butter served on different plates, but there is no such valid reason why the modern school should not serve as a foil for the classical on the same programme.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[96]

THE MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC WORLD

NEW YORK, MARCH 10, 1894.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert presented the following programme:

HECTOR BERLIOZ,
Fantastic Symphony, in C major, Op. 14a
I. Reveries—Passions: Largo (C minor) 4-4
Allegro agitato e appassionato assai (C major) 4-4
II. A Ball: Valse, Allegro non troppo (A major) 3-8
III. Scene in the Fields: Adagio (F major) 6-8
IV. March to the Scaffold: Allegretto non troppo (C minor) 4-4
V. A Walpurgis-Night's Dream: Larghetto (C major) 4-4
Allegro (C minor and C major) . 6-8
FRANZ LISZT, Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus"
MICHAIL IVANOVITCH GLINKA . . Komarinskaja
MICHAIL IVANOVITCH GLINKA,
Overture to "Ruszlan and Ludmilla," in D major (First Time.)

Berlioz's Op. 14, An Episode in the Life of an Artist, consists of two parts, viz: Part I., Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a; Part II., Lelio; or, The Return to Life, Lyric Monodrama, Op. 14b.

Dramatically and poetically considered, the young composer tries to kill himself with laudanum, but does not take enough to produce death, but in the stupor which follows, sees strange visions which form the subject-matter of the symphony.

At thirteen years of age Berlioz fell in love with the daughter of a neighbor, and to her he is said to have inscribed a song, the melody of which he afterward chose for the principal theme in this symphony, the several movements of which represent: I. The musical incarnation of the beloved woman, whose image appears to the dreamer, indicated by a theme resembling Wagner's Leitmotif. II. The image of his love appears at a ball surrounded by a gay crowd. III. The unhappy lover seeks repose in the quiet country. IV. is a march to the scaffold (perhaps the most famous movement of all). V. A Walpurgis-Night's Dream. In this the dreamer sees his damned soul among witches and lost spirits. The spotless virgin has become a common courtesan. Pandemonium ensues. There is a fugue dance of demons, shrieks, groans, ribald laughter, peals of thunder. Then, with a crash, the dreamer wakes. Who beside a Frenchman, and that Frenchman Berlioz, could treat such a subject as this is treated?

Consummate mastery over all tone effects, vitality, daring, tenacity of purpose. These are the elements that this genius brought to bear, and the result cannot be described in words.

The orchestra never played better. Its work, from the conductor down, was electrifying. I have never before heard such a performance of a Berlioz composition.

The Liszt symphonic poem, "Orpheus," (first performed at Weimar as overture to Gluck's "Orpheus," February 16, 1854), was smoothly played, but after such work as that which preceded it it sounded somewhat tame.

The two numbers by Glinka were interesting, and were evidently written under Berlioz's influence—indeed, the title page of the score of "Ruszlan and Ludmilla" bears the following: "Edited and dedicated to Mr. H. Berlioz by the composer's sister, L. Shestakof.

The compositions, at first hearing, impress one as coming from the pen of a student of the school created by Berlioz rather than meriting any special commendation for originality. They are formed by no unskilful hand, however.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 11, 1894.

The eighteenth Symphony programme was altogether a standard one, and represented a return to the classical after the excursion into the region of romance and rhapsody which was made in the preceding concert. The works chosen were these: Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture; Beethoven's fourth symphony; Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, and from Schumann the overture, scherzo and finale which stand as his opus 52. Of these compositions as such, nothing surely needs to be said. It only remains to record briefly that they were all played in masterly fashion, each accordingly to its form and color. Much of the detail was instinct with beauty and finished with the nicety of the Gericke period, while again the ensembles were worked at times to bursts of speed and enthusiastic expression scarcely less than wonderful for their flawless unity.

The next programme will begin with Mozart's G minor symphony, and follow on with the adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony, ending with the "Oberon" overture. Mme. Lilian Blauvelt will sing twice.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartette gave their regular concert with a programme of three numbers, of which all were beautifully and symmetrically presented. The first was the lovely and rarely heard serenade of Beethoven for flute, violin and viola, in D major, opus 25, M. Mole assisting. The second was that quartette of Brahms in A minor, opus 51, in which he had not forgotten to be melodious and interesting, although he had begun to be learned and deliberative, and the other was Haydn's charmingly genial quartette in C major, opus 33, No. 3.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1894

Max Heinrich was the soloist at the 16th Symphony Concert, and sang Handel's Honor and Arms, and Osmin's comic song in Mozart's Seraglio Elopement,—the latter a novelty. The Symphony was Haydn's Second, in D; the Overture, Beethoven's Egmont; while a still rarer composition was Handel's Tenth Concerto Grosso, in D-minor. It would be well if in his excellent programs Mr. Apthorp would give more information as to the number of performances of each piece here and elsewhere in America. In the pamphlet for this concert he gives a valuable list, his own compilation, of the 99 operas made from Shakespeare's plays: 14 from the Tempest, 8 from Merry Wives; 7 from Henry Fourth; 13 from Coriolanus; 17 from Romeo and Juliet; 4 from Othello; 12 from Hamlet; 3 from Lear; 3 from Macbeth; 4 from Midsummer Night; 3 from Richard Third; 2 each from Twelfth Night and Petruchio; one each from Measure for Measure, Comedy of Errors, Much Ado, Winter's Tale, Henry Eighth, Timon, Andronicus.

Arthur Foote's New String Quartet.

It is in E, his opus 32, and thus divided: Allegro comodo; Scherzo (vivace); Andante un polo con moto; Allegro con fuoco.

Listening to the first movement, one could fancy it written in autumn, and hear the raindrops pattering on the joyous dying leaves; but as the composer tells me he wrote it last summer, the picture must change to a July shower, recalling the couplet from that lovely old poem, whose authorship nobody has discovered:

> Small drops, but thick and fast they fell,
> Down straight into the ground.

In the second movement you could imagine the satisfactory mirth of the yellow corn, mingled with sadder remembrances, and an expiring sigh at the close, when the applause came; only this was not the close of that movement, but only a resting breath; and as the tales ran on you could dream the music chanted, the requiem of the Old Year, and the bucolic Yankee gayeties of the New, fusing into Will-o'-the-wisps, and finally ending with the glow of awakened life. Perhaps none of these notions may have been in Mr. Foote's brain, yet one liked to weave them about his melodies, as they had their first production at the sixth Kneisel Quartet Concert, in Chickering Hall. Of course the composer had to bow his acknowledgments of the applause from his seat in the audience.

Almost an equal novelty was Raff's second grand Trio in G, for piano, violin, and cello, in which Mr. Perabo beautifully sustained the piano part, which blended wonderfully with the other instruments.

The third selection was of Beethoven's three Rasoumoffsky quartets,—and an aggregation of loveliness.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

Among the works of Beethoven few are more rarely performed than the charming trios of which there are several among his earlier compositions. Yet these trios are certainly no less interesting than the early quartettes, of which we often enough have specimens rendered by professional players, who seem to consider the trios as proper for private study by amateur players.

Last Monday evening Mr. Molé, flutist of the Symphony orchestra, assisted Messrs. Kneisel and Svecenski in the rendering of the serenade for flute, violin and viola, op. 25. The performance was a masterly one; and, notwithstanding the length of the work—of which only one movement was omitted—the audience gave unmistakable signs of lively interest and enjoyment from beginning to end.

The second number on the programme was the second of Brahm's quartettes, op. 5. It is a remarkable work, but hardly merits the prominence which has been given to it among the similar works of the same composer, and we wish that the quartette might have chosen another of Brahm's few compositions in this form. No exception can be taken, however, to the manner of performance. It was perfect in every detail, and well merited the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience.

A fine rendering of Haydn's C major quartette, op. 33, ended the concert, which—doubtless on account of the opera season's attractions—was less well attended than has been usual during this season.

The closing concert of the series will take place on March 19.

Sunday Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 70.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur seems to have a preference for arranging programmes which shall contrast each other rather than planning individual lists of selections which shall afford the desired contrast within their own limits. In the record of a season possibly his system has its advantages, but for the attendant upon a single concert, the result of his plan is oftentimes wearisome.

Such was the result last evening.

The programme for this occasion had as its numbers "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Fingal's Cave" overtures, the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies and Schuman's overture, scherzo and finale, opus 52.

Now, no one can take exception to the choice of such compositions in a programme for a concert of a class given under Conductor Paur's direction. All these numbers are well worthy a hearing, and eminently suited to create a desire for the better forms of compositions in the line of ochestral works. It is, however, questionable whether a programme of so monotonous a character tends to create the desire for this class of music which would result from presenting it in contrast with less severe and more popular selections.

Mr. William F. Apthorp, who has done so much to enlighten the public who attend these concerts through the preparation of the analytical matter which accompanies each programme, may be supposed to be acquainted with the purposes of the conductor in his general conduct of the season's concerts. This being the case, it is to be presumed that he represents Conductor Paur when he intimates that the concert of last evening was intended "to illustrate the growth of that phase of German musical romanticism that was firmly based on the preceding classic period in instrumental compositions—on Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, and was specially represented by Felix Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann." The same authority states that "the preceding programme illustrated the other and freer and more irresponsible romanticism which sprang up almost contemporaneously in France under Hector Berlioz and in Germany under Franz Liszt, and to which the Russian school of composition soon allied itself."

Admitting the desirability of these illustrative programmes (which is a large admission), Conductor Paur is to be complimented for the skill and taste shown in the arrangement of the last two concerts. The performance of the selections last evening demands no extended comment. Mr. Paur's reading of the several selections was in keeping with the reputation he has already gained here of being an eminently intelligent and conservative interpreter of standard compositions. The symphony was played throughout with admirable taste. "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Fingal's Cave" overtures were brilliantly interpreted, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale were given a thoroughly satisfying performance. Despite the good taste shown by Conductor Paur it does seem desirable that his programme should be interesting as well as instructive, and a greater effort to arrange them with this end in view will be fully appreciated by the patrons of the symphony concert.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano, will be the soloist, and Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Weber will be drawn upon for the programme.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894

Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's symphony program last week was a continuation of his scheme to illustrate the different periods of musical composition, and comprised selections showing the epoch of romanticism, which was founded upon and followed the classic period, selections from the latter era having been given in the preceding concert. There were no soloists, the numbers being Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's fourth symphony, Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

The joyous Mozart overture was given with a grace and delicacy which captivated from the beginning. Devoid of stateliness and pomp, the melodic form conceived by Mozart appeal irresistibly to the humorous side of the auditor, and the odd, elf-like conceits given to the violins and wood winds are delightful examples of musical humor. These episodes were delightfully played, and in fact the whole overture was interpreted in a brilliant and dashing manner.

Beethoven's symphony No. 4 formed an excellent contrast to the Mozart number, and save a somewhat retarded tempo in the first movement the performance was highly satisfactory. A notably prominent part of the second movement was the beautiful effect of the arpeggios by the violins, which alternate with the diminuendo passages of the wood winds. The phrases seemed the perfection of harmony and sentiment. The figure given to the various instruments in sequence in the fantasia was also effective in a unique way. The running passages in the finale were deftly presented by the different contingents.

The restless, undulation themes of the "Fingal's Cave" overture brought out the ensemble precision of the orchestra in bold relief, the band presenting the Mendelssohn tone picture with great effect. The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale, with its contrast of dancing figures with a background of "signs" received a thoroughly Schumannesque interpretation. The peculiar rhythm of the second part was perfectly preserved, the energetic theme in the finale was not made too prominent and the concluding coda was given with smoothness and rapidity and without scurrying by the violins.

The program for the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, includes Mozart's symphony in G minor, the adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing an aria from "The Creation" and an aria by Mozart.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 12, 1894.

A CLASSICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Two Overtures and Two Symphonies Finely Performed—Marriage of Figaro Contrasted With a Recent Rendition—Jerome's New Comedy, "The Way to Win a Woman."

When the hilarious student in Germany has indulged in a wild round of dissipation, and when, on the succeeding morning, that period of deep depression known to him as "hair-ache" (far more intense and complicated than mere headache) has set in, his faithful servitor brings to him a meal composed chiefly of herring. Boston has had its round of operatic dissipation; possibly fearing that an epoch of tonal Katzenjammer had set in, our symphonic conductor had presented a musical herring in the shape of a severely classical programme on Saturday. Nothing that had not the sonota form was upon the programme; two symphonies and two classical overtures formed the penitential meal. Yet it would be wrong to give the impression that dulness ensued. A certain connection with the operatic season was established by the performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" overture as the first number, and nothing could teach the difference between music at wholesale and music heard under proper conditions than the execution of this number. It was well played in Mechanics' Hall, it was somewhat better performed at this concert, but the overwhelming difference lay in the fact that in the former case all its fragrance and delicacy was lost, while in this concert every point intended by the composer was conserved. It was perfect in performance and was not taken at the helter-skelter pace that is sometimes given to it.

Beethoven's fourth symphony was superbly played, with a clearness that shows in what fine training our orchestra is at present. One might dissent from the extreme slowness of the introduction, but that is a minor point, as a whole the reading and execution call only for unmitigated praise. The woodwind was especially excellent in the second theme of the first movement, and the little canon here was charmingly phrased and balanced. Even the kettle-drummer deserves praise for his discretion in the closing part of the adagio, and the furiously difficult passage for the contra-basses at the coda of the finale (for this symphony bears its sting in its tail) was played with a decision and surety that spoke of earnest rehearsals. This contra-bass passage, founded on the chief theme of the movement, was at the time that it was written the most difficult orchestral bit ever composed for these instruments and aroused the wittiest sarcasm on the part of Weber, who denounced it in the "Caecilia" (a musical journal of the time) with so little result that the composer duplicated his contra-bass difficulties in the Scherzo (trio part) of his next symphony. To our contra-bass players then, who so thoroughly conquered the passage on this occasion, belongs the chief praise; Palmam qui meruit ferat.

Although the rhapsodical modern school was banished from this programme, Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture (or "Fingal's Cave," as it is often called) gave something of the modern flavor to the list, and added sufficient contrast. If ever there was spontaneity in music it was in the case of the chief theme of this overture. This theme was written first as a letter (August 7, 1829) to his sister Fanny. In the letter he says: "In order to show you what a strange sensation has come to me on the Hebrides, I jotted down the following which came into my mind," and then follows the theme fully scored for orchestra as he afterwards employed it, a splendid instance of turning from words to a less tangible but more expressive language, to convey an impression from one musicion to another.

One may fairly grow enthusiastic over Mr. Paur's reading of the work: he gave it clearness without formality, brilliancy without sensationalism. The development was full of power, the plash of the waves in that wonderful chief figure ever present. The clarinette work in the recapitulation was simply magnificent; so fine and rich a tone has seldom been heard. Mendelssohn intended some prominence for the clarinette; he and Weber may be called the discoverers of the clarinette, spite of the fact that Mozart first brought it into symphony and gave it some good passages in his rescoring of the "Messiah," for it was these two composers who first appreciated the cold spectral color of the "chalumeau" (deepest register) of the instrument, and not only this work, but the introduction to the "Scotch" symphony, the first part of "Elijah" and the incantation scene in Weber's "Freischuetz" show the skill of these masters in using this strong touch of tone-color.

Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" is a symphony of three movements, quite as definite in form as his other symphonies, which never became so shapely as Beethoven's. The work received a strong performance, perhaps a little heavy and rigid in the Scherzo, but certainly most effective in the finale. Altogether such a concert is a reassurance as to the standing of our orchestra; if the performances are less spicy than in the past, they are also less flippant, less sensational, decidedly more educational. One might, however, advise a more carefully prepared variety of programme. This concert was entirely classical, the next programme also ignores the most modern school, the programme of March 3 was wholly modern without any classicality whatever. There may be method in this, but one may doubt the wisdom of it. One may agree with the boarder who desired the hairs and the butter served on different plates, but there is no such valid reason why the modern school should not serve as a foil for the classical on the same programme.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[96]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 12, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," in D major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Opus 60.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Fingals-Höhle," in B minor, Opus 26.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52.

Mozart's bright and lively overture was excellently played and put everyone in good humor, to begin with; while time lasts there will always be a place for such music. Few things could follow this overture better than Beethoven's B-flat symphony, so grave and thoughtful in its introduction, yet with such enchanting effects of color and subtlety of harmony, so heroic in its first allegro theme, like a Corybantic dance, so elegiac and exalted in sentiment in its Adagio, yet with flashes of divine humor playing through it all, as if it, too, were the sporting-ground of a Figaro brimming over with fun and saucy jokes. Ambros has called this B-flat symphony the counterpart and complement of the eighth, in F-major; in saying which he shows no common perspicacity. If every great composer is in a sense like Goethe's Earth-Spirit, who "sits at the whirring loom of Time and weaves the living garment of the Godhead," these two symphonies may be said to form together a shining double, reversible garment; one side is the eighth, all woven out of mocking humor, yet with a lining of infinite seriousness, beauty, and grace, that shimmers through the humorous texture every here and there; the other side is the fourth, woven out of nobler and more earnest stuff, yet with the mocking humor of the former ever and anon shining through its tissue. The symphony was capitally played; one still wonders at the interpretation all conductors — and Mr. Paur among them—put upon Beethoven's marking, Allegro, ma non troppo in the last movement, and how fast they would take it, if it were marked, Presto. Still, one has grown so used to the now conventional rapid tempo in this movement that it certainly sounds well enough.

Mendelssohn's ever-beautiful "Fingal's Cave" overture was played with great effect; with perhaps somewhat more of variety in the tempo than the composer intended, but with the various modifications of the initial rate of speed so cleverly brought in that they did not sensibly mar the unity of impression made by the composition. Upon the whole, one inclines to call this Mendelssohn's greatest overture; it has not perhaps quite the vivid flash of genius that lights up the "Midsummer Night's Dream," but it is so perfect in every part, so ripe in feeling, and profoundly poetic in expression, that it impresses one as really the finer work of the two.

Schumann probably had other reasons for refusing to call his Overture, Scherzo and Finale a "symphony" than the mere fact that there was no slow movement in the work, and, as von Bülow once said, "he could not drive the whole quadriga." The first movement, albeit quite symphonic in form, is so entirely an overture in character, it is so complete in itself, and works up to so definite a close at the end, that it could hardly stand as a symphonic first movement; when it is over, you expect nothing further, as you do after the well-conceived first movement of a symphony. By the way, how the coda of this overture reminds one of the final working-up of the second theme in Weber's "Jubel-Ouvertüre"—just before "God Save the King" comes in! And yet, how utterly different the two are! There is a certain unmistakable similarity between the two themes, and much the same joyous buoyancy in the working-up of each; but how Schumann has steered clear of that vein of mere trivial brilliancy and tinsel-glitter into which Weber fell; how elegant he remains in the midst of all his joyous expansiveness! And, in the Finale, how strikingly characteristic the working-out is of one side of Schumann's nature; with what exuberance of energy he hammers and batters away at his little theme, for page after page, without making it budge a single inch! The movement might well be christened "Much Ado About Nothing," for, with all his energetic work, Schumann really gets nowhere in it; he finds himself at the end still at his starting-point. But then, also, what glorious "Ado"! The very energy with which he goes to work is in itself enough to inspire and delight one. The work was excellently played.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in G minor: Haydn, aria from "The Creation;" Beethoven, adagio and scherzo from symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125; Mozart, aria; Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mme. Lillian Blauvelt will be the singer.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 11, 1894.

The Symphony concert last night was somewhat shorter than usual, and although every one of the four numbers on the programme had already had a number of hearings, the concert was far from being monotonous, because of the amount of spirit infused into each selection. The audience were afforded an excellent opportunity on this occasion of studying the several styles of and making comparisons between such composers as Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schumann.

Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," which opened the programme, was given a magnificent rendering, and those who had heard this opera when it was given last week at Mechanics' Hall could scarcely do otherwise than give our own Symphony band credit for a most superior performance. The Beethoven symphony No. 4 was also well given, particularly so with the strings, and at its conclusion Conductor Paur was obliged to bow his acknowledgments several times. But it was the Mendelssohn overture to "Fingal's Cave" which was the gem of the evening. Few composers can show such examples of magnificent orchestration as he, and this, of all his compositions, is perhaps the most striking in this respect, and it probably never received a better rendition by the Symphony band than on this occasion. The final number on the programme was the Schumann overture, scherzo and finale.

Next week's concert will present Mme. Lillian Blauvelt as the soloist, and the programme is otherwise an interesting one.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, MARCH 12, 1894.

Eighteenth Symphony—The Finale of the Opera.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture, Marriage of Figaro.....Mozart
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven
Overture, Hebrides.....Mendelssohn
Overture, Scherzo and finale....Schumann

The programme, which was almost stupid for the want of more contrast, was finely played by the orchestra, under the efficient and skilful conducting of Mr. Paur.

There is still demanded a more marked distinction between pianissimo and piano in the readings of Mr. Paur. The music of a programme of the above description demands that the most exact gradation of tone should be obtained, in order that the necessary contrasts shall exist.

Mr. Paur is still a little too robust in his temperament and does not seem to realize that repose is one of the greatest elements in the matter of expression.

Mr. Paur should also see that his tympani player has a softer covering for his sticks, so that in the forte passages the drums will not entirely override the tone of the orchestra and thereby destroy all effect.

I cannot understand how a musician of the sensitive nature of Mr. Paur can tolerate, much less encourage, such a nuisance as is the overwhelming noise of the drums at times.

The beautiful tone and the consummate skill of the first clarinet player in the orchestra of the grand opera at Mechanics' Hall, during the past two weeks, has not served in improving one's opinion of the tone and execution of the first clarinet of our own orchestra.

Both our tympani player and our first clarinet player can study with advantage the methods of the players of their respective instruments in the Metropolitan opera orchestra.

Next Saturday the programme will be as follows: Mozart's G minor symphony; Adagio and Scherzo, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and overture to "Oberon," Weber. Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing arias by Haydn and Mozart.

Mr. Paur makes the same mistake in his arrangement of this programme as he did in his previous one. This may do for Leipsic, but it will not satisfy the demands of the more catholic taste of a Boston audience.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the 18th Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture "Mar[illegible]e of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony No[illegible].....Beethoven
Overture "Hel[illegible].....Mendelssohn
Overture, Sche[illegible]nd Finale.....Schumann

The concert does not call for particular comment. The numbers are familiar, and when it is said that the performance was fully worthy of the deservedly high reputation of the orchestra under Mr. Paur, the story is told. That the audience appreciated the program and the performance was shown conclusively by the hearty and prolonged applause that followed each selection. Mr. Paur was obliged to bow his acknowledgments more than once.

The program of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Mozart's G minor symphony; adagio and scherzo, from Beethoven's 9th symphony; overture "Oberon," Weber. Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing airs by Haydn and Mozart.

The engagement was announced this week of Mr. Frederick R. Comos and Miss Clara E. Galloupe. Mr. Comos is well known to all the Music Hall patronage, and his wide circle of friends will extend their hearty congratulation. He is a Harvard man and a member of the University Club.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MONDAY, MARCH 12,

A CLASSICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Two Overtures and Two Symphonies Finely Performed—Marriage of Figaro Contrasted With a Recent Rendition

When the hilarious student in Germany has indulged in a wild round of dissipation, and when, on the succeeding morning, that period of deep depression known to him as "hair-ache" (far more intense and complicated than mere headache) has set in, his faithful servitor brings to him a meal composed chiefly of herring. Boston has had its round of operatic dissipation; possibly fearing that an epoch of tonal Katzenjammer had set in, our symphonic conductor had presented a musical herring in the shape of a severely classical programme on Saturday. Nothing that had not the sonota form was upon the programme; two symphonies and two classical overtures formed the penitential meal. Yet it would be wrong to give the impression that dulness ensued. A certain connection with the operatic season was established by the performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" overture as the first number, and nothing could teach the difference between music at wholesale and music heard under proper conditions than the execution of this number. It was well played in Mechanics' Hall, it was somewhat better performed at this concert, but the overwhelming difference lay in the fact that in the former case all its fragrance and delicacy was lost, while in this concert every point intended by the composer was conserved. It was perfect in performance and was not taken at the helter-skelter pace that is sometimes given to it.

Beethoven's fourth symphony was superbly played, with a clearness that shows in what fine training our orchestra is at present. One might dissent from the extreme slowness of the introduction, but that is a minor point, as a whole the reading and execution call only for unmitigated praise. The woodwind was especially excellent in the second theme of the first movement, and the little canon here was charmingly phrased and balanced. Even the kettle-drummer deserves praise for his discretion in the closing part of the adagio, and the furiously difficult passage for the contra-basses at the coda of the finale (for this symphony bears its sting in its tail) was played with a decision and surety that spoke of earnest rehearsals. This contra-bass passage, founded on the chief theme of the movement, was at the time that it was written the most difficult orchestral bit ever composed for these instruments and aroused the wittiest sarcasm on the part of Weber, who denounced it in the "Caecilia" (a musical journal of the time) with so little result that the composer duplicated his contra-bass difficulties in the Scherzo (trio part) of his next symphony. To our contra-bass players then, who so thoroughly conquered the passage on this occasion, belongs the chief praise; Palmam qui meruit ferat.

A Charming Bit of Mendelsshon.

Although the rhapsodical modern school was banished from this programme, Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture (or "Fingal's Cave," as it is often called) gave something of the modern flavor to the list, and added sufficient contrast. If ever there was spontaneity in music it was in the case of the chief theme of this overture. This theme was written first as a letter (August 7, 1829) to his sister Fanny. In the letter he says: "In order to show you what a strange sensation has come to me on the Hebrides, I jotted down the following which came into my mind," and then follows the theme fully scored for orchestra as he afterwards employed it, a splendid instance of turning from words to a less tangible but more expressive language, to convey an impression from one musicion to another.

One may fairly grow enthusiastic over Mr. Paur's reading of the work: he gave it clearness without formality, brilliancy without sensationalism. The development was full of power, the plash of the waves in that wonderful chief figure ever present. The clarinette work in the recapitulation was simply magnificent; so fine and rich a tone has seldom been heard. Mendelssohn intended some prominence for the clarinette; he and Weber may be called the discoverers of the clarinette, spite of the fact that Mozart first brought it into symphony and gave it some good passages in his scoring of the "Messiah," for it was these two composers who first appreciated the cold spectral color of the "chalumeau" (deepest register) of the instrument, and not only this work, but the introduction to the "Scotch" symphony, the first part of "Elijah" and the incantation scene in Weber's "Freischuetz" show the skill of these masters in using this strong touch of tone-color.

Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" is a symphony of three movements, quite as definite in form as his other symphonies, which never became so shapely as Beethoven's. The work received a strong performance, perhaps a little heavy and rigid in the Scherzo, but certainly most effective in the finale. Altogether such a concert is a reassurance as to the standing of our orchestra; if the performances are less spicy than in the past, they are also less flippant, less sensational, decidedly more educational. One might, however, advise a more carefully prepared variety of programme. This concert was entirely classical, the next programme also ignores the most modern school, the programme of March 3 was wholly modern without any classicality whatever. There may be method in this, but one may doubt the wisdom of it. One may agree with the boarder who desired the hairs and the butter served on different plates, but there is no such valid reason why the modern school should not serve as a foil for the classical on the same programme.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[97]

...ONE WHO HAS THE EYE OF ARGUS. HE IS HONORABLE ... AS BUT LOOKS TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH.

WORCESTER.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1894.

BRAVO, MR. PAUR!

Brilliant Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Carl Stasny, Soloist.

An exceedingly interesting program, of a character approaching the popular, was that prepared for the fourth concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday night. The list was as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major.

Grieg, Piano Concerto, A minor.

Chabrier, Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."

Rubinstein, "Feramors" ballet music, including Brides of Kashmire candle dance and dance of Bayaderes.

Wagner, Overture to "Flying Dutchman."

Soloist, Carl Stasny.

The ceaseless vivacity, the incomparable jollity of the Beethoven symphony was brought out with telling effect. Mr. Paur has scarcely done anything better in this city. It was a fine specimen of Beethoven playing, without languishing sentimentality, and yet with ample attention to the jaunty delicacies of the score. Mr. Paur adds himself to the list of conductors who reject the modern arguments of Wagner and Von Bulow for a slow tempo in the third movement and a literal translation of the words "tempo di menuetto." Theodore Thomas once followed these leaders and afterwards repented.

Carl Stasny is a pianist of good ability, despite his blase, lackadaisical and wearied deportment. He played a rather ineffective instrument, but the freshness and beauty of Grieg's music could not be hidden. We suspect there are traits in Mr. Stasny's execution that are calculated to encounter the displeasure of the pedagogs, but that doesn't amount to much in this case, unless clearness is sacrificed, as it sometimes was. The concerto itself is almost as characteristic North Country music as anything Grieg has written, and may well belong to the composer of "Peer Gynt." It is not so common a concert piece as it ought to be. Mr. Stasny was recalled. Emmanuel Chabrier's "Gwendoline" entr'acte is very "Berliozotic." The composer sprang into fame at the Lamoureaux concerts in Paris. The music contains two attractive themes worked up after Berlioz's models, but the effect, after all, is that of much talk and pother about small things. It was beautifully played.

It has seemed odd that Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music has not enjoyed a more permanent place in American concerts. It is wonderfully pretty music of the lighter sort, and Mr. Paur deserves popular thanks for reviving it. The band gave it with much piquancy.

The concert closed with a rousing performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Mr. Paur's habit of musical vivisection stood him in good stead here, as usual, and the devious intricacies of the score were as clear as day. For making the crooked paths straight and the hidden ways plain, there are few like him. It is impossible to recall a more thoroughly delightful reading of the Beethoven symphony or of the Wagner overture than he gave. The entire program itself was memorable in many respects and the emphatic applause of the fair-sized audience demonstrated the popular satisfaction.

The fifth and last concert will be given Tuesday, April 17.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1894.

FROM FIVE COMPOSERS.

Herr Paur and Boston Symphony Orchestra Give Their Fourth Concert.

Five composers were represented on the program presented at the Boston symphony orchestra concert at Mechanics hall, last evening. It was 7.50 when Mr. Paur rapped to attention and began Beethoven's symphony No. 8 in F major, op. 93, which began the evening's entertainment. The number was a unique one, the symphony being rather new to most of the audience. At the conclusion of the first movement, something over a hundred people who saw the concert announced for 8 o'clock, instead of 7.45 as previously, and who had been caught outside the closed doors, strolled into their seats. Conductor Paur evidently didn't understand matters, for he glared ferociously at the incoming crowd, and brought down on himself some unfavorable comment.

The little incident did not mar the presentation of the rest of the number, all four movements being presented with equal vigor and merit.

Carl Stasney, the soloist of the evening, was warmly welcomed. His selection was the concerto for pianoforte op. 16, A minor, by Edvard Grieg. Mr. Stasney was accompanied by the orchestra. He made a favorable impression, but his finale was completely drowned by the accompaniment.

The third number was the entr'acte from "Gwendoline," by Emmanuel Chabrier. It was an entirely new selection, written wholly in the modern romantic vein. It adhered to no musical form, although its development did not lack coherency. It was especially noteworthy as a piece of orchestral coloring, poetic and picturesq, but it did not find an enthusiastic welcome among Worcester music lovers.

The last two numbers every symphony concert goer looked forward to with pleasure. The next to the last was ballet music from "Feramors" by Rubinstein. There were two numbers; the first the candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire (moderato con moto, D minor). This was a dainty, waltz-like movement, daintily interpreted and sparkling with brilliancy. The second was the dance of Bayaderes (allegretto, B flat major). This was a graceful little dance, in which the tambourine played a conspicuous part. If anything, it was daintier than its predecessor.

The light airiness of the dance music contrasted strangely with the density of the next and final selection, Wagner's ever famous and ever welcome overture, "Flying Dutchman." A Worcester audience has never seen the new director throw himself so strongly into a selection as he did into this number. The orchestra seemed infused with the leader's fire, and the overture was given a magnificent production. The last concert of the season will be given April 17.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 18.

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme: Symphony G minor, Mozart; the Adagio and the Scherzo, from Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and sang an aria from "The Creation," by Haydn, and an air from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart. The Mozart's Symphony was sympathetically read, with here and there a slight concession to the more modern methods of interpreting the older composers, but, on the whole, along the line of a discreet and artistic conservatism, and with full respect for the underlying spirit of the music. It was perfectly played from beginning to end. The two movements from the Beethoven symphony, of which the adagio is among the most exquisitely beautiful inspirations that ever came to composer, were also delightfully and impressivrly given, the only feature that marred the performances being the brutal thumps that the drummer gave his drum in the Scherzo. This player is very prone to pound his instruments after a fashion that prevents their emitting a musical tone. In all likelihood he grew into this bad habit under the late conductor of the orchestra; but that is no reason why he should be permitted to persevere in it. He could have studied the tone produced by the tympanist of the recent opera orchestra, with great profit. This player's tone was always musical, even in the most violent fortissimos, and the note sounded could be clearly distinguished, a result that never attends a loud note from the Symphony Orchestra player, who, at such moments, might as well knock with a hammer on the bottom of a washtub, for all that the pitch of the note he sounds can be discovered. The scherzo of the symphony has rarely had as brilliant, as spiritedly marked and as interesting an interpretation as it received on this occasion. As time passes, Mr. Paur's worth becomes more and more apparent; and he is unquestionably, taken all in all, the most eclectic, efficient and valuable conductor the orchestra has had. Mme. Blauvelt's singing of "With Verdure Clad," was tasteful, flowing in style and neat and finished generally. She made a favorable impression and at the end of the air was recalled twice with great heartiness. Her other contribution to the concert was "Voi che sapeti," in the singing of which the pleasing characteristics that marked her earlier effort were equally prominent. For this, also, she received two very cordial recalls. The programme for the next concert is: "Faust" symphony, Liszt; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns (first time); "Kol Nidrei" for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr. Leo Schulz is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 18, 1894.

The nineteenth Symphony concert gave luminous proof that pure music, to cause delight and to conjure feeling, needs no extraordinary means—no uncouth combinations of peculiar implements, no percussion rattle-traps, no twiddling of the upper fiddle-strings, no theatrical marching out of "families" of instruments, no tremendous sonority of a brass band augmented up to the standard of a great moral show. Neither does it need the mystifications of scientific development or the sophistications of harmonic metaphysics. It only needs the free flow of the apt and rapt spirit. That sounds like a trifle; but it is one of the rare things of this world, where the labored flux of academically trained talent and the involutions of minds which would fain force themselves upon time and fame as genius are all too common. On the programme was no composition which asked for anything beyond instrumental simplicity, and yet every one touched the springs of feeling and stirred the founts of thought. There was that exquisite G minor symphony of Mozart, so brief and yet an epitome of its author's genius, content to qualify its strings with a couple of oboes, a single flute, a pair of bassoons and horns and a touch of trumpet tones. There were from Beethoven's ninth symphony the adagio with its scarcely less than heavenly melodies and its strange, unexpected, far off harmonies and the scherzo, in which the acme of eager, free and honest human hilarity seems to be reached—yet marking alike the pensive, pathetic suavity of the irrepressible gayety by the inspired use of the voices which all its anthor's brethren in art were using. And then there was the infinitely poetic "Oberon" overture of Weber, wherein the mystery of the great sea speech, the flicker of fairy feet in the moonlight and the crash and clangor of huge surprises are all conveyed even to souls which are but poorly imaginative by the delicate adjustment of the normal orchestra carried out into the sympathetic playing of competent and responsive musicians. None of the distinct and perfect moods created by these immortal compositions but would be diminished and enfeebled by the instrumental inventions of a Wagner, a Liszt, or a Berlioz, or by the academic elaborations of a Brahms, not one of whom can touch the finer, softer, truer and more soulful elements in a sensitive nature as these pages always have done and always will do. The vocal music which was placed with these selections had a similar merit in its natural melody, its unaffected spirit and its modest setting—Haydn's "In verdure clad" and Mozart's "Dove sono."

The performance was closely akin to the spirit of the music and in technical merit attained a high plane. The unity of the orchestral readings was remarkable, and the flute, the horns, the clarinet, and the oboe were especially elegant and just in their many sallies. Even the kettle-drums knew their place and kept it, and in the Beethoven would have been unqualifiedly commendable but that one of them was not squarely in tune. The many keen-cutting chords were sharp and sure, and the famous crash in the "Oberon" came as a perfect, single sound, in its exact delivery. The singing was by that charming New York soprano, Mme Lillian Blauvelt, who has not been heard here in anything important since she sang for the Apollo a couple of seasons ago, when she was put at disadvantage by the inadequate accompanist of her choice. Her voice has hardly the calibre requisite for Music Hall; but its purity and eqaqlity of tone are sufficient to make its slender notes heard. Her style is refined, polished, easy and graceful and she has the good sense not to endange its polish or the beauty of her tone by trying to urge her organ beyond its level strength.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1894.

Mme Blauvelt Sings at the Symphony.

The attendance at the symphony concert and rehearsal resumed its regular proportions last week for the great musical competitor of the previous fortnight no longer caused division in the allegiance of music lovers. Mr Paur did not offer any orchestral novelties on the program, but the numbers were excellently interpreted, and Mme Lillian Blauvelt, a charming young soprano, reappeared in this city and sang two solo numbers. The program was as follows: Symphony, G minor, Mozart; adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Lillian Blauvelt, an aria from "The Creation" and an air by Mozart.

The aria "With verdure clad" was not specially suited to Mme Blauvelt's voice, which, though sweet and flexible, is lacking in the warmth and breadth of tone requisite for an impressive interpretation of this familiar number. The phrasing and delivery were very artistic. Her voice easily filled the hall, and her execution was facile and generally smooth, and except the absence of that peculiar sympathetic quality needful in oratorio singing, the aria was very enjoyable.

In the air from "The Marriage of Figaro" the young artist was more successful and her sweet voice rang out clear and true, especially so in the staccato phrases, which were flute like in tone. Evidently in music of a florid and bravura nature Mme Blauvelt will achieve her greatest success, if any one may judge from her performances of last week. Her personality is very attractive and she sings without affectation, two important factors in her favor.

The Mozart symphony in G minor was treated in the proper romantic manner, the characteristics to the great audience being shown without undue exaggeration. The funny, fluttering figures of the second part, with its difficult modulations and repetitions, were sharply defined and executed with commendable precision. The finale was splendidly played.

The two orchestral movements from Beethoven's grand symphony No. 9 were artistically interpreted. The double themes of the third movement were well accentuated, the scherzo was played trippingly and in excellent time, and the curious trio was thoroughly Russian in its suggestiveness. Weber's overture to "Oberon" closed the program. The famous "orchestral crash" was given with the required energy. The whole number was brilliantly performed.

The rehearsal will be held Thursday afternoon this week to allow time to arrange the platform for the Handel and Haydn society's concert Friday evening. The symphony program will be as follows: "Faust," symphony, Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns, first time; "Kol Nidrei," for cello and orchestra, Bruch; overture, "Calm Sea," Mendelssohn; soloist, Mr Leo Schulz.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1894.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt, Soprano, Was Applauded Heartily.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony, G minor.....Mozart
"With Verdure Clad".....Haydn
Adagio and Scherzo, from the 9th Symphony...Beethoven
"Voi Che Sapete.....Mozart
Overture "Oberon".....Weber

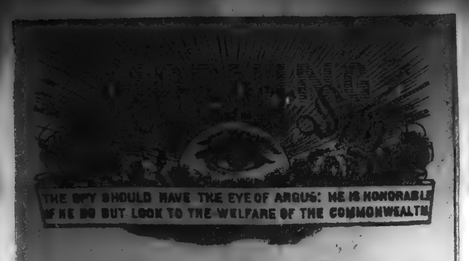
The G minor Symphony of Mozart is one of the most beautiful things in this little world. It is beautiful in its poetic thought; it is beautiful in the perfection of the expression of the thought. It has the artistic simplicity of a story of Boccaccio, of a painting by Botticelli, of one of the short Wessex tales by Thomas Hardy. It is a masterpiece in this: you cannot imagine it written in any other way. Beside the strings, Mozart only used 1 flute, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons and 2 horns; and where, pray, would you have other instruments added? The fiery or profound moderns use all instruments known to man; they invent instruments for the more complete expression of their thoughts; there is a mighty pother; there is fretting, and there is fuming; there are effects, strange, sensuous, or heavy with thought. The perfume of modern music is apt to be pungent, hot, acrid. The perfume of Mozart's symphony is the natural perfume of a sweet and healthy woman. The modern composer's face is too often seen through his music; the face is inquiring, anxious, or vague. But Mozart wrote with serene confidence, as though he looked forward a century and foresaw that his symphony would then be as fresh, as perfect, as when he wrote it, beset by many cares.

It may be said in brief that although there was no novelty the concert, in selections and in performance, gave great pleasure. Mr. Paur made no doubtful experiment in giving two movements of the 9th symphony. There are, indeed, few symphonies that, from beginning to end, hold the attention fixed and seem one homogeneous work as does the G minor of Mozart. Did any one last evening really feel the need of the first and the fourth movements of Beethoven's gigantic symphony? The time will come when fragments of sonatas, oratorios, concertos will be given as well as fragments of symphonies. When a work of large proportions is new, let it be heard as the composer wrote it, in justice to him and to the audience.

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt, who was heard here a season ago in a Damrosch concert, gave genuine delight last evening. The agreeable quality of her voice, the vocal art displayed by her, and the modesty and the grace of her bearing combine to make her a welcome apparition on the concert stage.

PHILIP HALE.

[98]



WORCESTER.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1894.

BRAVO, MR. PAUR!

Brilliant Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Carl Stasny, Soloist.

An exceedingly interesting program, of a character approaching the popular, was that prepared for the fourth concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Mechanics Hall, Tuesday night. The list was as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F major.

Grieg, Piano Concerto, A minor.

Chabrier, Entr'acte from "Gwendoline."

Rubinstein, "Feramors" ballet music, including Brides of Kashmire candle dance and dance of Bayaderes.

Wagner, Overture to "Flying Dutchman."

Soloist, Carl Stasny.

The ceaseless vivacity, the incomparable jollity of the Beethoven symphony was brought out with telling effect. Mr. Paur has scarcely done anything better in this city. It was a fine specimen of Beethoven playing, without languishing sentimentality, and yet with ample attention to the jaunty delicacies of the score. Mr. Paur adds himself to the list of conductors who reject the modern arguments of Wagner and Von Bulow for a slow tempo in the third movement and a literal translation of the words "tempo di menuetto." Theodore Thomas once followed these leaders and afterwards repented.

Carl Stasny is a pianist of good abilities, despite his blase, lackadaisical and wearied deportment. He played a rather ineffective instrument, but the freshness and beauty of Grieg's music could not be hidden. We suspect there are traits in Mr. Stasny's execution that are calculated to encounter the displeasure of the pedagogs, but that doesn't amount to much in this case, unless clearness is sacrificed, as it sometimes was. The concerto itself is almost as characteristic North Country music as anything Grieg has written, and may well belong to the composer of "Peer Gynt." It is not so common a concert piece as it ought to be. Mr. Stasny was recalled. Emmanuel Chabrier's "Gwendoline" entr'acte is very "Berliozotic." The composer sprang into fame at the Lamoureaux concerts in Paris. The music contains two attractive themes worked up after Berlioz's models, but the effect, after all, is that of much talk and pother about small things. It was beautifully played.

It has seemed odd that Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music has not enjoyed a more permanent place in American concerts. It is wonderfully pretty music of the lighter sort, and Mr. Paur deserves popular thanks for reviving it. The band gave it with much piquancy.

The concert closed with a rousing performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Mr. Paur's habit of musical vivisection stood him in good stead here, as usual, and the devious intricacies of the score were as clear as day. For making the crooked paths straight and the hidden ways plain, there are few like him. It is impossible to recall a more thoroughly delightful reading of the Beethoven symphony or of the Wagner overture than he gave. The entire program itself was memorable in many respects and the emphatic applause of the fair-sized audience demonstrated the popular satisfaction.

The fifth and last concert will be given Tuesday, April 17.

Worcester Telegram

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1894.

FROM FIVE COMPOSERS.

Herr Paur and Boston Symphony Orchestra Give Their Fourth Concert.

Five composers were represented on the program presented at the Boston symphony orchestra concert at Mechanics hall, last evening. It was 7.50 when Mr. Paur rapped to attention and began Beethoven's symphony No. 8 in F major, op. 93, which began the evening's entertainment. The number was a unique one, the symphony being rather new to most of the audience. At the conclusion of the first movement, something over a hundred people who saw the concert announced for 8 o'clock, instead of 7.45 as previously, and who had been caught outside the closed doors, strolled into their seats. Conductor Paur evidently didn't understand matters, for he glared ferociously at the incoming crowd, and brought down on himself some unfavorable comment.

The little incident did not mar the presentation of the rest of the number, all four movements being presented with equal vigor and merit.

Carl Stasney, the soloist of the evening, was warmly welcomed. His selection was the concerto for pianoforte op. 16, A minor, by Edvard Grieg. Mr. Stasney was accompanied by the orchestra. He made a favorable impression, but his finale was completely drowned by the accompaniment.

The third number was the entr'acte from "Gwendoline," by Emmanuel Chabrier. It was an entirely new selection, written wholly in the modern romantic vein. It adhered to no musical form, although its development did not lack coherency. It was especially noteworthy as a piece of orchestral coloring, poetic and picturesq, but it did not find an enthusiastic welcome among Worcester music lovers.

The last two numbers every symphony concert goer looked forward to with pleasure. The next to the last was ballet music from "Feramors" by Rubinstein. There were two numbers; the first the candle dance of the brides of Kashmire (moderato con moto, D minor). This was a dainty, waltz-like movement, daintily interpreted and sparkling with brilliancy. The second was the dance of Bayaderes (allegretto, B flat major). This was a graceful little dance, in which the tambourine played a conspicuous part. If anything, it was daintier than its predecessor.

The light airiness of the dance music contrasted strangely with the density of the next and final selection, Wagner's ever famous and ever welcome overture, "Flying Dutchman." A Worcester audience has never seen the new director throw himself so strongly into a selection as he did into this number. The orchestra seemed infused with the leader's fire, and the overture was given a magnificent production. The last concert of the season will be given April 17.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 18.

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme: Symphony G-minor, Mozart; the Adagio and the Scherzo, from Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and sang an aria from "The Creation," by Haydn, and an air from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart. The Mozart's Symphony was sympathetically read, with here and there a slight concession to the more modern methods of interpreting the older composers, but, on the whole, along the line of a discreet and artistic conservatism, and with full respect for the underlying spirit of the music. It was perfectly played from beginning to end. The two movements from the Beethoven symphony, of which the adagio is among the most exquisitely beautiful inspirations that ever came to composer, were also delightfully and impressivrly given, the only feature that marred the performances being the brutal thumps that the drummer gave his drum in the Scherzo. This player is very prone to pound his instruments after a fashion that prevents their emitting a musical tone. In all likelihood he grew into this bad habit under the late conductor of the orchestra; but that is no reason why he should be permitted to persevere in it. He could have studied the tone produced by the tympanist of the recent opera orchestra, with great profit. This player's tone was always musical, even in the most violent fortissimos, and the note sounded could be clearly distinguished, a result that never attends a loud note from the Symphony Orchestra player, who, at such moments, might as well knock with a hammer on the bottom of a washtub, for all that the pitch of the note he sounds can be discovered. The scherzo of the symphony has rarely had as brilliant, as spiritedly marked and as interesting an interpretation as it received on this occasion. As time passes, Mr. Paur's worth becomes more and more apparent; and he is unquestionably, taken all in all, the most eclectic, efficient and valuable conductor the orchestra has had. Mme. Blauvelt's singing of "With Verdure Clad," was tasteful, flowing in style and neat and finished generally. She made a favorable impression and at the end of the air was recalled twice with great heartiness. Her other contribution to the concert was "Voi che sapeti," in the singing of which the pleasing characteristics that marked her earlier effort were equally prominent. For this, also, she received two very cordial recalls. The programme for the next concert is: "Faust" symphony, Liszt; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns (first time); "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr. Leo Schulz is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 18, 1894.

The nineteenth Symphony concert gave luminous proof that pure music, to cause delight and to conjure feeling, needs no extraordinary means—no uncouth combinations of peculiar implements, no percussion rattle-traps, no twiddling of the upper fiddle-strings, no theatrical marching out of "families" of instruments, no tremendous sonority of a brass band augmented up to the standard of a great moral show. Neither does it need the mystifications of scientific development or the sophistications of harmonic metaphysics. It only needs the free flow of the apt and rapt spirit. That sounds like a trifle; but it is one of the rare things of this world, where the labored flux of academically trained talent and the involutions of minds which would fain force themselves upon time and fame as genius are all too common. On the programme was no composition which asked for anything beyond instrumental simplicity, and yet every one touched the springs of feeling and stirred the founts of thought. There was that exquisite G minor symphony of Mozart, so brief and yet an epitome of its author's genius, content to qualify its strings with a couple of oboes, a single flute, a pair of bassoons and horns and a touch of trumpet tones. There were from Beethoven's ninth symphony the adagio with its scarcely less than heavenly melodies and its strange, unexpected, far off harmonies and the scherzo, in which the acme of eager, free and honest human hilarity seems to be reached—yet marking alike the pensive, pathetic suavity of the irrepressible gayety by the inspired use of the voices which all its author's brethren in art were using. And then there was the infinitely poetic "Oberon" overture of Weber, wherein the mystery of the great sea speech, the flicker of fairy feet in the moonlight and the crash and clangor of huge surprises are all conveyed even to souls which are but poorly imaginative by the delicate adjustment of the normal orchestra carried out into the sympathetic playing of competent and responsive musicians. None of the distinct and perfect moods created by these immortal compositions but would be diminished and enfeebled by the instrumental inventions of a Wagner, a Liszt, or a Berlioz, or by the academic elaborations of a Brahms, not one of whom can touch the finer, softer, truer and more soulful elements in a sensitive nature as these pages always have done and always will do. The vocal music which was placed with these selections had a similar merit in its natural melody, its unaffected spirit and its modest setting—Haydn's "In verdure clad" and Mozart's "Dove sono."

The performance was closely akin to the spirit of the music and in technical merit attained a high plane. The unity of the orchestral readings was remarkable, and the flute, the horns, the clarinet, and the oboe were especially elegant and just in their many sallies. Even the kettle-drums knew their place and kept it, and in the Beethoven would have been unqualifiedly commendable but that one of them was not squarely in tune. The many keen-cutting chords were sharp and sure, and the famous crash in the "Oberon" came as a perfect, single sound, in its exact delivery. The singing was by that charming New York soprano, Mme Lillian Blauvelt, who has not been heard here in anything important since she sang for the Apollo a couple of seasons ago, when she was put at disadvantage by the inadequate accompanist of her choice. Her voice has hardly the calibre requisite for Music Hall; but its purity and eqaqlity of tone are sufficient to make its slender notes heard. Her style is refined, polished, easy and graceful and she has the good sense not to endange its polish or the beauty of her tone by trying to urge her organ beyond its level strength.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1894.

Mme Blauvelt Sings at the Symphony.

The attendance at the symphony concert and rehearsal resumed its regular proportions last week for the great musical competitor of the previous fortnight no longer caused division in the allegiance of music lovers. Mr Paur did not offer any orchestral novelties on the program, but the numbers were excellently interpreted, and Mme Lillian Blauvelt, a charming young soprano, reappeared in this city and sang two solo numbers. The program was as follows: Symphony, G minor, Mozart; adagio and scherzo, from Beethoven's ninth symphony; overture, "Oberon," Weber. Lillian Blauvelt, an aria from "The Creation" and an air by Mozart.

The aria "With verdure clad" was not specially suited to Mme Blauvelt's voice, which, though sweet and flexible, is lacking in the warmth and breadth of tone requisite for an impressive interpretation of this familiar number. The phrasing and delivery were very artistic. Her voice easily filled the hall, and her execution was facile and generally smooth, and except the absence of that peculiar sympathetic quality needful in oratorio singing, the aria was very enjoyable.

In the air from "The Marriage of Figaro" the young artist was more successful and her sweet voice rang out clear and true, especially so in the staccato phrases, which were flute like in tone. Evidently in music of a florid and bravura nature Mme Blauvelt will achieve her greatest success, if any one may judge from her performances of last week. Her personality is very attractive and she sings without affectation, two important factors in her favor.

The Mozart symphony in G minor was treated in the proper romantic manner, the characteristics to the great audience being shown without undue exaggeration. The funny, fluttering figures of the second part, with its difficult modulations and repetitions, were sharply defined and executed with commendable precision. The finale was splendidly played.

The two orchestral movements from Beethoven's grand symphony No. 9 were artistically interpreted. The double themes of the third movement were well accentuated, the scherzo was played trippingly and in excellent time, and the curious trio was thoroughly Russian in its suggestiveness. Weber's overture to "Oberon" closed the program. The famous "orchestral crash" was given with the required energy. The whole number was brilliantly performed.

The rehearsal will be held Thursday afternoon this week to allow time to arrange the platform for the Handel and Haydn society's concert Friday evening. The symphony program will be as follows: "Faust," symphony, Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns, first time; "Kol Nidrei," for cello and orchestra, Bruch; overture, "Calm Sea," Mendelsshon; soloist, Mr Leo Schulz.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1894.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt, Soprano, Was Applauded Heartily.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony, G minor.....Mozart
"With Verdure Clad".....Haydn
Adagio and Scherzo, from the 9th Symphony,..Beethoven
"Voi Che Sapete.....Mozart
Overture "Oberon".....Weber

The G minor Symphony of Mozart is one of the most beautiful things in this little world. It is beautiful in its poetic thought; it is beautiful in the perfection of the expression of the thought. It has the artistic simplicity of a story of Boccaccio, of a painting by Botticelli, of one of the short Wessex tales by Thomas Hardy. It is a masterpiece in this: you cannot imagine it written in any other way. Beside the strings, Mozart only used 1 flute, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons and 2 horns; and where, pray, would you have other instruments added? The fiery or profound moderns use all instruments known to man; they invent instruments for the more complete expression of their thoughts; there is a mighty pother; there is fretting, and there is fuming; there are effects, strange, sensuous, or heavy with thought. The perfume of modern music is apt to be pungent, hot, acrid. The perfume of Mozart's symphony is the natural perfume of a sweet and healthy woman. The modern composer's face is too often seen through his music; the face is inquiring, anxious, or vague. But Mozart wrote with serene confidence, as though he looked forward a century and foresaw that his symphony would then be as fresh, as perfect, as when he wrote it, beset by many cares.

It may be said in brief that although there was no novelty the concert, in selections and in performance, gave great pleasure. Mr. Paur made no doubtful experiment in giving two movements of the 9th symphony. There are, indeed, few symphonies that, from beginning to end, hold the attention fixed and seem one homogeneous work as does the G minor of Mozart. Did any one last evening really feel the need of the first and the fourth movements of Beethoven's gigantic symphony? The time will come when fragments of sonatas, oratorios, concertos will be given as well as fragments of symphonies. When a work of large proportions is new, let it be heard as the composer wrote it, in justice to him and to the audience.

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt, who was heard here a season ago in a Damrosch concert, gave genuine delight last evening. The agreeable quality of her voice, the vocal art displayed by her, and the modesty and the grace of her bearing combine to make her a welcome apparition on the concert stage.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 19, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

Again the symphony concert calls for much praise and some little adverse criticism; praise for a perfection of execution that has seldom been exceeded in Boston, blame for a programme made up in a motley fashion. To give two movements from the great ninth symphony, in a city full of choristers, to change the order of the movements, to end a presentation of Beethoven's most earnest work with its lightest mood, was certainly to eliminate much of the educational and æsthetic character from the composition. Yet something may be said in extenuation, too; the last movement is not a very practicable one, it always reads better in the score than it sounds in the performance; and had the great first movement been given, it would have lacked a proper counterpoise, a balancing movement for its power, the work would have led to an anticlimax. However, it is better to let such work alone if it cannot be presented entire.

The performance began with that violet among symphonies, Mozart's G minor. It is customary to consider the "Jupiter" as the great work among the master's last group of symphonies, but to the present writer the G minor is the nobler work of art; other composers might imitate the contrapuntal skill of the former, no one but Mozart could ever have attained the delicacy, sweetness and fragrance of the latter. Barring an absence of some of the daintiness with which former conductors have invested it, the performance was an eminently satisfactory one. The grace of the chief figure of the first movement was well brought out, the violins playing excellently together, with most refined shading. The minuet was somewhat heavy and formal.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and "With Verdure Clad" was a good transition to the pathos of the first theme of Beethoven's Adagio. The singer made a very good impression; at first there was a tremolo in the voice, but this probably proceeded from nervousness, for it soon disappeared, and there was good artistic work in the management of the voice, which of itself has a most agreeable timbre. Mme. Blauvelt's second number, "Voi che Sapete," again showed the advantage of hearing music under proper conditions; she sang it about as well as Mme. Arnoldson did recently in Mechanics' Hall, but it sounded infinitely better; in Music Hall not a nuance was lost, and the beautiful contrasts made their due effect. Especially to be praised was the richness of the voice in the deeper phrases; "Gelo e poi sento, l'alma avvumpar" was delivered with just the broad effect on the lower tones that the phrase demanded. There were many and hearty recalls at the close of the number.

Regarding the execution of the two movements from the Ninth symphony one can only speak ecstatically; Mr. Paur is proving himself far more of an acquisition than one would have deemed possible a few months ago. He does not give the fiery moods of his predecessor, (a fire that was without any insurance and that too often burnt up the intentions of the classical composer), but he has brought the orchestra to its highest efficiency: it is again the peer of any organization of its numbers in the world. The adagio was well played, and the second violins showed that they were not inferior to their rich relations, the firsts, in this movement; but the scherzo was a revelation. It is a rhythmic fantasie, demanding constant changes of accent and of phrasing, and to conquer these with good ensemble would prove the technique of any orchestra. They were given with perfect unity and shading on this occasion, and there was just the right amount of caprice displayed even to the brusque coda. It seems impossible to choose any special points for commendation where all was so well done, but the wind instruments were remarkably effective in this part of the programme; clarinette, bassoon, oboe, horn, all were finely played, and in the final number of the concert, the "Oberon" overture, they did quite as well. Perhaps one is the more inclined to notice this since it is not so long ago that the wind instruments were the Achilles' heel of the orchestra, now they have become as strong as any department of it.

In the accompaniments, too, the orchestra made its mark, for the support of Mme. Blauvelt in the Mozart aria was as free, as elastic, as well-shaded as if it had been played on a piano by a single performer. Altogether, then, the reviewer may bear with his disappointment at the haphazard way in which the programme was made up, in view of the brilliancy of its execution; but if Mr. Paur and his men are able to win success with such a handicap, what would they attain if the list were made out in a manner to show its musical gems to the best advantage? LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY REGISTER.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 77.
SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur's programme at the Symphony concert last evening was eminently in keeping with the penitential season. With Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Weber as composers, there was little to disturb the serenity of the audience, and had it not been that the "Oberon" overture ended the programme, there was little in it that was calculated to excite the feelings.

The Mozart symphony in G minor was placed first in the evening's selections, and had an admirable reading under Mr. Paur's direction, its simple characteristics being adhered to, and the several movements being given a graceful and enjoyable interpretation. Mr. Paur added to this symphonic selection the adagio and scherzo from the ninth of the Beethoven symphonies, and played the two movements in a very conservative fashion, which gave great gratification to the audience.

The singer of the evening was Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, an artist who has been heard before here in more brilliant selections than those which she contributed to the programme. She has a singularly pure, musical soprano voice, and, although her delivery of the aria from "The Creation," "With Verdure Clad," was lacking in style, there was a simplicity and directness in her interpretation of the number that was very charming. Her second selection was the "Voi che Sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and in this selection Mme. Blauvelt's voice was heard with exquisite pleasure, her phrasing of the aria being characterized by rare intelligence, and her delivery showing admirable taste in every way.

The "Oberon" overture was splendidly played as the finale of the programme, and proved a great relief from the monotonous selections which had preceded it.

The concert of the coming week will have for its selections the "Faust" symphony by Liszt, a berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra by Clayton-Johns, the "Kol Nidrei" for 'cello and orchestra by Max Bruch, and Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." The soloist will be Mr. Leo Schulz. The patrons of the rehearsals are reminded that the one of the coming week will be on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.
OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1894.

Four novelties in the 15th Symphony Concert out of five members. The Symphony was the Brahms second. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist in Max Bruch's Romance for Violin and Orchestra, A-minor, op. 42, and the Saint-Saens' Concert Morceau, E-minor, op. 62, and much praised for his fine work. Emil Hartmann's overture, Eine Nordische Heerfahrt, was welcome as an occasional visitor. There was general dissatisfaction over the closing number, Rubinstein's humorous character picture, Don Quixote (once before given in Boston, by the Thomas Orchestra) as puerile, and repellant to artistic sensibility.

For the 17th Symphony Concert another novelty program. Liszt's symphonic poem, Orpheus, though not new here, is not often heard, and hardly bears out the fancies which the composer wreathes about it. The overture was Ruszlen and Ludmilla, by Glinka, written fifty, and first heard in England twenty years ago, and enlivening with its chimes. Komarinskaja, by the same composer, is a jolly mingling of a dance with a Wedding song, written in 1840. Noisy, but bright and winning. The chief opus was Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. Its Love Reveries might be religious, so far as the music indicates; but there is no mistaking the Ballroom intent; or the Field Scene, the March to the Scaffold; or the nightmare of thunderings which lead you to the awsome whir of the Walpurgis Night.

At the seventh Kneisel Concert they gave us Haydn's Quartet in C, op. 33, No. 3, and Brahms's Quartet in A-minor, op. 51, two capital specimens of the ancient and modern classic schools; but the most satisfying pleasure came from Beethoven's Serenade in D, op. 25, for flute, violin, viola, Charles Mole playing the flute in a thoroughly artistic way, especially the exacting music of the Minuet. The usual high-toned and sympathetic audience filled Chickering Hall.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 19, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth symphony programme, given in the Music Hall last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.
Haydn: Air, "With verdure clad," from "The Creation."
Beethoven: Two movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, Opus 125.
Mozart: Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro."
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the singer.

It has generally been considered part of the etiquette of symphony concerts of high order, not to give fragments of symphonies. No doubt exceptions to this rule may sometimes be in order. For instance, when there happens to be one particularly fine movement in an otherwise uninteresting symphony—such as the first movement in Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, or the intermezzo in Goetz's symphony in F—there seems to be no good reason why this movement should not be given by itself, without derogating from the dignity of the concert. Such movements are too fine to be shelved for good and all, and there is little artistic common sense in forcing the audience to gape through three others, just for the pleasure of hearing the good one. Again there are choral symphonies—like Beethoven's ninth, and Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette"—which it is practically impossible to give entire as often as one would like to hear them, from the difficulty of collecting together and drilling an adequate chorus. It is hard to see why the purely orchestral parts of such works should not be given at times, leaving the choral parts for more special occasions. We have often wondered why the three symphonic movements from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" are never given at our symphony concerts: they would be heard there to the best advantage, which they are not at oratorio concerts, simply because the acoustical conditions of a large mass of surrounding chorus-singers are not favorable to the best effect of an orchestra. The three orchestral movements in the ninth symphony might well be given without the choral finale; it would give our public a chance of hearing these wonderful movements oftener than would be possible if the work were never to be given, save in its integrity.

But these are, we think, the only cases in which it is well to dismember a work, all parts of which are ideally connected together—the only cases in which symphonic fragments can properly be given hors de leur vrai cadre at first-class concerts. With the older orchestral suites it is a wholly different matter; the several movements of these have no ideal connection with each other, and there is no internal reason why a suite by Bach or Handel should not be dismembered as much as the programme-maker pleases: nothing is lost, and often much gained thereby. But to dismember a symphony, except in the cases mentioned above, is a serious, and generally an inartistic, piece of business, only to be excused by such practical considerations as the impossibility of giving the entire work with desirable frequency.

To our mind, it was a great mistake to give the Adagio and Scherzo of the ninth symphony by themselves; to give all three of the orchestral movements, in their proper order, would have been all right; but to give these two, and out of their proper order, at that, smacks too strongly of the Kursaal or the "popular" promenade concert. It was considerably infra dig. The effect, too, was unsatisfying; one longed to hear that glorious first movement, and the two movements played left us in the position of Oliver asking for more. It might be urged that giving the "Festival at the House of Capulet," the "Love-scene," and the "Queen Mab" from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" was just as bad; for there are two other purely orchestral movements,—the introductory "Combats, Tumult, Intervention of the Prince," and the "Romeo at the Tomb of the Capulets,"—in that symphony. But neither of these two movements is in any way symphonic in form, and to play them in addition to the three usually given would in no wise help to round out the selections to symphonic completeness. The three symphonic movements are those commonly given. Add to this that the orchestral introduction and tomb-scene in "Roméo et Juliette" are hardly known at all to our public, and their omission is consequently not seriously felt; but the first movement of the ninth symphony is perfectly familiar, and the audience has a very realizing sense of what it is robbed of. So much on this head!

Mozart's ever-wonderful G minor symphony was admirably played. We think Mr. Paur takes the Andante too slow and heavily; the music loses much of its dreamy, poetic grace thereby, and that persistent "fluttering of angels' wings" in the violins and wood-wind is made to assume too much of the character of an obstinately worked-out problem in counterpoint. The movement sounds severe and aseptic instead of poetic, graceful and replete with the most enchanting warmth of sentiment. But the rest of the symphony was capitally given.

Mr. Paur takes the Adagio in Beethoven's ninth, too, wonderfully slow; but here the effect is far different. Here, if anywhere, Wagner's dictum, "In a certain delicate sense, one may say of the pure Adagio that it cannot be taken slowly enough" is applicable. Some of us can remember the positively overwhelming effect Von Bülow made (in 1875-76) with his exceedingly slow tempo in the slow movement of the "Sonate pathétique;" this beauty of effect is perfectly reproducible in the Adagio of the ninth symphony: one may discuss it, but one cannot pooh-pooh it. And it can be said emphatically that, in spite of Mr. Paur's very slow tempo, the melodic flow of the music was still admirably well sustained, and its rhythmic character fully preserved. The whole movement was "well held together," as the phrase is. For one thing, the slow tempo made it easier for the orchestra to do some exceedingly beautiful bits of expressive phrasing and shading. The effect of making the fourth horn stand out so prominently (and with a certain "brassiness" of tone, too) in its descending arpeggio in the fifteenth measure, and at other corresponding points in the movement, was new to us, and struck us at first as a little crass; but the frequent recurrence of this figure, and always at the point in the theme indicated, gives it a certain thematic importance in itself, and it is no bad idea to have this emphasized. Before the movement was over we found that this underscoring the horn-figure paid well enough; there was [illegible] legitimate one [illegible] & S. [illegible] Hall, [illegible] with [illegible] version of the horn-parts in the second theme; that this remodelling of the horn-parts is necessary for the theme to produce any effect, seems unquestionable, and no one need cry out against "Vandalism." Only we think Wagner did not go quite far enough; had he put the clarinet, and sometimes the second oboe, parts up an octave, he would have got a brilliancy of reed tone that would better have counteracted the undue prominence of the horns, as he has written them; and, curiously enough, he has applied this very device in more than one passage in his own compositions. The medium register in the wind is fully represented by his horns, and the oboes and clarinets might well have been transferred to the upper register, to give it more brilliancy and edge.

The "Oberon" overture—one of the orchestra's chevaux de battaille ever since Gericke's day—was superbly played, and made the most brilliant effect imaginable. Only we found some of the toying with the famous horn passage superfluous and rather dandyfied. But the performance carried everything before it.

Mme. Blauvelt has a charming light soprano voice, well developed throughout its compass, and evidently knows a great deal about using it. She phrases at once naturally and with no little art; especially fine is the power she shows of "opening her voice" and throwing the tone well out into the house at the crucial point in a phrase. Her intonation is admirable, and she sings with great musical feeling. A certain personal charm and distinction, too, are not to be overlooked as important factors in the pleasure her performance gives. She has still something to learn, and that a person of her evident intelligence and musical organization will learn it in time and with further routine experience there can be little doubt. She has not yet quite learned to connect and fuse together all the delightful detail-effects she makes into a thoroughly consistent whole; as yet the separate details in her singing stand out somewhat too sharply as details. But she has already accomplished very much indeed, and gives promise of accomplishing more. Her singing both of the Haydn air and the incomparable "Voi che sapete" was highly delightful, and she was warmly and repeatedly recalled after both things, especially after the second.

The next programme is: Liszt, a Faust symphony; Clayton Johns, berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra (first time); Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, opus 47; Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist.

[99]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 19, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

Again the symphony concert calls for much praise and some little adverse criticism; praise for a perfection of execution that has seldom been exceeded in Boston, blame for a programme made up in a motley fashion. To give two movements from the great ninth symphony, in a city full of choristers, to change the order of the movements, to end a presentation of Beethoven's most earnest work with its lightest mood, was certainly to eliminate much of the educational and æsthetic character from the composition. Yet something may be said in extenuation, too; the last movement is not a very practicable one, it always reads better in the score than it sounds in the performance; and had the great first movement been given, it would have lacked a proper counterpoise, a balancing movement for its power, the work would have led to an anticlimax. However, it is better to let such work alone if it cannot be presented entire.

The performance began with that violet among symphonies, Mozart's G minor. It is customary to consider the "Jupiter" as the great work among the master's last group of symphonies, but to the present writer the G minor is the nobler work of art; other composers might imitate the contrapuntal skill of the former, no one but Mozart could ever have attained the delicacy, sweetness and fragrance of the latter. Barring an absence of some of the daintiness with which former conductors have invested it, the performance was an eminently satisfactory one. The grace of the chief figure of the first movement was well brought out, the violins playing excellently together, with most refined shading. The minuet was somewhat heavy and formal.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and "With Verdure Clad" was a good transition to the pathos of the first theme of Beethoven's Adagio. The singer made a very good impression; at first there was a tremolo in the voice, but this probably proceeded from nervousness, for it soon disappeared, and there was good artistic work in the management of the voice, which of itself has a most agreeable timbre. Mme. Blauvelt's second number, "Voi che Sapete," again showed the advantage of hearing music under proper conditions: she sang it about as well as Mme. Arnoldson did recently in Mechanics' Hall, but it sounded infinitely better; in Music Hall not a nuance was lost, and the beautiful contrasts made their due effect. Especially to be praised was the richness of the voice in the deeper phrases; "Gelo e poi sento, l'alma avvampar" was delivered with just the broad effect on the lower tones that the phrase demanded. There were many and hearty recalls at the close of the number.

Regarding the execution of the two movements from the Ninth symphony one can only speak ecstatically; Mr. Paur is proving himself far more of an acquisition than one would have deemed possible a few months ago. He does not give the fiery moods of his predecessor, (a fire that was without any insurance and that too often burnt up the intentions of the classical composer), but he has brought the orchestra to its highest efficiency: it is again the peer of any organization of its numbers in the world. The adagio was well played, and the second violins showed that they were not inferior to their rich relations, the firsts, in this movement; but the scherzo was a revelation. It is a rhythmic fantasie, demanding constant changes of accent and of phrasing, and to conquer these with good ensemble would prove the technique of any orchestra. They were given with perfect unity and shading on this occasion, and there was just the right amount of caprice displayed even to the brusque coda. It seems impossible to choose any special points for commendation where all was so well done, but the wind instruments were remarkably effective in this part of the programme; clarinette, bassoon, oboe, horn, all were finely played, and in the final number of the concert, the "Oberon" overture, they did quite as well. Perhaps one is the more inclined to notice this since it is not so long ago that the wind instruments were the Achilles' heel of the orchestra, now they have become as strong as any department of it.

In the accompaniments, too, the orchestra made its mark, for the support of Mme. Blauvelt in the Mozart aria was as free, as elastic, as well-shaded as if it had been played on a piano by a single performer. Altogether, then, the reviewer may bear with his disappointment at the haphazard way in which the programme was made up, in view of the brilliancy of its execution; but if Mr. Paur and his men are able to win success with such a handicap, what would they attain if the list were made out in a manner to show its musical gems to the best advantage? LOUIS C. ELSON.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 77.
SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur's programme at the Symphony concert last evening was eminently in keeping with the penitential season. With Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Weber as composers, there was little to disturb the serenity of the audience, and had it not been that the "Oberon" overture ended the programme, there was little in it that was calculated to excite the feelings.

The Mozart symphony in G minor was placed first in the evening's selections, and had an admirable reading under Mr. Paur's direction, its simple characteristics being adhered to, and the several movements being given a graceful and enjoyable interpretation. Mr. Paur added to this symphonic selection the adagio and scherzo from the ninth of the Beethoven symphonies, and played the two movements in a very conservative fashion, which gave great gratification to the audience.

The singer of the evening was Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, an artist who has been heard before here in more brilliant selections than those which she contributed to the programme. She has a singularly pure, musical soprano voice, and, although her delivery of the aria from "The Creation," "With Verdure Clad," was lacking in style, there was a simplicity and directness in her interpretation of the number that was very charming. Her second selection was the "Voi che Sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and in this selection Mme. Blauvelt's voice was heard with exquisite pleasure, her phrasing of the aria being characterized by rare intelligence, and her delivery showing admirable taste in every way.

The "Oberon" overture was splendidly played as the finale of the programme, and proved a great relief from the monotonous selections which had preceded it.

The concert of the coming week will have for its selections the "Faust" symphony by Liszt, a berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra by Clayton-Johns, the "Kol Nidrei" for 'cello and orchestra by Max Bruch, and Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." The soloist will be Mr. Leo Schulz. The patrons of the rehearsals are reminded that the one of the coming week will be on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.
WM. M. THOMS, Editor.
OFFICES, 23 UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1894.

Four novelties in the 15th Symphony Concert out of five members. The Symphony was the Brahms second. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist in Max Bruch's Romance for Violin and Orchestra, A-minor, op. 42, and the Saint-Saens' Concert Morceau, E-minor, op. 62, and much praised for his fine work. Emil Hartmann's overture, Eine Nordische Heerfahrt, was welcome as an occasional visitor. There was general dissatisfaction over the closing number, Rubinstein's humorous character picture, Don Quixote (once before given in Boston, by the Thomas Orchestra) as puerile, and repellant to artistic sensibility.

For the 17th Symphony Concert another novelty program. Liszt's symphonic poem, Orpheus, though not new here, is not often heard, and hardly bears out the fancies which the composer wreathes about it. The overture was Ruszlen and Ludmilla, by Glinka, written fifty, and first heard in England twenty years ago, and enlivening with its chimes. Komarinskaja, by the same composer, is a jolly mingling of a dance with a Wedding song, written in 1840. Noisy, but bright and winning. The chief opus was Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. Its Love Reveries might be religious, so far as the music indicates; but there is no mistaking the Ballroom intent; or the Field Scene, the March to the Scaffold; or the nightmare of thunderings which lead you to the awsome whir of the Walpurgis Night.

At the seventh Kneisel Concert they gave us Haydn's Quartet in C, op. 33, No. 3, and Brahms's Quartet in A-minor, op. 51, two capital specimens of the ancient and modern classic schools; but the most satisfying pleasure came from Beethoven's Serenade in D, op. 25, for flute, violin, viola, Charles Mole playing the flute in a thoroughly artistic way, especially the exacting music of the Minuet. The usual high-toned and sympathetic audience filled Chickering Hall.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 19, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth symphony programme, given in the Music Hall last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.
Haydn: Air, "With verdure clad," from "The Creation."
Beethoven: Two movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, Opus 125.
Mozart: Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro."
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the singer.

It has generally been considered part of the etiquette of symphony concerts of high order, not to give fragments of symphonies. No doubt exceptions to this rule may sometimes be in order. For instance, when there happens to be one particularly fine movement in an otherwise uninteresting symphony—such as the first movement in Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, or the intermezzo in Goetz's symphony in F—there seems to be no good reason why this movement should not be given by itself, without derogating from the dignity of the concert. Such movements are too fine to be shelved for good and all, and there is little artistic common sense in forcing the audience to gape through three others, just for the pleasure of hearing the good one. Again there are choral symphonies—like Beethoven's ninth, and Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette"—which it is practically impossible to give entire as often as one would like to hear them, from the difficulty of collecting together and drilling an adequate chorus. It is hard to see why the purely orchestral parts of such works should not be given at times, leaving the choral parts for more special occasions. We have often wondered why the three symphonic movements from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" are never given at our symphony concerts: they would be heard there to the best advantage, which they are not at oratorio concerts, simply because the acoustical conditions of a large mass of surrounding chorus-singers are not favorable to the best effect of an orchestra. The three orchestral movements in the ninth symphony might well be given without the choral finale; it would give our public a chance of hearing these wonderful movements oftener than would be possible if the work were never to be given, save in its integrity.

But these are, we think, the only cases in which it is well to dismember a work, all parts of which are ideally connected together—the only cases in which symphonic fragments can properly be given hors de leur vrai cadre at first-class concerts. With the older orchestral suites it is a wholly different matter; the several movements of these have no ideal connection with each other, and there is no internal reason why a suite by Bach or Handel should not be dismembered as much as the programme-maker pleases: nothing is lost, and often much gained thereby. But to dismember a symphony, except in the cases mentioned above, is a serious, and generally an inartistic, piece of business, only to be excused by such practical considerations as the impossibility of giving the entire work with desirable frequency.

To our mind, it was a great mistake to give the Adagio and Scherzo of the ninth symphony by themselves; to give all three of the orchestral movements, in their proper order, would have been all right; but to give these two, and out of their proper order, at that, smacks too strongly of the Kursaal or the "popular" promenade concert. It was considerably infra dig. The effect, too, was unsatisfying; one longed to hear that glorious first movement, and the two movements played left us in the position of Oliver asking for more. It might be urged that giving the "Festival at the House of Capulet," the "Love-scene," and the "Queen Mab" from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" was just as bad; for there are two other purely orchestral movements,—the introductory "Combats, Tumult, Intervention of the Prince," and the "Romeo at the Tomb of the Capulets,"—in that symphony. But neither of these two movements is in any way symphonic in form, and to play them in addition to the three usually given would in no wise help to round out the selections to symphonic completeness. The three symphonic movements are those commonly given. Add to this that the orchestral introduction and tomb-scene in "Roméo et Juliette" are hardly known at all to our public, and their omission is consequently not seriously felt; but the first movement of the ninth symphony is perfectly familiar, and the audience has a very realizing sense of what it is robbed of. So much on this head!

Mozart's ever-wonderful G minor symphony was admirably played. We think Mr. Paur takes the Andante too slow and heavily; the music loses much of its dreamy, poetic grace thereby, and that persistent "fluttering of angels' wings" in the violins and wood-wind is made to assume too much of the character of an obstinately worked-out problem in counterpoint. The movement sounds severe and ascetic, instead of poetic, graceful and replete with the most enchanting warmth of sentiment. But the rest of the symphony was capitally given.

Mr. Paur takes the Adagio in Beethoven's ninth, too, wonderfully slow; but here the effect is far different. Here, if anywhere, Wagner's dictum, "In a certain delicate sense, one may say of the pure Adagio that it cannot be taken slowly enough" is applicable. Some of us can remember the positively overwhelming effect Von Bülow made (in 1875-76) with his exceedingly slow tempo in the slow movement of the "Sonate pathétique;" this beauty of effect is perfectly reproducible in the Adagio of the ninth symphony; one may discuss it, but one cannot pooh-pooh it. And it can be said emphatically that, in spite of Mr. Paur's very slow tempo, the melodic flow of the music was still admirably well sustained, and its rhythmic character fully preserved. The whole movement was "well held together," as the phrase is. For one thing, the slow tempo made it easier for the orchestra to do some exceedingly beautiful bits of expressive phrasing and shading. The effect of making the fourth horn stand out so prominently (and with a certain "brassiness" of tone, too) in its descending arpeggio in the fifteenth measure, and at other corresponding points in the movement, was new to us, and struck us at first as a little crass; but the frequent recurrence of this figure, and always at the point in the theme indicated, gives it a certain thematic importance in itself, and it is no bad idea to have this emphasized. Before the movement was over we found that this underscoring the horn-figure paid well enough; there was an idea, and a perfectly legitimate one, behind it. The Scherzo was brilliantly played, with Wagner's version of the horn-parts in the second theme; that this remodelling of the horn-parts is necessary for the theme to produce any effect, seems unquestionable, and no one need cry out against "Vandalism." Only we think Wagner did not go quite far enough; had he put the clarinet, and sometimes the second oboe, parts up an octave, he would have got a brilliancy of reed tone that would better have counteracted the undue prominence of the horns, as he has written them; and, curiously enough, he has applied this very device in more than one passage in his own compositions. The medium register in the wind is fully represented by his horns, and the oboes and clarinets might well have been transferred to the upper register, to give it more brilliancy and edge.

The "Oberon" overture—one of the orchestra's chevaux de battaille ever since Gericke's day—was superbly played, and made the most brilliant effect imaginable. Only we found some of the toying with the famous horn passage superfluous and rather dandyfied. But the performance carried everything before it.

Mme. Blauvelt has a charming light soprano voice, well developed throughout its compass, and evidently knows a great deal about using it. She phrases at once naturally and with no little art; especially fine is the power she shows of "opening her voice" and throwing the tone well out into the house at the crucial point in a phrase. Her intonation is admirable, and she sings with great musical feeling. A certain personal charm and distinction, too, are not to be overlooked as important factors in the pleasure her performance gives. She has still something to learn, and that a person of her evident intelligence and musical organization will learn it in time and with further routine experience there can be little doubt. She has not yet quite learned to connect and fuse together all the delightful detail-effects she makes into a thoroughly consistent whole; as yet the separate details in her singing stand out somewhat too sharply as details. But she has already accomplished very much indeed, and gives promise of accomplishing more. Her singing both of the Haydn air and the incomparable "Voi che sapete" was highly delightful, and she was warmly and repeatedly recalled after both things, especially after the second.

The next programme is: Liszt, a Faust symphony; Clayton Johns, berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra (first time); Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, opus 47; Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist.

[99]

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, MARCH 19, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme Made Up of Familiar Numbers.

MR. PAUR'S COURAGE.

Beethoven's Music Treated with Loving Regard.

The Oberon Overture Very Well Given—The Drum Again a Nuisance.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria, "With Verdure Clad".....Haydn
Adagio and Scherzo from Ninth symphony, Beethoven
Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist.

As all the numbers performed are familiar, comment upon the compositions is unnecessary.

It only remains to speak of the performance, which as far as the orchestra is concerned, was admirable.

The delightful Mozart symphony was finely read by Conductor Paur; he giving himself some little latitude in the expression of the andante movement, but it was only the conception of a discreet musician and was not of an exaggerated form in the least, the effect of the music being enhanced thereby.

Mr. Paur always treats the music of Beethoven with loving regard for the great master's evident intentions, and so in these two movements we were vouchsafed a remarkably faithful rendering. These movements are the only ones worthy of perpetuation in this extraordinary composition of Beethoven's latest period, and it was gratifying to hear them unencumbered with the wearisome monotone of the first movement and the eccentricities of the finale. Mr. Paur is to be commended for his courage in so happily dismembering this uncouth specimen of the immortal master of symphonic composition.

The performance of the "Oberon" overture was an excellent one, but the rendering lacked that marvellous refinement that was such a positive characteristic of unrivalled interpretations of the Weber overtures by the master hand of Wilhelm Gericke. The admirable first horn player made much of the opening phrase for horn solo, but the diminuendo of the prolonged note was marred because of the falling from the pitch. The overture was played with remarkable precision and spirit.

The tympani as usual were out of tune. In the Scherzo of the Ninth Symphony the upper drum was nearly F sharp, which did not make a harmonious concord with the contrabasses playing F natural, to which pitch the drums are expected to be tuned. Besides, F sharp given by the drums as a major third in the key of D minor is a little queer to a musical ear against the F natural of the rest of the instruments.

The sound of these drums when subjected to the herculean thumps of the player always reminds me of the sheet-iron thunder of a theatrical storm. Mr. Paur should see that this overpowering nuisance is abated. It is the last relic of musical barbarism that existed during the incumbency of Mr. Nikisch.

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt is quite pretty, makes a pretty appearance, and has a pretty voice, but she has been badly taught, for her voice is not correctly placed and consequently, especially in the middle tones and in the softer passages, she is obliged to sing flat of the pitch, and often with a tremulous sound and always with an apparent muscular effort.

Neither is her style to be commended, for she gives a spasmodic impulse to all ascending scales, thereby forcing her voice, the only redeeming feature being that during this effort the true pitch is reached.

The Haydn aria was taken at too slow a pace, but it was not so untuneful as the Mozart aria which was so distressingly out of tune almost from beginning to end that one does not feel called upon to regard whatever else there may have been to comment upon, as good intonation is the first requisite of the singer, and when not attained, and sustained throughout as well, there is nothing to be said in praise of any accessory accomplishments.

Mrs. Blauvelt was consequently inadequate and out of place in such a programme. There are a half dozen or more choir singers in this city who could have sung both the arias infinitely better.

Now this failure to make the most of her delicate and beautiful voice must be charged to the instruction that has resulted in forbidding her accomplishing what might be creditable to her native, talents and agreeable to the critical ear. Mrs. Blauvelt should seek to remedy the difficulty before it is too late.

The audience was enthusiastic over her untuneful and inartistic performance, and was joined in the demonstration by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Had a man violinist played as falsely and with as little skill as the showing of the singer, the fiddlers of the orchestra would have considered him a fit subject for the bastinado.

And yet such immaculate performers as our concertmeister and his immediate companions were among the most energetic of those who applauded.

I am also surprised that some of my discriminating brother critics spoke in praise of the singer's performance.

I have taken occasion to speak critically but kindly of Mrs. Blauvelt's singing, for the vocal art is in such a degraded state that every effort should be made to revive its lost high standard, and it is every critic's duty who is competent to judge accurately of a singer's merits and demerits, to make as clear as possible what the difficulties are that handicap the public performer, and thereby assist in establishing finally a more critical judgment upon the part of the public so that the good model is easily distinguished when it is presented and commended accordingly.

The programme for next Saturday's concert will embrace Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns; Kol Nidrei for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; and Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." Mr. Leo Schultz will be the soloist. The public rehearsal will be upon Thursday afternoon instead of Friday.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, MAR. 20, 1894.

The Kneisel Quartette Concert.

The Kneisel Quartette series came to its end in Chickering Hall last night. While it was pleasant to think that each succeeding season would bring back the concerts, there was something of sadness in the thought that the hall which has been associated with so much noble music had come to a final end. Chickering Hall is now a thing of the past. The programme ran from the very oldest to the very newest string quartette and quintette music, beginning with an almost forgotten work by Dittersdorf, and ending with an unpublished composition by Dvorak. To revive Dittersdorf, was not altogether Quixotic; there is a degree of interest in watching the development of the string quartette, and Dittersdorf presents one of its earliest phases. But there is something more than a curious or an historical interest in his measures; he is melodic and graceful, he is sufficiently symmetrical, and he shows clearly (taking last night's quartette as a criterion) that he is a talent who has a right to exist spite of the greater works of greater masters. Genius should not always have the right to obliterate talent, and the prettiness of some portions of the string quartette that began the concert was a sufficient raison d'etre for the composition.

The first movement was delicate rather than ambitious, but the second movement awakened great enthusiasm; this latter was in "second Rondo" form, and its two counter themes, as well as its coda, consisted almost wholly of solo work for the first violin, which was given with excellent expression by Mr. Kneisel. The minuet was the most original movement, and the finale, full of quaint interruptions and unexpected pauses, was a chattering, jovial descendant from the Gigue, which was the finale of the suite, from which form the string quartette sprang.

Beethoven's quartette in E minor (op. 59, No. 2) which followed, no more demolished the airy measures of Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf, than an eagle would demolish a thrush or a linnet. It was a grand work grandly played. Then came a brand new quintette by Dvorak. Again there is a negro in Mr. Dvorak's woodpile. We ought to feel flattered at the classical apothesis of plantation music, but this is the third Afro-American work that we have had from this source recently, and one does not want the phrase "cherchez le negre" attached to Dvorak's works as "cherchez la Femme" was once to Oriental crimes. Nevertheless the treatment of the themes was unconstrained and easy, and there was an infectious hilarity in the work when suddenly Mr. Kneisel broke a string on his banjo,—I mean violin, and a pause for repairs ensued. Delightful altogether was the scherzo (allegro vivo) which followed. Here Dvorak made some fine use of the viola color for a dark contrast to the brighter passages.

Since there was a melancholy episode to the bright movement, the composer evened matters by giving a bright one to the andante. This movement was not in the folks-tone but was entirely beautiful without straining for any local characteristics. The finale, however, spite of its immense virility, seemed rather tawdry, and a camp-meeting flavor hung over the themes. It was said of Raff that he had such versatility in composition that if he desired to compose a string quartette he would write half-a-dozen for practice. Can it be that Dvorak has been practising thus with Negro themes? He has shown our composers the road to new effects in a purely native school; let us hope that he will not himself wear the path out.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1894.

A New Quintet by Dvorak Played at the Last of the Kneisel Concerts—Mr. Abloescher's Zither Concert.

The last concert of the ninth series of the Kneisel Quartet was given last evening in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet in E flat major.....Dittersdorf
Quartet No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.....Beethoven
Quintet in E flat major, op. 97. Allegro ma non tanto—Allegro vivo—Andante—Finale. (MS., first time).....Dvorak
Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

The quintet by Dvorak is one of his three experiments in founding a national American school of music on thematic material derived, as it is alleged, from negroes and Indians. The symphony and the quartet have been heard here during the season.

As music without any reference to ethnological claims or pretensions, the quintet after one hearing does not appear to be a work of as much merit as the quartet. The finale is cheap stuff, unworthy of the composer; and the other movements, though they will undoubtedly be popular for a time on account of marked and peculiar rhythm or on account of conventional pretty sentiment as in the theme and certain variations of the andante, seem to be the expression of experiment rather than unflinching musical conviction. To be sure, the effect of the first movement was in a measure marred by the snapping of a string of the first violin; in spite of the accident, the movement gave pleasure, superficial perhaps, but there is such a thing as amiability in music, and it is by no means to be despised. The second movement is the most characteristic of the four, with its realistic break-down and suggestion of interlocutor and end-men; but what in the world is that viola solo doing in the midst of the merriment? It furnishes a contrast; it was well played by Mr. Svecenski, but it did not seem in its proper place. The opening of the andante is dusky in its color, but the alleged negro quality of the theme is more after the pattern of S. C. Foster's sentimental warbler than after the negro of the South, whose ideas of music were largely imitative, in that he distorted camp-meeting tunes and the songs sung by the women of his owner's family. Some of the variations are Slavonic, and there is one that suggests strongly Bellini.

This quintet, as well as the other numbers of the program, was played exceedingly well. The quartet of Dittersdorf made a delightful impression when it was given about two years ago, and the impression was confirmed fully last evening. It is a singular fact that Dittersdorf's quartets were not mentioned by his contemporary biographers, and he himself does not refer to them in his interesting and pathetic "Autobiography." Yet this work must have made some noise in its day, for even now it is comparatively free from formalism or conventionality. Witness, for instance, the bagpipe drone in the last movement while the first violin sings a wild tune that might come from a Gipsy's mouth.

There was frequent and most hearty applause throughout the evening, and there were many recalls. It is always with regret that our music lovers attend the final concert of these admirable artists, whose return in the winter is anticipated joyfully.

It is announced that the concert last evening was the last that will be given in Chickering Hall, as the familiar room will hereafter be used for business purposes.

PHILLIP HALE.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCV, NO. 79.

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The season's series of concerts by the Kneisel quartet was brilliantly ended last evening at Chickering Hall, the audience attending representing the best circles of social and artistic life in the city. The programme consisted of Dittersdorf's quartet in E-flat major, Beethoven's quartet in E minor, op. 59, No. 2, and Dvorak's quintet in E-flat major, MS. In selecting Dvorak's quintet as the novelty of the evening a most enjoyable feature was added to the programme, and the Bohemian composer's tuneful work was played with all the finish and brilliancy demanded to realize its beauties. The same excellence was shown in the Dittersdorf and Beethoven compositions, so that the programme as a whole made a notable ending for the season's performances. Mr. Kneisel and his associates have never labored more zealously or with better results than in the concerts of this season, and it is gratifying to know that, despite the financial depression, their return has been adequate to their efforts.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1894.

Kneisel Quartet.

The last of the series of eight concerts by the Kneisel quartet was given last evening in Chickering hall before a large and critical audience. Two of the works presented were in E flat major, the first number on the program being Dittersdorf's quartet and the last Dvorak's quintet, op 97, the latter receiving its first public performance in Boston. This composition was written last summer in Iowa, and bears strong traces of the influence upon the composer of so-called negro folk-songs and dances of the south.

In short, one might say that Dr Dvorak has idealized some of the negro ditties well known in this country. The music is not profound, but it is not trivial.

This number was heartily enjoyed by the critical audience, the novelty of the composition probably being the special feature.

Dittersdorf's quartet was charmingly played, the andante movement receiving a notably artistic interpretation. Beethoven's quartet was also performed with that delicacy and grace which always characterizes the work of this splendid organization. The club had the assistance of Max Zach, second viola in the quintet.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1894.

THE KNEISEL CONCERT.

At Chickering Hall last evening, the Kneisel Quartet brought to a close probably the most successful series of concerts ever given by this organization. The programme was a most interesting one. Dittersdorf's quartet in E flat major and Beethoven's quartet No. 2 in E minor were splendidly played and received with great enthusiasm. Dvorak's quintet in E flat major, four movements, was played for the first time, Mr. Max Zach assisting as second viola. The quintet is a sympathetic, catchy composition, and is of the same style of the later works of this composer, and was rendered in a delightful manner. The audience was a large one and intensely enthusiastic.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1894.

Chickering Hall: The Kneisel Quartet.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mr. Max Zach, gave the eighth concert of this, its ninth, season in Chickering Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Dittersdorf: Quartet in E-flat major.
Beethoven: Quartet in E minor, Opus 59, No. 2.
Dvorák: Quintet in E-flat major, Opus 97.

It was curious to note the success the Dittersdorf Quartet had with the audience; no doubt a good deal of the applause was a tribute to the superb playing, but the composition itself must have excited at least some of it. Equally euphonious and brightly melodious things of ten times its calibre have hardly got a hand, but this one seemed to drive the audience fairly wild with delight. Was it the humor in the work—of which there is a good deal—or was it that almost all there is in it lies palpably on the surface? Strangely enough the Andante, the principal theme of which is very suggestive of the sort of thing Lowell Mason and George F. Root used to give our church choirs to sing, did not seem to please the people any more than the Minuet and Finale. Upon the whole, here was a bit of musical resurrection that really paid and gave unfeigned pleasure.

The greater E minor Rasoumoffsky quartet was splendidly played and produced its unfailing superb effect. The playing of the Molto adagio was, in particular, well-nigh ideal.

Two whole quartets made one a little tired to be in more than a merely animally receptive mood for the new Dvorák quintet. We, for one, could hear the music and luxuriously drink it in with our ears, but really listen to it we could not; the spirit was willing but the flesh weak. The composition has evidently much of the "Spillville" element in it—an element which, some Bohemian musicians affirm, makes them feel very much at home—and we cannot say we like it any the better for this. That we are getting heartily tired of the uncivilized in chamber and symphonic music, we have said more than once before. When the man who belongs to what the geographies used to call the "civilized and enlightened" part of humankind voluntarily returns to barbarism, one cannot help a suspicion that effeteness of some sort has had a good deal to do with it. But the quintet has, nevertheless, much that is charming in it; it is frankly melodious, although the distinction of many of its themes is quite open to question, and very euphoniously written for the instruments. There is life and go to it. It was admirably played, and the audience seemed to find it to their taste. More than this we cannot say at present.

And so ends the ninth season of the Kneisel Quartet. The organization has steadily grown in artistic efficiency from the beginning; each one of its members has developed more and more with time, and their acquaintance with one another, their esprit de corps, has increased pari passu. One notices now in their playing something that may stand as one of the finest elements in concerted chamber-playing; perfect harmony of ensemble, which does not preclude the perfectly free expression of each player's individuality. Such a quartet is one for any city to be proud of.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

Eighth Concert, and the Last of This Season's Series.

The eighth concert of the Kneisel Quartet, and the last of this season's series, took place in Chickering Hall last evening. Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski and Schroeder were assisted by Mr. Max Zach, second viola. The programme was as follows:

Quartet, in E flat major.....Dittersdorf
Quartet, in E minor, op. 59, No. 2....Beethoven
Quintet, in E flat major, op. 97.....Dvorak
The latter is in manuscript and was played for the first time in Boston.

Karl Dittersdorf, whose original name was Ditters, was born in Vienna Nov. 2, 1739. He was a distinguished violinist and composer, his works embracing all classes of composition, including symphonies, oratorios, operas, violin concertos, string quartets, etc. He was intimate with Haydn, who was seven years his senior, and with Gluck, who was born 25 years before Dittersdorf.

His quartet given last evening was a particularly melodious work, charming in its simplicity and spontaneity, and sufficiently original to characterize it from the works of his eminent contemporaries. That it was delightfully played goes without saying.

The Beethoven Quartet, one of the most delightful of this class of the great composer's compositions, was rendered in a manner that fairly surpassed all previous efforts of this superior organization. The adagio was simply perfect, and it does not seem possible that quartet playing can be carried beyond the height of excellence reached in the rendering of this movement, either esthetically or in a technical sense. The audience were enthusiastic in the extreme over its performance and recalled the players several times.

We have already heard the symphony and the quartet written since Dvorak discovered that there was some available material in the tunes of our Southern negro that would make themes in the construction of works that might appear as music of a school naturally American.

The symphony was almost barren of results in this direction, but the quartet was a remarkable evidence of what a master hand could do in working out such a composition upon such themes.

The quintet has not borne such good results as the quartet did in the matter of the composers invention. There is much of the rhythmical peculiarities of the plantation tunes, to be sure, and some very ingenious display of the composer's resources, but regardless of the novelty of using a "breakdown" tune for treatment in a classic composition, it must be acknowledged that such material soon palls on the intelligent listener, and if any less eminent hand than Dvorak's had dealt with such shallow stuff, in a strictly musical sense, it would have been unbearable, no doubt. The quintet was superbly played.

This concert of the Kneisel Quartet was the last performance to be given in Chickering Hall, for the building is to be immediately remodelled for business purposes.

That this charming and convenient concert room is to become a thing of the past will be learned with regret by the large number of our musical community who have enjoyed so many delightful evenings within its walls. It is unfortunate that it should cease to exist, and particularly so as there is no hall suitable for chamber concerts and smaller musical affairs that can be had to supply the place made vacant in its demolition.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[100]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 25, 1894.

The twentieth Symphony concert was rather top-heavy, so to speak. It consumed more than the first full hour of its time with Lizst's "Faust" symphony, which was extracted from the hitherto unknown and may be relegated to the hereafter-to-be ignored without many regrets. It has its points of interest for their passing phrases of melody, for their devices of orchestration or for melting sequences of tone color. It displays imagination, art, taste and a great command of technical resource and tricksy ingenuity, and it casts some new light upon the workings of its author's genius. But when all is said and done, it has determined almost nothing and leaves the listener in doubt as to what Lizst really thought and wanted to convey. It is divided into three movements, respectively entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," each of which is supposed to be a character sketch of the personage whose name it bears. The first movement is a half an hour long and makes a confused and contradictory showing. Its general tenor might be described as inquisitive, groping and tentative, which is fair enough toward the philosophic, restless, unsatisfied side of Faust. Then it has periods of excitement and perturbation, whence it passes into a phase of large and stately kind—quite martial and romantic one would pronounce it—and it ends, after some grumbling and rumbling, in rather a calm and lofty fashion. To interpret it literally, would give us suggestions of a character which came to nobility, dignity and strength out of a good deal of disturbance and erratic experiment. The second movement is bland, dreamy and generally peaceful, indicative of a nature even more soft, smooth, high-thoughted and elegant than Gounod's Marguerite, and certainly much superior in temperament, susceptibility and aspiration to Goethe's little hausmadchen. There is a charm, however, in the dainty instrumentation of the movement, which begins with delicate passages for solos from the wooden wind and lower strings, and later has some other quite enchanting movements when the upper strings are divided into many parts, and the harp gives a shining support. The last movement is as enigmatical as the first and begins by intimating that Mephistopheles was a sort of hop-skip-and-jump devil—a Puck upon a larger scale. There is little which is particularly demoniac and certainly nothing which is decidedly dominant in it—nothing which arouses any feeling of dread, antipathy or horror. There are some groaning, some vague and uneasy dialogue, some hurrying, as of the black horses's feet, and some turmoil; but it comes at last to quite a pleasant and conventional ending after a brief return to the sonorous and inspiriting military episode noted in the first part. Altogether, while it may be well enough to have heard it once, we fancy that few people will care to hear it again, although perhaps the "Gretchen" movement might be welcome now and then for the sake of the pensive grace and quiet inventiveness of the scoring.

The rest of the programme was all light and produced rather a crushed effect after the long drawn wanderings and instrumental magnitudes of Liszt. Mr. Clayton Johns came first with a delightful little Berceuse and a lively scherzo for strings, neither of which was pretentious, but each of which was neatly and purely written, said its say simply and ended without attempt at amplification. Then Mr. Schulz played in a beautiful and truly sustained style that small grave 'cello arrangement by Bruch of the Hebrew religious air, "Kol Nidrei." The concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture, which was a thoroughly infelicitous choice, for a gay, brilliant, stirring work, preferable of the French school, was absolutely needed to refresh and inspirit the audience, fatigued by the first half of the concert and lulled by the second. The readings were almost unexceptionably good, and in the Liszt especially, the second violins and violas, as well as the wooden wind, had more opportunity than usual to show their proficiency.

There will be no concert this week, and the next programme in order will be this, which is to be a memorial for the late Hans Guido von Bulow: Funerale, (first time,) Von Bulow; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; two movements from Molique's violin concerta, for Mr. Roth; Brahm's "Tragic" overture, and Wagner's "Huldigung" march.

The Kneisel Quartette ended their season on Monday night with a programme which required no soloist, but employed a second viola, played by Mr. Zach, for one number, this being a manuscript quintette by Dvorak then played for the first time. For their initial selection they went back a hundred years and more and took from Dittersdorf his quartette in E-flat major, a sweet, airy and lightsome composition, yet surely compacted too of good material well disposed, having its touch of sentiment to modify its gentle scholasticism and a sparkle of vivacious mirth to brighten both. It was all played with an appropriately delicate touch and Mr. Kneisel was particularly happy in one movement which was virtually a solo for the first violin with a trio accompaniment. An excellent reading of Beethoven's quartette in E minor, opus 59, followed; and although the hearers felt the power of the great master, it was not at the expense of the ingenuous, honest earlier writer who had just been heard. The Dvorak quintette was interesting and able, and was accordingly well received. Although nothing was stated to that effect, there can be little question but that this composition is another exhibition of its author's idea that there are indigenous hints, if not actually themes, for music of local character and color. For although no subject in it and no use of any could be said to have any direct relation to what some people have ponderously called the "Afro-American," yet there was a good deal in it which one felt certainly would not—indeed we might say could not—have been written, anywhere but in America. That the idea was presented rather dogmatically and pushed too far, was plain, and one was inclined to think that some parts might have been almost as effectively arranged for the instrument which Europe is wont to regard as distinctively American. And if one is to accept a negro type of melody or of sentiment, why not accept the banjo along with it? The barbaric, the untutored and the unsymmetrical may do well enough as bases of a popular fantasia or possibly for an eccentric symphony; but chamber composition had best cling still to the approved forms and keep itself within the lines of gentle expression. When it becomes doctrinaire or sensational, it departs from its sphere and is in danger of becoming nondescript

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1894.

Carl Stasney in Worcester.

Here we are in the Heart of the Commonwealth, in the big hall beloved of political conventions and musical festivals, rather high up from the street, but hugely hospitable when you get into it. On the stairs a surprised greeting from Mr. Fred Cowey, unwontedly cheery, perhaps on account of his newly announced bethrothal. "Hello! what brings you here?" Sure enough! Well, your correspondent is here because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is here, or rather because Mr. Stasny is here with it. Front seats, whence best his fingers can be seen as he sweeps the Miller Grand—a new one, to have its primal public trial.

Not altogether too confortable are the chairs; but, as you wait, you can enjoy the big oil paintings of departed political worthies, hanging in the great panels behind the stage and balconies. Big as is this stage, it has to be extended a few rows to accommodate Mr. Paur's players, who are beginning to assemble. From Flutist Molé; from Violinist Akeroyd and Loeffler; from Cellist Schulz; from Concertmaster Kneisel, come pleasant nods, as they detect an unexpected pair of gleaming spectacles in the shadow of the platform. Perhaps 1,200 auditors have gathered,—not a crowd in such a mass-meeting place, but a good audience, nevertheless.

The time has come. Mr. Paur appears, and there is that interchange of smiles with his band, which characterizes his pleasant relations to his coadjutors. Discipline? Yes! But cordial co-operation throughout the ranks.

The baton descends. Beethoven's elfish Eighth Symphony, is beautifully played, with fine effects on the acoustic side; but the audience is rather cool, despite the music-loving celebrity of Worcester. The biggest applause of the evening is Stasny's meed, when he is recalled, after playing his selection, Edward Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, op. 16, A-minor, in three movements: Allegro molto moderato; Adagio; Allegro marcato. It is always a pleasure to see as well as hear Mr. Stasny, for his profile, like his manner, is clean cut, earnest, and musicianly. He devotes himself assiduously to his work, and his face shows just the tinge of nervousness which is the harbinger and assurance of conscientiously successful effort. Every part was well done, especially the runs and ensemble passages, the piano in such good rapport with the orchestra that they sometimes blended into such a harmonious whole that one was scarcely distinguished from the other. There is feeling also in Stasny's pianism.

The other orchestral numbers were the entracte music from Emmanuel Chabrier's opera, Gwendoline, some of the charming Feramor's Ballet Music; the Flying Dutchman's Overture, splendidly rendered.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1894.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria, "With verdure clad," from "The Creation".....Haydn
Two movements from Symphony No. 9.....Beethoven
Adagio.
Scherzo.
Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt was applauded heartily and deservedly last evening for her excellent singing of the airs by Haydn and Mozart.

The fact that two movements of the Ninth symphony were given occasioned some remark; but why should not a movement or two movements from a symphony be played? How many symphonies are there that seem homogeneous, or in which the movements seem so absolutely dependent on each other as in the G minor of Mozart, one of the most beautiful things in this world.

The performance of the orchestra was admirable. It is true that the drum player produced at times noise instead of sound in the Beethoven scherzo, but with this exception there was little to find fault with in the performance.

If the programs of the 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th Symphony concerts are viewed collectively, it must be admitted that Mr. Paur appears to choose at random. The compiler of the program book spoke the other day of how certain programs selected by Mr. Paur were "intended to illustrate the growth of that phase," &c., &c.; but I do not believe that Mr. Paur arranges the numbers with any intent of "illustrating" anything or educating in a specific manner anybody.

The program for the next concert is: "Faust" symphony, Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra. Clayton Johns (first time); "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr Leo Schutz is to be the soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last of this season's series of Kneisel concerts took place Monday evening at Chickering hall. The very delightful programme was made up of the following numbers:

Dittersdorf.....Quartette in E flat major.
Beethoven .....
....Quartette in E minor, Opus 59, No. 2.
Dvorak ....Quintette in E-flat major, Opus 97.

When one hears such a delightful composition as that of Dittersdorf, one is inclined to wonder how it happens that its author's works have been so generally shelved; for there were certainly great powers to charm and no little individuality in the composition. But a very limited acquaintance with Dittersdorf's works convinces one that concert-givers do well in giving them only rarely. Dittersdorf has, indeed, an individuality, but a very restricted one, and his style becomes exasperatingly monotonous before one has heard two of his works in larger form. On the contrary, an occasional rendering of a single one of his better works gives, as was the case on Monday evening, a great deal of pleasure. In giving this number, the quartette gave renewed evidence of its mastery.

In the Beethoven number, too,—the second of the great Rasoumoffsky group—our quartette showed its wonderful powers in handling more serious and more taxing compositions.

The Dvorak quintette, in which Mr. Zach assisted, was the novelty of the evening. It is another in the group of "New-World" compositions which the enthusiastic "Americanist" is writing. We cannot help wishing that Mr. Dvorak would give up his enthusiasm for the negro melodies. They are not so charming as those which he is accustomed to invent himself, and he certainly adopts no new and peculiar methods in treating them. We do not believe he is rendering any service to America or to himself in taking—or imitating—negro melodies, and in manipulating them in German or Hungarian fashion. The work was enjoyable enough, and beautifully played, but seemed hardly a fitting close to the splendid series of concerts.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 25, 1894.

The twentieth Symphony concert was rather top-heavy, so to speak. It consumed more than the first full hour of its time with Lizst's "Faust" symphony, which was extracted from the hitherto unknown and may be relegated to the hereafter-to-be ignored without many regrets. It has its points of interest for their passing phrases of melody, for their devices of orchestration or for melting sequences of tone color. It displays imagination, art, taste and a great command of technical resource and tricksy ingenuity, and it casts some new light upon the workings of its author's genius. But when all is said and done, it has determined almost nothing and leaves the listener in doubt as to what Lizst really thought and wanted to convey. It is divided into three movements, respectively entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," each of which is supposed to be a character sketch of the personage whose name it bears. The first movement is a half an hour long and makes a confused and contradictory showing. Its general tenor might be described as inquisitive, groping and tentative, which is fair enough toward the philosophic, restless, unsatisfied side of Faust. Then it has periods of excitement and perturbation, whence it passes into a phase of large and stately kind—quite martial and romantic one would pronounce it—and it ends, after some grumbling and rumbling, in rather a calm and lofty fashion. To interpret it literally, would give us suggestions of a character which came to nobility, dignity and strength out of a good deal of disturbance and erratic experiment. The second movement is bland, dreamy and generally peaceful, indicative of a nature even more soft, smooth, high-thoughted and elegant than Gounod's Marguerite, and certainly much superior in temperament, susceptibility and aspiration to Goethe's little hausmadchen. There is a charm, however, in the dainty instrumentation of the movement, which begins with delicate passages for solos from the wooden wind and lower strings, and later has some other quite enchanting movements when the upper strings are divided into many parts, and the harp gives a shining support. The last movement is as enigmatical as the first and begins by intimating that Mephistopheles was a sort of hop-skip-and-jump devil—a Puck upon a larger scale. There is little which is particularly demoniac and certainly nothing which is decidedly dominant in it—nothing which arouses any feeling of dread, antipathy or horror. There are some groaning, some vague and uneasy dialogue, some hurrying, as of the black horses's feet, and some turmoil; but it comes at last to quite a pleasant and conventional ending after a brief return to the sonorous and inspiriting military episode noted in the first part. Altogether, while it may be well enough to have heard it once, we fancy that few people will care to hear it again, although perhaps the "Gretchen" movement might be welcome now and then for the sake of the pensive grace and quiet inventiveness of the scoring.

The rest of the programme was all light and produced rather a crushed effect after the long drawn wanderings and instrumental magnitudes of Liszt. Mr. Clayton Johns came first with a delightful little Berceuse and a lively scherzo for strings, neither of which was pretentious, but each of which was neatly and purely written, said its say simply and ended without attempt at amplification. Then Mr. Schulz played in a beautiful a nd truly sustained style that small grave 'cello arrangement by Bruch of the Hebrew religious air, "Kol Nidrei." The concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage" overture, which was a thoroughly infelicitous choice, for a gay, brilliant, stirring work, preferable of the French school, was absolutely needed to refresh and inspirit the audience, fatigued by the first half of the concert and lulled by the second. The readings were almost unexceptionably good, and in the Liszt especially, the second violins and violas, as well as the wooden wind, had more opportunity than usual to show their proficiency.

There will be no concert this week, and the next programme in order will be this, which is to be a memorial for the late Hans Guido von Bulow: Funerale, (first time,) Von Bulow; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; two movements from Molique's violin concerta, for Mr. Roth; Brahm's "Tragic" overture, and Wagner's "Huldigung" march.

The Kneisel Quartette ended their season on Monday night with a programme which required no soloist, but employed a second viola, played by Mr. Zach, for one number, this being a manuscript quintette by Dvorak then played for the first time. For their initial selection they went back a hundred years and more and took from Dittersdorf his quartette in E-flat major, a sweet, airy and lightsome composition, yet surely compacted too of good material well disposed, having its touch of sentiment to modify its gentle scholasticism and a sparkle of vivacious mirth to brighten both. It was all played with an appropriately delicate touch and Mr. Kneisel was particularly happy in one movement which was virtually a solo for the first violin with a trio accompaniment. An excellent reading of Beethoven's quartette in E minor, opus 59. followed; and although the hearers felt the power of the great master, it was not at the expense of the ingenuous, honest earlier writer who had just been heard. The Dvorak quintette was interesting and able, and was accordingly well received. Although nothing was stated to that effect, there can be little question but that this composition is another exhibition of its author's idea that there are indigenous hints, if not actually themes, for music of local character and color. For although no subject in it and no use of any could be said to have any direct relation to what some people have ponderously called the "Afro-American," yet there was a good deal in it which one felt certainly would not—indeed we might say could not—have been written, anywhere but in America. That the idea was presented rather dogmatically and pushed too far, was plain, and one was inclined to think that some parts might have been almost as effectively arranged for the instrument which Europe is wont to regard as distinctively American. And if one is to accept a negro type of melody or of sentiment, why not accept the banjo along with it? The barbaric, the untutored and the unsymmetrical may do well enough as bases of a popular fantasia or possibly for an eccentric symphony; but chamber composition had best cling still to the approved forms and keep itself within the lines of gentle expression. When it becomes doctrinaire or sensational, it departs from its sphere and is in danger of becoming nondescript

AMERICAN ART JOURNAL.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1894.

Carl Stasney in Worcester.

Here we are in the Heart of the Commonwealth, in the big hall beloved of political conventions and musical festivals, rather high up from the street, but hugely hospitable when you get into it. On the stairs a surprised greeting from Mr. Fred Cowey, unwontedly cheery, perhaps on account of his newly announced bethrothal. "Hello! what brings you here?" Sure enough! Well, your correspondent is here because the Boston Symphony Orchestra is here, or rather because Mr. Stasny is here with it. Front seats, whence best his fingers can be seen as he sweeps the Miller Grand—a new one, to have its primal public trial.

Not altogether too confortable are the chairs; but, as you wait, you can enjoy the big oil paintings of departed political worthies, hanging in the great panels behind the stage and balconies. Big as is this stage, it has to be extended a few rows to accommodate Mr. Paur's players, who are beginning to assemble. From Flutist Molé; from Violinist Akeroyd and Loeffler; from Cellist Schulz; from Concertmaster Kneisel, come pleasant nods, as they detect an unexpected pair of gleaming spectacles in the shadow of the platform. Perhaps 1,200 auditors have gathered,—not a crowd in such a mass-meeting place, but a good audience, nevertheless.

The time has come. Mr. Paur appears, and there is that interchange of smiles with his band, which characterizes his pleasant relations to his coadjutors. Discipline? Yes! But cordial co-operation throughout the ranks.

The baton descends. Beethoven's elfish Eighth Symphony, is beautifully played, with fine effects on the acoustic side; but the audience is rather cool, despite the music-loving celebrity of Worcester. The biggest applause of the evening is Stasny's meed, when he is recalled, after playing his selection, Edward Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, op. 16, A-minor, in three movements: Allegro molto moderato; Adagio; Allegro marcato. It is always a pleasure to see as well as hear Mr. Stasny, for his profile, like his manner, is clean cut, earnest, and musicianly. He devotes himself assiduously to his work, and his face shows just the tinge of nervousness which is the harbinger and assurance of conscientiously successful effort. Every part was well done, especially the runs and ensemble passages, the piano in such good rapport with the orchestra that they sometimes blended into such a harmonious whole that one was scarcely distinguished from the other. There is feeling also in Stasny's pianism.

The other orchestral numbers were the entracte music from Emmanuel Chabrier's opera, Gwendoline, some of the charming Feramor's Ballet Music; the Flying Dutchman's Overture, splendidly rendered.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1894.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria, "With verdure clad," from "The Creation".....Haydn
Two movements from Symphony No. 9.....Beethoven
Adagio.
Scherzo.
Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt was applauded heartily and deservedly last evening for her excellent singing of the airs by Haydn and Mozart.

The fact that two movements of the Ninth symphony were given occasioned some remark; but why should not a movement or two movements from a symphony be played? How many symphonies are there that seem homogeneous, or in which the movements seem so absolutely dependent on each other as in the G minor of Mozart, one of the most beautiful things in this world.

The performance of the orchestra was admirable. It is true that the drum player produced at times noise instead of sound in the Beethoven scherzo, but with this exception there was little to find fault with in the performance.

If the programs of the 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th Symphony concerts are viewed collectively, it must be admitted that Mr. Paur appears to choose at random. The compiler of the program book spoke the other day of how certain programs selected by Mr. Paur were "intended to illustrate the growth of that phase," &c., &c.; but I do not believe that Mr. Paur arranges the numbers with any intent of "illustrating" anything or educating in a specific manner anybody.

The program for the next concert is: "Faust" symphony, Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra. Clayton Johns (first time); "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr Leo Schutz is to be the soloist.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1894.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE.

The last of this season's series of Kneisel concerts took place Monday evening at Chickering hall. The very delightful programme was made up of the following numbers:

Dittersdorf.....Quartette in E flat major.
Beethoven .....
....Quartette in E minor, Opus 59, No. 2.
Dvorak ....Quintette in E-flat major, Opus 97.

When one hears such a delightful composition as that of Dittersdorf, one is inclined to wonder how it happens that its author's works have been so generally shelved; for there were certainly great powers to charm and no little individuality in the composition. But a very limited acquaintance with Dittersdorf's works convinces one that concert-givers do well in giving them only rarely. Dittersdorf has, indeed, an individuality, but a very restricted one, and his style becomes exasperatingly monotonous before one has heard two of his works in larger form. On the contrary, an occasional rendering of a single one of his better works gives, as was the case on Monday evening, a great deal of pleasure. In giving this number, the quartette gave renewed evidence of its mastery.

In the Beethoven number, too,—the second of the great Rasoumoffsky group—our quartette showed its wonderful powers in handling more serious and more taxing compositions.

The Dvorak quintette, in which Mr. Zach assisted, was the novelty of the evening. It is another in the group of "New-World" compositions which the enthusiastic "Americanist" is writing. We cannot help wishing that Mr. Dvorak would give up his enthusiasm for the negro melodies. They are not so charming as those which he is accustomed to invent himself, and he certainly adopts no new and peculiar methods in treating them. We do not believe he is rendering any service to America or to himself in taking—or imitating—negro melodies, and in manipulating them in German or Hungarian fashion. The work was enjoyable enough, and beautifully played, but seemed hardly a fitting close to the splendid series of concerts.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 84.

SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Leo Schulz.

It is easy to forgive Mr. Paur for his recent sins of omission and commission in the way of programme making after hearing the concert of last evening.

Upon this occasion he made a very happy choice of his compositions, and arranged them in such a way that, although they covered an unusual amount of time, there was no sense of weariness during the performance, and his audience left the hall with an agreeable feeling of having enjoyed the entire list of selections.

The evening was begun with a splendid performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which had, so far as memory serves, its first performance here on this occasion. It might with more propriety be called a series of three symphonic poems having for their subjects Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. There is little in either of the three movements into which this work is divided that suggests purely symphonic form, and the free style in which the several subjects are treated is hardly in keeping with the traditions suggested by the word symphony. In the first movement, "Faust," the composer shows that he is not above borrowing from himself, but although the ideas and themes seem familiar, their treatment and development gives to the movement as a whole a degree of originality which makes it steadily interesting. It is difficult to say just what the themes suggest, but to those who are not compelled to have the programme before them in order to enjoy this class of compositions, the movement is steadily pleasing. In its scoring the composer has used all the resources of the modern orchestra, and in a way to present a series of tone pictures of the most fascinating character.

The "Gretchen" movement is full of poetic characteristics, and very suggestive of the subject treated, the development and working out of the themes being in a style strongly in contrast to those of the first movement. It is in the third movement, however, that Liszt gives himself the greatest freedom, and his writing in this part of the symphony is irresistibly amusing as well as vastly entertaining. The themes of the first and second movements are here parodied in the cleverest fashion, and the Mephistophelian style of the movement was caught up in the happiest fashion by the players, who, with their conductor, evidently enjoyed this part of the work quite as much as the audience.

Following the symphony came another comparative novelty, consisting of the berceuse and scherzo written for stringed orchestra by Clayton Johns. This delightfully dainty and melodious composition was played with charming grace, and displayed the taste of the conductor and his command over his men in the happiest fashion.

The soloist of the evening, Mr. Leo Schulz, was then introduced in the "Kol Nidrei" of Max Bruch, for 'cello, orchestra and harp. The noble melody selected by the composer for treatment in this bit of writing was played with admirable sentiment by Mr. Schulz, and his broad and tasteful treatment of the main subject showed him to be a thorough master of his instrument. The orchestral and harp parts of the composition were equally satisfactory, and the selection has, as a whole, never had a better interpretation here than on this occasion.

The programme was brought to a most enjoyable ending by a thoroughly artistic performance of the "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour during the coming week, and the concert on Saturday evening, April 7, will be in memory of Hans Guido von Bulow. The programme on this occasion will have as its novelty Bulow's "Funerale," and will include the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 25, 1894.

If last night's Symphony concert is a fair sample of the four remaining ones in this season's series, there will certainly be no dearth of novelties, for that of last night included two pieces entirely new, the Faust symphony of Liszt and a berceuse and scherzo for strings by Clayton Johns of this city.

The Faust symphony is so long as almost to be tiresome, its three movements occupying over one hour. It is a most curiously constructed composition, weird, yet often grand in the extreme. The full modern orchestra is required for its proper interpretation, and throughout there are a number of pretty themes which were exquisitely played. In the first movement the first violins render some lovely solo work, and the harp is utilized throughout with delightful effect.

The other novelty referred to was for strings alone. The first movement was a berceuse, and with the strings muted it had a most soothing effect after what had preceded. The second movement was fanciful, tuneful; but it must have occurred to the audience last night that both movements were painfully reminiscent. Still, that did not detract from their enjoyment.

The solo selection was the "Kol Nidrei" adagio for violoncello, played by Mr. Leo Schulz. It has both harp and orchestra accompaniment, which last night served as a delicate background for the excellent playing of Mr. Schulz. The programme ended with the Mendelssohn overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage." There will be no concert next week.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1894.

A program of unusual length was provided by director Paur for the last symphony concert of the Lenten season. The offerings were as follows: "A Faust Symphony," by Franz Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra, by Clayton Johns; "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello, with orchestra and harp, by Max Bruch, and an overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

The Liszt symphony was played for the first time here. It is an excessively long composition, requiring an hour and a quarter for performance, and in spite of its many beauties proved rather a severe tax on the attention of the audience.

The work is really three symphonic poems rather than a symphony and is intended to be descriptive of Goethe's characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

Like most of Liszt's compositions, this work is notable for elaborate ornamentation. The several themes are in themselves simple and suggestive, and they are treated in a very effective manner.

Especially effective is the manner in which the themes of the first two movements are reproduced in the third movement in the form of sarcastic parodies. This is strikingly in accord with the popular idea of the methods in favor with Mephistopheles.

The Gretchen movement is exceedingly sweet and delicate, but it is so full of repetitions in slightly varied forms that the sweetness becomes rather monotonous before the end. The symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra.

The Clayton Johns' berceuse and scherza were exquisitely interpreted. Not before has a similar composition been played with more grace, delicacy or artistic expression under Mr Paur's direction. It is a charming work and has added materially to the success already won by this Boston composer from Symphony concert patrons.

The "Kol Nidrei" is the first prayer by the Jewish high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, and it is the ritual melody of this prayer which Max Bruch has taken for the principal theme of his composition. It is, of course, very somber in character, but its performance was listened to with pleasure. Mr Leo Schultz played the solo 'cello splendidly and was cordially applauded.

The final number was Mendelssohn's overture, and the superb manner in which this delightful descriptive composition was played made it rather the most enjoyable offering of the concert.

There will be no Symphony concert this week. The program for the following week will be arranged in memory of Von Bulow, and the selections will be as follows: A funeral march, by Von Bulow; Beethoven's Symphony, "The Heroic;" two movements from Molique's first violin concerto, Otto Roth, solo violin; Brahms' "Tragic Overture;" Wagner's "Huldigung's March."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 25, 1894.

The Twentieth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—First Performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.

The program of the twentieth concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening was as follows:

A Faust Symphony.....Liszt
(First time.)
Berceuse and Scherzo, for string orchestra.....Clayton Johns
"Kol Nidrei" for cello and orchestra.....Bruch
Overture "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage"...Mendelssohn

Liszt spent much time over his "Faust" symphony. The first sketches were made between 1840-45. The work was completed in 1854, and the first public performance was in September, 1857, at the dedication of the Goethe-Schiller monument in Weimar. Then the restless man changed it considerably, and in 1861 the new and definite version was performed at Weimar under the direction of the composer.

Now, what is this symphony all about? There is a fourth movement in which the "mystic chorus" enters, sung by a tenor and male chorus, and "Das Ewig-Weibliche" ends the matter. This movement is often omitted, as it was last evening.

Profound German commentators find many things in the first movement, "Faust." There is the doubt of Faust and his disgust at all earthly knowledge; the answer of Fate to mortal questioner; the longing after a solution of the problem of life; the need of woman's love, etc., etc. So in the movement "Gretchen," there is the innocence of Gretchen, there is the happiness in love, etc., etc. "Mephistopheles," the third movement, is the musical expression of the Spirit that denies, and the Spirit spends here most of his time in burlesquing the motives of Faust and Gretchen.

Liszt simply put titles without text to the movements. The hearer is at liberty to draw his own conclusions. The first question of the hearer is not whether a certain movement expresses the character of this man or that woman, but whether the movement is of musical interest and worth. Judged from this standpoint, the "Faust" symphony is a colossal bore.

Liszt's bombast is bad; it is very bad; in fact, there is only one thing worse in his music, and that is his affected and false simplicity. It was said by George Sand that she had a habit of speaking and of writing concerning chastity in such terms that the very word became impure; so it is with the simplicity of Liszt. The very first theme in the "Gretchen" movement is a case in point. Gretchen here appears as the nuns in "Robert the Devil," who, aroused from their graves by Bertram's invocation, seem modest until they begin to dance to voluptuous strains. Whenever Liszt is naive or deeply religious look out.

It is true that in the "Gretchen" movement there are a few charming movements; but, as Rossini said of "Tannhaeuser," what dreadful half hours there are in the whole work. Faust is a dreary individual. Mephistopheles has little character; he is neither witty nor satanic.

Out of the whole orchestral turmoil, out of the mixture of bathos and rank sentimentalism, what remains in the hearer's mind? Nothing of this music, except possibly the theme in "Gretchen" that first appears in A flat, if I am not mistaken, the dolce amoroso.

The boredom induced by this symphony!

It was Vischer who once wrote a famous parody on the final chorus in Goethe's poem, and these two lines may be applied to Liszt's work:

"Das Ewig Langweilige
Zieht uns dahin."

* * *

Mr. Johns's berceuse and scherzo are unpretentious, amiable pieces of music, and they were a relief after the symphony. Now if Mr. Paur sees no harm in including such trifles in a symphony concert, why should he not allow a good Strauss waltz or an overture by Auber to enter the sacred precincts? Bruch's dull "Kol Nidrei" is well known here, and so are the abilities of Mr. Schulz, the 'cellist.

Mendelssohn's familiar overture had a new name in the program book, and it appears that there is a mighty difference between "Sea Calm" and "Calm Sea."

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 26, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

Again a display of great skill in conducting and performance, and absolute lack of tact and discretion in the formation of the programme. At the preceding concert Mr. Paur cut out the first movement of the great Ninth symphony; at this one he religiously gave every note of the interminable first movement of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, causing late-comers a wait of over half an hour in the corridor. The soloist of the concert began his work at half past nine, and the last number of the strange programme was played to many empty benches and to the boot-heel obbligato of many a departing auditor. The programme book stated that Liszt's symphony was given for the first time, but it has been heard in Boston before the present symphony orchestra was founded. It was then given with its proper ending, a chorus with words taken from Goethe's "Faust."

The first movement is a fearful picture of musical spasms; Faust in his struggles seems greatly to disturb the regular sonata shape, and all symphonic meaning (in the modern sense) is lost in vague growlings, having about as much shape as a London fog. At the end of the movement one is inclined to ask, with Southey's "young Peterkin," "Now tell us what 'twas all about?" It is a well-known fact in oratory that when a man has nothing to say, he takes a long while saying it, and here we find the same principle illustrated in music. Yet viewed purely as a bit of orchestral scoring, with no particular object, the work has a certain interest, it contains some unique bits of instrumental effect.

The second movement, picturing Marguerite, is much the best of the symphony. It is frequently given alone, a custom which our conductor might have followed to advantage. The work of the oboe and of the muted violins in this movement was exquisite, but there was some rigidity of phrasing in the most delicate passages.

In the third movement Liszt has brought ethics into music; to picture satan as the destroyer, powerless to create, there is no definite theme given to this part, but almost everything is founded on a mockery of the themes which have been presented in the preceding two movements. Possibly this fact may stand as an excuse for the infliction of the first movement upon the audience, but few could have appreciated this ethical touch, and these elect ones must have thought with the boy who had just completed his mastery of the alphabet, that it was not worth while going through so much to learn so little. Yet the general Diablerie of the movement is not without its charm, and it was played to perfection, a veritable technical triumph on which conductor and orchestra are to be congratulated. The omission of the final chorus was not a defect, for Liszt had this omision in view when he wrote the ending used on this occasion. In the full version Liszt gives an apotheosis of Marguerite in singing of "Das Ewig-weibliche," while in this finale the apotheosis is made by turning from the malevolent measures of Mephistopheles to a beatification of the Faust and Marguerite themes. But even to the end the spasmodic character is kept up, the work is a thing of magnificently colored shreds and patches, and when the musical hiccoughs ended with the kettle-drummer rapping violently to call the meeting to order, one was satisfied that the hour and a quarter of dissonance was quite sufficient without an added chorus.

Clayton Johns' melodic measures came like cold cream after inflammation. Under other circumstances, one might have held the Berceuse too light for symphonic concert use, but now the gentle passages of muted violins were cordially welcome. The scherzo which followed is a very concise bit of writing; like the Berceuse, it charms by straightforward melody only; its themes are well contrasted and graceful, and the carillon-like returning passage is also in place, but one could demand a larger form in an orchestral work. The composition won much applause. Now, at the time when suburbans take their trains, came Mr. Leo Schuiz with a short violoncello solo. It was Bruch's arrangement of the old Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei." This note of Jewish musical sorrow came rather sardonically on Easter eve., yet it made a great success. "Kol Nidrei" is probably the oldest Jewish theme in existence; many tunes are ascribed to Scriptural times, but they are always found wanting when weighed by the antiquarian. "Leoni" is given in many hymn-books as coming down from the Temple at Jerusalem, but people must accept the statement entirely on faith. "Kol Nidrei" itself does not go back so very far; its general style is Moorish, and it probably only carries us back to the time when the Sephardic Jews lived with the Moors in Spain. Mr. Schulz played with noble expression and the breadth of his C string was remarkable. He was recalled many times.

There was an evident haste to bring one number on the heels of another, caused by the length of the programme. Immediately that the cello solo was done Mendelssohn's "Becalmed at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" was rushed on. One was glad not to find the work marked on the programme as "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage;" this title has misled more auditors than one would imagine, and of itself shows the delusive character of programme music. Many listen to the first measures and imagine a tranquil and smiling sea, while the picture (which at once calls to mind a stanza from Coleridge) is taken from Goethe's verses:—

"Deepest stillness on the waters
Without motion rests the Sea,
And the Sailor sees around him
Only flat monotony.

Not a breath of air is stirring,
Awful silence, as the Grave;
In the whole wide, vast horizon
Moveth not a single wave."

The earnest introduction was taken a trifle too quickly, but the transition to the picture of the ship ploughing its way through the waves, homeward-bound, was excellently read, and the body of the work was brilliantly executed, even to the trumpet fanfares and the final bursting forth of the irrepressible kettle-drummer.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1894.

The Twentieth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, with the following programme:

A Faust Symphony.....Liszt
Berceuse and Scherzo.....Clayton Johns
Kol Nidrei, violoncello and orchestra.....Bruch
Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn

Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist.

The Faust Symphony, as far as my knowledge goes, has been given in its complete form only once in this city, and that was by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Bernard Listemann conductor, on the evening of Dec. 17, 1880. The choral part, which is for male voices and tenor solo, is quite short, appearing in the latter part of the final movement. This was omitted last Saturday evening, but otherwise the symphony was given complete.

Theodore Thomas has given it in its complete form in New York. The Gretchen movement has been heard here under Gericke.

If not a symphony in fact, it is a series of three character pieces. In form, it is chaotic and in meaning it is vague. There are occasional spots in the work that are beautiful, and the instrumentation is masterly in its variety of color and combinations, but when it is all said and done, what has it amounted to in its stupendous effort? Its extreme length, one hour and 10 minutes, renders it wearisome.

It was played in a marvellous manner, under the spirited and able direction of Conductor Paur.

To me, the performance of this composition proved, more than anything else, that Mr. Paur is the master of the orchestra, which now is in as efficient a state as at any time during its existence.

It no longer plays at sixes and sevens, as it did when Nikisch encumbered the position of conductor.

The difficulties of this composition, which would seem well nigh insurmountable, were overcome by the players with apparent ease. The facility with which the work was played was the only redeeming feature of the undertaking.

In the firm grip of Mr. Paur the orchestra will no longer drift at its own pleasure. It has to do his bidding now.

The Clayton Johns piece would be a tuneful "sugar plum" for the summer beer concerts. It was out of place in the symphony programme. Let Mr. Paur turn to the Strauss and Gungl waltzes for such material and the audience will be delighted.

The Kol Nidrei is a dreary composition, but Mr. Schulz played the 'cello solo in magnificent style. This excellent 'cellist has never shown a broader tone and more expressive style than in the performance of this piece of Bruch's. His intonation was perfect. He was recalled several times after its performance, and merited the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon his effort.

The Mendelssohn overture was admirably given, and ended the too long and not interesting programme, it being nearly 10 o'clock when it was finished.

The highly artistic and delightful playing of Mr. Sautet, the first oboe of the orchestra, in the Faust Symphony, must be mentioned. Mr. Sautet is a superior performer upon this difficult instrument.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening, the series being resumed Saturday evening, April 7, when a performance in memory of Hans Von Bulow will embrace the following works: "Funerale," Von Bulow; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven; "Tragic" overture, Brahms; Mr. Otto Roth will play two movements from Molique's concerto for violin, and the programme will end with Wagner's Huldigung's March.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

[102]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Liszt: A Faust Symphony.
Clayton Johns: Berceuse and Scherzo, for string orchestra.
Max Bruch: "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello with orchestra and harp, Opus 47.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Opus 27.

Mr. Leo Schulz was the 'cellist.

It is a good many years since all three movements of Liszt's "Faust" symphony have been given here; the second movement, "Gretchen," has been given separately now and then, but we doubt if many in last Saturday evening's audience remembered a note of the other two. Indeed it is no slight undertaking to give the work entire—nor to listen to it, for matter of that. It is enormously difficult, and lasts from sixty-five to seventy minutes—well over an hour! Of Liszt's two great symphonies—perhaps large would be the better word—the "Dante" and the "Faust," we must own to liking the "Faust" decidedly best. Both works are sharply characteristic of the composer, but in the "Faust" he seems to have worked under the influence of a more real inspiration.

The symphony may be called a monstrosity, without any one's needing to object. It shows all Liszt's faults in generous measure: his terrible and unflagging self-consciousness, his vain struggling after naïveté, his want of artistic measure, his general bent toward exaggerated expression. The first movement, in particular, furnishes more than one instance of the tediousness, the lack of true musical vitality, in his peculiar method of thematic development. Liszt seems to have had a passion for developing a theme in what is called sequence; the idea was not original with him, indeed, it is probably as old as thematic development itself; but his application of it is in one respect quite individual. It may be said of this plan of "development in sequence" that its prime artistic weakness lies in the fact that it is a cut-and-dried scheme from the start, and consequently almost necessarily precludes that constant display of inventiveness and felicity of resource that constitutes one of the greatest charms of thematic working-out. Its most obstinate and unstinted application is probably to be found in the free fantasia of the first movement of Adolph Saran's B-flat minor pianoforte sonata, Opus 5; and it is doubtless this very fact that best accounts for the exceedingly short-lived reputation this in many ways remarkable work enjoyed with musicians. But only examine these sequences in Saran's sonata, and you find that, cut-and-dried and formal as the scheme is, the result is by no means devoid of musical life and charm. Saran begins his working-out with a phrase of four measures, and then repeats it twice more, each time a semitone higher; then he adds a phrase of six measures, to round off the period. This whole period is then repeated, a tone lower than before. Then Saran begins another period (still on the same theme), in which phrases of two measures alternate with and are answered by other phrases of two measures, the sequence rising tone by tone with each repetition. Then comes still a third period, in which the phrase (still taken from the same theme) is only one measure long, the sequence now descending tone by tone with each repetition of the phrase. Here we have the scheme, which, cut-and-dried as it is, has a strong element of liveliness in it; this beginning with a sequence of four-measure phrases, then going on to to two-measure, and at last to one-measure phrases, presents the thematic material in a more and more condensed shape, and makes the fencing between question and response ever more lively and rapid. But when Liszt develops a phrase in sequence, he does little or nothing of this successive condensation of periods. Take the passage in alternate 4-4 and 6-4 time, marked "Meno mosso, misterioso e molto tranquillo," in the first movement of his "Faust" symphony; here he works up a phrase two measures long in sequence, repeating it nine times, changing key with every other repetition; but it is always one and the same phrase, over and over again, without variety and without any quickening of the diastole-systole of question and answer. The process becomes terribly tedious after a while, especially as this repeating the same thing over and over again without variation has no plastic, form-giving virtue whatever. The whole sequence sounds like mere reiteration, and says nothing more than was said in the first two phrases. We have thought it worth while to go into this matter at such length, because this lazy, absolutely cut-and-dried sort of development in sequence is a device of which Liszt is particularly fond, and the frequent application of which is perhaps the very dreariest feature in his compositions; in fact, this process cannot strictly be called one of development in any true sense of the word; the effect upon the ear is that of a sort of thematic marking-time, for the theme so treated really does not progress at all. There is more than one instance of this sort of thing in the symphony, albeit Liszt has been somewhat more merciful to the listener in this respect here than in his "Ideale."

Then, too, take the terribly tense and high-strung mood that pervades the work, the persistency of that uncomfortable, nervous interval of the augmented fifth almost throughout the first movement. This constant emotional high-pressure becomes frightfully wearing; after a while one begins to find this perpetual harping on the E-string of morbid sensibility unnatural and unreal; this constant acuteness of feeling and high nervous tension seem all too factitious and self-conscious. Again, take the second "Gretchen" movement; with all its undeniable musical beauty, what a terrible satire it is on Liszt's favorite maxim, "Il faut toujours tâcher de faire grand!" As a musical character-picture of Goethe's Gretchen, it is almost a blasphemy. Only think of anyone's trying to treat Gretchen "on a large scale!" This movement might pass as a character-picture of Madame de Genlis, or any high-strung sentimental-poetic female you please; but of Goethe's Gretchen, never!

Still, with and in spite of all its characteristic Lisztian blemishes, the symphony is unquestionably interesting, and something more. There is an enormous amount of work in it, and the sentiment in it seems throughout deeper and more genuine than one usually finds in Liszt. It is full of passages of really dazzling brilliancy, and the music sticks to its purpose unflinchingly. Then there is throughout the wonderful, aromatic charm of Liszt's orchestral colors individual and delightful. In the third, "Mephistopheles," movement Liszt has plainly owed much to Berlioz—indeed, the whole idea of the movement may be said to have been taken directly from the "Songe d'une Nuit du Sabbat" in the "Fantastic" symphony—but Liszt has made admirable use of his stolen ideas; the "irony" in the music is essentially Mephistophelian and heartlessly brilliant. We are quite free to own that, after the "Préludes" and "Tasso," this "Faust" is the first extended orchestral composition by Liszt that we have really enjoyed. The performance was, for the most part, superb, and showed the music in a most brilliant light.

Mr. Johns's Berceuse and Scherzo are two pretty little movements, and were pretty well played. Their absolute and unassuming simplicity was grateful after Liszt's high-strung complexities.

Mr. Schulz played Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" very beautifully indeed, but we cannot but find the composition itself dull and tedious. The real "Kol Nidrei" itself, when intoned by the high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, is said to be unspeakably impressive, grand and solemn. But try to be grand and solemn with a solo 'cello! That sugar-sweet voice is not tuned to solemnity.

Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" was capitally played and heartily enjoyed by all. There is descriptive and picturesque music that never for a moment forgets to be musical as well!

The next programme (for April 6 and 7, there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week) is to be in memoriam of the late Hans Guido von Bülow. Bülow, "Funerale;" Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), opus 55; Molique, two movements from violin concerto; Brahms, "Tragic" overture, opus 81; Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch. Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co.

Limited.

R. Friedlander.....President

406 NORTH FOURTH STREET

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, $5 per annum.

Donnerstag, 29. März 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchester. — Das letzte Konzert dieses vorzüglichen Orchesters hatte gestern Abend eine überaus große Anzahl von Kunstfreunden nach der Academy of Music geführt. Bei allen Hörern machte sich während des Abend das Gefühl geltend, daß damit leider eine erfolgreiche Saison der Organisation geschlossen werde. Herr Dirigent Paur hatte ein sehr interessantes Programm aufgestellt und führte außerdem seinen Konzertmeister Herrn Franz Kneisel und den eminenten Pianisten F. B. Busoni vor. Das Programm bot Liszts spanische Rhapsodie, welche von Mr. Busoni mit Orchester zum Vortrag gebracht wurde und in dem derselbe eine geradezu großartige Technik entfaltete; Mozart's Serenade No. 7, in welcher Herr Kneisel das Violin-Solo meisterhaft vortrug, Schuberts unvollendete Symphonie, die Oberon Ouverture und der packende Rakoczy-Marsch aus „Damnation de Faust" von Berlioz. Herr Busoni mußte obenein eine Da capo Piece einlegen. Jede Nummer wurde in meisterhafter Weise zum Vortrag gebracht. Das Publikum war für die Genüsse dankbar und ehrte das Orchester, die Solisten und den verdienten Dirigenten durch stürmischen Beifall.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1894.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

"Eine Faust-Symphonie".....Liszt
Berceuse and Scherzo, for string orchestra.....Clayton Johns
I. Berceuse: Andante con moto.
II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio: Poco meno mosso.
"Kol Nidrei," for violoncello, with orchestra and harp.....Bruch
Overture, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt," in D major.....Mendelssohn

Vischer's parody of the famous chorus may be applied well to this symphony of Liszt:

Das ewig Langweilige
Zieht uns dahin.

I know of nothing worse than the bombast of Liszt; stop, there is one thing worse in this wicked world, and that is the simplicity of Liszt. For the naïveté of the honorary Hungarian monk is like the nun's dress at the masked ball, when the air is hot and foul, and wrinkles burst through paint and powder, and eyes turn suddenly into plovers' eggs.

Liszt is most musically corrupt when he is either simple or deeply religious. When he speaks in Hungarian he is honest, but in church or in a virgin's bedroom he bears a striking resemblance to our old friend Tartuffe.

Is "Faust" or "Mephistopheles" the duller character in this long winded symphony? There is one charming "Gretchen" theme, the one that appears first, I believe, in A flat, "dolce amoroso." I speak from recollection, as I have not the score at hand. But, with the exception of this theme, what remains in the hearer's mind after he has been bombarded with themes repeated endlessly without variation, and with hair raising progressions? Then what a habit Liszt has of smiling at you affably and leading you up a long hill. Exhausted you arrive finally at the top. Then Liszt shows you wastes of sand that meet the horizon.

After this colossal bore Mr. Johns' simple pieces, with their conventional harmonies and respectably moving bass, seemed almost inspired. Lucky man, to follow with a simple tune the symphony of Liszt! If "After the Ball" had been played by the strings I believe the audience would have cheered wildly, for unpretentious, toy music was a relief.

Each succeeding week strengthens the impression that Mr. Paur knows nothing of the art of arranging a program.

Here is the program for the Symphony concert April 7. The concert will be in memory of Von Bülow:

Funerale (first time).....Von Bülow
Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica").....Beethoven
Second and first movements from concerto for violin.....Molique
Tragic overture.....Brahms
Huldigung's Marsch.....i. Wagner

Mr. Otto Roth will be the solo violinist.

* * *

THE last concert of the ninth season of the Kneisel Quartet was given on the 19th in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet in E flat major.....Dittersdorf
Quartet No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.....Beethoven
Quintet in E flat major, op. 97.....Dvorák
(MS.) (First time.) Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

It was an unalloyed pleasure to hear again the quartet by Dittersdorf. Played in January, 1892, at a Kneisel concert the quartet made a delightful impression, which was strengthened by the hearing of it last week.

Gerber called Dittersdorf "the darling of our nation" in the Dictionary of Musicians, written before the death of Dittersdorf, who during his lifetime was chiefly known by his violin playing, his operas, his oratorios, and the symphonies on subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses—early examples of program music. His string quartets are not mentioned by his contemporaries; nor does Dittersdorf allude to them in his fascinating and pathetic autobiography—a book that for its sincerity, frankness in acknowledging faults of character and delightful simplicity may be compared to the memories of Cellini, although it is true the latter was not often willing to admit that he went astray, and he spoke smugly of his murders and other licentious deeds. Yet this quartet must have attracted attention in its day—that is if it was then played in public, for in certain respects, as in the last movement where the first violin plays a defiant gipsy tune to the accompaniment of a bagpipe drone, it was ahead of its time. The first movement is in the manner of Haydn, smoothly written, melodious, interesting throughout. The andante is distinguished by its solemn harmonies and the melody given the first violin. The menuet is of the old-fashioned sort, a compromise between the pomp of the court dance and the jollity of the romping of the people. The work charms by its spontaneity, its honest conviction, its absence of padding and straining after effect. It was received last Monday with applause that was almost extravagant, but it was genuine.

In sharp contrast with this composition of the eighteenth century is Dvorák's negro quintet, for I believe that this quintet belongs to the series of experiments in founding a broad national school on the alleged scales, rhythms and tunes of a small and unrepresentative member of the whole body politic.

Now I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the negro in aboriginal or American music. I agree with Messrs. Woolf, Elson, Ticknor, Davenport and Apthorp in the opinion that even if the validity of the premises on which the apostles of the new negro school found their arguments that they may preach the gospel according to Dvorák be granted, it would be a sad thing for musical righteousness in the United States if our composers should henceforth devote themselves to the cultivation of barbarism.

Yet I cannot refrain from quoting a cheerful paragraph from Sir Richard F. Burton's "A Mission to Gelele, King of Dahomeh:" "The negro has never invented an alphabet, a musical scale or any other element of knowledge. Music and dancing, his passions, are as arts still in embryo."

To my mind this quintet, viewed as music and not a study in ethnology, is not as interesting as its associate the quartet and the symphony. The finale is pretty p stuff. The first two movements, with realistic breakdo and suggestions of interlocutor and end men, will enjo temporary popularity, more on account of rhythmic vices than thematic material or handling. And all throu the work, particularly in the third movement, there ample proofs that Dvorák's negroes have lived for a lo time in Bohemia.

The ensemble was excellent, and indeed the slow mo ment in the Beethoven quartet, with the exception of o pardonable slip on the part of Mr. Kneisel, was marv ously well played.

This was the last concert in Chickering Hall, which w in future be used for business purposes. The hall was ded cated November 7, 1883. There were that day two co certs, in which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Messrs. Lang Perabo, Osgood, Tucker, Hills, Foote, Fenollosa, C. F Adams, J. D. C. Parker and Preston took part. Other num bers were contributed by the Campanari string quartet, th Listemann string quintet and the Apollo Club.

* * *

The Times

EIGHT PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 29, 1894.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Boston Orchestra's Season. Busoni the Pianist.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening before a large audience. The programme arranged by Mr. Paur for this occasion was very attractive in the announcement, but proved rather insubstantial. The leading feature, after the "Oberon" overture, which was skilfully played, though without unusual sentiment, was one of Mozart's serenades, that to which the name of Haffner is attached, written for a chamber orchestra. The multiplication of the instruments in music of this character is of questionable value. The first violin was necessarily preserved as a solo part, and Mr. Kneisel played it beautifully, in perfect taste and with a br ghtness and fluency that won warm applause. But the effect would probably have been at least as good had the individuality of the other instruments been correspondingly retained, and the opportunities of hearing a great orchestra are so limited that it seemed a pity to give so much time to what is really chamber music. Amends were made, however, in the noble first movement of Schubert's unfinished symphony, the execution of which was broad and rich, as well as refined and thoughful. The second movement dragged, under Mr. Paur's habit of taking his slow movements very slow and exaggerating his soft passages; but the truth is that this second movement is in itself unsatisfying, and emphasizes the fact that the composition is "unfinished." After this Mr. Busoni played Liszt's Spanish rhapsody, a piano piece for which he has arranged a highly colored and stirring, if somewhat meretricious, orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Busoni is a pianist of extraordinary execution, playing the Liszt style of music with a dynamic exactness and an agility positively dazzling. It would have been a great pleasure to hear him in a composition of greater value. The concert closed with a stirring performance of the Rakoczy march.

THE MORNING HERALD BALTIMORE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season Given Yesterday.

It was when he directed the first performance of Richard Burmeister's "Chase After Fortune" in Berlin that Richard Strauss, the promising young German composer, became prominently known to Baltimoreans. Since then there has been a desire here to hear one of his master works, and that ambition was gratified yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the last concert of the season was begun with Strauss' Symphony in F minor. In this work can easily be seen why it is that the young master has gained fame as an exponent of modern ideas. National prejudices do not stand in the way of his combining German volume with French metre, and it is for this that Strauss is noted for richness and brilliancy of tone coloring, as well as consummate skill in orchestration.

The F minor symphony is novel for its wealth of originality. The scherzo, in particular, is unique for its frequent change of theme, and the elaborate manner in which it is worked up.

Ferruccio B. Busoni, the vulcan pianist, was the soloist, and his performance of Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" was a great piece of work. Busoni is possessed of the happy faculty of blending a stormy "Atta ca" with a rippling pianissimo in a manner which makes the shading effective throughout. He was heartily encored, and responded with a Liszt etude. The other orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Huldigungs March," and the overture to Beethoven's opera "Lenore."

It is with no little regret that the local lovers of good music see the Boston Symphony Orchestra season close. The organization is always a welcome visitor here and is given a hearty support. It is hoped that next season the series will be lengthened.

[103]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Liszt: A Faust Symphony.
Clayton Johns: Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra.
Max Bruch: "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello with orchestra and harp, Opus 47.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Opus 27.
Mr. Leo Schulz was the 'cellist.

It is a good many years since all three movements of Liszt's "Faust" symphony have been given here; the second movement, "Gretchen," has been given separately now and then, but we doubt if many in last Saturday evening's audience remembered a note of the other two. Indeed it is no slight undertaking to give the work entire—nor to listen to it, for matter of that. It is enormously difficult, and lasts from sixty-five to seventy minutes—well over an hour! Of Liszt's two great symphonies—perhaps large would be the better word—the "Dante" and the "Faust," we must own to liking the "Faust" decidedly best. Both works are sharply characteristic of the composer, but in the "Faust" he seems to have worked under the influence of a more real inspiration.

The symphony may be called a monstrosity, without any one's needing to object. It shows all Liszt's faults in generous measure: his terrible and unflagging self-consciousness, his vain struggling after naïveté, his want of artistic measure, his general bent toward exaggerated expression. The first movement, in particular, furnishes more than one instance of the tediousness, the lack of true musical vitality, in his peculiar method of thematic development. Liszt seems to have had a passion for developing a theme in what is called sequence; the idea was not original with him, indeed, it is probably as old as thematic development itself; but his application of it is in one respect quite individual. It may be said of this plan of "development in sequence" that its prime artistic weakness lies in the fact that it is a cut-and-dried scheme from the start, and consequently almost necessarily precludes that constant display of inventiveness and felicity of resource that constitutes one of the greatest charms of thematic working-out. Its most obstinate and unstinted application is probably to be found in the free fantasia of the first movement of Adolph Saran's B-flat minor pianoforte sonata, Opus 5; and it is doubtless this very fact that best accounts for the exceedingly short-lived reputation this in many ways remarkable work enjoyed with musicians. But only examine these sequences in Saran's sonata, and you find that, cut-and-dried and formal as the scheme is, the result is by no means devoid of musical life and charm. Saran begins his working-out with a phrase of four measures, and then repeats it twice more, each time a semitone higher; then he adds a phrase of six measures, to round off the period. This whole period is then repeated, a tone lower than before. Then Saran begins another period (still on the same theme), in which phrases of two measures alternate with and are answered by other phrases of two measures, the sequence rising tone by tone with each repetition. Then comes still a third period, in which the phrase (still taken from the same theme) is only one measure long, the sequence now descending tone by tone with each repetition of the phrase. Here we have the scheme, which, cut-and-dried as it is, has a strong element of liveliness in it; this beginning with a sequence of four-measure phrases, then going on to to two-measure, and at last to one-measure phrases, presents the thematic material in a more and more condensed shape, and makes the fencing between question and response ever more lively and rapid. But, when Liszt develops a phrase in sequence, he does little or nothing of this successive condensation of periods. Take the passage in alternate 4-4 and 6-4 time, marked "Meno mosso, misterioso e molto tranquillo," in the first movement of his "Faust" symphony; here he works up a phrase two measures long in sequence, repeating it nine times, changing key with every other repetition; but it is always one and the same phrase, over and over again, without variety and without any quickening of the diastole-systole of question and answer. The process becomes terribly tedious after a while, especially as this repeating the same thing over and over again without variation has no plastic, form-giving virtue whatever. The whole sequence sounds like mere reiteration, and says nothing more than was said in the first two phrases. We have thought it worth while to go into this matter at such length, because this lazy, absolutely cut-and-dried sort of development in sequence is a device of which Liszt is particularly fond, and the frequent application of which is perhaps the very dreariest feature in his compositions; in fact, this process cannot strictly be called one of development in any true sense of the word; the effect upon the ear is that of a sort of thematic marking-time, for the theme so treated really does not progress at all. There is more than one instance of this sort of thing in the symphony, albeit Liszt has been somewhat more merciful to the listener in this respect here than in his "Ideale."

Then, too, take the terribly tense and high-strung mood that pervades the work, the persistency of that uncomfortable, nervous interval of the augmented fifth almost throughout the first movement. This constant emotional high-pressure becomes frightfully wearing; after a while one begins to find this perpetual harping on the E-string of morbid sensibility unnatural and unreal; this constant acuteness of feeling and high nervous tension seem all too factitious and self-conscious. Again, take the second "Gretchen" movement; with all its undeniable musical beauty, what a terrible satire it is on Liszt's favorite maxim, "Il faut toujours tâcher de faire grand!" As a musical character-picture of Goethe's Gretchen, it is almost a blasphemy. Only think of anyone's trying to treat Gretchen "on a large scale!" This movement might pass as a character-picture of Madame de Genlis, or any high-strung sentimental-poetic female you please; but of Goethe's Gretchen, never!

Still, with and in spite of all its characteristic Lisztian blemishes, the symphony is unquestionably interesting, and something more. There is an enormous amount of work in it, and the sentiment in it seems throughout deeper and more genuine than one usually finds in Liszt. It is full of passages of really dazzling brilliancy, and the music sticks to its purpose unflinchingly. Then there is throughout the wonderful, aromatic charm of Liszt's orchestration, individual and delightful. In the third, "Mephistopheles," movement Liszt has plainly owed much to Berlioz—indeed, the whole idea of the movement may be said to have been taken directly from the "Songe d'une Nuit du Sabbat" in the "Fantastic" symphony—but Liszt has made admirable use of his stolen idea; the "irony" in the music is essentially Mephistophelian and heartlessly brilliant. We are quite free to own that, after the "Préludes" and "Tasso," this "Faust" is the first extended orchestral composition by Liszt that we have really enjoyed. The performance was, for the most part, superb, and showed the music in a most brilliant light.

Mr. Johns's Berceuse and Scherzo are two pretty little movements, and were pretty well played. Their absolute and unassuming simplicity was grateful after Liszt's high-strung complexities.

Mr. Schulz played Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" very beautifully indeed, but we cannot but find the composition itself dull and tedious. The real "Kol Nidrei" itself, when intoned by the high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, is said to be unspeakably impressive, grand and solemn. But try to be grand and solemn with a solo 'cello! That sugar-sweet voice is not tuned to solemnity.

Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" was capitally played and heartily enjoyed by all. There is descriptive and picturesque music that never for a moment forgets to be musical as well!

The next programme (for April 6 and 7, there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week) is to be in memoriam of the late Hans Guido von Bülow. Bülow, "Funerale;" Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), opus 55; Molique, two movements from violin concerto; Brahms, "Tragic" overture, onus 81; Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch. Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist.

Philadelphia Abend-Post.

Published every evening, except Sunday, by

The Post Printing and Publishing Co.

Limited.

R. Friedlander.....President

406 NORTH FOURTH STREET

Served to Subscribers at 10 cents per week, $5 per annum.

Donnerstag, 29. März 1894.

Boston Symphony Orchester. — Das letzte Konzert dieses vorzüglichen Orchesters hatte gestern Abend eine überaus große Anzahl von Kunstfreunden nach der Academy of Music geführt. Bei allen Hörern machte sich während des Abend das Gefühl geltend, daß damit leider eine erfolgreiche Saison der Organisation geschlossen werde. Herr Dirigent Paur hatte ein sehr interessantes Programm aufgestellt und führte außerdem seinen Konzertmeister Herrn Franz Kneisel und den eminenten Pianisten F. B. Busoni vor. Das Programm bot Liszts spanische Rhapsodie, welche von Mr. Busoni mit Orchester zum Vortrag gebracht wurde und in dem derselbe eine geradezu großartige Technik entfaltete; Mozart's Serenade No. 7, in welcher Herr Kneisel das Violin-Solo meisterhaft vortrug, Schuberts unvollendete Symphonie, die Oberon Ouverture und der packende Rakoczy-Marsch aus „Damnation de Faust" von Berlioz. Herr Busoni mußte obenein eine Da capo Piece einlegen. Jede Nummer wurde in meisterhafter Weise zum Vortrag gebracht. Das Publikum war für die Genüsse dankbar und ehrte das Orchester, die Solisten und den verdienten Dirigenten durch stürmischen Beifall.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1894.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

"Eine Faust-Symphonie".....Liszt
Berceuse and Scherzo, for string orchestra.....Clayton Johns
I. Berceuse: Andante con moto.
II. scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio: Poco meno mosso.
"Kol Nidrei," for violoncello, with orchestra and harp.....Bruch
Overture, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt," in D major.....Mendelssohn

Vischer's parody of the famous chorus may be applied well to this symphony of Liszt:

Das ewig Langweilige
Zieht uns dahin.

I know of nothing worse than the bombast of Liszt; stop, there is one thing worse in this wicked world, and that is the simplicity of Liszt. For the naïveté of the honorary Hungarian monk is like the nun's dress at the masked ball, when the air is hot and foul, and wrinkles burst through paint and powder, and eyes turn suddenly into plovers' eggs.

Liszt is most musically corrupt when he is either simple or deeply religious. When he speaks in Hungarian he is honest, but in church or in a virgin's bedroom he bears a striking resemblance to our old friend Tartuffe.

Is "Faust" or "Mephistopheles" the duller character in this long winded symphony? There is one charming "Gretchen" theme, the one that appears first, I believe, in A flat, "dolce amoroso." I speak from recollection, as I have not the score at hand. But, with the exception of this theme, what remains in the hearer's mind after he has been bombarded with themes repeated endlessly without variation, and with hair raising progressions? Then what a habit Liszt has of smiling at you affably and leading you up a long hill. Exhausted you arrive finally at the top. Then Liszt shows you wastes of sand that meet the horizon.

After this colossal bore Mr. Johns' simple pieces, with their conventional harmonies and respectably moving bass, seemed almost inspired. Lucky man, to follow with a simple tune the symphony of Liszt! If "After the Ball" had been played by the strings I believe the audience would have cheered wildly, for unpretentious, toy music was a relief.

Each succeeding week strengthens the impression that Mr. Paur knows nothing of the art of arranging a program.

Here is the program for the Symphony concert April 7. The concert will be in memory of Von Bülow:

Funerale (first time).....Von Bülow
Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica").....Beethoven
Second and first movements from concerto for violin.....Molique
Tragic overture.....Brahms
Huldigung's Marsch.....i. Wagner

Mr. Otto Roth will be the solo violinist.

* * *

THE last concert of the ninth season of the Kneisel Quartet was given on the 19th in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows:

Quartet in E flat major.....Dittersdorf
Quartet No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.....Beethoven
Quintet in E flat major, op. 97.....Dvorák
(MS.) (First time.) Second viola, Mr. Max Zach.

It was an unalloyed pleasure to hear again the quartet by Dittersdorf. Played in January, 1892, at a Kneisel concert the quartet made a delightful impression, which was strengthened by the hearing of it last week.

Gerber called Dittersdorf "the darling of our nation" in the Dictionary of Musicians, written before the death of Dittersdorf, who during his lifetime was chiefly known by his violin playing, his operas, his oratorios, and the symphonies on subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses—early examples of program music. His string quartets are not mentioned by his contemporaries; nor does Dittersdorf allude to them in his fascinating and pathetic autobiography—a book that for its sincerity, frankness in acknowledging faults of character and delightful simplicity may be compared to the memories of Cellini, although it is true the latter was not often willing to admit that he went astray, and he spoke smugly of his murders and other licentious deeds. Yet this quartet must have attracted attention in its day—that is if it was then played in public, for in certain respects, as in the last movement where the first violin plays a defiant gipsy tune to the accompaniment of a bagpipe drone, it was ahead of its time. The first movement is in the manner of Haydn, smoothly written, melodious, interesting throughout. The andante is distinguished by its solemn harmonies and the melody given the first violin. The menuet is of the old-fashioned sort, a compromise between the pomp of the court dance and the jollity of the romping of the people. The work charms by its spontaneity, its honest conviction, its absence of padding and straining after effect. It was received last Monday with applause that was almost extravagant, but it was genuine.

In sharp contrast with this composition of the eighteenth century is Dvorák's negro quintet, for I believe that this quintet belongs to the series of experiments in founding a broad national school on the alleged scales, rhythms and tunes of a small and unrepresentative member of the whole body politic.

Now I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the negro in aboriginal or American music. I agree with Messrs. Woolf, Elson, Ticknor, Davenport and Apthorp in the opinion that even if the validity of the premises on which the apostles of the new negro school found their arguments that they may preach the gospel according to Dvorák be granted, it would be a sad thing for musical righteousness in the United States if our composers should henceforth devote themselves to the cultivation of barbarism.

Yet I cannot refrain from quoting a cheerful paragraph from Sir Richard F. Burton's "A Mission to Gelele, King of Dahomeh:" "The negro has never invented an alphabet, a musical scale or any other element of knowledge. Music and dancing, his passions, are as arts still in embryo."

To my mind this quintet, viewed as music and not as study in ethnology, is not as interesting as its associates the quartet and the symphony. The finale is pretty poor stuff. The first two movements, with realistic breakdowns and suggestions of interlocutor and end men, will enjoy temporary popularity, more on account of rhythmic devices than thematic material or handling. And all through the work, particularly in the third movement, there are ample proofs that Dvorák's negroes have lived for a long time in Bohemia.

The ensemble was excellent, and indeed the slow movement in the Beethoven quartet, with the exception of one pardonable slip on the part of Mr. Kneisel, was marvelously well played.

This was the last concert in Chickering Hall, which will in future be used for business purposes. The hall was dedicated November 7, 1883. There were that day two concerts, in which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Messrs. Lang, Perabo, Osgood, Tucker, Hills, Foote, Fenollosa, C. R. Adams, J. D. C. Parker and Preston took part. Other numbers were contributed by the Campanari string quartet, the Listemann string quintet and the Apollo Club.

* * *

The Times

EIGHT PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 29, 1894.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Boston Orchestra's Season. Busoni the Pianist.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening before a large audience. The programme arranged by Mr. Paur for this occasion was very attractive in the announcement, but proved rather insubstantial. The leading feature, after the "Oberon" overture, which was skilfully played, though without unusual sentiment, was one of Mozart's serenades, that to which the name of Haffner is attached, written for a chamber orchestra. The multiplication of the instruments in music of this character is of questionable value. The first violin was necessarily preserved as a solo part, and Mr. Kneisel played it beautifully, in perfect taste and with a brightness and fluency that won warm applause. But the effect would probably have been at least as good had the individuality of the other instruments been correspondingly retained, and the opportunities of hearing a great orchestra are so limited that it seemed a pity to give so much time to what is really chamber music. Amends were made, however, in the noble first movement of Schubert's unfinished symphony, the execution of which was broad and rich, as well as refined and thoughful. The second movement dragged, under Mr. Paur's habit of taking his slow movements very slow and exaggerating his soft passages; but the truth is that this second movement is in itself unsatisfying, and emphasizes the fact that the composition is "unfinished." After this Mr. Busoni played Liszt's Spanish rhapsody, a piano piece for which he has arranged a highly colored and stirring, if somewhat meretricious, orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Busoni is a pianist of extraordinary execution, playing the Liszt style of music with a dynamic exactness and an agility positively dazzling. It would have been a great pleasure to hear him in a composition of greater value. The concert closed with a stirring performance of the Rakoczy march.

THE MORNING HERALD BALTIMORE.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season Given Yesterday.

It was when he directed the first performance of Richard Burmeister's "Chase After Fortune" in Berlin that Richard Strauss, the promising young German composer, became prominently known to Baltimoreans. Since then there has been a desire here to hear one of his master works, and that ambition was gratified yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the last concert of the season was begun with Strauss' Symphony in F minor. In this work can easily be seen why it is that the young master has gained fame as an exponent of modern ideas. National prejudices do not stand in the way of his combining German volume with French metre, and it is for this that Strauss is noted for richness and brilliancy of tone coloring, as well as consummate skill in orchestration.

The F minor symphony is novel for its wealth of originality. The scherzo, in particular, is unique for its frequent change of theme, and the elaborate manner in which it is worked up.

Ferruccio B. Busoni, the vulcan pianist, was the soloist, and his performance of Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" was a great piece of work. Busoni is possessed of the happy faculty of blending a stormy "Atta ca" with a rippling pianissimo in a manner which makes the shading effective throughout. He was heartily encored, and responded with a Liszt etude. The other orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Huldigungs March," and the overture to Beethoven's opera "Lenore."

It is with no little regret that the local lovers of good music see the Boston Symphony Orchestra season close. The organization is always a welcome visitor here and is given a hearty support. It is hoped that next season the series will be lengthened.

[103]

The Washington Post

MARCH 27,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra bade farewell to Washington for the season. Though it was their fifth appearance here this winter, Metzerott Hall was crowded to the doors. Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz, and Franz Liszt made up the programme, together with a composition of C. M. Leoffler, who for so many seasons has been a familiar face on the Symphony platforms at the head of the first line of violins. It was this number of Mr. Leoffler's that called forth almost, if not quite, the heartiest applause of the evening. It was a fantastic concerto for the violoncello and the orchestra. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, one of the two soloists of the evening, played the solo part in the number, and as the insistent applause that followed the climax rang out again and again over the house the player arose, bowed, and, leaning over to the composer, raised him by the hand and presented him with a smile to the audience as though to say that he was the one to be thanked for their entertainment.

The Berlioz number was two movements from the Fantastic Symphony, and proved, as Berlioz always does, one of the brightest, most artistic, and at the same time the most feeling of the evening. The first scene from the fields was a marvel of soft, warm sunshine, with the bird songs and hum of gauzy winged insects and all the color and movement of a sultry summer day. It was one of the few orchestral arrangements in which the great master attempted the suggestion of a thunder storm, but it was done to the life and formed a fitting climax for the composer's musical tribute to the great out doors. The method employed was artistic. The hush of the wind through the trees stilled the piping of the birds and against a background of deep toned harmony there played in and out a strain of lighter melody, like lightning against the thunder clouds. Then the rush of the wind increased, the wail of the string rose like a gale in the tree tops, and all around the horizon volleyed the quick roll of the thunder from the kettle drums, now far, now near, growing in intensity, and after a final crash overhead rumbling off in soft recurring echoes that finally died into silence.

The selection from Beethoven was symphony No. 4 in B-flat major. It was a mingling of the grave and gay, bright, allegro movements following in the wake of plaintive adagio minors with a tender, melodious little serenade running throughout almost the whole of the composition, recurring again and again like the wandering ghost of a dead lover haunting his mistress through the glittering mazes of the dance or whispering softly at her side while the majestic tones of the organ rolled under the echoing dome of some great cathedral.

The greatest show of enthusiasm during the evening was after the appearance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, the second soloist of the evening, who gave his own arrangement of Listz's "Spanish Rhapsody," a concerted piece for the piano and orchestra. It was enough to show that a Washington audience is fond of the pianoforte. Mr. Busoni's touch was light and rapid, but true feeling. The accompaniment of the orchestra was just suggestive enough of the rattling castanets and broken Spanish melody to bring out the full beauty of the soloist's playing, and at the end of the number Mr. Paur, from the leader's stand, joined heartily in the applause of the artist, laughing good-naturedly as the audience refused to be satisfied with the player's deeply appreciative bow, and motioning Mr. Busoni back to the piano to comply with the recall. This the player did, giving as an encore another of Listz's "Campanilla," and winning almost as hearty a recognition as at his first appearance.

The final number of the evening was Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremburg," and in this Mr. Paur appeared at his best, bringing out the full strength of his great orchestra in the interpretation of the only composer who ever gives the leader carte blanche as to the amount of vigor that he may put into the rendition of a number.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

A Brilliant Musician Whose Greatness Was Predicted by Hamerik.

Years ago Asger Hamerik, writing to Baltimore from St. Petersburg, described the contests for the prizes offered by Rubinstein to composers and performers. An Italian, Ferruccio B. Busoni, won the prize for composition and received high praise also for his piano playing. He was young and comparatively unknown, "but," wrote Mr. Hamerik, "the world will hear from him."

The world has heard from him, and that part of the world which heard from him yesterday at the last Boston symphony concert, at Ford's Opera House, readily accorded him a place among the great pianists. Busoni played his own arrangement for piano and orchestra of Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," a brilliant and effective arrangement, by the way, that preserved the showy Lisztian spirit and gave an additional Spanish flavor by the occasional tambourine and castanet touches in the orchestration. As to Mr. Busoni's playing it is astonishing in its brilliance and purity. Such faultless, clear and delicate fingering, such exquisite scales, such dynamic effects are seldom heard in a like degree. With this technical grasp of the pianoforte are allied a keen rhythmic sense and intellectual power, guiding and controlling all.

The orchestra, under Emil Paur's direction, gave a successful performance of Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, Wagner's "Huldigungs March" and an F minor Symphony by a young German composer, Richard Strauss, who is rapidly rising into prominence.

Baltimore American

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1894.

Boston Symphony's Last Appearance for This Season.

The Boston Orchestra closed its series of concerts for the season yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House. The concert was opened with Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, opus 12. The audience became impressed with the merit of the composition before the second movement, the scherzo, had proceeded very far, and at its close gave evidence of their approval. In the scherzo a number of themes are taken up and treated briefly and in brilliant fashion, the composer being familiar with the resources of the modern orchestra. There is a constant change of rhythm, and the grouping of the instruments is striking, the whole treatment being skilful and effective. The third movement, the andante, is equally attractive. There are fine passages for strings and wind instruments, the elaboration of the themes is scholarly, and there is richness of color and beauty everywhere. The first and last movements are not remarkably impressive. The symphony was finely rendered.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, a young Italian pianist, who has already achieved the distinction he deserves, was the soloist in Liszt Spanish Rhapsody, which he has arranged for piano and orchestra. Mr. Busoni played in Baltimore for the first time during the winter of 1892-3, at Sutro Hall, and astonished his audience at that time, most of whom had never heard of him. He added considerably yesterday to the impression already produced. The rhapsody abounds in the sensuous dance melodies which are characteristic of the Spanish people. They are varied, and treated in a style that is, by turns, dreamy, sentimental and dashing, but always suggestive of delightful poetry of motion. Mr. Busoni brought out their beauties in fine style, calling forth, at the close of his work, warm applause. The orchestration is cleverly done. It is not subordinated to the piano part, but the whole band is made use of, including the castanets, which give the scoring a distinctly Spanish flavor. The rendering of the rhapsody was thoroughly artistic. When Mr. Busoni was recalled, he played Chopin's famous polonaise.

Two other numbers of the orchestra were Wagner's "Huldegung's March," a piece by no means characteristic of the Wagner of later days, and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

Mr. Paur, as a leader this season, while his work has been in sharp contrast to that of his predecessor, has grown in favor at every concert. He impresses his audiences as a thorough musician, who is entirely devoted to his work. The orchestra, under his leadership, has reached a stage of development that leaves but little to be desired.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1894.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusually Successful Season Brought to An End by Conductor Paur.

The last of this season's concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience to the Academy of Music last evening that filled every section of the house, and one that was a representative assemblage of the best musical element of Philadelphia. The concert was delightful from the first number to the last, and proved conclusively that Mr. Paur is a master in programme-making. In the "Oberon" overture some beautiful shadings were produced, and the gradual working up to the climax in the "Finale" was a triumph in skillful orchestral manipulation. Although this is the end of Mr. Paur's first season as conductor, it is plainly noticeable that he has placed the orchestra under his control completely. The attack is nearer perfection than it has been in years, and the colorings and precision have vastly improved.

One of the most beautiful works heard in symphony concerts in years was the "Haffner Serenade," by Mozart, which last evening was introduced to the local audience. The five excerpts of this voluminous composition rendered contain charms that thrilled the listeners as works of this order seldom do. The first movement, the "Allegro Maestoso," is dainty and quaint and treated as brightly as anything Mozart has written outside of opera. It ends with a fine cadenza for the solo violin, as also does the second movement, while there are exceedingly catchy violin obligatos well distributed through all the parts. Mr. Kneisel played the solo violin part with a finish that surprised even his warmest admirers and after each number he was forced to bow acknowledgments repeatedly. The "Minuette," written in Mozart's jolliest vein, was given with vivacity and much sprightliness. The tempo of "Rondo" was unusually fast and displayed Mr. Kneisel's superior bowing and the orchestra's excellent training.

In this selection Mr. Paur demonstrated his greatness as a conductor, for at no time did the orchestra overshadow the soloist, and the subdued manner in which it was played was bewitching and very effective. The spirituelle work of Schubert, known as "The Unfinished Symphonie" was gracefully interpreted.

Nothing approaching the melodious sweetness of the "Andante con Mote" of this one of Schubert's greatest orations is to be found in the list of symphonic work. The modulations are charming and the orchestration delightful.

Especially fortunate was the selection of the soloist for this occasion, for seldom does a Philadelphia audience give vent to its enthusiasm to such an extraordinary extent as it did on the piano playing of Mr. Ferrucio B. Busoni last evening. The virtuoso was heard in his arrangement for piano and orchestra of Liszt's famous "Spanish Rhapsody." Mr. Busoni possesses a touch of rare velvety softness which is at the same time broad and powerful. His execution is as clear as that of Paderewski and Joseffy, outside of which no pianist heard in late years is his superior. His orchestration of this composition shows him to be a master of instrumentation and a genius in pleasing combinations. His artistic rendering called forth stormy applause of long duration, during which he bowed many times and finding that the large audience would not be satisfied with this he played Liszt's difficult "Campanella" excellently. The well-known "Rakoczy March" closed the concert and was played with abundant spirit and finish.

Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Director Paur Closes His Season Here With a Delightful Program.

The fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night, and was in many respects the most pleasing of the year. Director Paur failed to enthuse his audience on his first appearance, but has grown steadily in favor. The Wagner concert was one of the best ever given here, indicating that his strongest leanings are in the direction of the "music of the future." But the program last night was anything but Wagnerian and the interpretation of the classic compositions evoked more enthusiasm than on any similar occasion in years. The program included the "Obecon" overture, Mozart's Haffner serenade, Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Rakoczy march, from the "Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody, rearranged as a concerto with orchestral accompaniament, written by Ferrucio Busoni, who played the piano score. This was the novel fearure of the evening. Mr. Busoni appeared here last year as a soloist without making a decided impression. Last night he scored a complete hit. The familiar Spanish themes in the rhapsody have been scored for the orchestra with plenty of realism, giving them a remarkable amount of local color and characteristic vivacity. It has plenty of go in it. Mr. Busoni played alternately with decided force and with a feathery lightness suggestive of Paderewski. The audience was enthusiastic and Paur and the orchestra joined in applauding the pianist who wat obliged to give an encore.

The Oberon overture was played with great delicacy, and though in a somewhat different manner from what the same organization gave it under other directors, the result was highly satisfactory. The Serenade, which is an enlarged chamber composition, was played deliciously, Mr. Kireisel playing the solos with that masterly comprehension that have made this modest artist so deservedly popular. The unfinished symphony was played so well that again the audience was compelled to secretly mourn its non-completion. The spirited Rakoczy march closed an evening of the rarest musical delight.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 29, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many in the fine audience at the Academy of Music, last evening, when the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place, probably regretted that this was the close of the current series (a series, by-the-way, that has proved very successful), but it was at least highly satisfying to feel that the season was ushered out under such pleasurable circumstances. The programme selected by Mr. Paur was in some ways one of the most attractive of the whole list, and the orchestra carried it out with that faultlessness of execution and artistic manner of treatment that distinguish the performances of this great organization. Furthermore, the soloist of the evening, F. B. Busoni, the pianist, was a particularly welcome factor in the concert, and made so admirable an impression in a rearrangement of Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody that he had to yield to the enthusiastic demands for an encore piece. Mr. Busoni is a master of technique; his style is brilliant, and there is about his work a clearness of tone and gracefulness of touch at once gratifying and unusual. Certainly, nothing could have been more striking in its way that his playing in the Rhapsody, while the orchestral portion, be it added, was given with all needed verve and picturesqueness.

The other numbers on the programme included the poetic "Oberon" overture by Weber; the lovely "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert in B minor (which had a really noble presentation), and the stirring Rakoczy March, according to the version written by Berlioz, and introduced in his "Damnation de Faust." The latter hardly had the full Hungarian spirit imparted to it, but it was given with much effect notwithstanding. Yet another number was Mozart's No. 7 serenade in D major, or five movements thereof, wherein Franz Kneisel provided the violin obligato in an exquisite fashion, in keeping with the rest of the performance. The large audience was very enthusiastic at times, and rewarded Mr. Paur, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Busoni with well-deserved applause.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1894

In the evening the last Kneisel concert of the season once more filled the dear little hall; and what a treat! To begin with an old quartet in E-flat lively and brief; full of bright melody, written in the latter half of the last century by Dittersdorf, but not published till a hundred years later. Next, Beethoven's Quartet 2, in E-minor, op. 59. Lastly, a manuscript Quintet in E-flat, op. 97, first time here, by Dvorak, Max Zach assisting with the second viola; an attractive work which raises the question whether it is intended for the exploitation of more native American airs (like his late symphony), so full is it of melodious themes, at once strong and almost catchy, the Allegro Vivace, the second movement, giving us the eddying water-race, if not the whir of the mill.

J. H. W.

The Record

Philadelphia, March 29, 1894.

The Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a brilliant conclusion last evening at the Academy of Music, when Leader Emil Paur presented a farewell programme that was particularly well selected. The audience was large and enthusiastic; the enthusiasm reaching a high pitch at the conclusion of Pianist Busoni's performance of the "Spanish Rhapsody," by Liszt. This composition has been effectively rearranged and scored for pianoforte and full orchestra by Busoni himself in a manner that shows the arranger to be a scholarly musician. The scoring for the orchestra is both ingenious and elaborate, and there are introduced a number of descriptive effects that impart delightful color and expression to the work. A timely assertion of castanets is a bit of realistic detail that gives a charming emphasis to the dance measures. Busoni's work upon the piano, of course, closely follows Liszt, with a pardonable excursion now and then into intricate variations that afford the pianist opportunities to display his somewhat remarkable techinal skill. Busoni is neither a Rubinstein nor a Paderewski, but he is certainly a singularly well-equipped musician, with a skillful mastery of the keyboard that is at times astonishing. The feature of the orchestral programme was the "Haffner Serenade," of which five movements were presented. Leader Paur reads Mozart with a keen and thoughtful appreciation of the composer's meaning and intention, and the instrumentalists last evening responded to his direction with a precision and a completeness of effort that brought out the beauty of this composition with rare clearness. The orchestra was equally successful with Schubert's unfinished symphony, while nothing could be finer, for energy and spurt, than the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." A notice of the concert would be incomplete without reference to the excellent work contributed by Franz Kneisel, who had the violin obligato in the "Haffner Serenade."

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1894

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening before the large, intelligent and fashionable audience which it never fails to attract. A varied and interesting programme, including the "Oberon" overture, the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert and the Rakoczy march, as arranged by Berlioz, had been prepared for performance, and in all three numbers, as also in the Haffner serenade of Mozart and in Liszt's Spanish fantasia for pianoforte, with instrumental accompaniment, the orchestra, skilfully directed by Mr. Paur, played with that beauty of tone, that precision of attack, that unanimity of movement, that perfect lucidity of utterance and symmetry of proportion, which constantly characterizes its work, and which properly entitle it to rank among the half a dozen great orchestras of the world. Nothing could surpass the delicacy, the refinement, the lovely poetry of feeling which distinguished the playing of Weber's fairy music, as heard in the slow introduction to the "Oberon" overture, and yet it can hardly be said that the orchestra was better or was heard to greater advantage in it than in the rushing allegro by which the adagio is followed, or in the fiery, tempestuous Rakoczy march, which brought the concert to a close. It is such a great organization, it is composed of such excellent material, and is in such thorough training, that there is nothing it cannot do in the best possible manner, and whenever its playing is unsatisfying and unconvincing, as it sometimes is, as it was last night in the slow movement of the Schubert symphony, which dragged rather badly, it is the conductor who must answer for it. There were really two soloists last evening, although only one was announced. The Haffner serenade is full of passages for the violin obligato, which were rendered with admirable purity of tone and grace of execution by Mr. Kneisel, while Mr. Busoni showed an extraordinary command of the keyboard in his playing of the Liszt concerto. He was much applauded, and gave as an encore Rubinstein's "Campanella."

Baltimore Life,

MARCH 31, 1894

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last of a series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, season 1893-94, Emil Paur, conductor, took place at Ford's Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon. The programme, which was an excellent one, included compositions by Richard Strauss, Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner and Ludwig van Beethoven. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the soloist, and most praiseworthy was his rendition of Franz Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody, rearranged by himself as a Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra accompainment. He was repeatedly called before the footlights after rendering his first number and the echo of applause did not cease until the young, famous composer honored the audience with a second number. It is to be hoped that Manager Ellis will favor the music lovers of Baltimore with a series of concerts by his famous orchestra for the 1894-'95 season.

[104]

The Washington Post

MARCH 27,

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra bade farewell to Washington for the season. Though it was their fifth appearance here this winter, Metzerott Hall was crowded to the doors. Beethoven, Wagner, Berlioz, and Franz Liszt made up the programme, together with a composition of C. M. Leoffler, who for so many seasons has been a familiar face on the Symphony platforms at the head of the first line of violins. It was this number of Mr. Leoffler's that called forth almost, if not quite, the heartiest applause of the evening. It was a fantastic concerto for the violoncello and the orchestra. Mr. Alwin Schroeder, one of the two soloists of the evening, played the solo part in the number, and as the insistent applause that followed the climax rang out again and again over the house the player arose, bowed, and, leaning over to the composer, raised him by the hand and presented him with a smile to the audience as though to say that he was the one to be thanked for their entertainment.

The Berlioz number was two movements from the Fantastic Symphony, and proved, as Berlioz always does, one of the brightest, most artistic, and at the same time the most feeling of the evening. The first scene from the fields was a marvel of soft, warm sunshine with the bird songs and hum of gauzy winged insects and all the color and movement of a sultry summer day. It was one of the few orchestral arrangements in which the great master attempted the suggestion of a thunder storm, but it was done to the life and formed a fitting climax for the composer's musical tribute to the great out doors. The method employed was artistic. The hush of the wind through the trees stilled the piping of the birds and against a background of deep toned harmony there played in and out a strain of lighter melody, like lightning against the thunder clouds. Then the rush of the wind increased, the wail of the string rose like a gale in the tree tops, and all around the horizon volleyed the quick roll of the thunder from the kettle drums, now far, now near, growing in intensity, and after a final crash overhead rumbling off in soft recurring echoes that finally died into silence.

The selection from Beethoven was symphony No. 4 in B-flat major. It was a mingling of the grave and gay, bright, allegro movements following in the wake of plaintive adagio minors with a tender, melodious little serenade running throughout almost the whole of the composition, recurring again and again like the wandering ghost of a dead lover haunting his mistress through the glittering mazes of the dance or whispering softly at her side while the majestic tones of the organ rolled under the echoing dome of some great cathedral.

The greatest show of enthusiasm during the evening was after the appearance of Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, the second soloist of the evening, who gave his own arrangement of Listz's "Spanish Rhapsody," a concerted piece for the piano and orchestra. It was enough to show that a Washington audience is fond of the pianoforte. Mr. Busoni's touch was light and rapid, but true feeling. The accompaniment of the orchestra was just suggestive enough of the rattling castanets and broken Spanish melody to bring out the full beauty of the soloist's playing, and at the end of the number Mr. Paur, from the leader's stand, joined heartily in the applause of the artist, laughing good-naturedly as the audience refused to be satisfied with the player's deeply appreciative bow, and motioning Mr. Busoni back to the piano to comply with the recall. This the player did, giving as an encore another of Listz's "Campanilla," and winning almost as hearty a recognition as at his first appearance.

The final number of the evening was Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremburg," and in this Mr. Paur appeared at his best, bringing out the full strength of his great orchestra in the interpretation of the only composer who ever gives the leader carte blanche as to the amount of vigor that he may put into the rendition of a number.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

A Brilliant Musician Whose Greatness Was Predicted by Hamerik.

Years ago Asger Hamerik, writing to Baltimore from St. Petersburg, described the contests for the prizes offered by Rubinstein to composers and performers. An Italian, Ferruccio B. Busoni, won the prize for composition and received high praise also for his piano playing. He was young and comparatively unknown, "but," wrote Mr. Hamerik, "the world will hear from him."

The world has heard from him, and that part of the world which heard from him yesterday at the last Boston symphony concert, at Ford's Opera House, readily accorded him a place among the great pianists. Busoni played his own arrangement for piano and orchestra of Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," a brilliant and effective arrangement, by the way, that preserved the showy Lisztian spirit and gave an additional Spanish flavor by the occasional tambourine and castanet touches in the orchestration. As to Mr. Busoni's playing it is astonishing in its brilliance and purity. Such faultless, clear and delicate fingering, such exquisite scales, such dynamic effects are seldom heard in a like degree. With this technical grasp of the pianoforte are allied a keen rhythmic sense and intellectual power, guiding and controlling all.

The orchestra, under Emil Paur's direction, gave a successful performance of Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, Wagner's "Huldigungs March" and an F minor Symphony by a young German composer, Richard Strauss, who is rapidly rising into prominence.

Baltimore American

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1894.

Boston Symphony's Last Appearance for This Season.

The Boston Orchestra closed its series of concerts for the season yesterday afternoon at Ford's Opera House. The concert was opened with Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, opus 12. The audience became impressed with the merit of the composition before the second movement, the scherzo, had proceeded very far, and at its close gave evidence of their approval. In the scherzo a number of themes are taken up and treated briefly and in brilliant fashion, the composer being familiar with the resources of the modern orchestra. There is a constant change of rhythm, and the grouping of the instruments is striking, the whole treatment being skilful and effective. The third movement, the andante, is equally attractive. There are fine passages for strings and wind instruments, the elaboration of the themes is scholarly, and there is richness of color and beauty everywhere. The first and last movements are not remarkably impressive. The symphony was finely rendered.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, a young Italian pianist, who has already achieved the distinction he deserves, was the soloist in Liszt Spanish Rhapsody, which he has arranged for piano and orchestra. Mr. Busoni played in Baltimore for the first time during the winter of 1892-3, at Sutro Hall, and astonished his audience at that time, most of whom had never heard of him. He added considerably yesterday to the impression already produced. The rhapsody abounds in the sensuous dance melodies which are characteristic of the Spanish people. They are varied, and treated in a style that is, by turns, dreamy, sentimental and dashing, but always suggestive of delightful poetry of motion. Mr. Busoni brought out their beauties in fine style, calling forth, at the close of his work, warm applause. The orchestration is cleverly done. It is not subordinated to the piano part, but the whole band is made use of, including the castanets, which give the scoring a distinctly Spanish flavor. The rendering of the rhapsody was thoroughly artistic. When Mr. Busoni was recalled, he played Chopin's famous polonaise.

Two other numbers of the orchestra were Wagner's "Huldegung's March," a piece by no means characteristic of the Wagner of later days, and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

Mr. Paur, as a leader this season, while his work has been in sharp contrast to that of his predecessor, has grown in favor at every concert. He impresses his audiences as a thorough musician, who is entirely devoted to his work. The orchestra, under his leadership, has reached a stage of development that leaves but little to be desired.

The Philadelphia Press.

THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1894.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusually Successful Season Brought to An End by Conductor Paur.

The last of this season's concerts in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an audience to the Academy of Music last evening that filled every section of the house, and one that was a representative assemblage of the best musical element of Philadelphia. The concert was delightful from the first number to the last, and proved conclusively that Mr. Paur is a master in programme-making. In the "Oberon" overture some beautiful shadings were produced, and the gradual working up to the climax in the "Finale" was a triumph in skillful orchestral manipulation. Although this is the end of Mr. Paur's first season as conductor, it is plainly noticeable that he has placed the orchestra under his control completely. The attack is nearer perfection than it has been in years, and the colorings and precision have vastly improved.

One of the most beautiful works heard in symphony concerts in years was the "Haffner Serenade," by Mozart, which last evening was introduced to the local audience. The five excerpts of this voluminous composition rendered contain charms that thrilled the listeners as works of this order seldom do. The first movement, the "Allegro Maestoso," is dainty and quaint and treated as brightly as anything Mozart has written outside of opera. It ends with a fine cadenza for the solo violin, as also does the second movement, while there are exceedingly catchy violin obligatos well distributed through all the parts. Mr. Kneisel played the solo violin part with a finish that surprised even his warmest admirers and after each number he was forced to bow acknowledgments repeatedly. The "Minuette," written in Mozart's jolliest vein, was given with vivacity and much sprightliness. The tempo of "Rondo" was unusually fast and displayed Mr. Kneisel's superior bowing and the orchestra's excellent training.

In this selection Mr. Paur demonstrated his greatness as a conductor, for at no time did the orchestra overshadow the soloist, and the subdued manner in which it was played was bewitching and very effective. The spirituelle work of Schubert, known as "The Unfinished Symphonie" was gracefully interpreted.

Nothing approaching the melodious sweetness of the "Andante con Mote" of this one of Schubert's greatest orations is to be found in the list of symphonic work. The modulations are charming and the orchestration delightful

Especially fortunate was the selection of the soloist for this occasion, for seldom does a Philadelphia audience give vent to its enthusiasm to such an extraordinary extent as it did on the piano playing of Mr. Ferrucio B. Busson last evening. The virtuoso was heard in his arrangement for piano and orchestra of Liszt's famous "Spanish Rhapsody." Mr. Busoni possesses a touch of rare velvety softness which is at the same time broad and powerful. His execution is as clear as that of Paderewski and Joseffy, outside of which no pianist heard in late years is his superior. His orchestration of this composition shows him to be a master of instrumentation and a genius in pleasing combinations. His artistic rendering called forth stormy applause of long duration, during which he bowed many times and finding that the large audience would not be satisfied with this he played Liszt's difficult "Campanella" excellently. The well-known "Rakoczy March" closed the concert and was played with abundant spirit and finish.

Philadelphia Inquirer

THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Director Paur Closes His Season Here With a Delightful Program.

The fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night, and was in many respects the most pleasing of the year. Director Paur failed to enthuse his audience on his first appearance, but has grown steadily in favor. The Wagner concert was one of the best ever given here, indicating that his strongest leanings are in the direction of the "music of the future." But the program last night was anything but Wagnerian and the interpretation of the classic compositions evoked more enthusiasm than on any similar occasion in years. The program included the "Obecon" overture, Mozart's Haffner serenade, Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Rakoczy march, from the "Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody, rearranged as a concerto with orchestral accompaniament, written by Ferrucio Busoni, who played the piano score. This was the novel fearure of the evening. Mr. Busoni appeared here last year as a soloist without making a decided impression. Last night he scored a complete hit. The familiar Spanish themes in the rhapsody have been scored for the orchestra with plenty of realism, giving them a remarkable amount of local color and characteristic vivacity. It has plenty of go in it. Mr. Busoni played alternately with decided force and with a feathery lightness suggestive of Paderewski. The audience was enthusiastic and Paur and the orchestra joined in applauding the pianist who wat obliged to give an encore.

The Oberon overture was played with great delicacy, and though in a somewhat different manner from what the same organization gave it under other directors, the result was highly satisfactory. The Serenade, which is an enlarged chamber composition, was played deliciously, Mr. Kireisel playing the solos with that masterly comprehension that have made this modest artist so deservedly popular. The unfinished symphony was played so well that again the audience was compelled to secretly mourn its non-completion. The spirited Rakoczy march closed an evening of the rarest musical delight.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Thursday, March 29, 1894.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many in the fine audience at the Academy of Music, last evening, when the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place, probably regretted that this was the close of the current series (a series, by-the-way, that has proved very successful), but it was at least highly satisfying to feel that the season was ushered out under such pleasurable circumstances. The programme selected by Mr. Paur was in some ways one of the most attractive of the whole list, and the orchestra carried it out with that faultlessness of execution and artistic manner of treatment that distinguish the performances of this great organization. Furthermore, the soloist of the evening, F. B. Busoni, the pianist, was a particularly welcome factor in the concert, and made so admirable an impression in a rearrangement of Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody that he had to yield to the enthusiastic demands for an encore piece. Mr. Busoni is a master of technique; his style is brilliant, and there is about his work a clearness of tone and gracefulness of touch at once gratifying and unusual. Certainly, nothing could have been more striking in its way that his playing in the Rhapsody, while the orchestral portion, be it added, was given with all needed verve and picturesqueness.

The other numbers on the programme included the poetic "Oberon" overture by Weber; the lovely "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert in B minor (which had a really noble presentation), and the stirring Rakoczy March, according to the version written by Berlioz, and introduced in his "Damnation de Faust." The latter hardly had the full Hungarian spirit imparted to it, but it was given with much effect notwithstanding. Yet another number was Mozart's No. 7 serenade in D major, or five movements thereof, wherein Franz Kneisel provided the violin obligato in an exquisite fashion, in keeping with the rest of the performance. The large audience was very enthusiastic at times, and rewarded Mr. Paur, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Busoni with well-deserved applause.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1894

In the evening the last Kneisel concert of the season once more filled the dear little hall; and what a treat! To begin with an old quartet in E-flat lively and brief; full of bright melody, written in the latter half of the last century by Dittersdorf, but not published till a hundred years later. Next, Beethoven's Quartet 2, in E-minor, op. 59. Lastly, a manuscript Quintet in E-flat, op. 97, first time here, by Dvorak, Max Zach assisting with the second viola; an attractive work which raises the question whether it is intended for the exploitation of more native American airs (like his late symphony), so full is it of melodious themes, at once strong and almost catchy, the Allegro Vivace, the second movement, giving us the eddying water-race, if not the whir of the mill.

J. H. W.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, March 29, 1894.

The Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a brilliant conclusion last evening at the Academy of Music, when Leader Emil Paur presented a farewell programme that was particularly well selected. The audience was large and enthusiastic; the enthusiasm reaching a high pitch at the conclusion of Pianist Busoni's performance of the "Spanish Rhapsody," by Liszt. This composition has been effectively rearranged and scored for pianoforte and full orchestra by Busoni himself in a manner that shows the arranger to be a scholarly musician. The scoring for the orchestra is both ingenious and elaborate, and there are introduced a number of descriptive effects that impart delightful color and expression to the work. A timely assertion of castanets is a bit of realistic detail that gives a charming emphasis to the dance measures. Busoni's work upon the piano, of course, closely follows Liszt, with a pardonable excursion now and then into intricate variations that afford the pianist opportunities to display his somewhat remarkable techinal skill. Busoni is neither a Rubinstein nor a Paderewski, but he is certainly a singularly well-equipped musician, with a skillful mastery of the keyboard that is at times astonishing. The feature of the orchestral programme was the "Haffner Serenade," of which five movements were presented. Leader Paur reads Mozart with a keen and thoughtful appreciation of the composer's meaning and intention, and the instrumentalists last evening responded to his direction with a precision and a completeness of effort that brought out the beauty of this composition with rare clearness. The orchestra was equally successful with Schubert's unfinished symphony, while nothing could be finer, for energy and spurt, than the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." A notice of the concert would be incomplete without reference to the excellent work contributed by Franz Kneisel, who had the violin obligato in the "Haffner Serenade."

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THURSDAY, HARCH 29, 1894.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Last Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening before the large, intelligent and fashionable audience which it never fails to attract. A varied and interesting programme, including the "Oberon" overture, the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert and the Rakoczy march, as arranged by Berlioz, had been prepared for performance, and in all three numbers, as also in the Haffner serenade of Mozart and in Liszt's Spanish fantasia for pianoforte, with instrumental accompaniment, the orchestra, skilfully directed by Mr. Paur, played with that beauty of tone, that precision of attack, that unanimity of movement, that perfect lucidity of utterance and symmetry of proportion, which constantly characterizes its work, and which properly entitle it to rank among the half a dozen great orchestras of the world. Nothing could surpass the delicacy, the refinement, the lovely poetry of feeling which distinguished the playing of Weber's fairy music, as heard in the slow introduction to the "Oberon" overture, and yet it can hardly be said that the orchestra was better or was heard to greater advantage in it than in the rushing allegro by which the adagio is followed, or in the fiery, tempestuous Rakoczy march, which brought the concert to a close. It is such a great organization, it is composed of such excellent material, and is in such thorough training, that there is nothing it cannot do in the best possible manner, and whenever its playing is unsatisfying and unconvincing, as it sometimes is, as it was last night in the slow movement of the Schubert symphony, which dragged rather badly, it is the conductor who must answer for it. There were really two soloists last evening, although only one was announced. The Haffner serenade is full of passages for the violin obligato, which were rendered with admirable purity of tone and grace of execution by Mr. Kneisel, while Mr. Busoni showed an extraordinary command of the keyboard in his playing of the Liszt concerto. He was much applauded, and gave as an encore Rubinstein's "Campanella."

Baltimore Life.

MARCH 31, 1894

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last of a series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, season 1893-94, Emil Paur, conductor, took place at Ford's Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon. The programme, which was an excellent one, included compositions by Richard Strauss, Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner and Ludwig van Beethoven. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the soloist, and most praiseworthy was his rendition of Franz Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody, rearranged by himself as a Concert Piece for Pianoforte and Orchestra accompainment. He was repeatedly called before the footlights after rendering his first number and the echo of applause did not cease until the young, famous composer honored the audience with a second number. It is to be hoped that Manager Ellis will favor the music lovers of Baltimore with a series of concerts by his famous orchestra for the 1894-95 season.

THE STANDARD UNION.

SATURDAY EVE'G, MARCH 31st., 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is rumored that Mr. Paur will not be with the Boston Orchestra next season. Comparisons may be odious, but they are generally involuntary, and often salutary. The last rehearsal and concert necessitates some expression of opinion as to whether the season's close engenders the same state of feeling as that of a year ago. Then we knew beyond a shadow of doubt that we were parting with a conductor who had given many of us a more intense pleasure in the line of orchestral music than we had ever known. As the last note sounded, as Mr. Nikisch came back upon the empty stage and made his bow, as we filed out one one by one from the hall which but a few moments before had resounded with such a wealth of harmony, which had echoed the wonderful tones of as great an orchestra as the world holds, there was a positive sensation of pain. To-day, we know only a polite regret that a season of enjoyable musical instruction is at its close, and a less polite but more poignant regret that there is no probability of Mr. Nikisch's return.

It is not that Mr. Paur is not a conscientious worker and an earnest musician. No one who observes attentively his intellectual forehead, his bright, appreciative eye, the spiritual illumination of his whole countenance, the vim with which he plunges into the thick of each musical number, can doubt that he loves his work; that his aims are high, and that he is not without power. But the difference between Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur is the difference between poetry and mathematics. Those who love warmth, color, passion, cannot be argued out of their delight in the orchestra under one man, and their indifference to it under the others. Mr. Paur may be scholarly, honest and capable, but he is not and never can be imaginative; and he lacks magnetism. He never gets a full grasp either on his audience or his men, and the consequence is, performances which may be scientifically correct, but are not inspiring.

The difference between the two leaders is manifest not only in the performances, but in the selections. Mr. Nikisch, while adhering closely to high ideals; managed at the same time to arrange his programmes with the greatest art, allowing for the inevitable brain weariness which ensues from a succession of purely intellectual numbers. He introduced music, which appeals more to the heart and senses than to the head, and allowed us to drift at intervals into the realm of mere feeling. Professional musicians do not, as a general thing, realize the infinite blessing, if not the necessity, of periods of repose, in a modern classical programme. Too much Wagner, except in his more rational moments, too much Rubinstein, when he is on a musical "tear," and too much Brahms, in any of his dull, dry, dreary moods, is positive agony to many a listener. No one can contentedly make a whole dinner out of roast beef, good, wholesome, nutritious and orthodox though it may be; to long for a bite of ortolan and a sip of champagne is perfectly natural, and the wise host has them at hand.

The difference between Mr. Paur and Mr. Nikisch is something absurd to dwell upon, perhaps, because it is no more nor less than a difference of temperament. Mr. Paur can no more help his coldness, his angularities, his pedantry, than he can his fair hair, his blue eyes. It is simply Mr. Nikisch's luck that he is dark and Southern, with all the passion, personal magnetism, and artistic sensibility of the South—the European South. Yet, it must be confessed that, with all these fascinating characteristics, which are supposed to ally themselves to enervation and indolence, he was as alive to the necessities of exertion as the coolest-headed Northerner. Without the hardest kind of labor that Boston orchestra could never have attained the artistic perfection which it undoubtedly possessed, and which was never more apparent than when the leader was on the eve of bidding it good-bye. A slender, pale, refined-looking man, Mr. Nikisch, held those eighty odd men in the hollow of his hand, and exercised an authority as relentless as a military dictator. He permitted no liberties either from his musicians or his audience, and breathed his fiery spirit into both until there was but one thought through the whole multitude. When a leader brings about this result, there can be no question that he is a genius.

Mr. Paur is a man whom we may all respect, but it is a misfortune that he came after Nikisch. The public rehearsal of yesterday afternoon, like all the rehearsals of the winter, was enjoyable enough in its way, but it was neither distinctive nor remarkable. The programme included the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Mozart's "Hafner Serenade," Schubert's unfinished symphony in E minor, and the march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." In Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody, for pianoforte and orchestra, Mr. Busoni was the soloist. It was far and away the most enjoyable performance, both as regards the selection and the execution, that has been given by the Boston Orchestra this season. The overture to "Oberon" was rendered with a vim and spirit which almost took the listener off his feet; but still the concert increased in strength of instrumentation till it close in a blaze of glory, through the medium of Berlioz' "Rakoczy March" from the "Damnation of Faust." A most delightful number was Mozart's Serenade [illegible] composed for the wedding [illegible] occasion played by Mr. Kneisel, in his usual smooth and lovely style. Mr. Busoni, the soloist of the afternoon, created great enthusiasm by his rendition on the pianoforte of Liszt's "Spanish Rhaysody," arranged as a concert piece with orchestral accompaniment by himself. No one was prepared for so remarkable a performance, for such brilliance of tone and masterly execution, and Mr. Busoni reaped all the benefit of a surprise. The applause was spontaneous and sincere, and, for a house composed largely of women, quite thunderous. After four recalls, the pianist graciously played an encore, which served to emphasize the favorable impression he had created at first.

The programme will be repeated this evening, and then farewell to this admirable orchestra for many months.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 31, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the season by the unrivaled Symphony orchestra from Boston will be given at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme was publicly rehearsed yesterday before half a house. The neglect of the public to appreciate and support these concerts may cost it the rehearsals next season, for it is said that the band draws larger audiences in all the other cities it visits than it does in Brooklyn. For the last bill of the winter a fine programme has been prepared and it is needless to say that it is finely played. The band is always in excellent form and yesterday it played with the singleness of tone and expression that denotes great leadership. The beautiful "Oberon" overture was the first number, and here Mr. Paur disclosed more poetry than he has had credit for owning. Exquisitely soft and fairy like was the far off blowing of the horns, and the violin notes frolicked like elves. Eight parts were played of a serenade by Mozart, composed for the wedding of a young woman named Haffner. The work is characteristic; it has the lightness, the joyousness, the life, the innocence of most of this composer's writing, and the same lack of all that touches, moves and elevates. There are almost no shadows to offset the lights in his tone pictures; and although it is known that the life experience of Mozart was like that of many, if not most, musicians in its sorrow and its trials, he seems to have gone through it without any deepening of character or widening in his range of expression. He and Haydn, with their simple airs and their childlike gaiety, always seem to be sporting over the surface of things. This number was played broadly, brightly, with sweeping smoothness from the violins and with no great sympathy. There are several cadenzas and other ornaments for a single violin and these were given by Franz Kneisel with taste, correctness and a certain brilliancy. The gem of the bill is the Unfinished symphony of Schubert, one of the world's few masterpieces—one of the perfect works that nobody would wish to alter. Here is a contrast to the Mozart music and the Mozart philosophy—if he can be said to have one. The Schubert piece is beautiful in its humanity. It is not a gloomy work, but there are tears in it. It is one of the joys of such music that its meanings are as wide as the meanings of nature, and it can be accepted as a picture of life, though more particularly of a gentle and winning life, or it may be listened to as pure music, sweet music and great music. Its two movements are different in purpose, howbeit they are related in sentiment. There is, to those who listen for it, a suggestion of the sea in the allegro: in its distant booming, in the fluidity of its motion, in the significance of its minors, in the occasional rushes and tempestuous dashing. The other part is more reflective, more significant of fixity. Those who wander along mountains and watch the going off of the sun rays from the peaks, the blossoming of the stars and the gathering of the mists, know the feeling that was in the breast of Schubert when he wrote this thing of affecting beauty. It was a broad, beautiful, at times dramatic reading, that Mr. Paur gave of this work. Raw and harsh for the first few measures sounded the Spanish rhapsody of Liszt after Schubert's perfectly tempered and soothingly orchestrated andante, but the man who arranged it for himself and the piano soon commanded his audience. This was Ferruccio B. Busoni, a pale and scholarly looking player with a crop of hair not quite so large as Paderewski's. His arrangement of the piece shows an able and practised hand, the Schubert procession being an accident that militated against it. His orchestration is full and vigorous without being noisy, though it is conventional. His playing is bright, florid and positive; he is a finer pianist than his lack of local fame has probably led some people to suppose him to be. In sundry ways he reminds one of Joseffy; there is less of languor, but there is the capacity for daintiness, cleanness, sparkle, and he has a repose and deliberation that Joseffy has less of. His playing gained him such applause that he was nearly compelled to come out again and on his return he gave one of the Liszt Hungarian rhapsodies. The always stirring "Rakoczy March" of Berlioz concluded the performance, and it was played with a martial force and verve. The repertory for the season that will close to-night is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor
First movement from concerto for violin, in D major.
Berlioz. Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust"
Brahms.....Symphony No. 1, in C minor
Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Academic festival overture, in C minor, Op. 80.
Chabrier.....Entr'act from "Gwendoline"
Gluck...Aria, "Ah si ma liberte se doit etre ravie," from "Armide"
Liszt.....Spanish rhapsody
Massenet.....Aria "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid"
Mozart.....Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)
Rubinstein.....Symphony No. 4 (Dramatic.)
Ballet music from "Feramors."
Schubert.....Unfinished symphony
Song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht."
Smetana.....Symphonic poem, "Vltava."
Volkmann.....Serenade No. 3, in D minor
Wagner "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure." Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
("Prelude and Love Death"), from "Tristan und Isolde."
Siegfried Idyl.
"Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Gotterdammerung."
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung."
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon."

The Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

LAST NIGHT'S CONCERT.

Farewell Appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony musicians gave their final serenade to the metropolis last night. These admirable players, who, as an organization, if not in the individual excellence of their chief performers, are justly esteemed above any orchestra in America, have brought to a successful ending one of the most interesting seasons in their history. They will give a few more concerts in Boston; but so far as New York is concerned, and it is deeply concerned in art of such a graceful character, their music is mute.

Herr Paur, with his hair cut and an unusually romantic sentiment in his manner to signalize the occasion, said farewell to his metropolitan admirers in a kindly fashion. His fifth and final concert at Music Hall was one of the most agreeable of the series. Although the programme was scarcely eclectic in nature, it was varied. It began with a superb rendering of Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" in C minor, in the interpretation of which famous score the Boston men disclosed merits which the Seidl orchestra could have studied with profit. There was a certain precision of attack in the violins that was instructive as an instance of earnest conducting. Herr Paur is not so brilliant as our distinguished Wagnerian leader. But try as he may, Anton Seidl cannot extract so rich a tone out of the horns as they give forth when Boston blows into them. This was an excellent performance, upon which we desire to congratulate the small man with the large head, who was received rather doubtfully at the first of the season, but who has ended it in universal applause.

Lest, however, the new blonde bandmaster may become unreasonably elated in pleasing an audience that has heard much good music in its time, Herr Paur should realize that he scarcely attained success in the Strauss Symphony in F minor. We expected better things than were given in the beautiful andante movement. Let Herr Paur perpend and think this matter over. There was an indecision among his fiddles last night during the andante which must be amended.

The soloist on this occasion was Ferruccio Busoni. We made the acquaintance of this gentleman some time ago, but he has been studying lately and is, so to speak, a new man. His improvement in the difficult and little understood art of the piona has been marvelous. In his performance of Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody last evening he made a sensation that was reminiscent of the golden days of Paderewski. Mr. Busoni must share with Herr Paur in the congratulations merited by the event. He discovered various tones, singing qualities and bits of technique in the keyboard and pedals that have not yet been found by either Mr. Slivinski or Mr. Courtlandt Palmer. With his right hand he is almost as cunning as Pachmann; with his left he suggests memories of the splendid volume of Paderewski. In extending our compliments to Herr Paur and his musical men from Boston we also desire to felicitate the admirable Busoni.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Final Concert of Its Season in This City Last Night.

The programme of the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last night was too generous. It consisted of the vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger," Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, Opus 12; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; the same composer's Spanish rhapsody, rearranged as a concert piece for piano and orchestra by F. B. Busoni, and the Rakoczy march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Either the first or the last number could have been omitted, or, better still, the "Mazeppa," which is simply glorified rubbish.

Strauss's F minor symphony has not been heard here in some years. It deserves an occasional performance, for, though it is not a great work, it is interesting. There is not a single passage in it that utters the thought of a big mind, yet it is serious in its art and is capably made. It displays musical feeling and skill. The man who wrote it certainly had musical ideas and knew how to express them. The scherzo in particular is evidence of Strauss's right to compose. It follows the Beethoven model in rhythm and form, yet it is modern in its peculiar piquancy and playful delicacy. It was by far better performed than anything else in the concert, yet one missed the clear-cut precision and marvelous finish of nuance that used to characterize the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It may as well be said right here that the playing of the organization last night was far below its old level. Indeed, the Rakoczy march was very raggedly performed and was absolutely deprived of its usual inspiriting effect.

Mr. Busoni has made an effective virtuoso piece out of the Spanish rhapsody. It does not pretend to be anything else and it need not be condemned, especially at this time, as music. Mr. Busoni deserves credit for being faithful to the Liszt spirit in his arrangement. He has arranged the composition for piano and orchestra much as Liszt might have done it himself. His performance of the solo part was clean, brilliant, and vigorous, although it lacked distinction in color and was pervaded by a coldness of tone. For an encore number he played "La Campanella."

The best work of the orchestra, aside from its performance of the scherzo already mentioned, was in the "Meistersinger" prelude, for here the sonority of the splendid body of strings could not be deadened even by Mr. Paur's academic reading.

The New York Recorder.

By Grace W. Tone

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth and Last Appearance of the Boston Orchestra.

Mr. Emil Paur is not an ideal programme maker, else he would have built his musical scheme without two Liszt numbers in succession last night at Carnegie Music Hall. It was the fifth and last concert of the season and the band from Boston has not played better in this city this season. The prelude to "Meistersinger" was cleanly read through without much warmth of color. The symphony by Richard Strauss, a follower of Wagner and Liszt, was an early work in F minor, and was played here a decade ago by Theodore Thomas.

The first two movements are the best, the whole being conceived in a Schumannish mood and extremely well scored. In his working out sections Strauss is very felicitous, though revealing too much of the "Sturm und drang." The opus, however, is only twelve, and this accounts for much that is bizarre. The scherzo, in particular, is very daring. In the slow movement the lack of thematic invention of the composer is apparent, although the work as a whole is singularly mature and homogeneous.

Liszt wrote a rhapsody on the "Jota Arragonese" of Spain. It is a tawdry, bombastic thing. When Anton Seidl orchestrated it last Winter the composition gained in dignity and interest.

We got last night another arangement by F. Busoni for piano and orchestra. It afforded the solo performer an excellent opportunity for lots of ground and lofty tumbling, acrobatic ticklings of the treble of the piano and harsh attacks in the bass. But cui bono? The composition is not worth a rush; why serve it up hot and smoking once more? Herr Busoni played brilliantly, and had to respond with Liszt's "Campanella" as an encore.

The balance of the programme comprised Liszt's "Mazeppa," which might have been omitted, and Berlioz's "Rakoczy Marsh."

It is doubtful if Emil Paur will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A change is contemplated.

Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

BOSTON'S ORCHES TRA.

Last Concert of the Season—Mr. Busoni's Fine Playing.

The last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was far away the best in the series given during the season, both on account of the exceptional interest of the programme and the brilliant character of its interpretation. The symphony was Richard Strauss' in F minor, which is a remarkable composition when one considers that it was written by a youth of but sixteen years of age—and the pity of it is that he has not gone on in the direction of development which it indicated, instead of prostituting his talents to such works which have followed, as "The Tempest," "Francesca da Rimini" and "Don Juan," all of which show that he is devoting his powers solely to the mechanical side of his art and not in the least to its spiritual and intellectual elements.

But the symphony was by no means the feature of the concert. That was the arrangement of Liszt's Spanish Raphsodie by Mr. F. Busoni, in which the arranger, and pianist won a triumph which is seldom witnessed at these concerts. His performance was a marvel of brilliant execution and earnest musical spirit—such a performance as has not been heard here in many a day. It was rewarded with tempestuous applause, and Mr. Busoni responded with Weber's "Concertstuck," which he played exquisitely. He is a pianist of whom we shall hear much more in the future.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was certainly a "romantic" programme the Boston Symphony gave last evening at Music Hall. Beginning with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," containing Richard Strauss melodious symphony in F minor, and ending with the Berlioz arrangement of the Rakoczy March, this last concert of the season was one of the most enjoyable of the series.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni gave a powerful performance of Liszt's "Rhapsodie Espagnole", which he had arranged for piano solo with orchestra. In the fortissimo passages the tone was a little hard, but he exhibited an easy, fluent technique. His octave playing was remarkably brilliant, and his pianissimos were delightfully delicate. At the finish Mr. Busoni was recalled to the platform several times, and finally played with fantastic charm the Paganini-Liszt "Campanella" étude.

It was a little the fault of the tempi adopted by Herr Paur that Richard Straus' F minor symphony became rather monotonous. Particularly was the andante dragged lethargically until it lost all poetry and became sentimental. Otherwise the orchestra was at its best last evening. The strings played with a crystalline purity of tone and unanimity that was irreproachable.

Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" was played with virtuosity by the orchestra.

[105]

THE STANDARD UNION.

SATURDAY EVE., MARCH 31st., 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is rumored that Mr. Paur will not be with the Boston Orchestra next season. Comparisons may be odious, but they are generally involuntary, and often salutary. The last rehearsal and concert necessitates some expression of opinion as to whether the season's close engenders the same state of feeling as that of a year ago. Then we knew beyond a shadow of doubt that we were parting with a conductor who had given many of us a more intense pleasure in the line of orchestral music than we had ever known. As the last note sounded, as Mr. Nikisch came back upon the empty stage and made his bow, as we filed out one one by one from the hall which but a few moments before had resounded with such a wealth of harmony, which had echoed the wonderful tones of as great an orchestra as the world holds, there was a positive sensation of pain. To-day, we know only a polite regret that a season of enjoyable musical instruction is at its close, and a less polite but more poignant regret that there is no probability of Mr. Nikisch's return.

It is not that Mr. Paur is not a conscientious worker and an earnest musician. No one who observes attentively his intellectual forehead, his bright, appreciative eye, the spiritual illumination of his whole countenance, the vim with which he plunges into the thick of each musical number, can doubt that he loves his work; that his aims are high, and that he is not without power. But the difference between Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur is the difference between poetry and mathematics. Those who love warmth, color, passion, cannot be argued out of their delight in the orchestra under one man, and their indifference to it under the others. Mr. Paur may be scholarly, honest and capable, but he is not and never can be imaginative, and he lacks magnetism. He never gets a full grasp either on his audience or his men, and the consequence is, performances which may be scientifically correct, but are not inspiring.

The difference between the two leaders is manifest not only in the performances, but in the selections. Mr. Nikisch, while adhering closely to high ideals, managed at the same time to arrange his programmes with the greatest art, allowing for the inevitable brain weariness which ensues from a succession of purely intellectual numbers. He introduced music, which appeals more to the heart and senses than to the head, and allowed us to drift at intervals into the realm of mere feeling. Professional musicians do not, as a general thing, realize the infinite blessing, if not the necessity, of periods of repose, in a modern classical programme Too much Wagner, except in his more rational moments, too much Rubinstein, when he is on a musical "tear," and too much Brahms, in any of his dull, dry, dreary moods, is positive agony to many a listener. No one can contentedly make a whole dinner out of roast beef, good, wholesome, nutritious and orthodox though it may be; to long for a bite of ortolan and a sip of champagne is perfectly natural, and the wise host has them at hand.

The difference between Mr. Paur and Mr. Nikisch is something absurd to dwell upon, perhaps, because it is no more nor less than a difference of temperament. Mr. Paur can no more help his coldness, his angularities, his pedantry, than he can his fair hair, his blue eyes. It is simply Mr. Nikisch's luck that he is dark and Southern, with all the passion, personal magnetism, and artistic sensibility of the South—the European South. Yet, it must be confessed that, with all these fascinating characteristics, which are supposed to ally themselves to enervation and indolence, he was as alive to the necessities of exertion as the coolest-headed Northerner. Without the hardest kind of labor that Boston orchestra could never have attained the artistic perfection which it undoubtedly possessed, and which was never more apparent than when the leader was on the eve of bidding it good-bye. A slender, pale, refined-looking man, Mr. Nikisch, held those eighty odd men in the hollow of his hand, and exercised an authority as relentless as a military dictator. He permitted no liberties either from his musicians or his audience, and breathed his fiery spirit into both until there was but one thought through the whole multitude. When a leader brings about this result, there can be no question that he is a genius.

Mr. Paur is a man whom we may all respect, but it is a misfortune that he came after Nikisch. The public rehearsal of yesterday afternoon, like all the rehearsals of the winter, was enjoyable enough in its way, but it was neither distinctive nor remarkable. The programme included the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Mozart's "Hafner Serenade," Schubert's unfinished symphony in E minor, and the march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." In Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody, for pianoforte and orchestra, Mr. Busoni was the soloist. It was far and away the most enjoyable performance, both as regards the selection and the execution, that has been given by the Boston Orchestra this season. The overture to "Oberon" was rendered with a vim and spirit which almost took the listener off his feet; but still the concert increased in strength of instrumentation till it close in a blaze of glory, through the medium of Berlioz's 'Rakoczy March" from the "Damnation of Faust." A most delightful number was Mozart's Serenade [illegible] the one composed for the wedding [illegible] occasion played by Mr. Kneisel, in his usual smooth and lovely style. Mr. Busoni, the soloist of the afternoon, created great enthusiasm by his rendition on the pianoforte of Liszt's "Spanish Rhaysody," arranged as a concert piece with orchestral accompaniment by himself. No one was prepared for so remarkable a performance, for such brilliance of tone and masterly execution, and Mr. Busoni reaped all the benefit of a surprise. The applause was spontaneous and sincere, and, for a house composed largely of women, quite thunderous. After four recalls, the pianist graciously played an encore, which served to emphasize the favorable impression he had created at first.

The programme will be repeated this evening, and then farewell to this admirable orchestra for many months.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 31, 1894.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the season by the unrivaled Symphony orchestra from Boston will be given at the Academy of Music to-night. The programme was publicly rehearsed yesterday before half a house. The neglect of the public to appreciate and support these concerts may cost it the rehearsals next season, for it is said that the band draws larger audiences in all the other cities it visits than it does in Brooklyn. For the last bill of the winter a fine programme has been prepared and it is needless to say that it is finely played. The band is always in excellent form and yesterday it played with the singleness of tone and expression that denotes great leadership. The beautiful "Oberon" overture was the first number,and here Mr. Paur disclosed more poetry than he has had credit for owning. Exquisitely soft and fairy like was the far off blowing of the horns, and the violin notes frolicked like elves. Eight parts were played of a serenade by Mozart, composed for the wedding of a young woman named Haffner. The work is characteristic; it has the lightness, the joyousness, the life, the innocence of most of this composer's writing, and the same lack of all that touches, moves and elevates. There are almost no shadows to offset the lights in his tone pictures; and although it is known that the life experience of Mozart was like that of many, if not most, musicians in its sorrow and its trials, he seems to have gone through it without any deepening of character or widening in his range of expression. He and Haydn, with their simple airs and their childlike gaiety, always seem to be sporting over the surface of things. This number was played broadly, brightly, with sweeping smoothness from the violins and with no great sympathy. There are several cadenzas and other ornaments for a single violin and these were given by Franz Kneisel with taste, correctness and a certain brilliancy. The gem of the bill is the Unfinished symphony of Schubert, one of the world's few masterpieces—one of the perfect works that nobody would wish to alter. Here is a contrast to the Mozart music and the Mozart philosophy—if he can be said to have one. The Schubert piece is beautiful in its humanity. It is not a gloomy work, but there are tears in it. It is one of the joys of such music that its meanings are as wide as the meanings of nature, and it can be accepted as a picture of life, though more particularly of a gentle and winning life, or it may be listened to as pure music, sweet music and great music. Its two movements are different in purpose, howbeit they are related in sentiment. There is, to those who listen for it, a suggestion of the sea in the allegro: in its distant booming, in the fluidity of its motion, in the significance of its minors, in the occasional rushes and tempestuous dashing. The other part is more reflective, more significant of fixity. Those who wander along mountains and watch the going off of the sun rays from the peaks, the blossoming of the stars and the gathering of the mists, know the feeling that was in the breast of Schubert when he wrote this thing of affecting beauty. It was a broad, beautiful, at times dramatic reading, that Mr. Paur gave of this work. Raw and harsh for the first few measures sounded the Spanish rhapsody of Liszt after Schubert's perfectly tempered and soothingly orchestrated andante, but the man who arranged it for himself and the piano soon commanded his audience. This was Ferruccio B. Busoni, a pale and scholarly looking player with a crop of hair not quite so large as Paderewski's. His arrangement of the piece shows an able and practised hand, the Schubert precession being an accident that militated against it. His orchestration is full and vigorous without being noisy, though it is conventional. His playing is bright, florid and positive; he is a finer pianist than his lack of local fame has probably led some people to suppose him to be. In sundry ways he reminds one of Joseffy; there is less of languor, but there is the capacity for daintiness, cleanness, sparkle, and he has a repose and deliberation that Joseffy has less of. His playing gained him such applause that he was nearly compelled to come out again and on his return he gave one of the Liszt Hungarian rhapsodies. The always stirring "Rakoczy March" of Berlioz concluded the performance, and it was played with a martial force and verve. The repertory for the season that will close to-night is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 5, in C minor
First movement from concerto for violin, in D major.
Berlioz. Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust"
Brahms.....Symphony No. 1, in C minor
Variations on a theme by Haydn.
Academic festival overture, in C minor, Op. 80.
Chabrier.....Entr'act from "Gwendoline"
Gluck...Aria, "Ah si ma liberte se doit etre ravie," from "Armide"
Liszt.....Spanish rhapsody
Massenet.....Aria "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid"
Mozart.....Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner)
Rubinstein.....Symphony No. 4 (Dramatic.)
Ballet music from "Feramors."
Schubert.....Unfinished symphony
Song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht."
Smetana.....Symphonic poem, "Vltava."
Volkmann.....Serenade No. 3, in D minor
Wagner "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm" from "Die Walkure." Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
("Prelude and Love Death"), from "Tristan und Isolde."
Siegfried Idyl.
"Siegfried's Funeral March," from "Gotterdammerung."
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung."
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon."

The Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

LAST NIGHT'S CONCERT.

Farewell Appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The Boston Symphony musicians gave their final serenade to the metropolis last night. These admirable players, who, as an organization, if not in the individual excellence of their chief performers, are justly esteemed above any orchestra in America, have brought to a successful ending one of the most interesting seasons in their history. They will give a few more concerts in Boston; but so far as New York is concerned, and it is deeply concerned in art of such a graceful character, their music is mute.

Herr Paur, with his hair cut and an unusually romantic sentiment in his manner to signalize the occasion, said farewell to his metropolitan admirers in a kindly fashion. His fifth and final concert at Music Hall was one of the most agreeable of the series. Although the programme was scarcely eclectic in nature, it was varied. It began with a superb rendering of Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" in C minor, in the interpretation of which famous score the Boston men disclosed merits which the Seidl orchestra could have studied with profit. There was a certain precision of attack in the violins that was instructive as an instance of earnest conducting. Herr Paur is not so brilliant as our distinguished Wagnerian leader. But try as he may, Anton Seidl cannot extract so rich a tone out of the horns as they give forth when Boston blows into them. This was an excellent performance, upon which we desire to congratulate the small man with the large head, who was received rather doubtfully at the first of the season, but who has ended it in universal applause.

Lest, however, the new blonde bandmaster may become unreasonably elated in pleasing an audience that has heard much good music in its time, Herr Paur should realize that he scarcely attained success in the Strauss Symphony in F minor. We expected better things than were given in the beautiful andante movement. Let Herr Paur perpend and think this matter over. There was an indecision among his fiddles last night during the andante which must be amended.

The soloist on this occasion was Ferruccio Busoni. We made the acquaintance of this gentleman some time ago, but he has been studying lately and is, so to speak, a new man. His improvement in the difficult and little understood art of the piona has been marvelous. In his performance of Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody last evening he made a sensation that was reminiscent of the golden days of Paderewski. Mr. Busoni must share with Herr Paur in the congratulations merited by the event. He discovered various tones, singing qualities and bits of technique in the keyboard and pedals that have not yet been found by either Mr. Slivinski or Mr. Courtlandt Palmer. With his right hand he is almost as cunning as Pachmann; with his left he suggests memories of the splendid volume of Paderewski. In extending our compliments to Herr Paur and his musical men from Boston we also desire to felicitate the admirable Busoni.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Final Concert of Its Season in This City Last Night.

The programme of the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last night was too generous. It consisted of the vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger," Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, Opus 12; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; the same composer's Spanish rhapsody, rearranged as a concert piece for piano and orchestra by F. B. Busoni, and the Rakoczy march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Either the first or the last number could have been omitted, or, better still, the "Mazeppa," which is simply glorified rubbish.

Strauss's F minor symphony has not been heard here in some years. It deserves an occasional performance, for, though it is not a great work, it is interesting. There is not a single passage in it that utters the thought of a big mind, yet it is serious in its art and is capably made. It displays musical feeling and skill. The man who wrote it certainly had musical ideas and knew how to express them. The scherzo in particular is evidence of Strauss's right to compose. It follows the Beethoven model in rhythm and form, yet it is modern in its peculiar piquancy and playful delicacy. It was by far better performed than anything else in the concert, yet one missed the clear-cut precision and marvelous finish of nuance that used to characterize the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It may as well be said right here that the playing of the organization last night was far below its old level. Indeed, the Rakoczy march was very raggedly performed and was absolutely deprived of its usual inspiriting effect.

Mr. Busoni has made an effective virtuoso piece out of the Spanish rhapsody. It does not pretend to be anything else and it need not be condemned, especially at this time, as music. Mr. Busoni deserves credit for being faithful to the Liszt spirit in his arrangement. He has arranged the composition for piano and orchestra much as Liszt might have done it himself. His performance of the solo part was clean, brilliant, and vigorous, although it lacked distinction in color and was pervaded by a coldness of tone. For an encore number he played "La Campanella."

The best work of the orchestra, aside from its performance of the scherzo already mentioned, was in the "Meistersinger" prelude, for here the sonority of the splendid body of strings could not be deadened even by Mr. Paur's academic reading.

The New York Recorder.

By GEORGE W. TURNER.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth and Last Appearance of the Boston Orchestra.

Mr. Emil Paur is not an ideal programme maker, else he would have built his musical scheme without two Liszt numbers in succession last night at Carnegie Music Hall. It was the fifth and last concert of the season and the band from Boston has not played better in this city this season. The prelude to "Meistersinger" was cleanly read through without much warmth of color. The symphony by Richard Strauss, a follower of Wagner and Liszt, was an early work in F minor, and was played here a decade ago by Theodore Thomas.

The first two movements are the best, the whole being conceived in a Schumannish mood and extremely well scored. In his working out sections Strauss is very felicitous, though revealing too much of the "Sturm und drang." The opus, however, is only twelve, and this accounts for much that is bizarre. The scherzo, in particular, is very daring. In the slow movement the lack of thematic invention of the composer is apparent, although the work as a whole is singularly mature and homogenous.

Liszt wrote a rhapsody on the "Jota Arragonese" of Spain. It is a tawdry, bombastic thing. When Anton Seidl orchestrated it last Winter the composition gained in dignity and interest.

We got last night another arangement by F. Busoni for piano and orchestra. It afforded the solo performer an excellent opportunity for lots of ground and lofty tumbling, acrobatic ticklings of the treble of the piano and harsh attacks in the bass. But cui bono? The composition is not worth a rush; why serve it up hot and smoking once more? Herr Busoni played brilliantly, and had to respond with Liszt's "Campanella" as an encore.

The balance of the programme comprised Liszt's "Mazeppa," which might have been omitted, and Berlioz's "Rakoczy Marsh."

It is doubtful if Emil Paur will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A change is contemplated.

Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

BOSTON'S ORCHES TRA.

Last Concert of the Season—Mr. Busoni's Fine Playing.

The last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was far away the best in the series given during the season, both on account of the exceptional interest of the programme and the brilliant character of its interpretation. The symphony was Richard Strauss' in F minor, which is a remarkable composition when one considers that it was written by a youth of but sixteen years of age—and the pity of it is that he has not gone on in the direction of development which it indicated, instead of prostituting his talents to such works which have followed, as "The Tempest," "Francesca da Rimini" and "Don Juan," all of which show that he is devoting his powers solely to the mechanical side of his art and not in the least to its spiritual and intellectual elements.

But the symphony was by no means the feature of the concert. That was the arrangement of Liszt's Spanish Raphsodie by Mr. F. Busoni, in which the arranger, and pianist won a triumph which is seldom witnessed at these concerts. His performance was a marvel of brilliant execution and earnest musical spirit—such a performance as has not been heard here in many a day. It was rewarded with tempestuous applause, and Mr. Busoni responded with Weber's "Concertstuck," which he played exquisitely. He is a pianist of whom we shall hear much more in the future.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was certainly a "romantic" programme the Boston Symphony gave last evening at Music Hall. Beginning with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," containing Richard Strauss melodious symphony in F minor, and ending with the Berlioz arrangement of the Rakoczy March, this last concert of the season was one of the most enjoyable of the series.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni gave a powerful performance of Liszt's "Rhapsodie Espagnole", which he had arranged for piano solo with orchestra. In the fortissimo passages the tone was a little hard, but he exhibited an easy, fluent technique. His octave playing was remarkably brilliant, and his pianissimos were delightfully delicate. At the finish Mr. Busoni was recalled to the platform several times, and finally played with fantastic charm the Paganini-Liszt "Campanella" étude.

It was a little the fault of the tempi adopted by Herr Paur that Richard Straus' F minor symphony became rather monotonous. Particularly was the andante dragged lethargically until it lost all poetry and became sentimental. Otherwise the orchestra was at its best last evening. The strings played with a crystalline purity of tone and unanimity that was irreproachable.

Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa" was played with virtuosity by the orchestra.

[105]

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Orchestra for this season took place last night in the Music Hall. It was an interesting concert, and the playing of the orchestra was up to the high level that it has taught us to expect from it. The programme consisted of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Richard Strauss's Symphony in F minor, Liszt's orchestrated pianoforte étude with added march of barbaric color, which, for want of a better title, he called "Mazeppa"; the same composer's Spanish rhapsody, in a new arrangement for pianoforte and orchestra written by Mr. Busoni, who played the solo part and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march. The Rhapsody was new to New-York in the form presented last night, though Mr. Busoni now figures among local musicians. In the original package it has never enjoyed great popularity, and we doubt whether it will be heard very often in its transformed shape, though it has gained greatly in effectiveness. In making the arrangement, Mr. Busoni has followed the example set by Liszt himself in the Hungarian Fantasia, and it would be extremely difficult to say how the work could be better done. The solo part is extremely brilliant, and the orchestra is employed in a masterly manner, and relieves the work of the charge of monotony which lies heavily against it in the form in which Liszt gave it to the world. Mr. Busoni, in playing it, and afterward in his performance of Liszt's "Campanella," gave an exhibition which created a decided sensation. More brilliant pianoforte playing, from a technical point of view, at least (and the music calls for little else), has not been heard here this season. It must have caused many in the audience to wonder why so talented an artist is held here so seldom. As an interesting fact in connection with the Rhapsody, it is to be noted that Mr. Seidl made a transcription of it last summer for orchestra and brought it forward at one of his Sunday night concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House, two months or so ago.

The Strauss symphony was a novelty to all intents and purposes, though Mr. Thomas gave it in a Philharmonic Concert ten years ago, when it was still in manuscript. As the work of a young man scarcely twenty years old at the time of its composition, it is extremely interesting, and suggests the thought that the composer might have made a profounder impression had he stuck to the ideals which find expression in it, instead of running to the extremes of musical realism which mark his later works. It sounds like the product of a born symphonist.

The World.

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 53-63 PARK ROW.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

A STRAUSS SYMPHONY HEARD.

The Last Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Given at Music Hall.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place at Music Hall last night. The principal number on a not any too interesting programme was a symphony in F minor, by Richard Strauss, one of the modern German impressionists. The symphony is more fluent and straightforward than most of the composer's later works, and exhibits great command of orchestral technique, and—notably in the charming, quaintly rythmic scherzo—occasional marked freshness of thought. As a whole, however, the work is dull; there is much sound and varied color, but few ideas worth the trouble the composer is at to express them. The two first movements of the four in which the symphony is cast are far the best.

Besides the symphony the orchestra was heard in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Liszt's brilliant and pictorial symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Berlioz's Rakoczy March. The soloist of the occasion, Mr. F. B. Busoni, played Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," effectively rearranged by himself as a concert piece for piano and orchestra, exceedingly well, with power, artistic finish and irreproachable technique, and made the hit of the evening. Recalled with enthusiasm, he gave Liszt's "Campanella" with much brilliancy and little sentiment.

The playing of the orchestra, as ever, was as polished and compact as a bit of mosaic, but whether owing to the absence of Mr. Nikisch or the presence of Mr. Paur it seems to have lost both in style and general impressiveness.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1894.

The Last Boston Symphony Concert.

MR. EMIL PAUR is not an ideal program maker else he would have built his musical scheme without two Liszt numbers in succession last Thursday night at Carnegie Music Hall. It was the fifth and last concert of the season and the band from Boston has not played better in this city this season. The prelude to "Meistersinger" was cleanly read through without much warmth of color. The symphony, by Richard Strauss, a follower of Wagner and Liszt, is an early work in F minor and was played here a decade ago by Theodore Thomas.

The first two movements are the best, the whole being conceived in a Schumannish mood and extremely well scored. In his working out sections Strauss is very felicitous, though revealing too much of the "Sturm und drang." The opus, however, is only twelve and this accounts for much that is bizarre. The scherzo in particular is very daring. In the slow movement the lack of thematic invention of the composer is apparent, although the work as a whole is singularly mature and homogeneous for the work of a very young man.

Liszt wrote a rhapsody on the "Jota Arragonese" of Spain. It is a tawdry, bombastic thing. When Anton Seidl orchestrated it last winter the composition gained in dignity and interest.

We got another arrangement by F. Busoni for piano and orchestra. It afforded the solo performer an excellent opportunity for lots of ground and lofty tumbling, acrobatic ticklings of the treble of the piano and harsh attacks in the bass. But cui bono? The composition is not worth a rush; why serve it up hot and smoking once more? Mr. Busoni played brilliantly, and had to respond with Liszt's "Campanella" as an encore.

The balance of the program comprised Liszt's "Mazeppa," which might have been omitted, and Berlioz' "Rakoczy Marsh," which strangely enough was played in spiritless style.

It is doubtful if Emil Paur will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A change is contemplated.

Did you notice the drum player in the Symphony Orchestra? It is hard to escape from his presence during a concert. Even when his dread instruments are hushed, you know he is meditating an attack. This man of military bearing is conscientious, he is fatally accurate in his aim; but he has not learned the acoustical fact that noise and sound are not synonomous. He is a German; but surely his ancestors years ago saw South America, the great seat of drum worship; or possibly they came from Lapland, where witches obeyed the drum's invocation.

This man of rare physical endurance and dull ear reminds me of the Patagonian wizard described by Master Richard Johnson: "He begins by making a strange noise with his nums, after which he feigns a fit and to struggle with the demon that has entered him." Oh, Mr. Paur, how can you stand it, and you so near him!

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert, the 5th, in Cambridge, will produce for the first time in this country the new symphonic poem "Hiawatha," by Louis Adolphe Coerne.

Paur in Brooklyn.—The fifth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn took place at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of last week. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist, and this the program:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner).....Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart
Violin obligato.
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Spanish rhapsody.....Franz Liszt
(Rearranged as a concert piece for piano and orchestra by F. Busoni.)
Rakóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24.....Hector Berlioz

Sixth Philbarmonic Concert.—The sixth public rehearsal and sixth concert of the Philharmonic Society occur in Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Emma Juch and Maud Powell are to be the soloists, the former singing Weber's aria "Er Geht," from "Sylvana," and the latter playing Dvorák's concerto for

TROY, N. Y., March 2, 1894.

TWO most enjoyable musical events took place here during the week, and Troy can again be said to be thoroughly aroused musically. And she ought to be, too, as in no other town of 60,000 people are such really first-class musical events given. There must be a harmony of feeling, together with the musical harmony prevailing here among the musicians and music lovers, as we seldom hear of any of the petty jealousies that flesh seems to be heir to in other towns. It is principally on that account that we can support magnificently two first-class vocal clubs without the least difficulty.

Monday night a subscription "chamber musical" was given at the residence of Mrs. H. B. Nason, the artists being the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston. The house was filled with lovers of the art, and many would have liked to have been there, but couldn't, as it was rather exclusive.

A delightful evening was spent, which of course was assured when it was known that the famous Boston quartet was to be present.

A program of rare excellence received a beautiful interpretation. The following is the arrangement:

Quartet, in G minor.....Haydn
Chaconne.....Bach
Mr. Kneisel.
Andante.....Grieg
Nocturne.....Chopin
Serenade.....Sitt
Capriccio.....Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Andante, from quartet in D minor.....Schubert
Menuet and fugue, from the quartet in C major, op. 59.....Beethoven

The selections by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were gems of the first magnitude, and their work was greatly admired. The second of these chamber musicals will be held Wednesday, March 28, when the Brodsky Quartet, of New York city, will play. It will be held at the residence of Mrs. Griswold.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 6, 1894.

WILL PAUR STAY?

Col. Higginson's Hope of a New Leader.

The rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived.

This time it comes from New York, in which city Colonel Higginson now is.

While there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give a very favorable coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization.

A Post man talked yesterday with several people who are in positions to know of these things.

"Mr. Paur," said one of this number, "may be with the orchestra next season, but I am inclined to believe that another man will occupy the position if Colonel Higginson can arrange matters.

"Despite what may be said, the statement is true that Mr. Paur has not the qualities possessed by his predecessors which endeared them to the music-loving public. He is not so popular with his audiences, and the orchestra's repute and efficiency are not increased as they have been before.

"He is to my mind inferior in his position to any of those who have preceded him. It would not surprise me to see Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again with the orchestra next season."

Apropos of the Gericke possibility, on the authority of a friend who talked with him recently, it may be stated that that musician has repented his refusal of the offer extended to him when Mr. Nikisch left, and would accept the position willingly if again tendered.

Gericke, in conversation with the Boston friend mentioned, stated that had he known that he was wanted here by the public generally, as well as by Colonel Higginson, he should have left Vienna.

One act of omission on the part of Colonel Higginson is believed to mean more than any act of commission yet done by him.

It has always been customary at the last concert of the season in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and other cities to announce on the printed programmes the concerts for the next season, their number, and the name of the leader.

This year the programmes appeared without a word of announcement.

This was in direct contravention of the custom which has been observed for at least ten years.

The inference is that Colonel Higginson, expecting to make a change before next season, preferred to omit the announcement altogether rather than to print one without a leader's name, which would undoubtedly have attracted greater attention.

The annual trip westward will be omitted this spring, also, although the stated cause—the financial depression—may be responsible for this.

Still, a depression does not generally affect such events as the Symphony concerts.

Mr. Paur is generally believed to have come over for a five years' stay. The breaking of contract which his dismissal would mean must be compensated for. Five thousand dollars is understood to be the figure which will be paid him.

This sum will be no inducement to him to leave, however. One who knows him quite well said:

"Leader Paur will stay if he possibly can, and it will be the shattering of all his hopes if he is not directing the Symphony Orchestra next season.

"A matter of $5000 is nothing. To leave his position and return to Europe after one season would mean failure—would have an effect on the minds of the musical world which he can by no possibility afford."

The situation seems to be that Herr Paur wants to stay, Colonel Higginson doesn't want him to stay, and the Symphony admirers generally have preferences for a more magnetic leader.

[106]

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The last of the concerts of the Boston Orchestra for this season took place last night in the Music Hall. It was an interesting concert, and the playing of the orchestra was up to the high level that it has taught us to expect from it. The programme consisted of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Richard Strauss's Symphony in F minor, Liszt's orchestrated pianoforte étude with added march of barbaric color, which, for want of a better title, he called "Mazeppa"; the same composer's Spanish rhapsody, in a new arrangement for pianoforte and orchestra written by Mr. Busoni, who played the solo part and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march. The Rhapsody was new to New-York in the form presented last night, though Mr. Busoni now figures among local musicians. In the original package it has never enjoyed great popularity, and we doubt whether it will be heard very often in its transformed shape, though it has gained greatly in effectiveness. In making the arrangement, Mr. Busoni has followed the example set by Liszt himself in the Hungarian Fantasia, and it would be extremely difficult to say how the work could be better done. The solo part is extremely brilliant, and the orchestra is employed in a masterly manner, and relieves the work of the charge of monotony which lies heavily against it in the form in which Liszt gave it to the world. Mr. Busoni, in playing it, and afterward in his performance of Liszt's "Campanella," gave an exhibition which created a decided sensation. More brilliant pianoforte playing, from a technical point of view, at least (and the music calls for little else), has not been heard here this season. It must have caused many in the audience to wonder why so talented an artist is held here so seldom. As an interesting fact in connection with the Rhapsody, it is to be noted that Mr. Seidl made a transcription of it last summer for orchestra and brought it forward at one of his Sunday night concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House, two months or so ago.

The Strauss symphony was a novelty to all intents and purposes, though Mr. Thomas gave it in a Philharmonic Concert ten years ago, when it was still in manuscript. As the work of a young man scarcely twenty years old at the time of its composition, it is extremely interesting, and suggests the thought that the composer might have made a profounder impression had he stuck to the ideals which find expression in it, instead of running to the extremes of musical realism which mark his later works. It sounds like the product of a born symphonist.

The World.

JOSEPH PULITZER.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR AT NOS. 53-63 PARK ROW.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1894.

A STRAUSS SYMPHONY HEARD.

The Last Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Given at Music Hall.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place at Music Hall last night. The principal number on a not any too interesting programme was a symphony in F minor, by Richard Strauss, one of the modern German impressionists. The symphony is more fluent and straightforward than most of its composer's later works, and exhibits great command of orchestral technique, and—notably in the charming, quaintly rythmic scherzo—occasional marked freshness of thought. As a whole, however, the work is dull; there is much sound and varied color, but few ideas worth the trouble the composer is at to express them. The two first movements of the four in which the symphony is cast are far the best.

Besides the symphony the orchestra was heard in the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Liszt's brilliant and pictorial symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Berlioz's Rakoczy March. The soloist of the occasion, Mr. F. B. Busoni, played Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," effectively rearranged by himself as a concert piece for piano and orchestra, exceedingly well, with power, artistic finish and irreproachable technique, and made the hit of the evening. Recalled with enthusiasm, he gave Liszt's "Campanella" with much brilliancy and little sentiment.

The playing of the orchestra, as ever, was as polished and compact as a bit of mosaic, but whether owing to the absence of Mr. Nikisch or the presence of Mr. Paur it seems to have lost both in style and general impressiveness.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 4, 1894.

The Last Boston Symphony Concert.

MR. EMIL PAUR is not an ideal program maker else he would have built his musical scheme without two Liszt numbers in succession last Thursday night at Carnegie Music Hall. It was the fifth and last concert of the season and the band from Boston has not played better in this city this season. The prelude to "Meistersinger" was cleanly read through without much warmth of color. The symphony, by Richard Strauss, a follower of Wagner and Liszt, is an early work in F minor and was played here a decade ago by Theodore Thomas.

The first two movements are the best, the whole being conceived in a Schumannish mood and extremely well scored. In his working out sections Strauss is very felicitous, though revealing too much of the "Sturm und drang." The opus, however, is only twelve and this accounts for much that is bizarre. The scherzo in particular is very daring. In the slow movement the lack of thematic invention of the composer is apparent, although the work as a whole is singularly mature and homogeneous for the work of a very young man.

Liszt wrote a rhapsody on the "Jota Arragonese" of Spain. It is a tawdry, bombastic thing. When Anton Seidl orchestrated it last winter the composition gained in dignity and interest.

We got another arrangement by F. Busoni for piano and orchestra. It afforded the solo performer an excellent opportunity for lots of ground and lofty tumbling, acrobatic ticklings of the treble of the piano and harsh attacks in the bass. But cui bono? The composition is not worth a rush; why serve it up hot and smoking once more? Mr. Busoni played brilliantly, and had to respond with Liszt's "Campanella" as an encore.

The balance of the program comprised Liszt's "Mazeppa," which might have been omitted, and Berlioz' "Rakoczy Marsh," which strangely enough was played in spiritless style.

It is doubtful if Emil Paur will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. A change is contemplated.

Did you notice the drum player in the Symphony Orchestra? It is hard to escape from his presence during a concert. Even when his dread instruments are hushed, you know he is meditating an attack. This man of military bearing is conscientious, he is fatally accurate in his aim; but he has not learned the acoustical fact that noise and sound are not synonomous. He is a German; but surely his ancestors years ago saw South America, the great seat of drum worship; or possibly they came from Lapland, where witches obeyed the drum's invocation.

This man of rare physical endurance and dull ear reminds me of the Patagonian wizard described by Master Richard Johnson: "He begins by making a strange noise with his nums, after which he feigns a fit and to struggle with his nums, after which he feigns a fit and to struggle with the demon that has entered him." Oh, Mr. Paur, how can you stand it, and you so near him!

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its next concert, the 5th, in Cambridge, will produce for the first time in this country the new symphonic poem "Hiawatha," by Louis Adolphe Coerne.

Paur in Brooklyn.—The fifth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn took place at the Academy of Music on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of last week. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist, and this the program:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Serenade No. 7, in D major (Haffner).....Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart
Violin obligato.
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert
Spanish rhapsody.....Franz Liszt
(Rearranged as a concert piece for piano and orchestra by F. Busoni.)
Rakóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24.....Hector Berlioz

Sixth Philbarmonic Concert.—The sixth public rehearsal and sixth concert of the Philharmonic Society occur in Music Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively. Emma Juch and Maud Powell are to be the soloists, the former singing Weber's aria "Er Geht," from "Sylvana," and the latter playing Dvorák's concerto for

TROY, N. Y., March 2, 1894.

TWO most enjoyable musical events took place here during the week, and Troy can again be said to be thoroughly aroused musically. And she ought to be, too, as in no other town of 60,000 people are such really first-class musical events given. There must be a harmony of feeling, together with the musical harmony prevailing here among the musicians and music lovers, as we seldom hear of any of the petty jealousies that flesh seems to be heir to in other towns. It is principally on that account that we can support magnificently two first-class vocal clubs without the least difficulty.

Monday night a subscription "chamber musical" was given at the residence of Mrs. H. B. Nason, the artists being the Kneisel Quartet, of Boston. The house was filled with lovers of the art, and many would have liked to have been there, but couldn't, as it was rather exclusive.

A delightful evening was spent, which of course was assured when it was known that the famous Boston quartet was to be present.

A program of rare excellence received a beautiful interpretation. The following is the arrangement:

Quartet, in G minor.....Haydn
Chaconne.....Bach
Mr. Kneisel.
Andante.....Grieg
Nocturne.....Chopin
Serenade.....Sitt
Capriccio.....Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Andante, from quartet in D minor.....Schubert
Menuet and fugue, from the quartet in C major, op. 59.....Beethoven

The selections by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were gems of the first magnitude, and their work was greatly admired. The second of these chamber musicals will be held Wednesday, March 28, when the Brodsky Quartet, of New York city, will play. It will be held at the residence of Mrs. Griswold.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 6, 1894.

WILL PAUR STAY?

Col. Higginson's Hope of a New Leader.

The rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived.

This time it comes from New York, in which city Colonel Higginson now is.

While there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give a very favorable coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization.

A Post man talked yesterday with several people who are in positions to know of these things.

"Mr. Paur," said one of this number, "may be with the orchestra next season, but I am inclined to believe that another man will occupy the position if Colonel Higginson can arrange matters.

"Despite what may be said, the statement is true that Mr. Paur has not the qualities possessed by his predecessors which endeared them to the music-loving public. He is not so popular with his audiences, and the orchestra's repute and efficiency are not increased as they have been before.

"He is to my mind inferior in his position to any of those who have preceded him. It would not surprise me to see Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again with the orchestra next season."

Apropos of the Gericke possibility, on the authority of a friend who talked with him recently, it may be stated that that musician has repented his refusal of the offer extended to him when Mr. Nikisch left, and would accept the position willingly if again tendered.

Gericke, in conversation with the Boston friend mentioned, stated that had he known that he was wanted here by the public generally, as well as by Colonel Higginson, he should have left Vienna.

One act of omission on the part of Colonel Higginson is believed to mean more than any act of commission yet done by him.

It has always been customary at the last concert of the season in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and other cities to announce on the printed programmes the concerts for the next season, their number, and the name of the leader.

This year the programmes appeared without a word of announcement.

This was in direct contravention of the custom which has been observed for at least ten years.

The inference is that Colonel Higginson, expecting to make a change before next season, preferred to omit the announcement altogether rather than to print one without a leader's name, which would undoubtedly have attracted greater attention.

The annual trip westward will be omitted this spring, also, although the stated cause—the financial depression—may be responsible for this.

Still, a depression does not generally affect such events as the Symphony concerts.

Mr. Paur is generally believed to have come over for a five years' stay. The breaking of contract which his dismissal would mean must be compensated for. Five thousand dollars is understood to be the figure which will be paid him.

This sum will be no inducement to him to leave, however. One who knows him quite well said:

"Leader Paur will stay if he possibly can, and it will be the shattering of all his hopes if he is not directing the Symphony Orchestra next season.

"A matter of $5000 is nothing. To leave his position and return to Europe after one season would mean failure—would have an effect on the minds of the musical world which he can by no possibility afford."

The situation seems to be that Herr Paur wants to stay, Colonel Higginson doesn't want him to stay, and the Symphony admirers generally have preferences for a more magnetic leader.

[106]

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1894.

"ER-OH-LYING!"

Emil Paur's Characterization of the Latest "Fake."

He Laughs Pityingly as He Reads the Article.

The Eminent Conductor Gives the Terms of His Contract.

Mr. and Mrs. Paur Think Stories Started in New York.

Mr. Emil Paur of the Boston Symphony Orchestra smiled patiently when, in the presence of a Journal reporter, he read the latest account of his professional fate. A morning paper of this city, after digesting all the baseless reports concerning Mr. Paur which have appeared quite regularly in some of the New York papers, decided to announce to-day that "the rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived." It added that, "while there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization."

Mr. Paur's smile began to appear as he slowly studied the foregoing quotations, but when he learned further along the ideas of his contract with Mr. Higginson possessed by some persons he laughed in a pitying way. Then he handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing to that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for 10 years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press and the critics have treated us most kindly.

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Neidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "When we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higginson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty;" and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, APR. 7, 1894.

MR. PAUR'S CONTRACT.

Conductor Paur of the Boston Symphony Orchestra denied once more the old rumor "that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season." It was revived by a morning paper yesterday. "There's nothing to that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying," said Mr. Paur.

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for 10 years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so, on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am content to stay here. I am very contented to stay here."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1894.

AS TO MR. PAUR.

The Foolishness of the New Rumor—His Work.

The Musical Courier of New York has had a recurrence of its former complaint, i. e., the discharge of Conductor Paur from the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season

In its present aberration it disposes of Conductor Paur as "having been weighed in the scales of criticism and found wanting."

Its former hallucination, appearing in its columns in the form of a prediction that Mr. Paur would only remain during one season, has overcome its reason again, and it now asserts that Mr. Higginson has been negotiating for Mr. Paur's successor, with a faint possibility that Mr. Gericke will return to his old post.

It would be interesting to know the source of the information that produces these occasional aberrations on the part of our esteemed contemporary.

Mr. Higginson says that Conductor Paur is engaged for a term of years, and Conductor Paur says that he is engaged for five years with the privilege of an additional five years if he desires.

Mr. Paur is now laying his plans for next season's series, and will be so busy with the affairs of his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that he will not go abroad this summer. These facts hardly warrant a claim that he will be discharged or resign.

He has already rehabilitated the orchestra and is now its master. The musical barbarism that existed during the four seasons that Nikisch encumbered the position of conductor has, with the exception of the infernal pounding of the tympani, been eradicated. It is reported that there will be changes in the membership of the band at the expiration of the present season, among which will be the engagement of a first clarinet player to replace the present incumbent brought here by Nikisch, a player whose efforts when he first began here were, in the opinion of many, hardly above those of a clever amateur.

Undoubtedly the exacting discipline of Conductor Paur has disturbed the go-as-you-please inclinations of many of the players who in this direction enjoyed a sort of picnic under the laxity of Nikisch's incompetency.

That business is all over now, and whoever remains under the baton of Conductor Paur will find that he is positive in his conception and able to enforce his ideas of its rendition, regardless of any inclination, whims, or inattention upon the part of the players engaged to do his bidding.

The Musical Courier admits that Mr. Paur is an excellent musician and conductor, and in the same breath remarks that there are at least half a dozen conductors in this country his superiors. Well, if there are a half dozen such, none of them are to be found in New York. The Boston Transcript, which the Musical Courier taunts, will be able to crow over its New York contemporary next fall as lustily as will the Republican party over the beginning annihilation of the Democratic crew that has scuttled its craft with the auger of free silver and free trade, and gone to bottom helpless in the midocean of its political idiocy. In the slang of the day, "come off," gentlemen of the Musical Courier, and "give us a rest" on this subject of the future conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, through his superior ability, made Leipsic forget your friend Nikisch, and he has done Boston the same service.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XCV. NO. 98.

SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The memory of Dr. Hans von Bulow was honored in the programme of last evening's Symphony concert by the performance of his "Funerale" in D minor, the last of a set of four character pieces dedicated by the composer to Hans von Bronsart. The composition consists of a single movement of an uninteresting character, which is, however, elaborately treated in the well-known style of Von Bulow.

The great "Eroica" symphony followed, and the reading given the work by Mr. Paur was thoroughly conservative and equally gratifying. The funeral march was played in a particularly impressive fashion and the finale was read in a way to bring out all its manifold beauties. The audience was greatly pleased with the performance given the symphony, and the work of the men merited all the applause given at its conclusion.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist, making his annual appearance in the concerts on this occasion. He chose for his contribution to the programme the first and second movements from Bernhard's "Moliques," concerto for violin No. 5 in A minor, playing the andante first and following it with the allegro. Mr. Roth has gained something in finish and style since his last appearance in these concerts, and what his playing lacks in strength and character is made up for largely in the purity of his tone and his delicate touch. He is a master of the technique of his instrument, and the many difficulties of the allegro movement were played with an easy grace that quite charmed his audience. He was honored with generous applause at the conclusion of his effort, in which his fellow-musicians joined.

Brahm's tragic overture ended the programme, and Mr. Paur brought to its performance all of his well known admiration for the works of this composer, giving the admirers of "Beethoven's successor" an opportunity to appreciate the finale of the programme to the fullest extent.

Next week's concert will consist of a reading of "Midsummer Night's Dream," with Shakespeare's music, in which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1894.

Music is again but strife and contention. There is talk, it seems, against Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, just as there was talk against the gentlemen who preceded him, Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch. A conductor is not only a man who governs an orchestra by a stick; he draws toward him the lightning of comment and criticism. But there is no lightning in this present attack. Trains of gunpowder have been slyly laid, but there is smoldering, there is sputtering, rather than any fierce explosion.

The critics are in singular harmony, and they praise this leader. The audiences applaud heartily. Who, pray, are the discontented? Are they young composers whose pieces do not seem to Mr. Paur worthy of performance? Are they members of the orchestra who have been justly corrected for tardiness or indifference at rehearsals? Is there, possibly, one that aspires ambitiously to the very position now held by Mr. Paur?

It appears that Mr. Paur is a fine fellow and an excellent musician, but, alas, he is not "magnetic." He filled positions in Europe with honor; but, alas, he is not "magnetic." Under his direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays exceedingly well; but, alas, he is not "magnetic." If he were only a horse-shoe magnet of science, or the loadstone mountain that wrecked the third Royal Calender, or even the toy magnet dear to children; then, all would be well.

In olden times the loadstone was worshiped as a god; in modern times the loadstone-conductor worships himself. There was an ancient belief that iron statues were suspended in the air by help of loadstones; and the wonder at the suspension dulled acute consideration of the worth of the statue. When the loadstones were removed, the statue fell, and there was merely broken iron. Now, Mr. Nikisch was such a magnet, and the orchestra under him was the statue. A "magnetic" conductor is a dangerous thing.

Or possibly the objection against Mr. Paur is that he does not please certain individuals in New York. But was he not hired to please chiefly the audiences of Boston?

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8, 1894.

Just why Hans von Bulow should have had an elegiac concert in Boston, when that sort of respect was paid neither to Gounod nor Tschaikowsky, does not appear obviously, unless the reason be that he was a German, while neither of them was. Any how a goodly proportion, if not the whole of the audience at last night's Symphony concert must have regretted his death sincerely because it was the excuse for weighing down their spirits with one of the gloomiest and least interesting programmes which even Mr. Paur's poor judgment in such matters has compounded. It began with a "Funerale" composed by the late lamented, which fortunately was not very long and was rather expressively developed in a Wagnerian fashion from a melancholy theme first propounded by a cheerful choir of bassoons, horns and violas. The treatment of this subject was musicianly and was worked up a couple of times or so to a good deal of sonority and strength. The composer had had the consideration to end its lugubrious minor monody with a few bars in the major mode, but the impression left was still sepulchral. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony followed—noblest of works in its kind, grand, grave even in its lighter moods, and tinged with sombreness even when it would rejoice and acclaim. A work of works, yet one which should be heard either upon some occasion of solemn state or in relief against the outpourings of altogether other moods. The andante and the opening allegro from Molique's fifth violin concerto came next, but added no positive interest or real life to the hour. The andante is pleasant but pensive, and the other movement makes a good deal of display and tries the players' skill and speed, yet says nothing of consequence and diverts by no positive brilliancy. Mr. Roth played the movements very well, showing a marked gain in composure, smoothness and self-command, manifested through a technique which was quite equal to the demands of the music. Brahms's rather grim and heavy "Tragic" overture brought the concert to a serious conclusion. The orchestra did good service all through the evening both mechanically and in spirit.

The next programme consists solely of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, with the ladies of the Cecilia for vocal assistants, while the usual condensed version of the play will be read by Mr. Riddle, whose success in it has always been eminent.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1894.

Von Bulow's Memory Honored by the Symphony Orchestra—Grand German Opera—Varied Musical Happenings.

The program of the 21st symphony concert was given in memory of Hans Guido von Bulow, who died Feb 12 of this year.

One of this eminent composer's latest works was given the place of honor on the program, a "Funerale" in D minor. It is a short and very impressive composition. There is but one movement and a single theme. The latter is itself extremely simple, but is worked out with much elaboration.

In treatment the work is strikingly characteristic of the unique individuality and vigorous, straightforward methods of its composer. It will take high rank with older writings of this character.

The performance by the orchestra was admirable; rarely has a composition received more sympathetic or impressive interpretations.

The other selections consisted of Beethoven's third symphony (Heroic), two movements from Bernhard Molique's concerto No. 5 for violin and orchestra, and Johannes Brahms' tragic overture in D minor. These are all very impressive offerings and thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the occasion, even if their heaviness and length did prove so severe a tax upon the attention of the audience that many left the hall before the final number was played.

The interpretation of the familiar Beethoven symphony differed materially from that given here by Mr Paur's predecessors and proved, considered as a whole, very satisfactory. The simple grandeur, and one might say rugged, character of the music was made more evident than was the custom with former conductors.

Mr Paur's was probably as faithful a reading of the great master's famous symphony as has ever been given here. There were none of those dainty ornamentations and novel changes of tempo which were so much in favor with Mr Nikisch.

Mr Otto Roth added materially to his popularity here by his really brilliant playing of the violin solo in Molique's concerto. He some time ago proved himself entitled to high rank among resident violinists and the evidence shown yesterday of advancement in his art was most gratifying to a large number of friends. His technique seems equal to all requirements, his tones are pure and exact and he plays with uncommon expression and true artistic feeling.

The program of this week's concert will consist of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr George Riddle will read the text and the orchestra will be assisted by a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8, 1894.

Because of the peculiar character of the twenty-second Symphony concert, last night, it could scarcely be recommended as a "cure for the blues," for, with two funeral marches and a tragic overture, the programme was of a rather heavy, sombre order. But the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony more than compensated for any shortcomings in the make-up, and, as played last night, it was deserving all the enthusiasm lavished upon it.

As a tribute to the late Von Bulow, his Funerale, op. 23, No. 4, was selected as the first piece on the programme, and, as it was the first time the Symphony band had played it, it must be looked upon as one of the few novelties of the season. It consists of a single movement, with one prominent theme running through it, and which is at times considerably elaborated. It was beautifully played, but failed to make any special impression upon the audience.

The one bit of sunlight let in upon the rather gloomy evening was furnished by Mr. Otto Roth, who played two movements from Molique's violin concerto in A. Mr. Roth is at all times a most finished and conscientious artist, and for his magnificent rendering of the piece he was called back several times. The "Tragic Overture" in D minor, by Brahms, closed the programme, and its dash and spirit served to sufficiently awake the audience and prepare itself for departure.

For the concert next Saturday, Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given, with the assistance or a chorus from the Cecilia, and Mr. George Riddle, reader.

[107]

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1894.

"ER-OH-LYING!"

Emil Paur's Characterization of the Latest "Fake."

He Laughs Pityingly as He Reads the Article.

The Eminent Conductor Gives the Terms of His Contract.

Mr. and Mrs. Paur Think Stories Started in New York.

Mr. Emil Paur of the Boston Symphony Orchestra smiled patiently when, in the presence of a Journal reporter, he read the latest account of his professional fate. A morning paper of this city, after digesting all the baseless reports concerning Mr. Paur which have appeared quite regularly in some of the New York papers, decided to announce to-day that "the rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived." It added that, "while there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization."

Mr. Paur's smile began to appear as he slowly studied the foregoing quotations, but when he learned further along the ideas of his contract with Mr. Higginson possessed by some persons he laughed in a pitying way. Then he handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing to that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for 10 years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press and the critics have treated us most kindly.

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Neidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur. "When we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higginson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty;" and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
SATURDAY MORNING, APR. 7, 1894.

MR. PAUR'S CONTRACT.

Conductor Paur of the Boston Symphony Orchestra denied once more the old rumor "that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season." It was revived by a morning paper yesterday. "There's nothing to that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying," said Mr. Paur.

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for 10 years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am content to stay here. I am very contented to stay here."

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1894.

AS TO MR. PAUR.

The Foolishness of the New Rumor—His Work.

The Musical Courier of New York has had a recurrence of its former complaint, i. e., the discharge of Conductor Paur from the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season

In its present aberration it disposes of Conductor Paur as "having been weighed in the scales of criticism and found wanting."

Its former hallucination, appearing in its columns in the form of a prediction that Mr. Paur would only remain during one season, has overcome its reason again, and it now asserts that Mr. Higginson has been negotiating for Mr. Paur's successor, with a faint possibility that Mr. Gericke will return to his old post.

It would be interesting to know the source of the information that produces these occasional aberrations on the part of our esteemed contemporary.

Mr. Higginson says that Conductor Paur is engaged for a term of years, and Conductor Paur says that he is engaged for five years with the privilege of an additional five years if he desires.

Mr. Paur is now laying his plans for next season's series, and will be so busy with the affairs of his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that he will not go abroad this summer. These facts hardly warrant a claim that he will be discharged or resign.

He has already rehabilitated the orchestra and is now its master. The musical barbarism that existed during the four seasons that Nikisch encumbered the position of conductor has, with the exception of the infernal pounding of the tympani, been eradicated. It is reported that there will be changes in the membership of the band at the expiration of the present season, among which will be the engagement of a first clarinet player to replace the present incumbent brought here by Nikisch, a player whose efforts when he first began here were, in the opinion of many, hardly above those of a clever amateur.

Undoubtedly the exacting discipline of Conductor Paur has disturbed the go-as-you-please inclinations of many of the players who in this direction enjoyed a sort of picnic under the laxity of Nikisch's incompetency.

That business is all over now, and whoever remains under the baton of Conductor Paur will find that he is positive in his conception and able to enforce his ideas of its rendition, regardless of any inclination, whims, or inattention upon the part of the players engaged to do his bidding.

The Musical Courier admits that Mr. Paur is an excellent musician and conductor, and in the same breath remarks that there are at least half a dozen conductors in this country his superiors. Well, if there are a half dozen such, none of them are to be found in New York. The Boston Transcript, which the Musical Courier taunts, will be able to crow over its New York contemporary next fall as lustily as will the Republican party over the beginning annihilation of the Democratic crew that has scuttled its craft with the auger of free silver and free trade, and gone to bottom helpless in the midocean of its political idiocy. In the slang of the day, "come off," gentlemen of the Musical Courier, and "give us a rest" on this subject of the future conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, through his superior ability, made Leipsic forget your friend Nikisch, and he has done Boston the same service.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 98.
SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The memory of Dr. Hans von Bulow was honored in the programme of last evening's Symphony concert by the performance of his "Funerale" in D minor, the last of a set of four character pieces dedicated by the composer to Hans von Bronsart. The composition consists of a single movement of an uninteresting character, which is, however, elaborately treated in the well-known style of Von Bulow.

The great "Eroica" symphony followed, and the reading given the work by Mr. Paur was thoroughly conservative and equally gratifying. The funeral march was played in a particularly impressive fashion and the finale was read in a way to bring out all its manifold beauties. The audience was greatly pleased with the performance given the symphony, and the work of the men merited all the applause given at its conclusion.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist, making his annual appearance in the concerts on this occasion. He chose for his contribution to the programme the first and second movements from Bernhard's "Moliques," concerto for violin No. 5 in A minor, playing the andante first and following it with the allegro. Mr. Roth has gained something in finish and style since his last appearance in these concerts, and what his playing lacks in strength and character is made up for largely in the purity of his tone and his delicate touch. He is a master of the technique of his instrument, and the many difficulties of the allegro movement were played with an easy grace that quite charmed his audience. He was honored with generous applause at the conclusion of his effort, in which his fellow-musicians joined.

Brahm's tragic overture ended the programme, and Mr. Paur brought to its performance all of his well known admiration for the works of this composer, giving the admirers of "Beethoven's successor" an opportunity to appreciate the finale of the programme to the fullest extent.

Next week's concert will consist of a reading of "Midsummer Night's Dream," with Shakespeare's music, in which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1894.

Music is again but strife and contention. There is talk, it seems, against Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, just as there was talk against the gentlemen who preceded him, Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch. A conductor is not only a man who governs an orchestra by a stick; he draws toward him the lightning of comment and criticism. But there is no lightning in this present attack. Trains of gunpowder have been slyly laid, but there is smoldering, there is sputtering, rather than any fierce explosion.

The critics are in singular harmony, and they praise this leader. The audiences applaud heartily. Who, pray, are the discontented? Are they young composers whose pieces do not seem to Mr. Paur worthy of performance? Are they members of the orchestra who have been justly corrected for tardiness or indifference at rehearsals? Is there, possibly, one that aspires ambitiously to the very position now held by Mr. Paur?

It appears that Mr. Paur is a fine fellow and an excellent musician, but, alas, he is not "magnetic." He filled positions in Europe with honor; but, alas, he is not "magnetic." Under his direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays exceedingly well; but, alas, he is not "magnetic." If he were only a horse-shoe magnet of science, or the loadstone mountain that wrecked the third Royal Calender, or even the toy magnet dear to children; then, all would be well.

In olden times the loadstone was worshiped as a god; in modern times the loadstone-conductor worships himself. There was an ancient belief that iron statues were suspended in the air by help of loadstones; and the wonder at the suspension dulled acute consideration of the worth of the statue. When the loadstones were removed, the statue fell, and there was merely broken iron. Now, Mr. Nikisch was such a magnet, and the orchestra under him was the statue. A "magnetic" conductor is a dangerous thing.

Or possibly the ob'ection against Mr. Paur is that he does not please certain individuals in New York. But was he not hired to please chiefly the audiences of Boston?

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8, 1894.

Just why Hans von Bulow should have had an elegiac concert in Boston, when that sort of respect was paid neither to Gounod nor Tschaikowsky, does not appear obviously, unless the reason be that he was a German, while neither of them was. Any how a goodly proportion, if not the whole of the audience at last night's Symphony concert must have regretted his death sincerely because it was the excuse for weighing down their spirits with one of the gloomiest and least interesting programmes which even Mr. Paur's poor judgment in such matters has compounded. It began with a "Funerale" composed by the late lamented, which fortunately was not very long and was rather expressively developed in a Wagnerian fashion from a melancholy theme first propounded by a cheerful choir of bassoons, horns and violas. The treatment of this subject was musicianly and was worked up a couple of times or so to a good deal of sonority and strength. The composer had had the consideration to end its lugubrious minor monody with a few bars in the major mode, but the impression left was still sepulchral. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony followed—noblest of works in its kind, grand, grave even in its lighter moods, and tinged with sombreness even when it would rejoice and acclaim. A work of works, yet one which should be heard either upon some occasion of solemn state or in relief against the outpourings of altogether other moods. The andante and the opening allegro from Molique's fifth violin concerto came next, but added no positive interest or real life to the hour. The andante is pleasant but pensive, and the other movement makes a good deal of display and tries the players' skill and speed, yet says nothing of consequence and diverts by no positive brilliancy. Mr. Roth played the movements very well, showing a marked gain in composure, smoothness and self-command, manifested through a technique which was quite equal to the demands of the music. Brahms's rather grim and heavy "Tragic" overture brought the concert to a serious conclusion. The orchestra did good service all through the evening both mechanically and in spirit.

The next programme consists solely of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, with the ladies of the Cecilia for vocal assistants, while the usual condensed version of the play will be read by Mr. Riddle, whose success in it has always been eminent.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1894.

Von Bulow's Memory Honored by the Symphony Orchestra—Grand German Opera—Varied Musical Happenings.

The program of the 21st symphony concert was given in memory of Hans Guido von Bulow, who died Feb 12 of this year.

One of this eminent composer's latest works was given the place of honor on the program, a "Funerale" in D minor. It is a short and very impressive composition. There is but one movement and a single theme. The latter is itself extremely simple, but is worked out with much elaboration.

In treatment the work is strikingly characteristic of the unique individuality and vigorous, straightforward methods of its composer. It will take high rank with older writings of this character.

The performance by the orchestra was admirable; rarely has a composition received more sympathetic or impressive interpretations.

The other selections consisted of Beethoven's third symphony (Heroic), two movements from Bernhard Molique's concerto No. 5 for violin and orchestra, and Johannes Brahms' tragic overture in D minor. These are all very impressive offerings and thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the occasion, even if their heaviness and length did prove so severe a tax upon the attention of the audience that many left the hall before the final number was played.

The interpretation of the familiar Beethoven symphony differed materially from that given here by Mr Paur's predecessors and proved, considered as a whole, very satisfactory. The simple grandeur, and one might say rugged, character of the music was made more evident than was the custom with former conductors.

Mr Paur's was probably as faithful a reading of the great master's famous symphony as has ever been given here. There were none of those dainty ornamentations and novel changes of tempo which were so much in favor with Mr Nikisch.

Mr Otto Roth added materially to his popularity here by his really brilliant playing of the violin solo in Molique's concerto. He some time ago proved himself entitled to high rank among resident violinists and the evidence shown yesterday of advancement in his art was most gratifying to a large number of friends. His technique seems equal to all requirements, his tones are pure and exact and he plays with uncommon expression and true artistic feeling.

The program of this week's concert will consist of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr George Riddle will read the text and the orchestra will be assisted by a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8, 1894.

Because of the peculiar character of the twenty-second Symphony concert, last night, it could scarcely be recommended as a "cure for the blues," for, with two funeral marches and a tragic overture, the programme was of a rather heavy, sombre order. But the performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony more than compensated for any shortcomings in the make-up, and, as played last night, it was deserving all the enthusiasm lavished upon it.

As a tribute to the late Von Bulow, his Funerale, op. 23, No. 4, was selected as the first piece on the programme, and, as it was the first time the Symphony band had played it, it must be looked upon as one of the few novelties of the season. It consists of a single movement, with one prominent theme running through it, and which is at times considerably elaborated. It was beautifully played, but failed to make any special impression upon the audience.

The one bit of sunlight let in upon the rather gloomy evening was furnished by Mr. Otto Roth, who played two movements from Molique's violin concerto in A. Mr. Roth is at all times a most finished and conscientious artist, and for his magnificent rendering of the piece he was called back several times. The "Tragic Overture" in D minor, by Brahms, closed the programme, and its dash and spirit served to sufficiently awake the audience and prepare itself for departure.

For the concert next Saturday, Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given, with the assistance or a chorus from the Cecilia, and Mr. George Riddle, reader.

[107]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Funerale, Von Bülow (first time); "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; two movements from Concerto No. 5, for violin, Molique, and Tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mr. Otto Roth. The "Funerale" was given in memory of the late Hans Von Bülow. It is somewhat more coherent than the other music of his that we have heard, and somewhat less noisy. It is well made, and richly instrumented, and is, of course, in the extreme modern style. It is not especially impressive, and seems vague and on the whole wearisome on a first hearing. It showed its composer's excellent musicianship, but it did not strike us as showing anything more. The Beethoven Symphony received splendid treatment at the hands of Mr. Paur. The nobility of style in which he read it was in refreshing contrast with the spasmodic and quasi-operatic manner in which it had been given by his predecessor. The tempi were just; the pace of the funeral march being notably so. There were few departures from the conservative reading of the work, and there was only an occasional retarding of the time for the more effective emphasizing of a phrase. Taken altogether, it was as masterly and as satisfying an interpretation of the work as it has ever had at these concerts, and was applauded in a spirit of hearty appreciation. The movements of the Molique concerto are clear, melodious, and have an easy and delightful flow. It is true that they sound a little old-fashioned, but it is a genuine musicianly old fashion. Mr. Roth played them brilliantly, and with irreproachable finish of style. In the matter of fluent and able technique, perfect intonation, phrasing, and grace of expression, nothing was left to wish for. In other respects, there was a lack of virility, but that seems to be a marked characteristic of the violinists of the orchestra who appear as soloists each season. Their peaying is always charming in its elegance, its precision and its fluency, but it is curiously similar in its absence of largeness, of vigor and of what is understood as inspiration. In other words, viewed from its technical standpoint it is admirable, but viewed from the standpoint of broad and manly playing, it seems finical, wanting in intellectuality, and displaying the finger-skilled and the bow-clever virtuoso, rather than the solid and earnest musician. It is all very pretty and very interesting, and is creditable to the industry, the ambition, and the talent of the artists, but it never exemplifies such supreme qualities as to do away with the desire to hear a really great violinist, now and then, at these concerts. Mr. Roth, however, acquitted himself tastefully and well and fairly deserved the hearty applause and the recalls that rewarded his efforts. The programme for the next concert is Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. George Riddle is to be the reader, and the choruses will be sung by members of the Cecilia.

Mischievous Musicians.

Certain people in New York seem to be very much disturbed about the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are full of good advice to Mr. Higginson regarding the course he should pursue in order to maintain the efficiency of the organization. This is amusing when it is considered that the orchestra has never been in a higher state of efficiency than it is under the direction of Mr. Paur. For some reason or other, the writers for the press, in New York, who are averse to the present conductor, never plummetted the depths of their rapture for Mr. Nikisch, under whom the orchestra steadily degenerated until it was in sore danger of losing the front rank it had obtained as one of the leading orchestras of the world.

There is good reason for believing that these periodical attacks on Mr. Paur originate with certain disgruntled members of the orchestra, who, having rejoiced under the lax discipline of Mr. Nikisch, revolt at the severer discipline to which they are subjected by his successor. It has become notorious that these discontents, only three or four in number, lose no opportunity that offers, to disparage Mr. Paur in the most scandalous fashion, and it would seem that, under the circumstances, the most advisable course to pursue would be to dispense with their services, and to fill their places with other players, and to permit them to find situations under conductors who countenance the "hail fellow, well met" methods with their men, that these performers favor, but which Mr. Paur opposes. As far as we have been able to discover, Mr. Paur has the respect and the esteem of his whole orchestra, except these few prominent men among the string players; and he also enjoys the best consideration of the whole musical public, save that of some young composers whose music he has not thought it advisable to perform, for doubtless good reasons, and that of the leader of a well-known clique here who has been unable to use him as he was able to use Mr. Nikisch.

None who have had any experience with large orchestra can possibly be surprised to hear of the petty backbitings, the small jealousies, and the treachery generally, of which they are capable. When Mr. Gericke first came, he was hailed with enthusiasm. After a short time the fault-finding, the disparagement and the contemptible backbiting began, and it was not long before he was in high disfavor with his men; and even those who pretended brotherly love for him when in his presence, ridiculed and snarled at him behind his back. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch. At the outset there went up a cry of perfect delight over him. By and by the usual order of things prevailed, and the backbiting, the belittling, the growling and the adverse criticism, on both professional and personal grounds, began. Here, again, the most zealous scandalizers were those who were most trusted by him, and those who were most sycophantic to him when in his company. A like course has followed Mr. Paur's coming hither. At the beginning, all was laudation. He was a delightful man, a fine musician, and a brilliant conductor. This jubilation continued for the regulation period, and then came the inevitable table-turning. In a short article, intended to be humorous, and which appeared in these columns shortly after Mr. Paur's engagement was announced, we dwelt on this theme, and prophesied exactly what has happened. And it can be prophesied with perfect safety of the orchestra's treatment of any conductor, whether his name be Paur, or Richter, or Colonne and which could be prophesied with similar certainty of Mr. Kneisel, if, by any curious oversight of fate, he should be appointed conductor.

Let us hasten to add, however, that the whole orchestra must not be blamed for the paltriness of a few firebrands. With the exception of these troublesome mischief-makers, Mr. Paur, we are assured, has the entire respect and sympathies of his men. The malcontents have been over-pampered with popularity, social and otherwise, and assume an importance that does not really attach to them. They appear to think that they are indispensable to the success and well-being of the orchestra, whereas, the truth is, that their places could be readily filled for the better. It is these, who, when in New York, supply certain papers there with news which they know to be false, merely for the purpose of stimulating sentiment against their conductor.

One paper there has stated: "There is very little likelihood of Mr. Emil Paur being retained as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next season. He has been weighed in the scales of criticism, and found wanting." The facts are that Mr. Paur's engagement is for five years, and, as we understand, with the privilege of renewal for five more. And, so far from being true is it, that criticism has been adverse to him, it has been exceptionally unanimous in his favor. This same paper says: "Boston's famous band has gone off in finish and musical enthusiasm.' And this, after the dreadful degeneracy to which it sunk under Mr. Nikisch, and its steady recovery under Mr. Paur, until it has reached a higher state of efficiency and of brilliancy in its work than it ever manifested before. All that can be said of the course followed by Mr. Paur's detractors, under the inspiration of the handful of chronic malcontents in his orchestra is, that "the wish is father to the thought." It is to be seriously doubted if the destinies of the orchestra and its conductor are to be influenced from such a distance as New York, by the few soured "kickers" against proper and necessary discipline, to be found in the ranks of the players. It is not easy to find so able a conductor as is Mr. Paur. It is more than easy to find as able, and even more able performers than those who are making all the trouble. As a matter of expediency, it would seem that the orchestra should be purged or its mischief-making malcontents, who, it is quite safe to say, are as plausibly friendly to Mr. Paur, before his face, as they are miserably treacherous to him, behind his back.

Mr. Paur Speaks.

The Boston Journal, in its Friday evening edition, published the following very interesting interview with Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be seen that it sets completely at rest the malicious reports that have obtained currency here and in New York, and which were evidently inspired by some members of the orchestra:

Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, smiled patiently when, in the presence of a Journal reporter, he read the latest account of his professional fate. A morning paper of this city, after digesting all the baseless reports concerning Mr. Paur which have appeared quite regularly in some of the New York papers, decided to announce to-day that "the rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived." It added that, "while there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization."

Mr. Paur's smile began to appear as he slowly studied the foregoing quotations, but when he learned, further along, the ideas of his contract with Mr. Higginson, possessed by some persons, he laughed in a pitying way. Then he handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing in that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for ten years For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press, and the critics have treated us most kindly."

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "when we were in New York the last time, friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higgtnson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty"; and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra—A Remarkable Performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Funerale, op. 23, No. 4.....von Buelow
(First time.)
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
Two movements from concerto for violin..... Molique
No. 5, A minor, op. 21.
II. Andante.
I. Allegro.
Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms

The program of this concert was arranged as a memorial service in honor of the late Hans Guido von Buelow. As Buelow died the 12th of February, the tribute came late, but, as some one said, it takes a long time to bury a distinguished man.

Tschaikowsky, who is one of the greatest composers for orchestra of the last 20 years, died this season and Mr. Paur made no sign. His last symphony, a work that is hailed as a masterpiece in European cities and in New York, has not even been put in rehearsal here.

Gounod's death this season was mourned publicly at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, but Mr. Paur made no sign. And yet no one will argue seriously that Buelow outranks Gounod as a composer.

Not that Buelow is to be grudged this tribute. He was a great, if at times eccentric, orchestral leader. His face, his playing of the piano, his sarcastic wit were well known in this town, and although there may not have been in the audience a sense of personal loss, as often happens when composers, strangers to us, die, nevertheless the tribute was deserved.

This tribute, by the way, would have been more complete if Mr. Paur had refused to put on the program one of Buelow's compositions; for this strange and versatile musician did not shine as a composer. To be sure, the orchestra might have played Buelow's overture to "Julius Cæsar:" and in comparison with that dull enormity, the Funerale is like unto a baleful star in the firmament.

The feature of the evening was the superb performance of the Heroic Symphony. Superb is a large, full word, often loosely used; but such a performance as that of last evening is rare. Not only was there scrupulous attention to detail; not only was there a fortunate and a sane choice of tempi; but under the direction of Mr. Paur there was no thought of orchestral pedagogue or magnetic virtuoso. The one thought was, How great is this music; and not, How admirably the leader conducts. Although the first movement was not played in the fixed, rigid spirit dear to some conservatives, the changes in tempo, slight, but effective, seemed the inevitable expression of the composer's ideas. The performance of the funeral march was free from theatrical extravagance: it was healthy and virile in its grief; there was no cheap suggestion of threadbare crape and tears; it was a lament with a mighty lamentation. Most excellent, too, was the rhythmic precision of the scherzo, and it may here be remarked that the pianissimo of Mr. Paur is a pianissimo, not a restless itch for a piano or a mezzo forte. The variations were played magnificently, and it was a relief to find that the poco andante was not dragged out beyond recognition, and that simplicity was not turned into sentimentalism. All in all, it was a great performance, and Mr. Paur was seconded most ably by the men under his control.

***

O, Bernhard Molique, you played one of your concertos in Paris in 1836, and you were then praised as a composer rather than as a virtuoso. For years your concertos were a delight to violinists. But this is another age.

"King Pandion, he is dead,
All thy friends are lapt in lead."

And to this restless generation your compositions for violin are in the limbo where are found pieces compounded of sugar and amiable bravura; yes, and your own oratorio, "Abraham," is there with many another vocal work, sacred or profane.

Mr. Roth played the peaceful numbers smoothly and with delicacy.

Molique, by the way, was born in 1803, not in 1802 as stated by the program book.

***

Next Saturday evening Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given. Mr. George Riddle will be the reader, and there will be a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

ABOUT MUSIC.

What is the meaning of all this talk about the possible resignation of Mr. Paur?

***

In Le Ménestrel, published at Paris, March 18th, is this paragraph: "Some time ago we announced that the position of Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston had been offered without favorable result to the chief Conductors in Germany, and Mr. Paur was persuaded finally to accept it. We are forced to believe that the position is an unpleasant one in spite of the enormous salary attached to it, because Mr. Paur has made known his intention to resign and return to Germany."

***

The following paragraph was published in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, Berlin, March 23: "Information, said to be trustworthy, comes from Boston to the effect that Mr. Paur has no thought of giving up his position there and returning to Europe. He is, on the contrary, so pleased that he intends to fulfill his contract for 10 years, particularly as the critics and the public applaud his work."

***

Last week a prominent musical newspaper in New York published the statement that Mr. Higginson has been negotiating for a successor, "and there is a faint possibility of Wilhelm Gericke returning to his old post."

***

There is no use of denying the fact that there is here in Boston a certain opposition to the methods of Mr. Paur, the conductor. This opposition is not found in the musical articles contributed to the press of Boston. Nor do I believe that there is any substantial opposition on the part of the audience to Mr. Paur.

It is true, however, that certain members of the orchestra do not hesitate in public to condemn the conducting of Mr. Paur and to sneer at his musical intelligence.

These objectors are few in number, but they undoubtedly have a certain influence.

It is not improbable that their policy is shaped by the determination of Mr. Paur to be conductor, in deed as well as in name.

Now ideal government has been defined as absolute despotism tempered by occasional assassination.

I do not understand that Mr. Paur is disagreeable at rehearsal; but it is said that he insists on having his own musical ideas, i. e., his interpretation of the composer's meaning carried out without question by the men who are paid by Mr. Higginson to obey the leader chosen by him, whether the name be Gericke, Nickish or

There are changes that might well be made next season in the personnel of the orchestra. The first clarinet is not the equal of his associates. The horns as a quartet are comparatively weaker brethren. And the kettle drum man should be given an opportunity to exercise his strength in some ruder land.

It is true that this drummer is agile, yet in dexterity is he surpassed easily by the Burmese, who perform in all sorts of apparently impossible positions, as behind the back, over and under the shoulders, under the legs, and, no doubt, while standing on the head.

This drummer with his dull ear and passion for noise was born out of due time. Years ago in Mexico a beautiful youth was sacrificed to Tezcatlipoca. And when after preparatory stuffing, and rejoicing, and festal procession the victim was put upon the altar of jasper, a mighty drum was pounded. Bernal Diaz saw the drum. It was made of serpents' skins. The sound of it was so loud that it could be heard eight miles away.

If this drummer is as dear to Mr. Paur as the apple of his eye, why does he not bring him forward in an horrific solo? We are obliged each year to listen to certain violinists and 'cellists of the orchestra in set solo pieces. However admirable their performances may be, it would be a pleasure to partake of the joy of variety. The selection of soloists seems, like kissing, to go by favor, particularly when two such remarkable performers as Marteau, the violinist, and de Pachmann, the pianist, now in this country, are not given a hearing.

I believe that this drummer was once heard in an elaborate solo at a promenade concert, but why should he not be invited to appear at one of the 24 solemn functions? There is a piece that he might play, a solo for six kettle drums, accompanied br full orchestra, written by Tausch. It is in two movements, slow march and polonaise. Of course, the indulgence of the audience should be requested during the tuning.

And at another concert one of the trombone players might be heard, say in an arrangement of Stigelli's "Tear."

***

One thing may justly be said of Mr. Paur: however great his merits as a conductor may be, he is not skillful in the composition of his programs. It is my impression that he means to be catholic in selection; but he apparently has little sense of values and he does not appreciate the power of judicious contrast.

It is given to few to present such interesting programs as those arranged by Mr. Frank Van der Stucken, who, by the way, is a conductor to be at least considered if Mr. Paur should by any chance make up his mind to return to Germany. Some here would at once object to Mr. Van der Stucken: for he was born in this country, he is not a German by birth or by parentage, and he believes in giving the works of the modern school a hearing, whether they be written by Frenchmen, Belgians, Germans, Russians, Italians, Americans, Barbarians or Scythians. These objections are indeed insuperable—that is, in Boston—and I hasten to withdraw the suggestion. Let us fold the hands and resign ourselves to an endless succession of Schmidts and Muellers, for they are the people, and music will die with them.

***

It is to be hoped that there will not be any change at present. Mr. Paur seems to be an honest, capable man, seeking to perform thoroughly the duties of his position, and not courting in any way self-glorification. Under his direction the orchestra has recovered the perfection of technique that, gained under Mr. Gericke, was frittered away under Mr. Nikisch. It should be understood thoroughly by the men under him that he, as conductor, has a right to fine even the most prominent if they are late at a rehearsal; nor should he be maligned because he insists that he is master in all questions of tempo and nuancirung.

PHILIP HALE.

MR. PAUR'S TALK.

The Journal's Exclusive Interview With the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sets the Town by the Ears.

The Journal's exclusive interview with Mr. Emil Paur, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, anent the latest "fake" story that he would not lead that aggregation of musicians another year, has aroused great interest and caused not a little excitement among musicians and the general public on account of the eminent conductor's very plain speaking.

As previously stated exclusively in the Journal, after reading the story as published by a Boston morning contemporary, Mr. Paur handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing to that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for 10 years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press and the critics have treated us most kindly.

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "when we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too, but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the Director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty, and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higginson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty," and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval.

This Journal interview has been the talk of the town, and has caused more comment than anything of a similar nature that has been published for years.

[108]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Funerale, Von Bülow (first time); "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; two movements from Concerto No. 5, for violin, Molique, and Tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mr. Otto Roth. The "Funerale" was given in memory of the late Hans Von Bülow. It is somewhat more coherent than the other music of his that we have heard, and somewhat less noisy. It is well made, and richly instrumented, and is, of course, in the extreme modern style. It is not especially impressive, and seems vague and on the whole wearisome on a first hearing. It showed its composer's excellent musicianship, but it did not strike us as showing anything more. The Beethoven Symphony received splendid treatment at the hands of Mr. Paur. The nobility of style in which he read it was in refreshing contrast with the spasmodic and quasi-operatic manner in which it had been given by his predecessor. The tempi were just; the pace of the funeral march being notably so. There were few departures from the conservative reading of the work, and there was only an occasional retarding of the time for the more effective emphasizing of a phrase. Taken altogether, it was as masterly and as satisfying an interpretation of the work as it has ever had at these concerts, and was applauded in a spirit of hearty appreciation. The movements of the Molique concerto are clear, melodious, and have an easy and delightful flow. It is true that they sound a little old-fashioned, but it is a genuine musicianly old fashion. Mr. Roth played them brilliantly, and with irreproachable finish of style. In the matter of fluent and able technique, perfect intonation, phrasing, and grace of expression, nothing was left to wish for. In other respects, there was a lack of virility, but that seems to be a marked characteristic of the violinists of the orchestra who appear as soloists each season. Their peaying is always charming in its elegance, its precision and its fluency, but it is curiously similar in its absence of largeness, of vigor and of what is understood as inspiration. In other words, viewed from its technical standpoint it is admirable, but viewed from the standpoint of broad and manly playing, it seems finical, wanting in intellectuality, and displaying the finger-skilled and the bow-clever virtuoso, rather than the solid and earnest musician. It is all very pretty and very interesting, and is creditable to the industry, the ambition, and the talent of the artists, but it never exemplifies such supreme qualities as to do away with the desire to hear a really great violinist, now and then, at these concerts. Mr. Roth, however, acquitted himself tastefully and well and fairly deserved the hearty applause and the recalls that rewarded his efforts. The programme for the next concert is Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. George Riddle is to be the reader, and the choruses will be sung by members of the Cecilia.

Mischievous Musicians.

Certain people in New York seem to be very much disturbed about the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are full of good advice to Mr. Higginson regarding the course he should pursue in order to maintain the efficiency of the organization. This is amusing when it is considered that the orchestra has never been in a higher state of efficiency than it is under the direction of Mr. Paur. For some reason or other, the writers for the press, in New York, who are averse to the present conductor, never plummetted the depths of their rapture for Mr. Nikisch, under whom the orchestra steadily degenerated until it was in sore danger of losing the front rank it had obtained as one of the leading orchestras of the world.

There is good reason for believing that these periodical attacks on Mr. Paur originate with certain disgruntled members of the orchestra, who, having rejoiced under the lax discipline of Mr. Nikisch, revolt at the severer discipline to which they are subjected by his successor. It has become notorious that these discontents, only three or four in number, lose no opportunity that offers, to disparage Mr. Paur in the most scandalous fashion, and it would seem that, under the circumstances, the most advisable course to pursue would be to dispense with their services, and to fill their places with other players, and to permit them to find situations under conductors who countenance the "hail fellow, well met" methods with their men, that these performers favor, but which Mr. Paur opposes. As far as we have been able to discover, Mr. Paur has the respect and the esteem of his whole orchestra, except these few prominent men among the string players; and he also enjoys the best consideration of the whole musical public, save that of some young composers whose music he has not thought it advisable to perform, for doubtless good reasons, and that of the leader of a well-known clique here who has been unable to use him as he was able to use Mr. Nikisch.

None who have had any experience with large orchestra can possibly be surprised to hear of the petty backbitings, the small jealousies, and the treachery generally, of which they are capable. When Mr. Gericke first came, he was hailed with enthusiasm. After a short time the fault-finding, the disparagement and the contemptible backbiting began, and it was not long before he was in high disfavor with his men; and even those who pretended brotherly love for him when in his presence, ridiculed and snarled at him behind his back. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch. At the outset there went up a cry of perfect delight over him. By and by the usual order of things prevailed, and the backbiting, the belittling, the growling and the adverse criticism, on both professional and personal grounds, began. Here, again, the most zealous scandalizers were those who were most trusted by him, and those who were most sycophantic to him when in his company. A like course has followed Mr. Paur's coming hither. At the beginning, all was laudation. He was a delightful man, a fine musician, and a brilliant conductor. This jubilation continued for the regulation period, and then came the inevitable table-turning. In a short article, intended to be humorous, and which appeared in these columns shortly after Mr. Paur's engagement was announced, we dwelt on this theme, and prophesied exactly what has happened. And it can be prophesied with perfect safety of the orchestra's treatment of any conductor, whether his name be Paur, or Richter, or Colonne and which could be prophesied with similar certainty of Mr. Kneisel, if, by any curious oversight of fate, he should be appointed conductor.

Let us hasten to add, however, that the whole orchestra must not be blamed for the paltriness of a few firebrands. With the exception of these troublesome mischief-makers, Mr. Paur, we are assured, has the entire respect and sympathies of his men. The malcontents have been over-pampered with popularity, social and otherwise, and assume an importance that does not really attach to them. They appear to think that they are indispensable to the success and well-being of the orchestra, whereas, the truth is, that their places could be readily filled for the better. It is these, who, when in New York, supply certain papers there with news which they know to be false, merely for the purpose of stimulating sentiment against their conductor.

One paper there has stated: "There is very little likelihood of Mr. Emil Paur being retained as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next season. He has been weighed in the scales of criticism, and found wanting." The facts are that Mr. Paur's engagement is for five years, and, as we understand, with the privilege of renewal for five more. And, so far from being true is it, that criticism has been adverse to him, it has been exceptionally unanimous in his favor. This same paper says: "Boston's famous band has gone off in finish and musical enthusiasm.' And this, after the dreadful degeneracy to which it sunk under Mr. Nikisch, and its steady recovery under Mr. Paur, until it has reached a higher state of efficiency and of brilliancy in its work than it ever manifested before. All that can be said of the course followed by Mr. Paur's detractors, under the inspiration of the handful of chronic malcontents in his orchestra is, that "the wish is father to the thought." It is to be seriously doubted if the destinies of the orchestra and its conductor are to be influenced from such a distance as New York, by the few soured "kickers" against proper and necessary discipline, to be found in the ranks of the players. It is not easy to find so able a conductor as is Mr. Paur. It is more than easy to find as able, and even more able performers than those who are making all the trouble. As a matter of expediency, it would seem that the orchestra should be purged or its mischief-making malcontents, who, it is quite safe to say, are as plausibly friendly to Mr. Paur, before his face, as they are miserably treacherous to him, behind his back.

Mr. Paur Speaks.

The Boston Journal, in its Friday evening edition, published the following very interesting interview with Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be seen that it sets completely at rest the malicious reports that have obtained currency here and in New York, and which were evidently inspired by some members of the orchestra:

Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, smiled patiently when, in the presence of a Journal reporter, he read the latest account of his professional fate. A morning paper of this city, after digesting all the baseless reports concerning Mr. Paur which have appeared quite regularly in some of the New York papers, decided to announce to-day that "the rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived." It added that, "while there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization."

Mr. Paur's smile began to appear as he slowly studied the foregoing quotations, but when he learned, further along, the ideas of his contract with Mr. Higginson, possessed by some persons, he laughed in a pitying way. Then he handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing in that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for ten years For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press, and the critics have treated us most kindly."

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "when we were in New York the last time, friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higgtnson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty"; and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval,

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1894.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra—A Remarkable Performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Funerale, op. 23, No. 4.....von Buelow
(First time.)
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
Two movements from concerto for violin.....Molique
No. 5, A minor, op. 21.
II. Andante.
I. Allegro.
Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms

The program of this concert was arranged as a memorial service in honor of the late Hans Guido von Buelow. As Buelow died the 12th of February, the tribute came late, but, as some one said, it takes a long time to bury a distinguished man.

Tschaikowsky, who is one of the greatest composers for orchestra of the last 20 years, died this season and Mr. Paur made no sign. His last symphony, a work that is hailed as a masterpiece in European cities and in New York, has not even been put in rehearsal here.

Gounod's death this season was mourned publicly at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, but Mr. Paur made no sign. And yet no one will argue seriously that Buelow outranks Gounod as a composer.

Not that Buelow is to be grudged this tribute. He was a great, if at times eccentric, orchestral leader. His face, his playing of the piano, his sarcastic wit were well known in this town, and although there may not have been in the audience a sense of personal loss, as often happens when composers, strangers to us, die, nevertheless the tribute was deserved.

This tribute, by the way, would have been more complete if Mr. Paur had refused to put on the program one of Buelow's compositions; for this strange and versatile musician did not shine as a composer. To be sure, the orchestra might have played Buelow's overture to "Julius Cæsar;" and in comparison with that dull enormity, the Funerale is like unto a baleful star in the firmament.

The feature of the evening was the superb performance of the Heroic Symphony. Superb is a large, full word, often loosely used; but such a performance as that of last evening is rare. Not only was there scrupulous attention to detail; not only was there a fortunate and a sane choice of tempi; but under the direction of Mr. Paur there was no thought of orchestral pedagogue or magnetic virtuoso The one thought was, How great is this music; and not, How admirably the leader conducts. Although the first movement was not played in the fixed, rigid spirit dear to some conservatives, the changes in tempo, slight, but effective, seemed the inevitable expression of the composer's ideas. The performance of the funeral march was free from theatrical extravagance: it was healthy and virile in its grief; there was no cheap suggestion of threadbare crape and tears; it was a lament with a mighty lamentation. Most excellent, too, was the rhythmic precision of the scherzo, and it may here be remarked that the pianissimo of Mr. Paur is a pianissimo, not a restless itch for a piano or a mezzo forte. The variations were played magnificently, and it was a relief to find that the poco andante was not dragged out beyond recognition, and that simplicity was not turned into sentimentalism. All in all, it was a great performance, and Mr. Paur was seconded most ably by the men under his control.

***

O. Bernhard Molique, you played one of your concertos in Paris in 1836, and you were then praised as a composer rather than as a virtuoso. For years your concertos were a delight to violinists. But this is another age.

"King Pandion, he is dead,
All thy friends are lapt in lead."

And to this restless generation your compositions for violin are in the limbo where are found pieces compounded of sugar and amiable bravura; yes, and your own oratorio, "Abraham," is there with many another vocal work, sacred or profane.

Mr. Roth played the peaceful numbers smoothly and with delicacy.

Molique, by the way, was born in 1803, not in 1802 as stated by the program book.

***

Next Saturday evening Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given. Mr. George Riddle will be the reader, and there will be a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

ABOUT MUSIC.

What is the meaning of all this talk about the possible resignation of Mr. Paur?

***

In Le Ménestrel, published at Paris, March 18th, is this paragraph: "Some time ago we announced that the position of Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston had been offered without favorable result to the chief Conductors in Germany, and Mr. Paur was persuaded finally to accept it. We are forced to believe that the position is an unpleasant one in spite of the enormous salary attached to it, because Mr. Paur has made known his intention to resign and return to Germany."

***

The following paragraph was published in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, Berlin, March 23: "Information, said to be trustworthy, comes from Boston to the effect that Mr. Paur has no thought of giving up his position there and returning to Europe. He is, on the contrary, so pleased that he intends to fulfill his contract for 10 years, particularly as the critics and the public applaud his work."

***

Last week a prominent musical newspaper in New York published the statement that Mr. Higginson has been negotiating for a successor, "and there is a faint possibility of Wilhelm Gericke returning to his old post."

***

There is no use of denying the fact that there is here in Boston a certain opposition to the methods of Mr. Paur, the conductor. This opposition is not found in the musical articles contributed to the press of Boston. Nor do I believe that there is any substantial opposition on the part of the audience to Mr. Paur.

It is true, however, that certain members of the orchestra do not hesitate in public to condemn the conducting of Mr. Paur and to sneer at his musical intelligence.

These objectors are few in number, but they undoubtedly have a certain influence.

It is not improbable that their policy is shaped by the determination of Mr. Paur to be conductor, in deed as well as in name.

Now ideal government has been defined as absolute despotism tempered by occasional assassination.

I do not understand that Mr. Paur is disagreeable at rehearsal; but it is said that he insists on having his own musical ideas, i. e., his interpretation of the composer's meaning carried out without question by the men who are paid by Mr. Higginson to obey the leader chosen by him, whether the name be Gericke, Nickish or

It is also stated that Mr. [illegible] a contract for five years with the privilege of renewal, and he has no intention of leaving a position that pleases him. As he is a man of firmness, it is not likely that he will be disturbed seriously by the mutterings of a few discontented players, or by the thought of Mr. Nikisch in Pesth, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter.

***

There are changes that might well be made next season in the personnel of the orchestra. The first clarinet is not the equal of his associates. The horns as a quartet are comparatively weaker brethren. And the kettle drum man should be given an opportunity to exercise his strength in some ruder land.

It is true that this drummer is agile, yet in dexterity is he surpassed easily by the Burmese, who perform in all sorts of apparently impossible positions, as behind the back, over and under the shoulders, under the legs, and, no doubt, while standing on the head.

This drummer with his dull ear and passion for noise was born out of due time. Years ago in Mexico a beautiful youth was sacrificed to Tezcatlipoca. And when after preparatory stuffing, and rejoicing, and festal procession the victim was put upon the altar of jasper, a mighty drum was pounded. Bernal Diaz saw the drum. It was made of serpents' skins. The sound of it was so loud that it could be heard eight miles away.

If this drummer is as dear to Mr. Paur as the apple of his eye, why does he not bring him forward in an horrific solo? We are obliged each year to listen to certain violinists and 'cellists of the orchestra in set solo pieces. However admirable their performances may be, it would be a pleasure to partake of the joy of variety. The selection of soloists seems, like kissing, to go by favor, particularly when two such remarkable performers as Marteau, the violinist, and de Pachmann, the pianist, now in this country, are not given a hearing.

I believe that this drummer was once heard in an elaborate solo at a promenade concert, but why should he not be invited to appear at one of the 24 solemn functions? There is a piece that he might play, a solo for six kettle drums, accompanied by full orchestra, written by Tausch. It is in two movements, slow march and polonaise. Of course, the indulgence of the audience should be requested during the tuning.

And at another concert one of the trombone players might be heard, say in an arrangement of Stigelli's "Tear."

***

One thing may justly be said of Mr. Paur: however great his merits as a conductor may be, he is not skillful in the composition of his programs. It is my impression that he means to be catholic in selection; but he apparently has little sense of values and he does not appreciate the power of judicious contrast.

It is given to few to present such interesting programs as those arranged by Mr. Frank Van der Stucken, who, by the way, is a conductor to be at least considered if Mr. Paur should by any chance make up his mind to return to Germany. Some here would at once object to Mr. Van der Stucken: for he was born in this country, he is not a German by birth or by parentage, and he believes in giving the works of the modern school a hearing, whether they be written by Frenchmen, Belgians, Germans, Russians, Italians, Americans, Barbarians or Scythians. These objections are indeed insuperable—that is, in Boston—and I hasten to withdraw the suggestion. Let us fold the hands and resign ourselves to an endless succession of Schmidts and Muellers, for they are the people, and music will die with them.

***

It is to be hoped that there will not be any change at present. Mr. Paur seems to be an honest, capable man, seeking to perform thoroughly the duties of his position, and not courting in any way self-glorification. Under his direction the orchestra has recovered the perfection of technique that, gained under Mr. Gericke, was frittered away under Mr. Nikisch. It should be understood thoroughly by the men under him that he, as conductor, has a right to fine even the most prominent if they are late at a rehearsal; nor should he be maligned because he insists that he is master in all questions of tempo and nuancirung.

PHILIP HALE.

MR. PAUR'S TALK.

The Journal's Exclusive Interview With the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sets the Town by the Ears.

The Journal's exclusive interview with Mr. Emil Paur, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, anent the latest "fake" story that he would not lead that aggregation of musicians another year, has aroused great interest and caused not a little excitement among musicians and the general public on account of the eminent conductor's very plain speaking.

As previously stated exclusively in the Journal, after reading the story as published by a Boston morning contemporary, Mr. Paur handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing to that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for 10 years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press and the critics have treated us most kindly.

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "When we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too, but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the Director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty, and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling [illegible]me circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as [illegible]e could. "Col. Higginson has told me not to [illegible]ermit careless players to be members of the [illegible]rchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty." "Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's [illegible]ife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that [illegible]hey, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The [illegible]onger he stays here the stronger he [illegible]ill become, and the others will go when [illegible]hey do not do their duty," and Mr. Paur bowed [illegible]is head once more in approval.

This Journal interview has been the talk of [illegible]he town, and has caused more comment than [illegible]nything of a similar nature that has been [illegible]ublished for years.

[108]

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1894.

VON BULOW'S MEMORY

The Twenty-first Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A GREAT PERFORMANCE

The Orchestra Heard to Best Advantage.

A Beethoven Symphony Magnificently Interpreted by Conductor Paur.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme, "In Memoriam Hans Guido Von Buelow"—born Jan. 8, 1830, died Feb. 12, 1894—was as follows:

Funerale, op 23, No. 4.....Bulow
(First time.)
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Andante and Allegro from Violin Concerto No. 5, Molique
Tragic Overture.....Brahms
Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist.

The great feature of this programme was the superb rendering of the Beethoven Symphony, by the orchestra, under the exacting baton of Conductor Paur, who now has such a mastery over the efforts of the players that he was enabled to present his noble conception of Beethoven's masterpiece of symphonic composition with a degree of expressiveness, discriminating tempi and rhythmical excellence that was well nigh faultless. Such a fine reading and such perfect playing seldom go hand in hand. Mr. Paur has now established his reputation as an almost unrivalled interpreter of the Master Beethoven. The audience recognized the wonderfully elevated and highly expressive rendering of the symphony with applause, at once spontaneous and prolonged, which Mr. Paur modestly acknowledged.

There is little to be said in praise of the recent eminent pianist's "Funerale" movement. It is scored in the modern mode and is skilfully managed in this direction, but it is, nevertheless, a dry and uninspired effort upon the part of its author, and fails in its effect to move the listener.

It is as a player of the highest intellectual order and a pedagogue of rare ability that Von Buelow must be remembered.

The smooth, flowing Andante and the florid and brilliant Allegro of the Molique Concerto furnished Mr. Otto Roth a fine opportuntity wherein to display his clear and ample technique, both as a player of cantabile and the difficulties of rapid technical work. Mr. Roth's intonation was remarkably correct. Although the work is old-fashioned and perhaps tedious to the listener, it was well chosen by the player to exhibit his best qualities. Mr. Roth was heartily applauded after his playing and was recalled.

The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Brahms's unmelodic but effective overture.

It is said that Mr. Paur has been disciplining some of his players lately for not getting to rehearsals on time. It would be well if he would discipline himself also, and begin the concerts on time. On Saturday he came on the stage 10 minutes after 8 o'clock. This made the performance drag beyond the hour at which it should have ended, and caused a great exodus of patrons before the concert was finished.

Mr. Paur also shows very poor judgment in arranging his programmes as regards their length. The programmes this evening was 10 minutes over the reasonable duration of one hour and a half, and had the Huldigung March followed the Brahms Overture as Mr. Paur first planned, it would have been a most tedious experience.

A large number of the subscribers to these concerts are suburbans, and must necessarily leave at a certain time in order to catch their trains. Mr. Paur should recognize this fact and remedy the difficulty by beginning at 8 o'clock promptly, and arranging his programme so that it shall end by 9.30.

Next Saturday evening Mendelsshon's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given, with the assistance of a chorus of members of the Cecilia. Mr. George Riddle will read from Shakespeare's lines.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APR. 9, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

To illustrate the peculiar deftness in the art of programme-making which has ruled recently in our symphony concerts, it may be mentioned that there were two funeral marches on the list on Saturday, the soloist came on at a quarter past nine, and a tragic overture made a dark ending to the matter at about 10 P.M. But everything in this long and ill-assorted programme was played to perfection, and there was certainly an excuse for the gloom of much of the music in the fact that the occasion was a tribute to the memory of the recently deceased Von Bulow.

To give a concert in memory of this great worker in music could not have been a very easy task, for Bulow was at his very weakest as a composer; to celebrate the memory of Tschaikowsky or even of Gounod would have been infinitely easier. One work only by the defunct was upon the programme, and this was by far the least interesting number of the evening. The "Funerale," which was the work in question, was a good study in scoring and in musical arithmetic, but its name was not to be whispered in the same breath with what Beethoven, Wagner or Chopin have done in the same direction.

It was immediately obliterated by Beethoven's Heroic symphony, which received an interpretation that has not been surpassed in this city. There was a little of over-precision in the first movement, but this was a failing that leaned to virtue's side. The Funeral March was given with just the right sentiment, being neither too inflated on the one hand, nor too lachrymose on the other. Coleridge once spoke of this as "a funeral march in purple," and the note of dignity which this implies was present from first to last. The oboe did especially excellent work in this movement, and the great orchestral sob with which the movement ends was perfectly portrayed.

The scherzo was taken with just the right spirit also; it is really the first symphonic scherzo ever written, for in the scherzo of the second symphony (the first establishment of this kind of movement) the composer has kept very close to the minuet in form, style and tempo, and it is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first symphony. Berlioz's idea that it pictures the world going on, chattering bargaining, and enjoying itself, even after the death of the hero, may not be so far from the truth, but he who listens carefully will not fail to hear something of the clash of swords, an echo of heroism, even in its jovial measures. The horn trio of this movement is not so difficult now, when the players give everything on F horns with ventils, as it was in the composer's time, when it was performed on three E-flat horns. It was very well played and the charming modulation in which D-flat is suddenly introduced was most clear and effective in performance. The finale always seems to the reviewer the beginning of the struggle of Beethoven to produce a good counterpoise to the power of the first-movement-form, a struggle continued in the fifth symphony and culminated in the ninth. It has always been a defect in the sonata-form (of which the symphony is the highest expression) that the trump card is played first, that the beginning with the finest form known to modern music makes the finale either a copy or an anti-climax. It seems odd, too, that Beethoven did not venture on trombones, the military instruments for heavy work, in this symphony, (they first came into symphony in the finale of the fifth symphony) and as he never made much of the trumpets (there is not a very difficult trumpet passage in all Beethoven's scores) the military tone-color is not very prominent. The finale was splendidly performed, and one may congratulate Boston on once more hearing Beethoven's works as he intended them, without extra spice or sensationalism.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist and played two movements of Molique's fifth concerto for violin with excellent expression and technique. His tone is broader, his style more masculine than it used to be, and he made more out of the sweet and rather cloying work than one would have expected. Many recalls greeted the end of his performance, and the enthusiasm was fully earned. The work itself, however, scarcely seems worthy of being ranked with the true concertos; compared with Mendelssohn's or any of Bruch's (to compare it with Beethoven's would be sacrilege), it seems rather a violin solo with orchestral accompaniment than an interweaving of the two forces, an orchestral work with a solo thread woven into the fabric, as the concerto should be and as the works cited are. Yet it is rich in melody, and even in these days of musical "impressionists" a set of tuneful themes is sure to win appreciation.

More laudatory adjectives must be showered upon the Tragic overture by Brahms. It had a smaller audience than its predecessors, for many had departed when it began. Its gloom was of a different type from that of the first two numbers; it is full of foreboding, of weird and mystic brooding; it suggests Ossian as strongly as Mendelssohn, and more strongly than Gade has done. Its interpretation only heightened the conviction that we are gaining ground steadily in the standard of our orchestral work, all that was lost has been recovered and the future promises even more.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was in memoriam Hans Guido, Baron von Bülow (born in Dresden Jan. 8, 1830; died in Cairo, Egypt, Feb. 12, 1894.) The programme was as follows:

Hans von Bülow: Funerale, Opus 23, No. 4.
(First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), Opus 55.
Molique: Two movements from Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, Opus 21.
Brahms: Tragic Overture, in D minor, Opus 81.
Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

An in memoriam programme is seldom an easy one to make up, especially when the person to be honored has made little or no mark as a composer. All sorts of conflicting elements have to be reconciled, as best they may. That each selection should have a certain appositeness to the occasion, goes without saying; it is also desirable that the programme itself should be a fine one, its component numbers going well together, both in the way of similarity of purpose and of artistic contrast. The problem is no easy one; unfortunately it is too often made harder than necessary by the half-hearted way it is faced. A third element is generally introduced: that of easy practicableness; the great departed musician is to be honored, to be sure, but at the expense of as little trouble as possible, and without lifting the orchestra too much out of its every-day ruts. It is rather like the tribute of respect paid to deceased notabilities by sending the empty family coach to their funerals—a piece of etiquette that does not represent much real pains-taking. We have had this sort of in memoriam concert in Boston before. Not very long ago we "honored" Sebastian Bach, not by giving a fine and carefully prepared performance of any important, hitherto unheard work of his, but by simply turning our Bach-barrel upside down, and fishing out a few old things that could be done with a minimum of trouble.

On last Saturday's programme there was a new work by Von Bulöw himself—probably the first orchestral piece of his ever heard in this city. So far, good! The "Eroica" symphony and the Tragic Overture were also unquestionably apposite; so far, still good! A little open to the suspicion of monotony, perhaps, but on occasions of this sort this is easily pardonable. But, in the name of common decency, what had the movements from Molique's concerto to do or say on such a programme? What possible connection can there be between an obsolete musical pink-of-propriety like Molique and the militant Von Bulöw, whose whole artistic life was an unintermitting energetic protest against all that men of Molique's stamp represented in music? Von Bülow may be said to have indicated his own in memoriam programme with tolerable distinctness, if ever a musician did. "My musical creed is in E-flat major—with three B's (flats) to the signature: Bach, Beethoven and Brahms!" We had the Beethoven and the Brahms; for which all thanks. But where was the Bach?—the first on the list! Conspicuous only by his absence! Or was Molique, a respectable gentleman who had made his studies in counterpoint as well as another, to rattle round in the great John Sebastian's shoes and stand proxy for him? We suspect that here the element of "easy practicableness" came in: that Mr. Roth had long been down on the list for a concerto, that the in memoriam Von Bülow programme was an after-thought, and that, having already made out the three remaining programmes of the season, Mr. Paur did not see his way clear to lodging Mr. Roth and his concerto anywhere else. And let it be said furthermore that, if the Molique concerto showed no honor to Von Bülow, its position on the programme showed no favor whatever to Mr. Roth. To ask a solo player to face an audience after nearly an hour and a half of pretty solid music, is to show him no kindness; but to expect him to thrill an audience with a poor, attenuated little salon-concerto like Molique's immediately after the "Eroica" symphony—that is to put him into about as anomalous a position as any artist could desire to escape from. Just after the uneasy chromatics and nightmare oppression of the Von Bülow Funerale, the unassuming clearness of style and rather simpering daintiness of the two Molique movements might have been really grateful; but Beethoven's "Eroica" killed it outright.

Von Bülow's Funerale is a piece of free writing, in which one catches a glimpse of more than one Wagnerish-sounding phrase. It seems to us quite as good as a great deal of the music that passes muster nowadays; it is only its disproportion with the greatness of Von Bülow's name that makes it seem something of a pity to rake it up out of oblivion and expose it to public hearing. The "Eroica" was played with great spirit, and with excellently well-chosen tempi; the performance, however, was not throughout impeccable in point of finish. Brahms's grand Tragic Overture was very well played indeed, and made a superb effect.

Mr. Roth played the Molique concerto very beautifully indeed, with exquisite sentiment in the cantilena passages, fine warmth of tone, grace of phrasing, and brilliancy of bravura. The composition itself we have already spoken of; it is dead past resuscitation. We have a suspicion, too, that the style of violin-playing which belonged to it in its day is also obsolete now. We have heard some of the older generation of violinists, now passing or passed away, speak with regret of the decay of the old "grand style" of solo playing which they remembered hearing in their youth. The late Julius Eichberg, for instance, would now and then go into descriptive details on the subject; his account tallied very well with other plausible historical evidence. These to us flimsy little concertos, especially the broader cantilena passages, were played with a grandiosity of dramatic expression that would probably raise a smile today; the same thing was true of the older English ballad-singing, by men like Incledon and Braham; simple little songs like the Dibdin ballads were sung in a portentously dramatic style that would have befitted the most strenuous passages in grand opera. Ole Bull's violin-playing was one of the last remnants of the old style,—exaggerated, to be sure, and pushed to extremes. No doubt it would be a ticklish experiment to try this sort of thing before a serious audience today; people would be pretty sure to laugh at it. Still we should not forget that things like this concerto of Molique's were probably conceived in this vein, and that it was this sort of playing that made them effective in the ears of audiences in the heyday of their popularity.

The next programme is Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with a chorus from the Cecilia and Mr. George Riddle as reader of the text.

THE NEW YORK MUSICAL COURIER has secured what it was after, notoriety, to wit: A deliberate statement that Mr. Paur would be dismissed from his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made in the Courier of last Wednesday, started several Boston newspapers on errands of inquiry, with the result that Mr. Paur denied the report, entirely. On a former occasion, when the Courier set this rumor afloat, the Transcript denied it on the highest authority. The Courier closed its latest repetition of the story, for which it furnished no corroborative evidence, with the expression of a wonder what the Transcript will say now. Only for that reason is any attention paid to the matter at this moment. Whether the Courier has any other motive than to gain notoriety is not worth the trouble to inquire. It may mean mischief, but it is harmless. The Courier has so many admirable features, that one sees with regret that it is disposed to resort to such unworthy means. Coupled with the report of Mr. Paur's enforced withdrawal are sneers at Mr. Theodore Thomas's capacity. Taken together, they look as if there were a conspiracy to set up some other conductor to rule the orchestras of New York, Chicago and Boston.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1894.

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last evening, the concert being the sixth and last of this season's series. At the hour of the concert the disagreeable storm which set in during the afternoon was at its height, the streets were in a forbidding condition for pedestrians, and the effect upon the attendance was shown by an unusual number of empty seats. Still, an audience of very fair size braved the elemental war, and were rewarded by hearing some very excellent playing. The music offered was more or less familiar to the regular attendants of the Symphony concerts, and either from this cause or in sympathy with the chill which reigned both outside and inside the hall, there was a lack of the usual demonstrative applause. The programme given ran as follows:

Felix Mendelssohn-Barthoidy—Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Op. 56: I. Introduction: Andante con moto (A minor), allegro un poco agitato (A minor); II. Vivace non troppo (B major); III. Adagio (A major); IV. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor), allegro maestoso assai (A major). Max Bruch—Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, Op. 44: Adagio ma non troppo; recit. (allegro moderato); finale (allegro molto). Anton Rubinstein—Ballet music from "Feramors:" I. Candle dance of the Brides of Kashmire: Moderato con moto (D minor); II. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto (B-flat major). Ludwig van Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72: Adagio (C major); allegro (C major).

Mr. Paur has been criticised for his programmes, it having been said of them that they lack, as a rule, the element of contrast. This, for instance, was exclusively a German programme, for Rubinstein, though Russian by birth, is thoroughly German in the form and coloring of his music, and in the general trend of his musical ideas and sympathies. The so-called "Scotch" overture of Mendelssohn, which headed the programme, is a gigantic work in but one direction—its length. In the biographies of Mendelssohn the story of the composing of this symphony is that it records the impressions made upon his receptive and sensitive mind while upon a visit to the Hebrides by the rugged and stormy grandeur of the Scottish coast scenery. The story may be true, but there is little in the work to suggest—if it were unlabelled—the grand and stern aspect of nature in Scottish cliff and crag. Moreover, the Scotch are not garrulous, but the symphony is; there are too many "conversational" episodes between the different families of instruments, and the "working out" of the various movements is carried to the point of tediousness. The only thing discernible to justify the name is the introduction into some of the themes of the peculiar rhythmic form known to musicians as the "Scotch snap." But, whether it be happily labelled or not, it is good music, and shows in many points the well-known traits of its author. No musician has ever excelled Mendelssohn in the finished and polished style of his work; his judgment was usually unerring in all matters of detail, a fact which makes the prolixity of some parts of this symphony almost understandable. The instrumentation is a beautiful mosaic, and full justice was rendered it in last night's performance.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. I. Schnitzler, who gave an exceedingly good performance of Bruch's violin concerto. The work itself is of but moderate interest, but the playing of the young artist fully justified the applause which greeted him at its close. His tone is not large, but clear as crystal, his technique is ample, and his playing throughout was marked by plenty of dash and spirit, governed by that masterful reserve that betrays the true artistic temperament. At the close of the concerto he was three times recalled.

The two excerpts from Rubinstein's opera "Feramors" formed the light number of the programme, and, with their "catchy" dance rhythms and bizarre orchestration, made a pleasant break in the solid procession of musical heavyweights. The scoring was strongly suggestive of Berlioz, who is by no means one of Rubinstein's musical gods. A fine performance of the greatest of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his one opera brought the concert to a close.

The season has been a successful and enjoyable one, and many fine works have been presented, though very few novelties. It is evident that the new conductor of the orchestra has a decided leaning toward the German school, as, out of the twenty-five numbers performed in these six concerts, no less than nineteen have been the works of German composers. Still, no fault can be found with the quality of the music offered. Five instrumental soloists have appeared, and but one vocalist (Madame Nordica at the first concert); a more even distribution here would have been acceptable to many. Mr. Paur, as conductor, has justified the belief of those who named him as a thorough and capable musician, though he lacks the magnetism and personal popularity of Nikisch. As stated above, fault has been found with his programme making, in that he seems to prefer to make his concerts all of one color. Such a system has some advantages, but it is doubtful if the element of judicious contrast does not offer more. There have been rumors that Herr Paur would retire at the end of the season, but in a recent interview he states that both himself and the management are satisfied with their relations, and that he has a five-year contract, which will not be broken. So that we shall doubtless greet again next season the same organization and leader.

---

[109]

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1894.

THE SERIES ENDED.

Final Performance in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Course.

The last performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence for this season was enjoyed at Infantry hall last night by a gathering which the execrable weather made considerably smaller than have been the audiences heretofore. The event was a fitting termination of a course of diversions so thoroughly entertaining as this one has proven, and in the success attained was mirrored the promise of an equally meritorious series of concerts for next year.

The program was like nearly all those Conductor Paur has chosen—rather one-sided in being practically national in character. One objection made to the music selected by the present leader for the public recitals has been that it is not varied enough when formed into a program for the tastes of most patrons of the orchestra. This was the criticism laid upon the offerings of last night. Outside of this point there was little that called for suggestion. The entirely orchestral numbers were rendered with the usual showy and perfect style of this organization. The works were the Symphony No. 3, a minor (Scotch), by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholly; ballet music from "Fesemors," by Rubinstein, and the overture to "Leonora," Beethoven. Herr I. Schnitzler was the soloist, his number being Bruch's violin concerto No. 2 in D minor. His interpretation of the fancies in the two movements played was refined and delightful.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, April 14, 1894.

"Naturally Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week," says the New York Musical Courier of this week. The writer continues:—"Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defense, and blamed some of the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor. Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second-rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words?, Mr. Paur must go."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 105.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last evening's concert at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra included Mendelssohn's music for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The connecting dialogue was read by Mr. George Riddle and the vocal numbers were given with the assistance of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Harriet S. Whittier, and a chorus of the Cecilia singers.

Mr. Paur's reading of the overture was a most fascinating one, and all of the instrumental music was given an interpretation of the most pleasing sort. The graceful scherzo, the wedding march and the other more familiar concert pieces were delightfully played, and as a whole the orchestral score has rarely been given better treatment in local concert rooms.

The singers were well chosen, the soloists and the chorus filling the demands of the vocal numbers with eminent success.

Mr. Riddle's reading of the fairy drama has been made familiar in former seasons. In certain parts he shows an improvement over any of the work he has done here in this play, and he caught the spirit of the more humorous scenes in a very happy fashion. No man can fully realize the airy grace of the fairy lines, and a full dress suit of the modern day in constant evidence fails to aid the imagination in picturing the scenes in which Oberon and Titania take prominence.

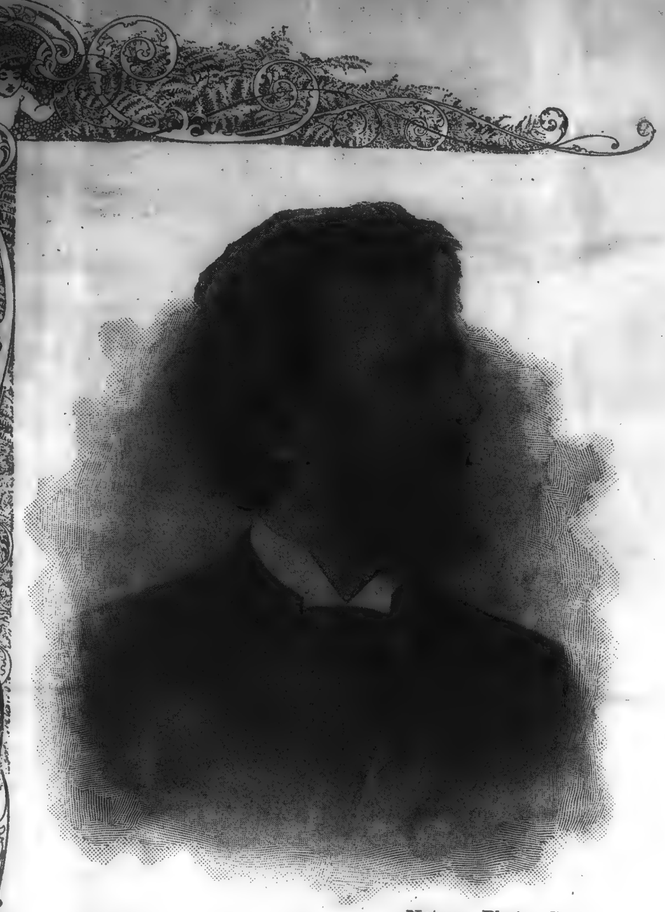
As a whole, however, the evening proved an enjoyable one and afforded many a source of constant pleasure.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Antoinette Trebelli will be the soloist and the programme will include Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to J. K. Paine's "Œdipus" and the "King Stephen" overture by Beethoven.

London Journal

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1894.



Notman Photo. Co.

(Emil Paur.)

Another thing which affects me at just this time of year is the annual onslaught upon the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I use no name because it would be the same whatever name stood as a synonym, and that it is Mr. Paur's makes no difference whatever. It has become a custom and probably Boston sentiment will keep it up as long as the orchestra exists.

And the starters of stories about the resignation of the leader always ignore the fact that he is engaged for a certain number of years and that he cannot be deposed in less time without mutual consent. And yet it is encouraging to see that this year the stories have been disposed of in much less time than usual.

I am told upon credible authority that all this dissention springs from within the orchestra itself and that a few pampered players, who, when they brush their hair, have to reach farther out than they do up, are responsible for these things. Orchestras have long been an excellent illustration of the necessity for all to work together, and it would seem now as though it were impossible to get true harmony in its music if there were not true harmony in its action. If there are any discordant sounds in the playing Mr. Paur would quickly eliminate them, and so it seems perfectly reasonable to say that if there are any discordant elements within the personnel of the orchestra, they also should be eliminated.

This elimination might remove some of the petted darlings of Boston society, but if Mr. Paur can succeed in suppressing them he will be as good as any patent medicine for removing the "tired feeling" which comes at about this time of year.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1894.

The 20th Symphony Concert. Of course there is fine writing in Liszt's Faust Symphony; in the Faust movement you hear something of philosophic despair and joy; the next hints of Gretchen; and these themes reappear in the third movement; but take that part for all in all it might as well be called Dame Martha or the Poodle, and seventy minutes is an insufferable waste of ears. Mendelssohn's Calm Sea overture was a blessed repose thereafter; though hardly scientific in title, in 1828, for with a sailing ship never a prosperous voyage can come from a "sea-calm." Bruch's Kol Nidrei, his Adagio on a theme from Jewish ritual, was exquisitely played, with Mr. Schulz in the cello solo, and Schueker at the harp. But the loveliest relief followed immediately after the Faust—a Berceuse in A, and a Scherzo in D, with Trio in G, by our own citizen Clayton Johns, for strings, and heard for the first time by this orchestra; as was the case also with the Faust Symphony which recalls the hymn:

Bound on a voyage of awful length,
Through dangers little known,
A stranger to superior strength,
Man vainly trusts his own,

and makes one think of wickedly substituting "Liszt" for "Man" in the last line. Life is too short for such musical experiments.

J. H. W.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1894.

For the first time since its constitution, the Symphony orchestra has given the whole of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, which composed—with the usual condensed version of the play—the whole of last night's concert. The orchestra is at last in just the right condition to play the delicate fairy music, the broad and gruff and yet modest humorous illustrations to the clown-comedy, the fantastic overture, the lightsome scherzo, the tranquil nocturne and the resplendent wedding-march, each in its proper mood and with its proper touch. Exactitude has come back to the strings, definiteness of attack to the wind choirs and obedience to the whole body of men, so that the conductor's desires are promptly and truly expressed, scarcely less to the credit of the executants than to his own. The entire performance was a delightful one for unity of rendering and for perfection of taste in the numbers of graceful beauty. There were decision and fulness when required, and the wedding march was superb in its splendid rhythmic emphasis, its resonant purity of tone and its remarkable enthusiasm. The small and few vocal numbers were well contributed by the ladies of the Cecilia, the brief, light solo passages being gracefully rendered by Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier.

The reader of the text was Mr. George Riddle, who stands facile princeps in it. There may be hidden away somewhere in the land another reader, woman or man, who might safely challenge comparison with him in this most difficult task; but we know of none such. He has a peculiar natural fitness in the melodious tone and extended compass of his voice, to whose sweet, fine, high and suave qualities his art has added depth, strength and upon occasion a ruggedness which at first seems quite unreconcilable with those other elements as the product of one and the same organ. He is alike happy in the fanciful airy voicings of Puck and the spirits, the femininity of Helena and Hermia, and in the rough, strident outcries of Bottom. More than this, his musical disposition is sensitive and he follows with harmonious sympathy the course of each passage of melodrama. Were we to make a criticism, it would be that in sentimental dialogue he seems less sincere and plastic than in the energetic or humorous; but to urge this might seem like cavilling, and would certainly be unnecessary. Of course, it hardly needs to be added that his diction is elegant, his attention to even minor points of emphasis true, his regard to rhythm invariable and his phrasing scholarly.

Next Saturday's programme gives the orchestra Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to Professor Paine's "Œdipus" and Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture. The soloist will be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, daughter of the famous contralto. She has but recently arrived in this country, and she chooses for this occasion arias from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Le Cid."

The New York Musical Courier continues its malicious and ignorant talk about the conductorship of the Boston orchestra in two more despicable and misleading paragraphs. What its object can be in thus malignantly attacking Mr. Paur and insolently assuming to speak for Mr. Higginson, is beyond even guessing. The only possible explanation or excuse is that it has gone mad with chargrin because its desire to recommend some unsuitable nominee of its own, for the position was passed over with silent contempt. If the Courier told truths, one would not mind its violent language and its ridiculous dictatorial tone. But there may be people in obscure places who will believe in its diatribes just because of their clamorous and confident manner, and it is therefore a pity that some pages out of its own history cannot be reprinted as a warning to those who may imagine that it is always honest and impartial and that it has never had to make mortifying retractions.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[110]

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1894.

THE SERIES ENDED.

Final Performance in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Course.

The last performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence for this season was enjoyed at Infantry hall last night by a gathering which the execrable weather made considerably smaller than have been the audiences heretofore. The event was a fitting termination of a course of diversions so thoroughly entertaining as this one has proven, and in the success attained was mirrored the promise of an equally meritorious series of concerts for next year.

The program was like nearly all those Conductor Paur has chosen—rather one-sided in being practically national in character. One objection made to the music selected by the present leader for the public recitals has been that it is not varied enough when formed into a program for the tastes of most patrons of the orchestra. This was the criticism laid upon the offerings of last night. Outside of this point there was little that called for suggestion. The entirely orchestral numbers were rendered with the usual showy and perfect style of this organization. The works were the Symphony No. 3, a minor (Scotch), by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholly; ballet music from "Fesemors," by Rubinstein, and the overture to "Leonora," Beethoven. Herr I. Schnitzler was the soloist, his number being Bruch's violin concerto No. 2 in D minor. His interpretation of the fancies in the two movements played was refined and delightful.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, April 14, 1894.

"Naturally Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week," says the New York Musical Courier of this week. The writer continues:—"Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defense, and blamed some of the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor. Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second-rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words?, Mr. Paur must go."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XOV. NO. 105.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last evening's concert at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra included Mendelssohn's music for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The connecting dialogue was read by Mr. George Riddle and the vocal numbers were given with the assistance of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Harriet S. Whittier, and a chorus of the Cecilia singers.

Mr. Paur's reading of the overture was a most fascinating one, and all of the instrumental music was given an interpretation of the most pleasing sort. The graceful scherzo, the wedding march and the other more familiar concert pieces were delightfully played, and as a whole the orchestral score has rarely been given better treatment in local concert rooms.

The singers were well chosen, the soloists and the chorus filling the demands of the vocal numbers with eminent success.

Mr. Riddle's reading of the fairy drama has been made familiar in former seasons. In certain parts he shows an improvement over any of the work he has done here in this play, and he caught the spirit of the more humorous scenes in a very happy fashion. No man can fully realize the airy grace of the fairy lines, and a full dress suit of the modern day in constant evidence fails to aid the imagination in picturing the scenes in which Oberon and Titania take prominence.

As a whole, however, the evening proved an enjoyable one and afforded many a source of constant pleasure.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Antoinette Trebelli will be the soloist and the programme will include Brahm's fourth symphony, the prelude to J. K. Paine's "Œdipus" and the "King Stephen" overture by Beethoven.

HOME JOURNAL

The Saturday Evening Paper.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1894.

Notman Photo. Co.

(Emil Paur.)

Another thing which affects me at just this time of year is the annual onslaught upon the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I use no name because it would be the same whatever name stood as a synonym, and that it is Mr. Paur's makes no difference whatever. It has become a custom and probably Boston sentiment will keep it up as long as the orchestra exists.

And the starters of stories about the resignation of the leader always ignore the fact that he is engaged for a certain number of years and that he cannot be deposed in less time without mutual consent. And yet it is encouraging to see that this year the stories have been disposed of in much less time than usual.

I am told upon credible authority that all this dissention springs from within the orchestra itself and that a few pampered players, who, when they brush their hair, have to reach farther out than they do up, are responsible for these things. Orchestras have long been an excellent illustration of the necessity for all to work together, and it would seem now as though it were impossible to get true harmony in its music if there were not true harmony in its action. If there are any discordant sounds in the playing Mr. Paur would quickly eliminate them, and so it seems perfectly reasonable to say that if there are any discordant elements within the personnel of the orchestra, they also should be eliminated.

This elimination might remove some of the petted darlings of Boston society, but if Mr. Paur can succeed in suppressing them he will be as good as any patent medicine for removing the "tired feeling" which comes at about this time of year.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1894.

The 20th Symphony Concert. Of course there is fine writing in Liszt's Faust Symphony; in the Faust movement you hear something of philosophic despair and joy; the next hints of Gretchen; and these themes reappear in the third movement; but take that part for all in all it might as well be called Dame Martha or the Poodle, and seventy minutes is an insufferable waste of ears. Mendelssohn's Calm Sea overture was a blessed repose thereafter; though hardly scientific in title, in 1828, for with a sailing ship never a prosperous voyage can come from a "sea-calm." Bruch's Kol Nidrei, his Adagio on a theme from Jewish ritual, was exquisitely played, with Mr. Schulz in the cello solo, and Schueker at the harp. But the loveliest relief followed immediately after the Faust—a Berceuse in A, and a Scherzo in D, with Trio in G, by our own citizen Clayton Johns, for strings, and heard for the first time by this orchestra; as was the case also with the Faust Symphony which recalls the hymn:

> Bound on a voyage of awful length,
> Through dangers little known,
> A stranger to superior strength,
> Man vainly trusts his own,

and makes one think of wickedly substituting "Liszt" for "Man" in the last line. Life is too short for such musical experiments.

J. H. W.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 15, 1894.

For the first time since its constitution, the Symphony orchestra has given the whole of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, which composed—with the usual condensed version of the play—the whole of last night's concert. The orchestra is at last in just the right condition to play the delicate fairy music, the broad and gruff and yet modest humorous illustrations to the clown-comedy, the fantastic overture, the lightsome scherzo, the tranquil nocturne and the resplendent wedding-march, each in its proper mood and with its proper touch. Exactitude has come back to the strings, definiteness of attack to the wind choirs and obedience to the whole body of men, so that the conductor's desires are promptly and truly expressed, scarcely less to the credit of the executants than to his own. The entire performance was a delightful one for unity of rendering and for perfection of taste in the numbers of graceful beauty. There were decision and fulness when required, and the wedding march was superb in its splendid rhythmic emphasis, its resonant purity of tone and its remarkable enthusiasm. The small and few vocal numbers were well contributed by the ladies of the Cecilia, the brief, light solo passages being gracefully rendered by Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier.

The reader of the text was Mr. George Riddle, who stands facile princeps in it. There may be hidden away somewhere in the land another reader, woman or man, who might safely challenge comparison with him in this most difficult task; but we know of none such. He has a peculiar natural fitness in the melodious tone and extended compass of his voice, to whose sweet, fine, high and suave qualities his art has added depth, strength and upon occasion a ruggedness which at first seems quite unreconcilable with those other elements as the product of one and the same organ. He is alike happy in the fanciful airy voicings of Puck and the spirits, the femininity of Helena and Hermia, and in the rough, strident outcries of Bottom. More than this, his musical disposition is sensitive and he follows with harmonious sympathy the course of each passage of melodrama. Were we to make a criticism, it would be that in sentimental dialogue he seems less sincere and plastic than in the energetic or humorous; but to urge this might seem like cavilling, and would certainly be unnecessary. Of course, it hardly needs to be added that his diction is elegant, his attention to even minor points of emphasis true, his regard to rhythm invariable and his phrasing scholarly.

Next Saturday's programme gives the orchestra Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to Professor Paine's "Œdipus" and Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture. The soloist will be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, daughter of the famous contralto. She has but recently arrived in this country, and she chooses for this occasion arias from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Le Cid."

The New York Musical Courier continues its malicious and ignorant talk about the conductorship of the Boston orchestra in two more despicable and misleading paragraphs. What its object can be in thus malignantly attacking Mr. Paur and insolently assuming to speak for Mr. Higginson, is beyond even guessing. The only possible explanation or excuse is that it has gone mad with chargrin because its desire to recommend some unsuitable nominee of its own, for the position was passed over with silent contempt. If the Courier told truths, one would not mind its violent language and its ridiculous dictatorial tone. But there may be people in obscure places who will believe in its diatribes just because of their clamorous and confident manner, and it is therefore a pity that some pages out of its own history cannot be reprinted as a warning to those who may imagine that it is always honest and impartial and that it has never had to make mortifying retractions.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[110]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, consisted of Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mr. George Riddle reading the poem, and members of the Cecilia rendering the solos and choruses. The music is still fascinating, fresh and interesting, even the overture, hackneyed as it is, retaining all of its original power to charm. Mr. Paur read the score from beginning to end in a delightfully sympathetic manner, and with a fine appreciation of its prevailing delicacy and purity of taste and style. The work of the orchestra was perfect, and its admirable discipline was notably exemplified in the clearness and precision with which the scherzo was given, and in the warmth and grace that marked its playing of the nocturne. Mr. Riddle's reading was not only beautiful from an elocutionary standpoint, but was also brilliant in the skill with which he individualized the various characters and entered into the spirit of the text. The audience, which was a large one, evidenced the pleasure that the performers gave it throughout, by the heartiness and the frequency of its applause. Nothing was lacking to make the entertainment one to be wholly enjoyed. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, E-minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Prelude to "Œdipus," J. K. Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture "King Stephen," Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli.

Paur and the Prophets.

The Musical Courier, of New York, continues to be greatly disturbed about Mr. Paur; why, it is not exactly easy to understand. It is true that we have heard something about the Courier making an application to Mr. Paur to put his portrait on the front page of that weekly, and of Mr. Paur's neglect to comply with the suggestion, which was doubtless delicately and thoughfully made; but this, of course, could not have had any effect in influencing the course of the Courier toward him, for, as we all know, that paper enjoys a flattering celebrity for its fairness and its incorruptibility. To suspect it of enmity to Mr. Paur because he declines to respond favorably to the request for his portrait, and is not open to conviction that it is worth while to pay for its insertion in the Courier would be to do an injustice to a periodical whose uprightness, whose horror of anything resembling the levying of blackmail on artists, and whose reputation for all that is fair, straightforward and honorable, are notorious, if we may use that word in a complimentary sense.

No, it is clear that the Courier is impartial in its hostility to Mr. Paur, and is moved only by its loyalty to art as it understands the matter. What perplexes us, however, is why the Courier is adverse to Mr. Paur, when all the reputable Boston music critics write favorably of him. The Courier says absolutely and imperiously, "Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted;" but it does not tell us why he will not do; and by whom he is not wanted. At this distance from the office of the Courier, it seems that Mr. Paur will do, and we have heard nothing about his not being wanted, except through that paper. Perhaps, if it gave its authority, we should learn that the information so positively sent forth has been derived from some few disgruntled first violinists, who have been disciplined by Mr Paur, and are resentful in consequence. With all our profound admiration for the honesty and the infallibility of the Courier, we are puzzled to understand what it means when it says that "Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. "What does it know practically of him as an artist, and in what is he a second rate conductor? In this benighted spot, it appears that Mr. Paur is the very best conductor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had; that he has retreived the orchestra from the sloppy demoralization into which it fell under the sway of Mr. Nikisch, and has brought it to even a higher state of efficiency, as far as spirit is concerned, than it maintained under Mr. Gericke. The Courier, however, does not seem to be aware of this fact, for it says, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch." Why should he begin to fill them? He was not engaged to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, nor to rival Mr. Nikisch's shirt cuffs. Mr. Nikisch did not fill his own boots, as a conductor of symphony concerts. They were much to large for him. If there is a cause for congratulation in the replacing of Mr. Nikisch by Mr. Paur, it is that the latter has nothing in common with the former, and that there is not a trace of the pretender, the humbug, or the poseur in him. It may be true that he does not visit the office of the Courier when he is in New York, and hob nob with the editors as did Mr. Nikisch; but then he may not have seen the advisability of doing so, and may also have certain views regarding personal dignity, to say nothing of his ignorance of the vital importance of the Courier as a disinterested supporter of musical art in this country, especially in Boston. Under these circumstances, it was somewhat premature in its reference to the size of Mr. Nikisch's boots, owing to its lack of opportuhity to inspect Mr. Paur's boots on its own premises. We must, however, charge the Courier with a few misstatements, not intentionally made, for we are aware that it is so rigid a follower of truth, that we do not hesitate to believe that it will blush for remorse when we have pointed out the errors into which it has fallen,—inadvertently, of course. It says that because Mr. Paur does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, "the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts." The public has done nothing of the kind, and the attendance at the concerts has been quite as large as it was under the gentleman whose boots assume such crucial importance in the eyes of the Courier. Another mistake is the statement, "The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality;" whereas, the truth is that they were abandoned because of the discouraging financial condition at present prevailing through the country, and in the face of which it was considered imprudent to go to the expense of transporting a large orchestra from place to place, under unfavorable circumstances. Then, too, as the South and West know nothing of Mr. Paur, and whether he does or does not lack personality or popularity, it is difficult to see the exact grounds on which our contemporary makes this remarkable statement. The climax of the Courier's polite, amicable and disinterested view of the case is reached in the following words: "Mr. Paur is a failure; a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go!" Ah, why juggle? Mr. Paur must go! He does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, and is an artistic failure; but, leaving these occult boots entirely out of the question, Mr. Paur is an artistic success.

We are afraid that the Courier indulges unconsciously in the very word juggling that it inferentially condemns. It is the boots about which all the argument revolves. The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks on Mr. Paur, would seem to suggest that he wears boots of his own, for which he might find vigorous and justifiable employment by way of showing his appreciation of some of the attentions that have been paid him in New York. In the meanwhile, Mr. Paur does not go. It is true that the Courier says that he "must go," but, as we have already hinted, he is not fully aware of the influential character of the Courier, and blindly, perhaps over-daringly, plays with fire, in remaining here under the terms of his contract. We, however, have such faith in the infallibility of the Courier that we cannot believe it to be capable of a mistake in this matter. "Mr. Paur must go?" Ah! we have it. The Courier juggles with words. It means he must go at the end of his five years' contract, or at the end of ten years if the contract is renewed. There you are! Our faith in the Courier, as a prophet and a power, is justified.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — A Fine Performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Music.

At the twenty-second Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall the overture and the incidental music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" made up the program. Mr. George Riddle read portions of the play. Mrs. Marie B. Smith and Miss Whittier sang the incidental solos. The choruses were sung by members of the Cecilia.

This music to Shakspeare's play, the play that Mr. Pepys thought such poor stuff, is still fresh and delightful. The overture is an exhibition of the spontaneous and the most charming side of Mendelssohn's musical nature; it was written before he became a dealer in mannerisms, and yet it has the peculiar hall mark of his talent. It is true that in delicacy the fairy scherzo, "Queen Mab" of Berlioz, surpasses any portion of the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," but on the other hand Mendelssohn had the gift of more genuine melody.

The Germans, who are so fond of Shakspeare that they claim to have discovered first his genius or even to have invented him, have better opportunities than we to hear this music in connection with the play. They that have heard such performances in the leading towns of Germany know how admirably the music fits the action of clown or fairy. Given thus with gorgeous scenic accessories and with a ballet, the play is a most entertaining spectacle.

Mr. Riddle read with his accustomed elocutionary skill and with fine appreciation of the beauty and the humor of the text. Some might quarrel with his conception of Bottom and prefer a dull, logy, yet uncouous ass. Mr. Riddle presents him rather as a hard, boisterous fellow, and no doubt he has a right to do this; he certainly carries out his conception admirably.

The musical performance was excellent. The overture was finely read and played. The music that accompanies the speaker was given with rare precision and effect.

The horn solo in the nocturne was well played, and the wood-wind was heard to great advantage throughout. The wedding march was taken at a slower pace than is customary, and the result was a stately grandeur in conception that became the marriage of Duke Theseus, and a clearness in certain passages for the brass that are often crackly and ragged when a faster tempo is chosen. The chorus and the solo singers lent valuable assistance. Many stood in the audience throughout the performance, and the applause was frequent and hearty.

The program of next Saturday's concert will be as follows: Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Paine's prelude to "Œdipus," and Beethoven's overture, "King Stephen." Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing airs from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Cid."

PHILIP HALE.

MR. PAUR AS A LION.

It was said of late that there would be greater interest in the Symphony concerts if the conductor, Mr. Paur, were a social lion, and it is believed by many that it is Mr. Paur's duty to art to be prominent at teas, lunches, dinners, receptions and other forms of social entertainments or functions. In other words, the proposition is made in all seriousness that excellence as a musician must be supplemented by parlor-reputation; that the dignity of the office depends on the frequency and the acceptance of pasteboard invitations. Unless the conductor is a recognized factor in social life, the orchestra will have no "social standing," and it will soon be unfashionable to attend the concerts.

To the visitor from Mars such a musical condition in Boston would smack of opera bouffe, and he might naturally inquire into the sincerity of the cultivators of the art. If he were told in addition that the purpose of the generous founder of these concerts was to give at a low price orchestral music performed by an excellent orchestra to the music-loving people of Boston; that this purpose had been of late years thwarted by the desire of many, who looked on the concerts as an opportunity for fashionable display, to raise the price of the tickets to an extravagant height; that the moment a conductor of acknowledged musical ability was engaged, there was more talk concerning his habits and costume than his musical fitness for the position; the visitor from Mars would undoubtedly shrug his shoulders, but not offensively, and say to himself, "Bless my soul, what queer people!"

Now Mr. Paur has a family. He has a pleasant home in Jamaica Plain. When he is through with the exhausting labor of rehearsal, or when the excitement of a concert is over, he is glad to leave the town behind him and rest quietly within the walls of his own dwelling-house. Is he a less competent conductor on this account? Is his knowledge of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, the less because he prefers slippers and a pipe to the formality of evening dress and the fatigue of forced conversation?

Mr. Paur, as he is, appears to be a more dignified figure than Mr. Paur as he should be, according to the definition of the lion-hunters. Should he be forced to play the lion and roar, he would be often in parlous state. Pitfalls and gins would be prepared for him. His roar would be misunderstood and misrepresented. Young composers would find him fair game and chase him under the chandelier. Before the season were over, the hunters would long for a fresh lion and talk of a new conductor.

Now, if the Symphony concerts really depend on the social success of the conductor, the sooner they are abandoned the better for musical righteousness in this city. If these concerts have only gratified a fleeting desire, the sooner they are given up the better for art. But we should be slow to believe that the organization of this great institution, which is indeed an honor to the town, rests on such flimsy foundations.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Symphony—Carl Zerrahn's Testimonial—Music Notes.

Mendelssohn's beautiful musical setting to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with the choruses given by the Cecilia club, portions of the text read by Mr George Riddle, and the solos sung by Mrs Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet Whittier, made up last week's symphony program. This was the first performance here of the entire composition since 1891 when it was performed at the Boston theater by the Philharmonic orchestra under the direction of Bernhard Listemann, Mr Riddle appearing as the reader.

The Cecilia club sang the choruses very daintily, and the soloists, Mrs Smith and Miss Whittier, performed their work quite effectively. Their voices harmonized well, but were lacking in the power necessary for singing with so large an instrumental contingent.

The text was admirably read by Mr Riddle. The comical scenes in which the "hard-handed men of Athens" are introduced, were specially commendable, the reader individualizing the various characters perfectly, and bringing out the humor of the lines with most laughable results. The scenes requiring the simulation of female voices were less successful, the falsetto tones of a man not being particularly pleasing to the ear. The sentiments were skilfully presented, though, and Mr Riddle's intelligent reading and thorough conception of the text clearly demonstrated his right to rank with the foremost in his class of entertainers.

The orchestra played the overture with commendable spirit, and, excepting a roughness in the brasses, the interpretation was excellent in every way. The "Wedding March" made the greatest impression, perhaps, because of its familiarity to the majority of the audience. It was magnificently given, the brasses redeeming themselves by a rich tonality and precision of phrasing, and the long applause at the close brought conductor Paur to the front of the platform several times to bow his acknowledgments.

Throughout the 14 numbers the perfect unanimity of the strings was notably in evidence. The fairy music, with its wonderful lights and shades, was as trippingly and delicately given as one could wish, the finale chorus of elves being one of the gems of the performance.

The audience kept up a rustling of program leaves in following the text, and although the "Dream" is a forest idyl this "realism" was very unpleasant and annoying at times to the reader.

The program this week will be as follows: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; prelude to "Œdipus," Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Mlle Antoinette Trebelli will be the solo singer.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-second concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme consisting of Shakspeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music. Mr. George Riddle was the reader; Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier sang the soprano and contralto solo parts, and the chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

If ever a composer showed genius and the finest sense of poetic and dramatic fitness in writing incidental music to a play, Mendelssohn has done so in his music to "Midsummer-Night's Dream." When one considers that wonderful overture written at the age of seventeen, and the rest of the music, written at thirty-four, one cannot help feeling a touch of ill will toward that well-meaning, but rather borné old tyrant, Abraham Mendelssohn, for doing his best to divert his son's rare genius from its native channel, and dry it up by premature forcing. To think that Mendelssohn gave to the world only four of those wondrously poetic and imaginative tone-poems—the overtures to "Midsummer-Night's Dream," "Die Fingals-Höhle," "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," and "Zur schönen Melusine,"—absolutely original in their day, as they are still ineffably beautiful, when, had not the grim old father stood over him with his inveterate pedantry, he might have left a good dozen such in his musical legacy to the world! If the "Fingals-Höhle" is probably the most completely fine of these four overtures, the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is surely the one which shows the greatest freshness of invention, originality, and most brilliant imaginativeness. Weber himself has not painted the world of poetic fancy and tricksy magic in truer nor more charming colors. And the boy Mendelssohn was only seventeen when he wrote it! He still had tolerably sound nerves then, and could be wholesomely tricksy and frolicsome without a trace of that rather morbid, involuntary restlessness that mars so much in his later works. Both conductor and orchestra fairly outdid themselves; for nicety of perception, vitality of style and fine finish, it was from beginning to end the best performance of the season. One could hardly imagine finer playing of that delightful scherzo that follows the first act. Mr. Paur's slight, but none the less perceptible, modification of the tempo in the second section of the first part of the "Wedding March" was almost a stroke of genius; it is once in a doc's age that one hears a tempo taken that seems at once so surprisingly and so convincingly right. The chorus, too, sang most excellently; only the solos sounded rather meagre and lifeless.

It is some time since we last heard Mr. Riddle read; he has evidently made a most admirable use of that time. Not only has his talent ripened well, but he has made an enormous advance in the technics of his art, which he now pushes fairly to the pitch of virtuosity. His whole method is better than it was a year or two ago. Now he never interrupts the dialogue by naming the respective speakers, but trusts to the audience's having the printed text before their eyes in the programme books. Though he still resorts to the trick of assuming different voices for different characters, he does so with far more art than formerly, without crassness of contrast, and never, except intentionally, with grotesqueness of effect. "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is probably the play to which he has given the most study, and the text of which he has searched through most carefully for legitimately effective points. And his search has not been unrewarded; some of the points he makes are as good as they are (to us) new. One of the best of these is where Quince—remembering Flute's mistake at rehearsal about "Ninny's tomb"—appears as Prologue to "The most lamentable Comedy," and takes particular pains to pronounce "Ni-nus' tomb" with comical distinctness; the point was made with the deftest lightness of touch, and told immediately upon the whole audience; everyone saw it. To hear Shakspeare's play so read and Mendelssohn's music so played is about as delightful a treat as we can well imagine. The public evidently expected great things, for the hall was crowded; and we mistake much if the highest expectations were not realized.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98; Mozart, aria from "Don Giovanni;" Paine, prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus," opus 35; Massenet, aria from "Le Cid;" Beethoven, overture to "König Stephan," opus 117. Miss Antoinette Trebelli will be the singer.

[111]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, consisted of Mendelssohn's music to Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mr. George Riddle reading the poem, and members of the Cecilia rendering the solos and choruses. The music is still fascinating, fresh and interesting, even the overture, hackneyed as it is, retaining all of its original power to charm. Mr. Paur read the score from beginning to end in a delightfully sympathetic manner, and with a fine appreciation of its prevailing delicacy and purity of taste and style. The work of the orchestra was perfect, and its admirable discipline was notably exemplified in the clearness and precision with which the scherzo was given, and in the warmth and grace that marked its playing of the nocturne. Mr. Riddle's reading was not only beautiful from an elocutionary standpoint, but was also brilliant in the skill with which he individualized the various characters and entered into the spirit of the text. The audience, which was a large one, evidenced the pleasure that the performers gave it throughout, by the heartiness and the frequency of its applause. Nothing was lacking to make the entertainment one to be wholly enjoyed. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, E-minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Prelude to "Œdipus," J. K. Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture "King Stephen," Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli.

Paur and the Prophets.

The Musical Courier, of New York, continues to be greatly disturbed about Mr. Paur; why, it is not exactly easy to understand. It is true that we have heard something about the Courier making an application to Mr. Paur to put his portrait on the front page of that weekly, and of Mr. Paur's neglect to comply with the suggestion, which was doubtless delicately and thoughfully made; but this, of course, could not have had any effect in influencing the course of the Courier toward him, for, as we all know, that paper enjoys a flattering celebrity for its fairness and its incorruptibility. To suspect it of enmity to Mr. Paur because he declines to respond favorably to the request for his portrait, and is not open to conviction that it is worth while to pay for its insertion in the Courier would be to do an injustice to a periodical whose uprightness, whose horror of anything resembling the levying of blackmail on artists, and whose reputation for all that is fair, straightforward and honorable, are notorious, if we may use that word in a complimentary sense.

No, it is clear that the Courier is impartial in its hostility to Mr. Paur, and is moved only by its loyalty to art as it understands the matter. What perplexes us, however, is why the Courier is adverse to Mr. Paur, when all the reputable Boston music critics write favorably of him. The Courier says absolutely and imperiously, "Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted;" but it does not tell us why he will not do; and by whom he is not wanted. At this distance from the office of the Courier, it seems that Mr. Paur will do, and we have heard nothing about his not being wanted, except through that paper. Perhaps, if it gave its authority, we should learn that the information so positively sent forth has been derived from some few disgruntled first violinists, who have been disciplined by Mr Paur, and are resentful in consequence. With all our profound admiration for the honesty and the infallibility of the Courier, we are puzzled to understand what it means when it says that "Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. "What does it know practically of him as an artist, and in what is he a second rate conductor? In this benighted spot, it appears that Mr. Paur is the very best conductor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had; that he has retreived the orchestra from the sloppy demoralization into which it fell under the sway of Mr. Nikisch, and has brought it to even a higher state of efficiency, as far as spirit is concerned, than it maintained under Mr. Gericke. The Courier, however, does not seem to be aware of this fact, for it says, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch." Why should he begin to fill them? He was not engaged to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, nor to rival Mr. Nikisch's shirt cuffs. Mr. Nikisch did not fill his own boots, as a conductor of symphony concerts. They were much to large for him. If there is a cause for congratulation in the replacing of Mr. Nikisch by Mr. Paur, it is that the latter has nothing in common with the former, and that there is not a trace of the pretender, the humbug, or the poseur in him. It may be true that he does not visit the office of the Courier when he is in New York, and hob nob with the editors as did Mr. Nikisch; but then he may not have seen the advisability of doing so, and may also have certain views regarding personal dignity, to say nothing of his ignorance of the vital importance of the Courier as a disinterested supporter of musical art in this country, especially in Boston. Under these circumstances, it was somewhat premature in its reference to the size of Mr. Nikisch's boots, owing to its lack of opportuhity to inspect Mr. Paur's boots on its own premises. We must, however, charge the Courier with a few misstatements, not intentionally made, for we are aware that it is so rigid a follower of truth, that we do not hesitate to believe that it will blush for remorse when we have pointed out the errors into which it has fallen,—inadvertently, of course. It says that because Mr. Paur does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, "the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts." The public has done nothing of the kind, and the attendance at the concerts has been quite as large as it was under the gentleman whose boots assume such crucial importance in the eyes of the Courier. Another mistake is the statement, "The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality;" whereas, the truth is that they were abandoned because of the discouraging financial condition at present prevailing through the country, and in the face of which it was considered imprudent to go to the expense of transporting a large orchestra from place to place, under unfavorable circumstances. Then, too, as the South and West know nothing of Mr. Paur, and whether he does or does not lack personality or popularity, it is difficult to see the exact grounds on which our contemporary makes this remarkable statement. The climax of the Courier's polite, amicable and disinterested view of the case is reached in the following words: "Mr. Paur is a failure; a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go!" Ah, why juggle? Mr. Paur must go! He does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, and is an artistic failure; but, leaving these occult boots entirely out of the question, Mr. Paur is an artistic success.

We are afraid that the Courier indulges unconsciously in the very word juggling that it inferentially condemns. It is the boots about which all the argument revolves. The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks on Mr. Paur, would seem to suggest that he wears boots of his own, for which he might find vigorous and justifiable employment by way of showing his appreciation of some of the attentions that have been paid him in New York. In the meanwhile, Mr. Paur does not go. It is true that the Courier says that he "must go," but, as we have already hinted, he is not fully aware of the influential character of the Courier, and blindly, perhaps over-daringly, plays with fire, in remaining here under the terms of his contract. We, however, have such faith in the infallibility of the Courier that we cannot believe it to be capable of a mistake in this matter. "Mr. Paur must go?" Ah! we have it. The Courier juggles with words. It means he must go at the end of his five years' contract, or at the end of ten years if the contract is renewed. There you are! Our faith in the Courier, as a prophet and a power, is justified.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — A Fine Performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Music.

At the twenty-second Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall the overture and the incidental music to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" made up the program. Mr. George Riddle read portions of the play. Mrs. Marie B. Smith and Miss Whittier sang the incidental solos. The choruses were sung by members of the Cecilia.

This music to Shakspeare's play, the play that Mr. Pepys thought such poor stuff, is still fresh and delightful. The overture is an exhibition of the spontaneous and the most charming side of Mendelssohn's musical nature; it was written before he became a dealer in mannerisms, and yet it has the peculiar hall mark of his talent. It is true that in delicacy the fairy scherzo, "Queen Mab" of Berlioz, surpasses any portion of the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," but on the other hand Mendelssohn had the gift of more genuine melody.

The Germans, who are so fond of Shakspeare that they claim to have discovered first his genius or even to have invented him, have better opportunities than we to hear this music in connection with the play. They that have heard such performances in the leading towns of Germany know how admirably the music fits the action of clown or fairy. Given thus with gorgeous scenic accessories and with a ballet, the play is a most entertaining spectacle.

Mr. Riddle read with his accustomed elocutionary skill and with fine appreciation of the beauty and the humor of the text. Some might quarrel with his conception of Bottom and prefer a dull, logy, yet unctuous ass. Mr. Riddle presents him rather as a hard, boisterous fellow, and no doubt he has a right to do this; he certainly carries out his conception admirably.

The musical performance was excellent. The overture was finely read and played. The music that accompanies the speaker was given with rare precision and effect.

The horn solo in the nocturne was well played, and the wood-wind was heard to great advantage throughout. The wedding march was taken at a slower pace than is customary, and the result was a stately grandeur in conception that became the marriage of Duke Theseus, and a clearness in certain passages for the brass that are often crackly and ragged when a faster tempo is chosen. The chorus and the solo singers lent valuable assistance. Many stood in the audience throughout the performance, and the applause was frequent and hearty.

The program of next Saturday's concert will be as follows: Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Paine's prelude to "Œdipus," and Beethoven's overture, "King Stephen." Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing airs from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Cid."

PHILIP HALE.

MR. PAUR AS A LION.

It was said of late that there would be greater interest in the Symphony concerts if the conductor, Mr. Paur, were a social lion, and it is believed by many that it is Mr. Paur's duty to art to be prominent at teas, lunches, dinners, receptions and other forms of social entertainments or functions. In other words, the proposition is made in all seriousness that excellence as a musician must be supplemented by parlor-reputation; that the dignity of the office depends on the frequency and the acceptance of pasteboard invitations. Unless the conductor is a recognized factor in social life, the orchestra will have no "social standing," and it will soon be unfashionable to attend the concerts.

To the visitor from Mars such a musical condition in Boston would smack of opera bouffe, and he might naturally inquire into the sincerity of the cultivators of the art. If he were told in addition that the purpose of the generous founder of these concerts was to give at a low price orchestral music performed by an excellent orchestra to the music-loving people of Boston; that this purpose had been of late years thwarted by the desire of many, who looked on the concerts as an opportunity for fashionable display, to raise the price of the tickets to an extravagant height; that the moment a conductor of acknowledged musical ability was engaged, there was more talk concerning his habits and costume than his musical fitness for the position; the visitor from Mars would undoubtedly shrug his shoulders, but not offensively, and say to himself, "Bless my soul, what queer people!"

Now Mr. Paur has a family. He has a pleasant home in Jamaica Plain. When he is through with the exhausting labor of rehearsal, or when the excitement of a concert is over, he is glad to leave the town behind him and rest quietly within the walls of his own dwelling-house. Is he a less competent conductor on this account? Is his knowledge of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, the less because he prefers slippers and a pipe to the formality of evening dress and the fatigue of forced conversation?

Mr. Paur, as he is, appears to be a more dignified figure than Mr. Paur as he should be, according to the definition of the lion-hunters. Should he be forced to play the lion and roar, he would be often in parlous state. Pitfalls and gins would be prepared for him. His roar would be misunderstood and misrepresented. Young composers would find him fair game and chase him under the chandelier. Before the season were over, the hunters would long for a fresh lion and talk of a new conductor.

Now, if the Symphony concerts really depend on the social success of the conductor, the sooner they are abandoned the better for musical righteousness in this city. If these concerts have only gratified a fleeting desire, the sooner they are given up the better for art. But we should be slow to believe that the organization of this great institution, which is indeed an honor to the town, rests on such flimsy foundations.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Symphony—Carl Zerrahn's Testimonial—Music Notes.

Mendelssohn's beautiful musical setting to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with the choruses given by the Cecilia club, portions of the text read by Mr George Riddle, and the solos sung by Mrs Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet Whittier, made up last week's symphony program. This was the first performance here of the entire composition since 1891 when it was performed at the Boston theater by the Philharmonic orchestra under the direction of Bernhard Listemann, Mr Riddle appearing as the reader.

The Cecilia club sang the choruses very daintily, and the soloists, Mrs Smith and Miss Whittier, performed their work quite effectively. Their voices harmonized well, but were lacking in the power necessary for singing with so large an instrumental contingent.

The text was admirably read by Mr Riddle. The comical scenes in which the "hard-handed men of Athens" are introduced, were specially commendable, the reader individualizing the various characters perfectly, and bringing out the humor of the lines with most laughable results. The scenes requiring the simulation of female voices were less successful, the falsetto tones of a man not being particularly pleasing to the ear. The sentiments were skilfully presented, though, and Mr Riddle's intelligent reading and thorough conception of the text clearly demonstrated his right to rank with the foremost in his class of entertainers.

The orchestra played the overture with commendable spirit, and, excepting a roughness in the brasses, the interpretation was excellent in every way. The "Wedding March" made the greatest impression, perhaps, because of its familiarity to the majority of the audience. It was magnificently given, the brasses redeeming themselves by a rich tonality and precision of phrasing, and the long applause at the close brought conductor Paur to the front of the platform several times to bow his acknowledgments.

Throughout the 14 numbers the perfect unanimity of the strings was notably in evidence. The fairy music, with its wonderful lights and shades, was as trippingly and delicately given as one could wish, the finale chorus of elves being one of the gems of the performance.

The audience kept up a rustling of program leaves in following the text, and although the "Dream" is a forest idyl this "realism" was very unpleasant and annoying at times to the reader.

The program this week will be as follows: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; prelude to "Œdipus," Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Mlle Antoinette Trebelli will be the solo singer.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-second concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme consisting of Shakspeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music. Mr. George Riddle was the reader; Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier sang the soprano and contralto solo parts, and the chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

If ever a composer showed genius and the finest sense of poetic and dramatic fitness in writing incidental music to a play, Mendelssohn has done so in his music to "Midsummer-Night's Dream." When one considers that wonderful overture written at the age of seventeen, and the rest of the music, written at thirty-four, one cannot help feeling a touch of ill will toward that well-meaning, but rather borné old tyrant, Abraham Mendelssohn, for doing his best to divert his son's rare genius from its native channel, and dry it up by premature forcing. To think that Mendelssohn gave to the world only four of those wondrously poetic and imaginative tone-poems—the overtures to "Midsummer-Night's Dream," "Die Fingals-Höhle," "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," and "Zur schönen Melusine,"—absolutely original in their day, as they are still ineffably beautiful, when, had not the grim old father stood over him with his inveterate pedantry, he might have left a good dozen such in his musical legacy to the world! If the "Fingals-Höhle" is probably the most completely fine of these four overtures, the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is surely the one which shows the greatest freshness of invention, originality, and most brilliant imaginativeness. Weber himself has not painted the world of poetic fancy and tricksy magic in truer nor more charming colors. And the boy Mendelssohn was only seventeen when he wrote it! He still had tolerably sound nerves then, and could be wholesomely tricksy and frolicsome without a trace of that rather morbid, involuntary restlessness that mars so much in his later works. Both conductor and orchestra fairly outdid themselves; for nicety of perception, vitality of style and fine finish, it was from beginning to end the best performance of the season. One could hardly imagine finer playing of that delightful scherzo that follows the first act. Mr. Paur's slight, but none the less perceptible, modification of the tempo in the second section of the first part of the "Wedding March" was almost a stroke of genius; it is once in a dog's age that one hears a tempo taken that seems at once so surprisingly and so convincingly right. The chorus, too, sang most excellently; only the solos sounded rather meagre and lifeless.

It is some time since we last heard Mr. Riddle read; he has evidently made a most admirable use of that time. Not only has his talent ripened well, but he has made an enormous advance in the technics of his art, which he now pushes fairly to the pitch of virtuosity. His whole method is better than it was a year or two ago. Now he never interrupts the dialogue by naming the respective speakers, but trusts to the audience's having the printed text before their eyes in the programme books. Though he still resorts to the trick of assuming different voices for different characters, he does so with far more art than formerly, without crassness of contrast, and never, except intentionally, with grotesqueness of effect. "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is probably the play to which he has given the most study, and the text of which he has searched through most carefully for legitimately effective points. And his search has not been unrewarded; some of the points he makes are as good as they are (to us) new. One of the best of these is where Quince—remembering Flute's mistake at rehearsal about "Ninny's tomb"—appears as Prologue to "The most lamentable Comedy," and takes particular pains to pronounce "Ni-nus' tomb" with comical distinctness; the point was made with the deftest lightness of touch, and told immediately upon the whole audience; everyone saw it. To hear Shakspeare's play so read and Mendelssohn's music so played is about as delightful a treat as we can well imagine. The public evidently expected great things, for the hall was crowded; and we mistake much if the highest expectations were not realized.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98; Mezart, aria from "Don Giovanni;" Paine, prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus," opus 35; Massenet, aria from "Le Cid;" Beethoven, overture to "König Stephan," opus 117. Miss Antoinette Trebelli will be the singer.

[111]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 16, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

September 29, 1662, Samuel Pepys wrote "To the King's Theatre where we saw 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life." While no auditor at Saturday's symphony concert (or possibly "musical entertainment" would be a truer expression) could share Pepys' views, not a few must have been astonished to find a play in the foreground, and the orchestra in the background. Yet the reading of almost the whole of the Shakespearian play gave opportunity to judge of the fitness of Mendelssohn's incidental music, an opportunity which would not have been obtained had not the reader been present to give the poet's context. The chief precedent for such a performance, in which the literary overbalanced the musical, is to be found in Schumann's "Manfred" which has frequently been given in our classical concerts; but here two points of distinction may be drawn,—"Manfred" is not a light comedy, but a most exalted tragedy, in it the text does not preponderate greatly over the music, and Schumann has written some of the most beautiful melodrama (the union of music with declamation) for the Byronic poem that ever was created, while Mendelssohn wrote the incidental music to the Shakespearian play to order, and with two exceptions, did not attempt enough to bring the work from the theatre into the concert room. The audience was evidently deeply interested, as was evinced not only by the applause but by the overwhelming rustle of the programme books when the reader passed from one page to the next.

Mr. George Riddle was the reader and showed great intelligence and marvellous elocutionary power in his work. One might object to the exaggeration of the character of Bottom, and especially to the introduction of burlesque singing on the symphonic stage, but this comment falls outside of the domain of musical criticism, and the shoemaker has no desire to be invited to stick to his last.

The musical portion of the work was admirably done. The overture is one of the finest specimens of humor in music that exists. It is a mistake to suppose that the great masters stalked about with their heads in the clouds, or were forever scaling Olympus; all of them have shown a tendency to do some work on the playful side, and not one of the great composers has gone solemnly through his career carrying a top-heavy dignity. Beethoven's drunken bassoonist in his sixth symphony, Mozart's ribald canons, show the coarse side of musical humor, Bach's "Coffee Cantata," the duller expression of it, but of all the composers at play none have achieved such fun without either vulgarity or clumsiness, such heartiness without coarseness as Mendelssohn, and the scherzo in the Scotch Symphony, or the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" are splendid examples of his power in this direction. In the midst of all the fun the symmetrical form is preserved, and if the drunken weaver snores during his slumber in fairyland, it is as a bass to the recapitulation of the chief theme that he does so. This same snoring, however, has lost some of its effect through the obsolescence of the Ophicleide. The raucous tone of this instrument, for which Mendelssohn wrote the part, is scarcely replaced by the smoother sound of the bass tuba which substitutes for it at present. The braying of the bassoon, allusive to the metamorphosis of Bottom, is fortunately still given as Mendelssohn wrote it. The coda seemed taken rather slow, and the woodwind did not blend as perfectly as usual, but beyond this everything was delightfully performed. The overture antedates the rest of the music by 17 years, and it is not too much to say that it is the most finished and satisfactory composition ever brought forth by a youth in his teens; only Schubert, who at the same age brought forth the "Erl-king," may be compared with Mendelssohn in this early ripeness.

The scherzo of the incidental music is not as spontaneous as the overture, there is less of abandon in the hard-worked man than in the enthusiastic boy. In the melodrama Mendelssohn falls far below Schumann, every portion of this seems perfunctory except those parts which he has taken from his own overture (a musical robbery of Peter to pay Paul) and a short passage for strings near the end of the play, but one can heartily compliment the performers, and the reader kept most admirably with the music, a species of timekeeping far more difficult than that achieved by the singer.

"You Spotted Snakes" was most daintily sung, Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith giving her solo both in this and later in the comedy with most careful effect and pleasant voice. Miss Harriet S. Whittier also sang with good taste, and the shading of the chorus, composed of members of the Cecilia, showed that the female branch of that worthy society still maintains its high standard of efficiency. Yet Stevens' setting of "You Spotted Snakes" is much stronger than this version by Mendelssohn. Titania's remark which ushers in this number, "Come now, a roundel and a fairy song" is notable as being Shakespeare's chief allusion to round-singing, which was popular enough in England in his time; per contra, he alludes frequently enough to catches, the tavern music of his day, in which I suspect he often sustained his part. The two chief points of the incidental music, which Mendelssohn wrote at the royal command, are the Nocturne and the Wedding March. The Nocturne was exquisitely shaded and the horn work was without a blemish. The Wedding March was taken with a dignity which is seldom accorded it and the fanfares rang out with amazing power and clearness. The applause which greeted this and the Nocturne showed that the audience appreciated the music none the less because of its declamatory adjuncts. Altogether, although "symphony concert" would be a misnomer for the proceedings, the occasion was not without its educational value, and it was well at least once to hear a celebrated work of that master whom the present age has somewhat slighted, and to hear it with its literary context.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream.

GEORGE RIDDLE READS.

An Interesting, Well Planned Programme.

The Director Paur Story—Notes of Interest in the Music World.

The overture and incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, with readings from the play by Mr. George Riddle, furnished the programme for the 22nd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening.

Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier and members of the Cecilia assisted in the performance.

The delicate and graceful music of Mendelssohn written to Shakespeare's play is of phenominal freshness and beauty and aptly dramatic in its fairy and rustic elements, as well, breathing as it does a most refined conception upon the part of its author. The invention shown in this work is of extraordinary fertility, the instrumentation being masterly in its treatment and delicacy.

Of this stroke of genius, to quote freely, it can be said that age cannot wither it, nor custom stale its infinite variety and beauty.

For the performance Saturday evening, nothing but praise can be accorded. Mr. Paur conducted the work with rare ability. His tempo of the Wedding March is to be commended for its moderate pace, the effect thereby being wonderfully grand and impressive. The audience recalled him several times after the playing of this number. The fairy lightness of the Scherzo was entrancing. The beautiful nocturne was played delightfully. Mr. Paur imparting to it the true spirit of tranquility.

The horn solo in this number was played by Mr. Hackenbarth, the first horn of the orchestra, in a most exquisite and highly artistic manner, his tone quality being of the most mellow character and accurately true in intonation.

Mr. Paur should prize this able and artistic performer. I am sure all the critical listeners bless the good fortune that brought this artistic player to our orchestra to sustain in so superior a manner the first horn part with all its difficulties.

Mr. Riddle was eminently successful in his readings, the audience recognizing the brilliancy of the effort and the individuality and dramatic delineation of the various characters of the play with frequent and hearty applause. In gaining his effects in the defining of the characters of the play Mr. Riddle did not spare his vocal apparatus, and the singer, actor or elocutionist that was among the listeners must have rejoiced that it was not his own throat that was being rasped so violently at times. Next Saturday evening will embrace the following numbers: Symphony, No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; Prelude to "Edipus," J. K. Paine; Overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing an aria from "Don Juan," Mozart; and one from Massenet's "Le Cid."

THE PAUR STORY.

Regardless of the fact that Mr. Higginson has said that Mr. Paur is engaged for a "term of years," and that Mr. Paur has also declared for publication that he "is engaged for five years, with an additional five years if all is satisfactory," the New York Musical Courier breaks out again with the following statement in its last issue:

"Naturally Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week. Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defence, and blamed some members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor.

"Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go."

The Courier might as well blame Mr. Paur for the wretched state of business generally throughout the country as to blame him for the deferring of the Western tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, because of his "lack of popularity and personality," as claimed by the Courier.

Since these "blessed Democratic days" have come upon us and paralyzed every branch of business and closed up the majority of industrial establishments, or reduced the pay of the employees to the low rate of "Cleveland wages," Mr. Higginson has been obliged, like all careful and other [illegible] owing to the universal prostration brought about through the election of the Democratic party to the management of the affairs of government. It is a mighty poor effort on the part of the Courier to try to bolster up the failure of Nikisch to prove himself a suitable man for the position so ably filled by Mr. Paur, by decrying the latter. It won't work, gentlemen.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Information comes from Buda Pesth that the intendant of the Royal Opera there has invited Mr. Josef Grossmann of the City Theatre at Cologne to come to Buda Pesth and conduct three operas there, and if his work is satisfactory he will be engaged for five years as capellmeister of the Grand Opera, beginning Sept. 1, 1894. The inference to be drawn from this is that Mr. Arthur Nikisch is to sever his connection with the Buda Pesth opera as capellmeister. There were people in this city who prophesied that Mr. Nikisch would not remain long at Buda Pesth, for Count Zichy, the intendant, is very exacting and will not tolerate either an indifferent or incompetent person in the position of capellmeister at that Opera House.

It may be that this losing of his job at Buda-Pesth by Nikisch is the cat in the meal at the office of the N.Y. Musical Courier, and that the extraordinary efforts made lately by our esteemed contemporary, looking towards the discharge of Mr. Paur from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as the Courier has said, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch," have been exerted in behalf of a re-engagement of the little poseur who encumbered for four seasons the position now so ably filled by Mr. Paur. A musical diet of the re-warmed baked-meats of Nikisch's incompetency will never be relished by Mr. Higginson or the musical public, either, not even with a piquante sauce, a la Musical Courier.

Worcester Telegram
PRINTED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

LAST OF THE SYMPHONIES.

Alwin Schroeder, Cellist, Accorded the Honor of the Evening.

The fifth and last concert for the season, and very likely the last for some years by the Boston symphony orchestra, attracted a little larger attendance than usual to Mechanics hall, last evening.

The audience was mildly enthusiastic, and the players in an unusually happy mood.

Alwin Schroeder, cellist, was accorded the warmest reception.

His solo was the "Fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestra," by C. M. Loeffler. The rendition was magnificent, and an equal handling of a cello has not been witnessed in Worcester of late years.

The two orchestral numbers on the program were both long, and one rather new to Worcester musicians.

The first number was the "Concerto grosso No. 10 in D minor," by George Frideric Handel. The last movement caught the fancy of the listeners, and Herr Paur was forced to smilingly bow his thanks again and again in response to the applause.

The closing number was the "Symphony in F major, op. 9," by Hermann Goetz. This was of varied interest, the second movement being most appreciated.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music to "Midsummer-Night's Dream" formed the program of the twenty-second Symphony concert. Mr. George Riddle read portions of the text with elocutionary skill. Valuable assistance was given by Mrs. Marie B. Smith, Miss Whittier and a female chorus from the Cecilia. It was a smooth performance.

The program of the concert next Saturday will include Brahms' Fourth symphony. Paine's "Œdipus" prelude and Beethoven's "King Stephan" overture. Miss Trebelli will sing airs by Mozart and Massenet.

MR. PAUR MUST GO.

IN Mr. Philip Hale's letter from Boston in our last issue you may read this in an interview with Mr. and Mrs. Paur:

"Everywhere in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur; "when we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

The stories referred to were of course about Mr. Paur's enforced resignation and approaching departure for Europe. We would like to know by what right Mr. Paur used the names of Messrs. Nikisch, Seidl and Damrosch in this case. It was, to say the least, impertinent and in bad taste. The three gentlemen named would not stoop to "sending out those stories." The fact of the matter is that the Paurs are provincial. Mr. Paur never held a first-class position as an orchestra conductor in Germany, and his sudden accession to good fortune has made him talk foolishly. He is not in the same class as Seidl, Nikisch or Gericke, and he commits a terrible breach of professional courtesy when he speaks as above quoted of fellow musicians.

Damrosch and Seidl are not sitting up at nights devising "those stories" to hurt the reputation of Mr. Paur. They have their own orchestras to look after. Besides "those stories" contain much that is probable. Colonel Higginson has grown very tired of his new man. Business has fallen off greatly, not only in New York, but even in Boston. The reason given for the abandonment of the customary spring tour was that Mr. Paur could not stand our sleeping cars. This is very funny. Mr. Nikisch, if we recollect aright, was averse to travel, but he traveled and conducted nevertheless. The plain truth of the matter is that the public is not interested in Mr. Paur's work and his terrible earnestness and rigid disciplinarianism do not compensate for a lack of magnetism and personal distinction. Mr. Paur must go. His stay may be prolonged longer than we wish, but public opinion here and in Boston will prove too strong.

As to the contract talk, that is nonsense. Colonel Higginson can force Mr. Paur to resign to-morrow. Mr. W. J. Henderson also took a hand in the controversy. In last Sunday's "Times" he had, among other things, the following to say:

The Boston "Saturday Evening Gazette," in commenting on this matter, seems to labor under the delusion that rigid discipline is all that is needed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no doubt that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated in this important requirement since the day when Wilhelm Gericke laid down the baton. Mr. Nikisch's warmest admirers could not fail to see that in his efforts to attain power, warmth and variety he sacrificed the superb precision, the military unanimity which Mr. Gericke developed. That the falling off in these matters was in some measure due to a lack of discipline must have been patent to the most casual observer. But it was also due to the conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important effects.

Now Mr. Paur, with all due respect to the opinions of the wise men of Boston, has not advanced a single step toward the restoration of this fine precision. On the contrary under his lead the orchestra has about reached the level of the Brooklyn Philharmonic under Theodore Thomas. It plays smoothly, correctly, glibly if you like, but with deadly dullness. The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here are gone, and with these qualities have departed the eloquent phrasing, the wondrously significant accentuation of Mr. Nikisch. The fact is that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind. He is the personification of respectability. And that is all.

The "Saturday Evening Gazette" in a gentle way intimates that the welfare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is none of New York's business. We regret to be forced into mild but firm dissent from this proposition. The first and most obvious reply to Boston is: "If your orchestra is none of our business, keep your orchestra at home." But it is not necessary to justify comment on the narrow ground that because the orchestra visits this city we have a right to talk about it. The New York "Times" has, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in New York, steadfastly maintained the opinion that it was the best concert orchestra in this country, and one of the best in the world. Since it has been regarded as the representative American orchestra, its welfare is of interest to every lover of music in the United States. For that reason this paper discusses it, and will continue to do so in spite of intimations from Boston that poaching on one's neighbor's preserves is reprehensible. The Boston Symphony Orchestra belongs to the United States, and the Hub will not be able to shut its greatness up within her provincial limits.

New York knows perfectly well what it wants as an orchestral conductor. New York does not want Theodore Thomas. New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go.

[112]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 16, 1894.

The Symphony Concert.

September 29, 1662, Samuel Pepys wrote "To the King's Theatre where we saw 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life." While no auditor at Saturday's symphony concert (or possibly "musical entertainment" would be a truer expression) could share Pepys' views, not a few must have been astonished to find a play in the foreground, and the orchestra in the background. Yet the reading of almost the whole of the Shakespearian play gave opportunity to judge of the fitness of Mendelssohn's incidental music, an opportunity which would not have been obtained had not the reader been present to give the poet's context. The chief precedent for such a performance, in which the literary overbalanced the musical, is to be found in Schumann's "Manfred" which has frequently been given in our classical concerts; but here two points of distinction may be drawn,—"Manfred" is not a light comedy, but a most exalted tragedy, in it the text does not preponderate greatly over the music, and Schumann has written some of the most beautiful melodrama (the union of music with declamation) for the Byronic poem that ever was created, while Mendelssohn wrote the incidental music to the Shakespearian play to order, and with two exceptions, did not attempt enough to bring the work from the theatre into the concert room. The audience was evidently deeply interested, as was evinced not only by the applause but by the overwhelming rustle of the programme books when the reader passed from one page to the next.

Mr. George Riddle was the reader and showed great intelligence and marvellous elocutionary power in his work. One might object to the exaggeration of the character of Bottom, and especially to the introduction of burlesque singing on the symphonic stage, but this comment falls outside of the domain of musical criticism, and the shoemaker has no desire to be invited to stick to his last.

The musical portion of the work was admirably done. The overture is one of the finest specimens of humor in music that exists. It is a mistake to suppose that the great masters stalked about with their heads in the clouds, or were forever scaling Olympus; all of them have shown a tendency to do some work on the playful side, and not one of the great composers has gone solemnly through his career carrying a top-heavy dignity. Beethoven's drunken bassoonist in his sixth symphony, Mozart's ribald canons, show the coarse side of musical humor, Bach's "Coffee Cantata," the duller expression of it, but of all the composers at play none have achieved such fun without either vulgarity or clumsiness, such heartiness without coarseness as Mendelssohn, and the scherzo in the Scotch Symphony, or the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" are splendid examples of his power in this direction. In the midst of all the fun the symmetrical form is preserved, and if the drunken weaver snores during his slumber in fairyland, it is as a bass to the recapitulation of the chief theme that he does so. This same snoring, however, has lost some of its effect through the obsolescence of the Ophicleide. The raucous tone of this instrument, for which Mendelssohn wrote the part, is scarcely replaced by the smoother sound of the bass tuba which substitutes for it at present. The braying of the bassoon, allusive to the metamorphosis of Bottom, is fortunately still given as Mendelssohn wrote it. The coda seemed taken rather slow, and the woodwind did not blend as perfectly as usual, but beyond this everything was delightfully performed. The overture antedates the rest of the music by 17 years, and it is not too much to say that it is the most finished and satisfactory composition ever brought forth by a youth in his teens; only Schubert, who at the same age brought forth the "Erl-king," may be compared with Mendelssohn in this early ripeness.

The scherzo of the incidental music is not as spontaneous as the overture, there is less of abandon in the hard-worked man than in the enthusiastic boy. In the melodrama Mendelssohn falls far below Schumann, every portion of this seems perfunctory except those parts which he has taken from his own overture (a musical robbery of Peter to pay Paul) and a short passage for strings near the end of the play, but one can heartily compliment the performers, and the reader kept most admirably with the music, a species of timekeeping far more difficult than that achieved by the singer.

"You Spotted Snakes" was most daintily sung, Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith giving her solo both in this and later in the comedy with most careful effect and pleasant voice. Miss Harriet S. Whittier also sang with good taste, and the shading of the chorus, composed of members of the Cecilia, showed that the female branch of that worthy society still maintains its high standard of efficiency. Yet Stevens' setting of "You Spotted Snakes" is much stronger than this version by Mendelssohn. Titania's remark which ushers in this number, "Come now, a roundel and a fairy song" is notable as being Shakespeare's chief allusion to round-singing, which was popular enough in England in his time; per contra, he alludes frequently enough to catches, the tavern music of his day, in which I suspect he often sustained his part. The two chief points of the incidental music, which Mendelssohn wrote at the royal command, are the Nocturne and the Wedding March. The Nocturne was exquisitely shaded and the horn work was without a blemish. The Wedding March was taken with a dignity which is seldom accorded it and the fanfares rang out with amazing power and clearness. The applause which greeted this and the Nocturne showed that the audience appreciated the music none the less because of its declamatory adjuncts. Altogether, although "symphony concert" would be a misnomer for the proceedings, the occasion was not without its educational value, and it was well at least once to hear a celebrated work of that master whom the present age has somewhat slighted, and to hear it with its literary context.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1894.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream.

GEORGE RIDDLE READS.

An Interesting, Well Planned Programme.

The Director Paur Story—Notes of Interest in the Music World.

The overture and incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, with readings from the play by Mr. George Riddle, furnished the programme for the 22nd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening.

Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier and members of the Cecilia assisted in the performance.

The delicate and graceful music of Mendelssohn written to Shakespeare's play is of phenominal freshness and beauty and aptly dramatic in its fairy and rustic elements, as well, breathing as it does a most refined conception upon the part of its author. The invention shown in this work is of extraordinary fertility, the instrumentation being masterly in its treatment and delicacy.

Of this stroke of genius, to quote freely, it can be said that age cannot wither it, nor custom stale its infinite variety and beauty.

For the performance Saturday evening, nothing but praise can be accorded. Mr. Paur conducted the work with rare ability. His tempo of the Wedding March is to be commended for its moderate pace, the effect thereby being wonderfully grand and impressive. The audience recalled him several times after the playing of this number. The fairy lightness of the Scherzo was entrancing. The beautiful nocturne was played delightfully, Mr. Paur imparting to it the true spirit of tranquility.

The horn solo in this number was played by Mr. Hackenbarth, the first horn of the orchestra, in a most exquisite and highly artistic manner, his tone quality being of the most mellow character and accurately true in intonation.

Mr. Paur should prize this able and artistic performer. I am sure all the critical listeners bless the good fortune that brought this artistic player to our orchestra to sustain in so superior a manner the first horn part with all its difficulties.

Mr. Riddle was eminently successful in his readings, the audience recognizing the brilliancy of the effort and the individuality and dramatic delineation of the various characters of the play with frequent and hearty applause. In gaining his effects in the defining of the characters of the play Mr. Riddle did not spare his vocal apparatus, and the singer, actor or elocutionist that was among the listeners must have rejoiced that it was not his own throat that was being rasped so violently at times. Next Saturday evening will embrace the following numbers: Symphony, No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; Prelude to "Edipus," J. K. Paine; Overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing an aria from "Don Juan," Mozart; and one from Massenet's "Le Cid."

THE PAUR STORY.

Regardless of the fact that Mr. Higginson has said that Mr. Paur is engaged for a "term of years," and that Mr. Paur has also declared for publication that he "is engaged for five years, with an additional five years if all is satisfactory," the New York Musical Courier breaks out again with the following statement in its last issue:

"Naturally Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week. Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defence, and blamed some members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor.

"Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go."

The Courier might as well blame Mr. Paur for the wretched state of business generally throughout the country as to blame him for the deferring of the Western tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, because of his "lack of popularity and personality," as claimed by the Courier.

Since these "blessed Democratic days" have come upon us and paralyzed every branch of business and closed up the majority of industrial establishments, or reduced the pay of the employees to the low rate of "Cleveland wages," Mr. Higginson has been obliged, like all careful and discriminating business men, to defer many other business ventures, no doubt owing to the universal prostration brought about through the election of the Democratic party to the management of the affairs of government. It is a mighty poor effort on the part of the Courier to try to bolster up the failure of Nikisch to prove himself a suitable man for the position so ably filled by Mr. Paur, by decrying the latter. It won't work, gentlemen.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Information comes from Buda Pesth that the intendant of the Royal Opera there has invited Mr. Josef Grossmann of the City Theatre at Cologne to come to Buda Pesth and conduct three operas there, and if his work is satisfactory he will be engaged for five years as capellmeister of the Grand Opera, beginning Sept. 1, 1894. The inference to be drawn from this is that Mr. Arthur Nikisch is to sever his connection with the Buda Pesth opera as capellmeister. There were people in this city who prophesied that Mr. Nikisch would not remain long at Buda Pesth, for Count Zichy, the intendant, is very exacting and will not tolerate either an indifferent or incompetent person in the position of capellmeister at that Opera House.

It may be that this losing of his job at Buda-Pesth by Nikisch is the cat in the meal at the office of the N.Y. Musical Courier, and that the extraordinary efforts made lately by our esteemed contemporary, looking towards the discharge of Mr. Paur from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as the Courier has said, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch," have been exerted in behalf of a re-engagement of the little poseur who encumbered for four seasons the position now so ably filled by Mr. Paur. A musical diet of the re-warmed baked-meats of Nikisch's incompetency will never be relished by Mr. Higginson or the musical public, either, not even with a piquante sauce, a la Musical Courier.

Worcester Telegram
PRINTED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

LAST OF THE SYMPHONIES.

Alwin Schroeder, Cellist, Accorded the Honor of the Evening.

The fifth and last concert for the season, and very likely the last for some years by the Boston symphony orchestra, attracted a little larger attendance than usual to Mechanics hall, last evening.

The audience was mildly enthusiastic, and the players in an unusually happy mood.

Alwin Schroeder, cellist, was accorded the warmest reception.

His solo was the "Fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestra," by C. M. Loeffler. The rendition was magnificent, and an equal handling of a cello has not been witnessed in Worcester of late years.

The two orchestral numbers on the program were both long, and one rather new to Worcester musicians.

The first number was the "Concerto grosso No. 10 in D minor," by George Frideric Handel. The last movement caught the fancy of the listeners, and Herr Paur was forced to smilingly bow his thanks again and again in response to the applause.

The closing number was the "Symphony in F major, op. 9," by Hermann Goetz. This was of varied interest, the second movement being most appreciated.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music to "Midsummer-Night's Dream" formed the program of the twenty-second Symphony concert. Mr. George Riddle read portions of the text with elocutionary skill. Valuable assistance was given by Mrs. Marie B. Smith, Miss Whittier and a female chorus from the Cecilia. It was a smooth performance.

The program of the concert next Saturday will include Brahms' Fourth symphony, Paine's "Œdipus" prelude and Beethoven's "King Stephan" overture. Miss Trebelli will sing airs by Mozart and Massenet.

MR. PAUR MUST GO.

IN Mr. Philip Hale's letter from Boston in our last issue you may read this in an interview with Mr. and Mrs. Paur:

"Everywhere in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur; "when we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

The stories referred to were of course about Mr. Paur's enforced resignation and approaching departure for Europe. We would like to know by what right Mr. Paur used the names of Messrs. Nikisch, Seidl and Damrosch in this case. It was, to say the least, impertinent and in bad taste. The three gentlemen named would not stoop to "sending out those stories." The fact of the matter is that the Paurs are provincial. Mr. Paur never held a first-class position as an orchestra conductor in Germany, and his sudden accession to good fortune has made him talk foolishly. He is not in the same class as Seidl, Nikisch or Gericke, and he commits a terrible breach of professional courtesy when he speaks as above quoted of fellow musicians.

Damrosch and Seidl are not sitting up at nights devising "those stories" to hurt the reputation of Mr. Paur. They have their own orchestras to look after. Besides "those stories" contain much that is probable. Colonel Higginson has grown very tired of his new man. Business has fallen off greatly, not only in New York, but even in Boston. The reason given for the abandonment of the customary spring tour was that Mr. Paur could not stand our sleeping cars. This is very funny. Mr. Nikisch, if we recollect aright, was averse to travel, but he traveled and conducted nevertheless. The plain truth of the matter is that the public is not interested in Mr. Paur's work and his terrible earnestness and rigid disciplinarianism do not compensate for a lack of magnetism and personal distinction. Mr. Paur must go. His stay may be prolonged longer than we wish, but public opinion here and in Boston will prove too strong.

As to the contract talk, that is nonsense. Colonel Higginson can force Mr. Paur to resign to-morrow. Mr. W. J. Henderson also took a hand in the controversy. In last Sunday's "Times" he had, among other things, the following to say:

The Boston "Saturday Evening Gazette," in commenting on this matter, seems to labor under the delusion that rigid discipline is all that is needed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no doubt that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated in this important requirement since the day when Wilhelm Gericke laid down the baton. Mr. Nikisch's warmest admirers could not fail to see that in his efforts to attain power, warmth and variety he sacrificed the superb precision, the military unanimity which Mr. Gericke developed. That the falling off in these matters was in some measure due to a lack of discipline must have been patent to the most casual observer. But it was also due to the conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important effects.

Now Mr. Paur, with all due respect to the opinions of the wise men of Boston, has not advanced a single step toward the restoration of this fine precision. On the contrary under his lead the orchestra has about reached the level of the Brooklyn Philharmonic under Theodore Thomas. It plays smoothly, correctly, glibly if you like, but with deadly dullness. The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here are gone, and with these qualities have departed the eloquent phrasing, the wondrously significant accentuation of Mr. Nikisch. The fact is that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind. He is the personification of respectability. And that is all.

The "Saturday Evening Gazette" in a gentle way intimates that the welfare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is none of New York's business. We regret to be forced into mild but firm dissent from this proposition. The first and most obvious reply to Boston is: "If your orchestra is none of our business, keep your orchestra at home." But it is not necessary to justify comment on the narrow ground that because the orchestra visits this city we have a right to talk about it. The New York "Times" has, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in New York, steadfastly maintained the opinion that it was the best concert orchestra in this country, and one of the best in the world. Since it has been regarded as the representative American orchestra, its welfare is of interest to every lover of music in the United States. For that reason this paper discusses it, and will continue to do so in spite of intimations from Boston that poaching on one's neighbor's preserves is reprehensible. The Boston Symphony Orchestra belongs to the United States, and the Hub will not be able to shut its greatness up within her provincial limits.

New York knows perfectly well what it wants as an orchestral conductor. New York does not want Theodore Thomas. New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go.

[112]

Worcester Daily Spy.

APRIL 18 1894

LAST SYMPHONY.

A Terrific Program for Boston's Matchless Band.

What Shall Be Done Next Season?—Gossip of Mr. Paur and His Musicians.

An audience that was rather small, but was very much impressed, attended the fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall Tuesday night. Nobody could have sat through the hour and a half and paid due attention to the music without forming very definite convictions on two points. One was the great intellectuality of the music, of the performance and of the conductor who brought out sucn impressive results. The other was that the listener was utterly tired out, and was hungry and thirsty for a Strauss waltz, a Berlioz Rakocsy march or some other sort of brandy-and-sodary tonic that would sooth and brace him up.

Now that is not a healthful condition, either for the public or for the orchestra that depends upon it for support. Something was wrong, and the fault was obviously in the program. It was appalling. Admiration for the performance was excelled only by amazement for the mind that conceived such a combination of pieces. The program was this:

(1) Handel's concerto grosso No. 10, in D minor, for strings; five movements, with only one change of key.

(2) C. M. Loeffler's fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra (manuscript); five movements, full of Slavic rhythms, Russian melodies, every instrument known to the orchestra, and instrumental "color" thrown on with a dipper.

(3) Hermann Goetz's F major symphony, op. 9, four movements, embodying much that is bright, original and pretty, but coming after the senses had been jaded and exhausted.

Possibly Mr. Paur intended this as an object lesson in the development of the concerto. There was the archaic concerto grosso, in which the band is divided into two choruses, as it were, the one playing against the other. Then there was Mr. Loeffler's exceedingly clever illustration of the most advanced modern school of orchestral writing. It may be doubted if such an object lesson were worth the while. The most enjoyable parts of the Handel number were the slow movement (No. 2, lento) and the last two allegri.

Mr. Loeffler is a very modest man. He had heard his concerto in Boston and he did not come to Worcester to witness its triumph here. Mr. Adamowski occupied the fair-haired violinist's chair by Mr. Kneisel's side. Unless it be McDowell, no Boston composer has a better mastery of orchestral color than Loeffler. Alwin Schroeder, who played the solo, has sometimes found music more congenial to himself and his instrument, but he is always an artist. Had either Mr. Loeffler's concerto or the Goetz symphony been more fortunately placed, each would have won even greater applause, though there was rather more than the usual demonstration during the evening.

Prospects for Next Year.

Though the original subscription list promised a much larger attendance than last season, the promise has not been fulfilled, and the gross receipts for the course of concerts just closed are at least 50 per cent smaller than those of last year. The consequent and natural disappointment has led the Boston managers to threaten rather positively that there shall be no symphony concerts here next winter. Yet it does not appear that the discouragement need be quite so complete as that. The decrease of patronage is not peculiar to Worcester alone. The concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Providence and other cities have not been as profitable as they were a year ago. Some of the western and southern concerts had to be given up entirely. Even in Boston, similar conditions have obtained. Anybody who has attended the Music Hall concerts and rehearsals must know that the Boston newspaper men are mistaken, when they say that the gross attendance has not fallen off. The irritating criticism of New York writers has goaded at least one Boston critic into making some claims that cannot be substantiated.

The primary cause of the decrease in receipts was not the change of conductors, but was obviously the general business depression which, as theatre managers, artists and music teachers abundantly realize, has hit the so-called "amusement business" a hard blow. With reviving financial prosperity, there is reason to hope that the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase everywhere. The Boston managers should be patient with Worcester, and "try, try again."

The town is near at hand, the traveling expenses for the orchestra must be comparatively light, and there are almost no hotel bills. There should be an annual course of concerts here, and under the intelligent Boston management they should be reasonably profitable. Worcester people ought to support the orchestra, and the subscription list, this season, as well as the receipts in 1892-'93, prove that under ordinary financial conditions they are disposed to do so.

About Mr. Paur Himself.

Whatever may have been the original arrangement (and it was first understood to last for only one year), there is no doubt now that Mr. Paur is to remain with the orchestra for [illegible]

[illegible] years [illegible] Col. Higginson [illegible] that term of years [illegible] but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000. It is not true that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound there absolutely for five years. I am very contented to stay here."

Boston writers take pleasure in attributing to certain alleged disaffected first violins the stories of discontent in Boston and of the probable retirement of Mr. Paur. B. E. Woolf of the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette goes so far as to advise the expulsion of those whom he thinks have been guilty of insubordination and impatience under the rigorous discipline lately enforced.

There is always some sort of badgering going on among a large company of musicians, and the recent mutterings need not reflect upon Mr. Paur. In discussing his qualities as a conductor, however, it must be confessed that he is not much of an exhibition trick pony. Rather, he is a sober, steady, reliable roadster, and a good, strong, all-round work horse. His most conspicuous service has been the much-needed restoration of discipline. The military precision of the orchestra under Gericke has hardly been regained, but that refinement is not so necessary as certain other merits. What Mr. Paur has accomplished is sufficient. Another quality for commendation is his fidelity to the classic ideals, which forbids his treating a symphony as if it were an opera. He has also given the orchestra a virility long lacking. Even better than that is the extraordinary clearness of his readings. Nobody has questioned his scholarship, though some are fond of calling him pedantic. Yet this very characteristic, as illustrated in his habit of strict and minute analysis, is what enables him to give the complex music of Brahms, Berlioz and others with such astonishing lucidity. In this respect he is unrivalled in this country.

It is indisputable, on the other hand, that his system is apt to impart to the music an unwelcome rigidity which his emphatic and angular beat seems to intensify. It makes the effects seem studied rather than spontaneous, and it does not always go well with poetry, romance and sentiment. Two conspicuous instances of this fact at the Worcester concerts were given in Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" and in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." The one great mystery, however, is the construction of Mr. Paur's programs. Even Boston writers have given up all hope of accounting for them. It is only just to add that at least two of the Worcester concerts sounded vastly better than they looked on paper. To sum it all up, Mr. Paur, like most other men, has his limitations, and there is much in him to admire. Whether this limitations are commercially more detrimental than the average, another year will be required to decide.

THE REGISTER.

Established 1812.

86, 88 and 90 Crown St., New Haven.

Advertisements are not received after 2 p. m. for the Daily edition, or after 9 p. m. Saturday for the Sunday edition.

All communications to the Editor should be accompanied by the author's name as a guarantee of good faith. We cannot promise to return unaccepted manuscript.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Grossmith, the English Entertainer, To-Night. Dickson Coming in "Willie."

This evening local theater goers will have an opportunity to judge for themselves of the ability of George Grossmith, the famous English entertainer, who will appear at the Hyperion and give a musical and humorous recital. During his entertainment he will treat on "The Art of Entertaining," "How I Discovered America," and "The Paderewski Craze." Grossmith has made great hits in Boston and other cities. The Buffalo "Express" had this to say of his entertainment in that city: "To begin with, Mr. Grossmith is an actor of high merit. He thus brings to his aid the knowledge obtained from a long experience on the stage, besides his training as an entertainer. Then he is a thoroughly up-to-date individual. In the hour and a half that he delighted an intelligent audience last night he was guilty of telling only one story that had an ancient flavor."

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Does civilization increase peril and liability to bodily accident? The man who came early to Music Hall the other evening and had an Edison incandescent bulb fall from the roof upon a seat in the second gallery, near him, and shiver into a thousand pieces, may well think so.

* * *

At the Symphony concert Saturday night the wedding march, so finely rendered, was highly appreciated. A pretty girl just behind me was particularly enthusiastic. "Oh, Charles," I heard her whisper, in ecstatic staccato, "if only we could have them play it for us!"

* * *

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK. WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Antoinette Trebelli.

THIS bright and rising star which already adorns the constellation of sopranos, is on the eve of a career that will eventually place her name high up among the immortals of this century. She was born in Paris, her mother being the great contralto, Mrs. Trebelli, who won such distinction on the operatic stage and concert platform; her father, Mr. Bettini, is also a well-known singer, although he has practically retired from public life. Her mother's signal success in England led her to locate in London, where the gifted subject of our sketch has spent the greater part of her life, frequently going to the Continent for longer or shorter periods. Besides the invaluable instruction received from her mother, Miss Trebelli studied for two years with Mr. Wartel in Paris, acquiring a large répertoire of French songs and arias.

Soon after her return to London from this sojourn in the French capital she made her début at St. James' Hall at a concert organized by Mr. Kuhl, and Mr. H. Sutherland Edwards, in his excellent work, "The Prima Donna," speaks of her first appearance in the following terms: "The child in question is already known as one of the most brilliant sopranos of the day. Miss Antoinette Trebelli, endowed by nature with a fresh, flexible voice of much brightness and of constantly increasing power, has had the advantage of being directed in her studies by one of the most perfect vocalists of our time; and those who have heard mother and daughter singing together, as happened on the occasion of Miss Antoinette Trebelli's début at St. James' Hall, may well hesitate as to which is most to be admired." Her singing as indicated above proved conclusively that she had inherited the musical talents of her parents, and fortunately she is also endowed with those desirable traits of character, a bright personality, modesty, earnestness, perseverance and good common sense. She has also inherited the great beauty of her mother, and if it were not that her art demands all of her time, which is gladly given to this grateful goddess, she would undoubtedly be a society favorite.

After this brilliant introduction to the public she became very popular, and engagements came to her from all over the United Kingdom. She immediately commenced studying with Mr. Santley and has continued with him ever since, thus the better appropriating the lessons of her wide experience, and gaining invaluable instruction from the veteran baritone. Her voice has gradually developed under his training, and with him she has learned a large répertoire, including all of the principal oratorios, cantatas, English songs, ballads, and she recently met with great success in a concert rendering of Gounod's "Faust" at Queen's Hall.

To give a record of Miss Antoinette Trebelli's public appearances during the time since her début would fill columns, but a few of the more important ones I will enumerate here: She has sung for the Philharmonic Society, the oldest and most important concert giving organization in England; Sir Charles Hallé's Manchester concerts, Liverpool Philharmonic Society, Choral Union and Scottish orchestras in Glasgow, all of the leading Philharmonic and orchestral societies in Great Britain, besides the choral societies and a number of grand concerts all over the country and in London. She has been the leading soprano at Mr. Ambroise Austin's annual sacred concert at St. James' Hall on Good Friday for the past three years, this last time singing Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and two oratorio selections besides, securing tremendous applause from the crowded house, and the highest praise from the press. Her singing of English ballads has met with great favor, and she is one of the most popular of the singers at the Ballad Concerts.

She makes her début at the great festivals this summer, singing at the Chester Festival in July. She has had equal success on the Continent, making tours through Holland, Sweden, Norway and Russia, where she has become a great favorite, her second and subsequent appearances being marked with great enthusiasm. The success of Miss Antoinette Trebelli on this side of the Atlantic, where she has won the homage of thousands upon thousands of music lovers by her beautiful voice and musicianly talents, is the best possible assurance of her success with the Americans, who are among the most appreciative people in the world of good singing.

We present an excellent likeness of this young artist, whose features by the way, bear a strong resemblance to Materna's, that is to the Materna of a quarter of a century ago. Later we will give to our readers the press notices of Miss Trebelli.

FREUND'S MUSICAL WEEKLY

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1894.

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Music Hall last week proved one of the most enjoyable of the season. The programme included Richard Straus's symphony in F minor, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Berlioz's Rakoczky march.

The performance of the orchestra, especially the string instruments, was as usual thoroughly artistic and finished, but lacking somewhat in spirit.

The soloist was Mr. F. B. Busoni, who played most effectively Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody." Mr. Busoni's technique is remarkably good, and he was recalled with enthusiasm.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony audience was called upon last night to give up its customary dignified mien and enter heartily into the merriment of the occasion, as the programme, Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," is of that order which calls for a happy, often humorous, state of mind from beginning to end. Coming as it did after the heavy programme of last week, it was a welcome relief.

As a matter of fact, a good share of the pleasure of the evening should be credited to Mr. George Riddle, who performed his part of the programme in the most acceptable manner. To recite, as he did last night, by far the greater part of the Shaksperian comedy is no small task, particularly when one considers the demands which such a character as Bottom makes upon the human voice. But he passed through the trying ordeal bravely, and won well merited applause frequently during the evening.

Mendelssohn's music to the comedy was written when he was but 17 years of age, which immediately places it among the remarkable compositions of the old composers. The overture is prettily conceived and of a most playful order, presaging the general tenor of what follows. It and the nocturne which ends Act III, the famous wedding march after Act IV and the dance of the clowns, Act V, are the special movements, or numbers, and all were given a magnificent rendering by Conductor Paur's band.

The female chorus of the Cecilia added not a little to the general effect of the work, and Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier sang several solo numbers in good taste. There was an interpolated addition to the programme, however, which made itself quite audible ever and anon throughout the evening; it sounded like the patter of hail, for which, however, the audience was responsible, not the orchestra.

The next concert will introduce Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli as the soloist.

[113]

Worcester Daily Spy.
APRIL 18 1894

LAST SYMPHONY.

A Terrific Program for Boston's Matchless Band.

What Shall Be Done Next Season?—Gossip of Mr. Paur and His Musicians.

An audience that was rather small, but was very much impressed, attended the fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mechanics Hall Tuesday night. Nobody could have sat through the hour and a half and paid due attention to the music without forming very definite convictions on two points. One was the great intellectuality of the music, of the performance and of the conductor who brought out such impressive results. The other was that the listener was utterly tired out, and was hungry and thirsty for a Strauss waltz, a Berlioz Rakocsy march or some other sort of brandy-and-sodary tonic that would sooth and brace him up.

Now that is not a healthful condition, either for the public or for the orchestra that depends upon it for support. Something was wrong, and the fault was obviously in the program. It was appalling. Admiration for the performance was excelled only by amazement for the mind that conceived such a combination of pieces. The program was this:

(1) Handel's concerto grosso No. 10, in D minor, for strings; five movements, with only one change of key.

(2) C. M. Loeffler's fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra (manuscript); five movements, full of Slavic rhythms, Russian melodies, every instrument known to the orchestra, and instrumental "color" thrown on with a dipper.

(3) Hermann Goetz's F major symphony, op. 9, four movements, embodying much that is bright, original and pretty, but coming after the senses had been jaded and exhausted.

Possibly Mr. Paur intended this as an object lesson in the development of the concerto. There was the archaic concerto grosso, in which the band is divided into two choruses, as it were, the one playing against the other. Then there was Mr. Loeffler's exceedingly clever illustration of the most advanced modern school of orchestral writing. It may be doubted if such an object lesson were worth the while. The most enjoyable parts of the Handel number were the slow movement (No. 2, lento) and the last two allegri.

Mr. Loeffler is a very modest man. He had heard his concerto in Boston and he did not come to Worcester to witness its triumph here. Mr. Adamowski occupied the fair-haired violinist's chair by Mr. Kneisel's side. Unless it be McDowell, no Boston composer has a better mastery of orchestral color than Loeffler. Alwin Schroeder, who played the solo, has sometimes found music more congenial to himself and his instrument, but he is always an artist. Had either Mr. Loeffler's concerto or the Goetz symphony been more fortunately placed, each would have won even greater applause, though there was rather more than the usual demonstration during the evening.

Prospects for Next Year.

Though the original subscription list promised a much larger attendance than last season, the promise has not been fulfilled, and the gross receipts for the course of concerts just closed are at least 50 per cent smaller than those of last year. The consequent and natural disappointment has led the Boston managers to threaten rather positively that there shall be no symphony concerts here next winter. Yet it does not appear that the discouragement need be quite so complete as that. The decrease of patronage is not peculiar to Worcester alone. The concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Providence and other cities have not been as profitable as they were a year ago. Some of the western and southern concerts had to be given up entirely. Even in Boston, similar conditions have obtained. Anybody who has attended the Music Hall concerts and rehearsals must know that the Boston newspaper men are mistaken, when they say that the gross attendance has not fallen off. The irritating criticism of New York writers has goaded at least one Boston critic into making some claims that cannot be substantiated.

The primary cause of the decrease in receipts was not the change of conductors, but was obviously the general business depression which, as theatre managers, artists and music teachers abundantly realize, has hit the so-called "amusement business" a hard blow. With reviving financial prosperity, there is reason to hope that the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will increase everywhere. The Boston managers should be patient with Worcester, and "try, try again."

The town is near at hand, the traveling expenses for the orchestra must be comparatively light, and there are almost no hotel bills. There should be an annual course of concerts here, and under the intelligent Boston management they should be reasonably profitable. Worcester people ought to support the orchestra, and the subscription list, this season, as well as the receipts in 1892-'93, prove that under ordinary financial conditions they are disposed to do so.

About Mr. Paur Himself.

Whatever may have been the original arrangement (and it was first understood to last for only one year), there is no doubt now that Mr. Paur is bound to remain with the orchestra for five years. He has a contract with Col. Higginson for ten years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000. It is not true that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. I am very contented to stay here."

Boston writers take pleasure in attributing to certain alleged disaffected first violins the stories of discontent in Boston and of the probable retirement of Mr. Paur. B. E. Woolf of the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette goes so far as to advise the expulsion of those whom he thinks have been guilty of insubordination and impatience under the rigorous discipline lately enforced.

There is always some sort of badgering going on among a large company of musicians, and the recent mutterings need not reflect upon Mr. Paur. In discussing his qualities as a conductor, however, it must be confessed that he is not much of an exhibition trick pony. Rather, he is a sober, steady, reliable roadster, and a good, strong, all-round work horse. His most conspicuous service has been the much-needed restoration of discipline. The military precision of the orchestra under Gericke has hardly been regained, but that refinement is not so necessary as certain other merits. What Mr. Paur has accomplished is sufficient. Another quality for commendation is his fidelity to the classic ideals, which forbids his treating a symphony as if it were an opera. He has also given the orchestra a virility long lacking. Even better than that is the extraordinary clearness of his readings. Nobody has questioned his scholarship, though some are fond of calling him pedantic. Yet this very characteristic, as illustrated in his habit of strict and minute analysis, is what enables him to give the complex music of Brahms, Berlioz and others with such astonishing lucidity. In this respect he is unrivalled in this country.

It is indisputable, on the other hand, that his system is apt to impart to the music an unwelcome rigidity which his emphatic and angular beat seems to intensify. It makes the effects seem studied rather than spontaneous, and it does not always go well with poetry, romance and sentiment. Two conspicuous instances of this fact at the Worcester concerts were given in Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" and in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." The one great mystery, however, is the construction of Mr. Paur's programs. Even Boston writers have given up all hope of accounting for them. It is only just to add that at least two of the Worcester concerts sounded vastly better than they looked on paper. To sum it all up, Mr. Paur, like most other men, has his limitations, and there is much in him to admire. Whether his limitations are commercially more detrimental than the average, another year will be required to decide.

THE REGISTER.

Established 1812.

86, 88 and 90 Crown St., New Haven.

Advertisements are not received after 2 p. m. for the Daily edition, or after 9 p. m. Saturday for the Sunday edition.

All communications to the Editor should be accompanied by the author's name as a guarantee of good faith. We cannot promise to return unaccepted manuscript.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Grossmith, the English Entertainer, To-Night. Dickson Coming in "Willie."

This evening local theater goers will have an opportunity to judge for themselves of the ability of George Grossmith, the famous English entertainer, who will appear at the Hyperion and give a musical and humorous recital. During his entertainment he will treat on "The Art of Entertaining," "How I Discovered America," and "The Paderewski Craze." Grossmith has made great hits in Boston and other cities. The Buffalo "Express" had this to say of his entertainment in that city: "To begin with, Mr. Grossmith is an actor of high merit. He thus brings to his aid the knowledge obtained from a long experience on the stage, besides his training as an entertainer. Then he is a thoroughly up-to-date individual. In the hour and a half that he delighted an intelligent audience last night he was guilty of telling only one story that had an ancient flavor."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Does civilization increase peril and liability to bodily accident? The man who came early to Music Hall the other evening and had an Edison incandescent bulb fall from the roof upon a seat in the second gallery, near him, and shiver into a thousand pieces, may well think so.

* * *

At the Symphony concert Saturday night the wedding march, so finely rendered, was highly appreciated. A pretty girl just behind me was particularly enthusiastic. "Oh, Charles," I heard her whisper, in ecstatic staccato, "if only we could have them play it for us!"

* * *

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

Antoinette Trebelli.

THIS bright and rising star which already adorns the constellation of sopranos, is on the eve of a career that will eventually place her name high up among the immortals of this century. She was born in Paris, her mother being the great contralto, Mrs. Trebelli, who won such distinction on the operatic stage and concert platform; her father, Mr. Bettini, is also a well-known singer, although he has practically retired from public life. Her mother's signal success in England led her to locate in London, where the gifted subject of our sketch has spent the greater part of her life, frequently going to the Continent for longer or shorter periods. Besides the invaluable instruction received from her mother, Miss Trebelli studied for two years with Mr. Wartel in Paris, acquiring a large répertoire of French songs and arias.

Soon after her return to London from this sojourn in the French capital she made her début at St. James' Hall at a concert organized by Mr. Kuhl, and Mr. H. Sutherland Edwards, in his excellent work, "The Prima Donna," speaks of her first appearance in the following terms: "The child in question is already known as one of the most brilliant sopranos of the day. Miss Antoinette Trebelli, endowed by nature with a fresh, flexible voice of much brightness and of constantly increasing power, has had the advantage of being directed in her studies by one of the most perfect vocalists of our time; and those who have heard mother and daughter singing together, as happened on the occasion of Miss Antoinette Trebelli's début at St. James' Hall, may well hesitate as to which is most to be admired." Her singing as indicated above proved conclusively that she had inherited the musical talents of her parents, and fortunately she is also endowed with those desirable traits of character, a bright personality, modesty, earnestness, perseverance and good common sense. She has also inherited the great beauty of her mother, and if it were not that her art demands all of her time, which is gladly given to this grateful goddess, she would undoubtedly be a society favorite.

After this brilliant introduction to the public she became very popular, and engagements came to her from all over the United Kingdom. She immediately commenced studying with Mr. Santley and has continued with him ever since, thus the better appropriating the lessons of her wide experience, and gaining invaluable instruction from the veteran baritone. Her voice has gradually developed under his training, and with him she has learned a large répertoire, including all of the principal oratorios, cantatas, English songs, ballads, and she recently met with great success in a concert rendering of Gounod's "Faust" at Queen's Hall.

To give a record of Miss Antoinette Trebelli's public appearances during the time since her début would fill columns, but a few of the more important ones I will enumerate here: She has sung for the Philharmonic Society, the oldest and most important concert giving organization in England; Sir Charles Hallé's Manchester concerts, Liverpool Philharmonic Society, Choral Union and Scottish orchestras in Glasgow, all of the leading Philharmonic and orchestral societies in Great Britain, besides the choral societies and a number of grand concerts all over the country and in London. She has been the leading soprano at Mr. Ambroise Austin's annual sacred concert at St. James' Hall on Good Friday for the past three years, this last time singing Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and two oratorio selections besides, securing tremendous applause from the crowded house, and the highest praise from the press. Her singing of English ballads has met with great favor, and she is one of the most popular of the singers at the Ballad Concerts.

She makes her début at the great festivals this summer, singing at the Chester Festival in July. She has had equal success on the Continent, making tours through Holland, Sweden, Norway and Russia, where she has become a great favorite, her second and subsequent appearances being marked with great enthusiasm. The success of Miss Antoinette Trebelli on this side of the Atlantic, where she has won the homage of thousands upon thousands of music lovers by her beautiful voice and musicianly talents, is the best possible assurance of her success with the Americans, who are among the most appreciative people in the world of good singing.

We present an excellent likeness of this young artist, whose features by the way, bear a strong resemblance to Materna's, that is to the Materna of a quarter of a century ago. Later we will give to our readers the press notices of Miss Trebelli.

FREUND'S MUSICAL WEEKLY

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1894.

LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Music Hall last week proved one of the most enjoyable of the season. The programme included Richard Straus's symphony in F minor, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," and Berlioz's Rakoczky march.

The performance of the orchestra, especially the string instruments, was as usual thoroughly artistic and finished, but lacking somewhat in spirit.

The soloist was Mr. F. B. Busoni, who played most effectively Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody." Mr. Busoni's technique is remarkably good and he was recalled with enthusiasm.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony audience was called upon last night to give up its customary dignified mien and enter heartily into the merriment of the occasion, as the programme, Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," is of that order which calls for a happy, often humorous, state of mind from beginning to end. Coming as it did after the heavy programme of last week, it was a welcome relief.

As a matter of fact, a good share of the pleasure of the evening should be credited to Mr. George Riddle, who performed his part of the programme in the most acceptable manner. To recite, as he did last night, by far the greater part of the Shaksperian comedy is no small task, particularly when one considers the demands which such a character as Bottom makes upon the human voice. But he passed through the trying ordeal bravely, and won well merited applause frequently during the evening.

Mendelssohn's music to the comedy was written when he was but 17 years of age, which immediately places it among the remarkable compositions of the old composers. The overture is prettily conceived and of a most playful order, presaging the general tenor of what follows. It and the nocturne which ends Act III, the famous wedding march after Act IV and the dance of the clowns, Act V, are the special movements, or numbers, and all were given a magnificent rendering by Conductor Paur's band.

The female chorus of the Cecilia added not a little to the general effect of the work, and Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier sang several solo numbers in good taste. There was an interpolated addition to the programme, however, which made itself quite audible ever and anon throughout the evening; it sounded like the patter of hail, for which, however, the audience was responsible, not the orchestra.

The next concert will introduce Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli as the soloist.

THE SPENCER SUN

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1894

Symphony Orchestra.

The weather was more propitious for the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Worcester last week than on the night of the preceding concert, and a larger number of Spencer people than usual enjoyed the interesting programme. The opening number was Beethoven's eigth symphony, which was played in a manner calculated to arouse the enthusiasm of the most fastidious concert goer. Mr. Carl Stasney, the soloist of the evening, gave what, to us, was a rather dull performance of the concerto for piano by Grieg. Rubenstein's dainty ballet music from "Feramors" was exquisitely played and thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, as was evinced by the hearty applause it received. In marked contrast to this number followed Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," which was splendidly given by the orchestra, and which was indeed a fitting climax to a most delightful concert. We hope our musical friends will not forget that they have but one more opportunity to hear this magnificent orchestra in Worcester this season, as the last concert of the series occurs Tuesday, April 17.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 22, 1894.

The twenty third Symphony programme presented no novelty in the way of music; for although Professor Paine's serious and appropriate "Œdipus" prelude had then its first hearing in such a connection, it could not be set down as anything really new in spite of its being rather unfamiliar. It was calmly and comprehendingly read. The symphony, which had the central position in the concert, was Brahm's fourth. This may not unfairly be described as a descending series expressed in terms of music instead of mathematics; for its interest—unless for the admirer of mere thematic evolution—declines distinctly from the first and second movements to the third and thence across a great gap to the dull and labored fourth. The playing matched the composition, being bright and earnest in the first movement, genially grave in the second, emphatic and slightly uncouth in the third, uneasy and not always definite in the fourth. The only other orchestral number was Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, a fine and illuminated composition, but better suited for its intended place as a prologue than for that which Mr. Paur gave it as a finale. Something of different class and calibre is needed for the end of these programmes instead of the selections which he is wont to make.

There were two numbers for soprano voice, sung by Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli—daughter of the eminent contralto—who came as a stranger to the symphony. The first was the so-called "Letter" scene in "Don Giovanni," and the second was to be the light and lively bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers." This latter did not materialize, however, either because the orchestral parts could not be obtained or because (which is quite as likely a reason) it was tabooed on account of its Italian origin. (And again parenthetically, it is a constant cause of regret that American concerts should be so characteristically German as the Music Hall evenings are.) In place of the Verdi was therefore substituted the pleasant short air from Massenet's "Herodiade," which is getting to be pretty nearly an old story. The singer is a sweet-faced young woman of modest demeanor and easy bearing. Her voice is fresh, equable and limpid, and her style simple but fine—better however in vocalization than in diction, for although her phrases were charmingly enunciated, scarcely a word of her texts could be understood. She gratified her hearers and was handsomely recalled.

The assitant-editor of the programme-book, M. Hector Berlioz, of Paris, really ought to be replaced next season by somebody who should be less like a man of the past. The partiality of the editor and the tolerance of the public has allowed him to reprint vast sections of his own "Across Country" and other books. But when he goes back several decades to print his garbled and incorrect account of Jenny Lind's visit to this country, one really must protest and regret that the inadvertence of the editor should have allowed these statements, quite as misleading as anything in Dickens or Mrs. Trollope, to occupy pages which might have been filled with profitable romance or veritable history.

The last programme to be performed this week, is not particularly interesting and stands thus: Wagner's Huldigung's March, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's sixth symphony.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

The 23d Symphony Concert in Music Hall and the Successful Appearance of Miss Antoinette Trebelli.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the singer. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles..J. K. Paine
Recitative and aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni"..... Mozart
Symphony No. 4..... Brahms
Aria from Herodiade, "Il est bon, il est doux"..Massenet
Overture to "King Stephan"..... Beethoven

Miss Antoinette Trebelli is the daughter of Zelie Thérèse Caroline Gillebert de Beaulieu, who, known to the public as Madame Trebelli, was one of the most famous opera singers of the last 30 years. The mother was married in 1863 to Bettini, an Italian singer, and Rossini was one of the witnesses at the marriage ceremony. Born in 1838, she died in 1892. It is said she took her stage name from "Gillebert," which spelled backward makes Trebellig, and then the "g" was dropped.

The singer that pleased the audience last evening was born in April, 1864, if English accounts are to be believed; certainly, the singer looks younger. She studied first with her mother, then with Wartel, and afterward with Santley. She has thus far sung chiefly in concert and in oratorio. If I am not mistaken, she made her first appearance in St. James Hall, London, in concert with her mother. She has sung with marked success in Holland, Sweden, Norway and Russia. Her first appearance in this city was at the final Star Course entertainment in Music Hall, this month.

Miss Trebelli has an agreeable voice, which has been admirably trained. Her tone production is excellent; she sings with delightful ease; there are no facial contortions; there is no apparent and distressing jugulation. Her technique was last evening adequate throughout, in cantabile or in bravura. And the modesty and the girlish grace of the singer accentuated the pleasure given by her song. No wonder that the audience applauded enthusiastically.

***

It was also a pleasure to hear the noble overture of Prof. Paine, an overture fit to usher in the mighty tragedy of Sophocles. Indeed, the spirit of Grecian tragedy is in this music, for the passion is never forced, never boisterous, and in the stormiest passages there is form and there is beauty. Skillfully made, it is without taint of pedagogism. Although it is the work of a teacher, yea, of a professor, it is not academic. Dramatic, it is free from theatrical effect, nor is there here any absurd and desperate chase of local color. The music is free, fluent, noble in theme and in treatment, and, above all, it is passionate. Twice was Prof. Paine obliged to bow his acknowledgments to the applausive audience.

Perhaps it is imperfect sympathy, but to me the fourth symphony of Brahms is not as truly a musical work as the second or the third. The second movement abounds in beautiful passages, and one must often pay tribute throughout the work to the mastery of the composer over all technical resources. Strength there is in plenty, and the strength is at times defiant, as though Brahms said "I wish it this way. You may like it or not; what care I?" And this sturdiness is perhaps to be admired. Certainly it is better than writing with one eye on the audience. But could not this sturdiness be tempered more with sensuousness? Is there not a species of prudery at times in the apparent reluctance of Brahms to write as though he wished to be heard by men only? Ruinous is it to a composer to fall into the musical eroticism that disfigures so much of the music of Gounod and Massenet. But Brahms occasionally invites the suspicion of affected crabbedness, of wanton surliness. If he had not turned his attention to music, he would probably have been a formidable chess player or the honored President of a Zetetic Society.

It is a long time—nearly 10 years—since the "King Stephen" overture was heard at a Symphony concert. This King Stephen is not the King Stephen of the old ballad sung by Iago, who was a worthy peer, and "whose breeches cost him but a crown." And yet the music of the one is not worth much more than the breeches of the other.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

Mlle Antoinette Trebelli Sings at the Symphony—Testimonial to Mrs Benzing—Music Notes.

The 13th season of the symphony concerts is drawing to a close, the rehearsal and concert this week completing the series for 93-94. Last week's program contained one novelty, Prof J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus," given for the first time here. Mlle Trebelli sang the letter aria from "Don Giovanni" and the bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the orchestra played Brahm's fourth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." Prof Paine's work is a soleman and scholarly composition which is interesting only to the expert and advanced student of music, for its severely classical style, so admirably fitting its subject, does not appeal to the tastes of concert patrons in general.

The orchestration is admirable, its treatment broad and effective and thoroughly in keeping with the Sophocles text, which admits of no triviality. The reading by Mr Paur was conscientious, and evidently in accordance with the ideas of the composer.

Mlle Trebelli's voice is very pleasing, and she sings easily and generally true. There is a suggestion of reserve strength about her vocalizing which begets confidence in her powers, and her stage presence is very prepossessing and free from mannerisms. Her bravura passages were executed clearly and smoothly, her upper register is sweet, while the lower notes, though not broad, are of even quality and apparently need but experience to develop in warmth and resonance. Her reception must have been very flattering to the young artist, the audience recalling her to the platform several times after each number.

Brahm's fourth symphony, abounding in peculiar and inharmonious modulations, was generally well played. The difficult parts allotted the strings were clearly and smoothly performed throughout the four movements. The melody given to the violas, bassoons and violins in the last part of the second movement was beautifully expressed, and the joyous character of the allegro giocoso was well sustained. The cross-relations between naturals and sharps, which are chaos to the ear, were effectively set forth.

Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen" is simply and generally brilliant, with marked gypsy characteristics in its treatment. The prominence given the wind instruments in the composition is notable, and the body did commendable work, especially in the foot passages in themes of the gypsy nature.

The program for this week will be as follows: Huldigungs march, Wagner; waltz, "Mephisto," Liszt; overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

[114]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, was, Prelude to "Œdipus," op 35, J. K. Paine; aria, "Non mi dir," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, E-minor, op 98, Brahms; Aria, "Il est bon il est doux" Massenet; Overture, "King Stephan," Beethoven; Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist. The audience was large and very enthusiastic. Mr. Paine's noble and classic prelude that so fitly and so sympathetically ushers in the tragedy for which it was written, was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is a splendid composition in every way, dignified and poetic in sentiment and of peculiar beauty in its harmonic and orchestral treatment. It was applauded with great fervor, and the audience did not cease until the composer, who was present, rose and bowed his acknowledgments. The Brahms symphony was read with fine brilliancy by Mr. Paur; in truth, the interpretation was unlike any that the work has ever had here, and made it clearer and more interesting to us than it ever seemed before. It was beautifully played throughout, the effect of Mr. Paur's careful discipline being notably evident in the strings, which he has brought up to their best efficiency in the past, and to which he has imparted a greater fire and sweep than they have ever had. The performance was sturdily applauded, and Mr. Paur was recalled several times. In fact, the audience through the whole concert was lavish in its applause for the conductor. Mlle. Trebelli was cordially received and made a very favorable impression. She has a full and sympathetic soprano voice of fine quality and extensive range, and she sings with skill and knowledge, showing careful and admirable training in all she does. The Mozart air was sung broadly, with artistic phrasing and perfect tunefulness, and with a method and a style in which it would be difficult to find a fault. In the Massenet air, she was even more successful, and her reading of it was particularly notable for its propriety of dramatic expression. Mlle. Trebelli sings without effort, and is a solid, serviceable vocalist generally, judged by her performances of last night. She was recalled twice after each effort. The programme for the next and last concert of the season, is Huldigungs March, Wagner; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

Still Kicking.

Some of the New York music critics continue to object to Mr. Paur. One of these writers inveighed at great length against him in last Sunday's Times, and took occasion to comment forcibly, but civilly, on what has appeared in the GAZETTE on the subject The trend of his argument, however, is chiefly a defence of Mr. Nikisch. He concedes frankly that the orchestra deteriorated under Mr. Nikisch, but seems to think that this was atoned for by the "conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important things." As far as our experience in Boston may be taken as evidence of Mr. Nikisch's "more important things," they were principally confined to the imparting of an operatic color to everything he conducted. The Times writer, in dwelling on the orchestra under Mr. Gericke, says: "The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here, are gone," whereas, if there was anything that the orchestra's playing under Mr. Gericke lacked, it was "snap and incisiveness." There were wonderful precision, finish and clearness, following a discipline that never relaxed; but, despite its technical beauty, the performances were pedagogic in effect. Of "snap" there was nothing. Mr. Nikisch had "snap," and subjugated all the proprieties to it. With all due respect to those New York critics who are so excited over Mr. Paur, we feel that it is not possible that they can know as much about him and his skill as a conductor, as is known by the music critics of Boston; firstly, because the latter have had the experience of twenty-two concerts directed by him, while the New Yorkers have only heard him at some half-dozen, more or less; aed, secondly, because the Boston critics are fully as well, if not better, equipped to pass judgment on such matters as are the men of New York. We have had six months of Mr. Paur, and in that time he has restored the orchestra to the efficiency it lost under the showy and unconscientious control of Mr. Nikisch, who was more concerned for himself than for the music he attempted to interpret. Not only this, but under Mr. Paur the orchestra plays with greater warmth, brilliancy, incisiveness and fluency than have ever before attended its performance. The concensus of critical opinion here supports these facts. That criticism which can accept the sickly sentimental readings of Mr. Nikisch in preference to the manly readings of Mr. Paur, speaks its own worthlessness. The Times writer seems to think that the GAZETTE has objected to unfavorable discussion of Mr. Paur by the New York critics. If so, he is in error. What the GAZETTE objects to is the injustice with which Mr. Paur has been treated in New York, and to the apparent determination that exists there to "down him" at any cost. The sincerity and the value of New York musical criticism are not set at a very high rate in Boston, for various unpleasant reasons on which it would be painful to dwell. When it combines in a concerted attack on an artist, and treats him with insulting arrogance, after he has met with favor in a community that is quite as musical as is New York, and quite as capable of judging music and its performances, the inevitable conclusion here is, that there is considerable axe-grinding under way for somebody. Discuss Mr. Paur, by all means, but at least have the discretion to refrain from setting up such twaddling conducting as that of Mr. Nikisch as a standard by which to judge him.

Some of the statements in the Times are remarkable. For instance, it says: "The fact is, that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind." But that is just what he has shown. He has musical temperament, and has communicated its warmth to the men of the orchestra, for, as we have said, they have not, under any previous conductor, played with so much warmth. The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, last week, bore ample evidence to that fact, and, in the whole existence of the orchestra, it has never done warmer or more perfect work. When the Times says that the orchestra "plays smoothly, correctly, glibly, if you will, but with deadly dulness," it shows that the writer is not filled with the spirit of fairness. Nor is it any potent argument against the capacity of Boston to judge of a conductor's efficiency, by referring flippantly to her "provincial limits." By and by the New York critics will recover from the malady of Nikischitis under which they are at present suffering, and then they will be clearer in judgment, even if they should not be fairer in spirit.

The Times has, at least, conducted its argument with dignity. Not so the Musical Courier, which returned, last week, to the attack on Mr. Paur, with all the bitterness and the offensive personalities that have characterized its treatment of Mr. Paur from the outset. Not only this, but it adheres to the misreprcsentations in which it has steadily indulged. However, it is something in the nature of a compliment to be abused by the Courier, and its power to do injury is immeasurably, almost ludicrously out of proportion to its gleeful eagerness to work it. Without any hesitation, it announces that "Mr. Higginson has grown very tired of his new man." And yet we doubt if Mr. Higginson has taken the Courier into his confidence. The Courier is probably indebted for its information to some one or more of the digruntled violinists who have busied themselves in inveighing against Mr. Paur in return for the discipline to which he has subjected them. It repeats its offensive fiat: "Mr. Paur must go," evidently firm in the faith that New York, as represented by the Courier, is all powerful in Boston. We are told, "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go!" New York is less influential here than is imagined by the Courier, for according to that veracious and highly respectable periodical, New York did want Arthur Nikisch,—and yet Arthur Nikisch's services were willingly dispensed with, and musical Boston has not given as much as one sigh for his departure. We are afraid that the Musical Courier is not yet in a position to cause Mr. Paur's dismissal. The wonder of it all is that New York should be so agitated over Mr. Paur. That city has Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Seidl, and is likely to have Mr. Theodore Thomas. It would seem that, in its wealth of conductors of its own, it had enough to attend to without troubling itself so greatly about Boston's conductor. Perhaps New York does not trouble itself, after all, and that all this pother by a few music critics, is of a limited, personal nature, rather than an expression of general opinion. It is not long since these writers decided that Walter Damrosch "must go;" and yet that gentleman is still at the fore. They have entered upon a combined opposition to Theodore Thomas, and yet the indications are that they will fail to write him down. Something must be wrong. Can it be that these writers are not so very influential, after all?

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mlle. Trebelli.

The Bostonians in "Robin Hood"—"Tabasco" Still Popular—Tonight's Attractions—Singers for Carney Hospital—Mr. and Mrs. Paur's Recitals—The Actors' Fund Benefit—Notes.

Conductor Paur found an opportunity to again recognize the Boston musicians, whom he has dealt with so generously during the season, at last evening's Symphony concert. In affording another hearing of John Knowles Paine's prelude to the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, opus 35, Mr. Paur gratified a long desired wish of those who enjoyed a hearing of the music composed by Prof. Paine for the tragedy when it was performed at Harvard University in 1881. Like all of the music by this composer, the "Edipus" prelude commands the respect and admiration of musical students. The mastery of the best forms of orchestral writing which it shows the composer to possess can but be recognized, and the treatment of the themes commands the approval of the most critical. The prelude was splendidly played by Mr. Paur and his musicians, and its performance was greatly enjoyed, the applause following it being finally quieted by an acknowledgement from the composer, who modestly rose in his seat on the floor to do so.

The symphony of the evening was the fourth of the Brahms series, and the tendencies of this composer toward his more melodious epoch, as shown in this composition, was again fully appreciated in its performance. Mr. Paur's reading of the several movements was admirable in every way, and caused general gratification to the followers of "Beethoven's successor."

The soloist of the evening was Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, who chose the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Don Giovani" for Donna Anna, "Non mi Dir" and an aria from Messenet's "Herodiade" for her numbers. It would be very pleasant to commend the singing of Mme. Trebelli and to return the compliments paid to American singers in their concert appearances in London. This, unfortunately, cannot be done with truth or justice to the rising singers of the day. Mme Trebelli has a very pleasant, musical voice, which she uses with good taste and with correct method. Her singing is, however, amateurish, her tones uncertain, and she shows in her vocal work a lack of finish which is especially noticeable in such selections as she chose for her appearance last evening. She found her audience kindly disposed toward her, however, and met with a pleasant reception and approving applause.

The programme was ended with Beethoven's brilliant overture to "King Stephen," which was capitally played and left the audience in a very happy frame of mind.

The season's series of concerts ends next Saturday evening with a programme which includes "The Huldigung's March," "The Mephisto" waltz, Schubert's overture to "Genoveva" and the sixth of the Beethoven symphonies.

THE SPENCER SUN

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1894

Symphony Orchestra.

The weather was more propitious for the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Worcester last week than on the night of the preceding concert, and a larger number of Spencer people than usual enjoyed the interesting programme. The opening number was Beethoven's eigth symphony, which was played in a manner calculated to arouse the enthusiasm of the most fastidious concert goer. Mr. Carl Stasney, the soloist of the evening, gave what, to us, was a rather dull performance of the concerto for piano by Grieg. Rubenstein's dainty ballet music from "Feramors" was exquisitely played and thoroughly enjoyed by the audience, as was evinced by the hearty applause it received. In marked contrast to this number followed Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman," which was splendidly given by the orchestra, and which was indeed a fitting climax to a most delightful concert. We hope our musical friends will not forget that they have but one more opportunity to hear this magnificent orchestra in Worcester this season, as the last concert of the series occurs Tuesday, April 17.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 22, 1894.

The twenty third Symphony programme presented no novelty in the way of music; for although Professor Paine's serious and appropriate "Œdipus" prelude had then its first hearing in such a connection, it could not be set down as anything really new in spite of its being rather unfamiliar. It was calmly and comprehendingly read. The symphony, which had the central position in the concert, was Brahm's fourth. This may not unfairly be described as a descending series expressed in terms of music instead of mathematics; for its interest—unless for the admirer of mere thematic evolution—declines distinctly from the first and second movements to the third and thence across a great gap to the dull and labored fourth. The playing matched the composition, being bright and earnest in the first movement, genially grave in the second, emphatic and slightly uncouth in the third, uneasy and not always definite in the fourth. The only other orchestral number was Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, a fine and illuminated composition, but better suited for its intended place as a prologue than for that which Mr. Paur gave it as a finale. Something of different class and calibre is needed for the end of these programmes instead of the selections which he is wont to make.

There were two numbers for soprano voice, sung by Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli—daughter of the eminent contralto—who came as a stranger to the symphony. The first was the so-called "Letter" scene in "Don Giovanni," and the second was to be the light and lively bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers." This latter did not materialize, however, either because the orchestral parts could not be obtained or because (which is quite as likely a reason) it was tabooed on account of its Italian origin. (And again parenthetically, it is a constant cause of regret that American concerts should be so characteristically German as the Music Hall evenings are.) In place of the Verdi was therefore substituted the pleasant short air from Massenet's "Herodiade," which is getting to be pretty nearly an old story. The singer is a sweet-faced young woman of modest demeanor and easy bearing. Her voice is fresh, equable and limpid, and her style simple but fine—better however in vocalization than in diction, for although her phrases were charmingly enunciated, scarcely a word of her texts could be understood. She gratified her hearers and was handsomely recalled.

The assitant-editor of the programme-book, M. Hector Berlioz, of Paris, really ought to be replaced next season by somebody who should be less like a man of the past. The partiality of the editor and the tolerance of the public has allowed him to reprint vast sections of his own "Across Country" and other books. But when he goes back several decades to print his garbled and incorrect account of Jenny Lind's visit to this country, one really must protest and regret that the inadvertence of the editor should have allowed these statements, quite as misleading as anything in Dickens or Mrs. Trollope, to occupy pages which might have been filled with profitable romance or veritable history.

The last programme to be performed this week, is not particularly interesting and stands thus: Wagner's Huldigung's March, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's sixth symphony.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

The 23d Symphony Concert in Music Hall and the Successful Appearance of Miss Antoinette Trebelli.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the singer. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles.....J. K. Paine
Recitative and aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4.....Brahms
Aria from Herodiade, "Il est bon, il est doux".....Massenet
Overture to "King Stephan".....Beethoven

Miss Antoinette Trebelli is the daughter of Zelie Thérèse Caroline Gillebert de Beaulieu, who, known to the public as Madame Trebelli, was one of the most famous opera singers of the last 30 years. The mother was married in 1863 to Bettini, an Italian singer, and Rossini was one of the witnesses at the marriage ceremony. Born in 1838, she died in 1892. It is said she took her stage name from "Gillebert," which spelled backward makes Trebellig, and then the "g" was dropped.

The singer that pleased the audience last evening was born in April, 1864, if English accounts are to be believed; certainly, the singer looks younger. She studied first with her mother, then with Wartel, and afterward with Santley. She has thus far sung chiefly in concert and in oratorio. If I am not mistaken, she made her first appearance in St. James Hall, London, in concert with her mother. She has sung with marked success in Holland, Sweden, Norway and Russia. Her first appearance in this city was at the final Star Course entertainment in Music Hall, this month.

Miss Trebelli has an agreeable voice, which has been admirably trained. Her tone production is excellent; she sings with delightful ease; there are no facial contortions; there is no apparent and distressing jugulation. Her technique was last evening adequate throughout, in cantabile or in bravura. And the modesty and the girlish grace of the singer accentuated the pleasure given by her song. No wonder that the audience applauded enthusiastically.

***

It was also a pleasure to hear the noble overture of Prof. Paine, an overture fit to usher in the mighty tragedy of Sophocles. Indeed, the spirit of Grecian tragedy is in this music, for the passion is never forced, never boisterous, and in the stormiest passages there is form and there is beauty. Skillfully made, it is without taint of pedagogism. Although it is the work of a teacher, yea, of a professor, it is not academic. Dramatic, it is free from theatrical effect, nor is there here any absurd and desperate chase of local color. The music is free, fluent, noble in theme and in treatment, and, above all, it is passionate. Twice was Prof. Paine obliged to bow his acknowledgments to the applausive audience.

Perhaps it is imperfect sympathy, but to me the fourth symphony of Brahms is not as truly a musical work as the second or the third. The second movement abounds in beautiful passages, and one must often pay tribute throughout the work to the mastery of the composer over all technical resources. Strength there is in plenty, and the strength is at times defiant, as though Brahms said "I wish it this way. You may like it or not; what care I?" And this sturdiness is perhaps to be admired. Certainly it is better than writing with one eye on the audience. But could not this sturdiness be tempered more with sensuousness? Is there not a species of prudery at times in the apparent reluctance of Brahms to write as though he wished to be heard by men only? Ruinous is it to a composer to fall into the musical eroticism that disfigures so much of the music of Gounod and Massenet. But Brahms occasionally invites the suspicion of affected crabbedness, of wanton surliness. If he had not turned his attention to music, he would probably have been a formidable chess player or the honored President of a Zetetic Society.

It is a long time—nearly 10 years—since the "King Stephen" overture was heard at a Symphony concert. This King Stephen is not the King Stephen of the old ballad sung by Iago, who was a worthy peer, and "whose breeches cost him but a crown." And yet the music of the one is not worth much more than the breeches of the other.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

Mlle Antoinette Trebelli Sings at the Symphony—Testimonial to Mrs Benzing—Music Notes.

The 13th season of the symphony concerts is drawing to a close, the rehearsal and concert this week completing the series for 93-94. Last week's program contained one novelty, Prof J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus," given for the first time here. Mlle Trebelli sang the letter aria from "Don Giovanni" and the bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the orchestra played Brahm's fourth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." Prof Paine's work is a solemn and scholarly composition which is interesting only to the expert and advanced student of music, for its severely classical style, so admirably fitting its subject, does not appeal to the tastes of concert patrons in general.

The orchestration is admirable, its treatment broad and effective and thoroughly in keeping with the Sophocles text, which admits of no triviality. The reading by Mr Paur was conscientious, and evidently in accordance with the ideas of the composer.

Mlle Trebelli's voice is very pleasing, and she sings easily and generally true. There is a suggestion of reserve strength about her vocalizing which begets confidence in her powers, and her stage presence is very prepossessing and free from mannerisms. Her bravura passages were executed clearly and smoothly, her upper register is sweet, while the lower notes, though not broad, are of even quality and apparently need but experience to develop in warmth and resonance. Her reception must have been very flattering to the young artist, the audience recalling her to the platform several times after each number.

Brahm's fourth symphony, abounding in peculiar and inharmonious modulations, was generally well played. The difficult parts allotted the strings were clearly and smoothly performed throughout the four movements. The melody given to the violas, bassoons and violins in the last part of the second movement was beautifully expressed, and the joyous character of the allegro giocoso was well sustained. The cross-relations between naturals and sharps, which are chaos to the ear, were effectively set forth.

Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen" is simply and generally brilliant, with marked gypsy characteristics in its treatment. The prominence given the wind instruments in the composition is notable, and the body did commendable work, especially in the foot passages in themes of the gypsy nature.

The program for this week will be as follows: Huldigungs march, Wagner; waltz, "Mephisto," Liszt; overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

[114]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, was, Prelude to "Œdipus," op 35, J. K. Paine; aria, "Non mi dir," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, E-minor, op 98, Brahms; Aria, "Il est bon il est doux" Massenet; Overture, "King Stephan," Beethoven; Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist. The audience was large and very enthusiastic. Mr. Paine's noble and classic prelude that so fitly and so sympathetically ushers in the tragedy for which it was written, was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is a splendid composition in every way, dignified and poetic in sentiment and of peculiar beauty in its harmonic and orchestral treatment. It was applauded with great fervor, and the audience did not cease until the composer, who was present, rose and bowed his acknowledgments. The Brahms symphony was read with fine brilliancy by Mr. Paur; in truth, the interpretation was unlike any that the work has ever had here, and made it clearer and more interesting to us than it ever seemed before. It was beautifully played throughout, the effect of Mr. Paur's careful discipline being notably evident in the strings, which he has brought up to their best efficiency in the past, and to which he has imparted a greater fire and sweep than they have ever had. The performance was sturdily applauded, and Mr. Paur was recalled several times. In fact, the audience through the whole concert was lavish in its applause for the conductor. Mlle. Trebelli was cordially received and made a very favorable impression. She has a full and sympathetic soprano voice of fine quality and extensive range, and she sings with skill and knowledge, showing careful and admirable training in all she does. The Mozart air was sung broadly, with artistic phrasing and perfect tunefulness, and with a method and a style in which it would be difficult to find a fault. In the Massenet air, she was even more successful, and her reading of it was particularly notable for its propriety of dramatic expression. Mlle. Trebelli sings without effort, and is a solid, serviceable vocalist generally, judged by her performances of last night. She was recalled twice after each effort. The programme for the next and last concert of the season, is Huldigungs March, Wagner; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

Still Kicking.

Some of the New York music critics continue to object to Mr. Paur. One of these writers inveighed at great length against him in last Sunday's Times, and took occasion to comment forcibly, but civilly, on what has appeared in the GAZETTE on the subject The trend of his argument, however, is chiefly a defence of Mr. Nikisch. He concedes frankly that the orchestra deteriorated under Mr. Nikisch, but seems to think that this was atoned for by the "conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important things." As far as our experience in Boston may be taken as evidence of Mr. Nikisch's "more important things," they were principally confined to the imparting of an operatic color to everything he conducted. The Times writer, in dwelling on the orchestra under Mr. Gericke, says: "The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here, are gone," whereas, if there was anything that the orchestra's playing under Mr. Gericke lacked, it was "snap and incisiveness." There were wonderful precision, finish and clearness, following a discipline that never relaxed; but, despite its technical beauty, the performances were pedagogic in effect. Of "snap" there was nothing. Mr. Nikisch had "snap," and subjugated all the proprieties to it. With all due respect to those New York critics who are so excited over Mr. Paur, we feel that it is not possible that they can know as much about him and his skill as a conductor, as is known by the music critics of Boston; firstly, because the latter have had the experience of twenty-two concerts directed by him, while the New Yorkers have only heard him at some half-dozen, more or less; aed, secondly, because the Boston critics are fully as well, if not better, equipped to pass judgment on such matters as are the men of New York. We have had six months of Mr. Paur, and in that time he has restored the orchestra to the efficiency it lost under the showy and unconscientious control of Mr. Nikisch, who was more concerned for himself than for the music he attempted to interpret. Not only this, but under Mr. Paur the orchestra plays with greater warmth, brilliancy, incisiveness and fluency than have ever before attended its performances. The concensus of critical opinion here supports these facts. That criticism which can accept the sickly sentimental readings of Mr. Nikisch in preference to the manly readings of Mr. Paur, speaks its own worthlessness. The Times writer seems to think that the GAZETTE has objected to unfavorable discussion of Mr. Paur by the New York critics. If so, he is in error. What the GAZETTE objects to is the injustice with which Mr. Paur has been treated in New York, and to the apparent determination that exists there to "down him" at any cost. The sincerity and the value of New York musical criticism are not set at a very high rate in Boston, for various unpleasant reasons on which it would be painful to dwell. When it combines in a concerted attack on an artist, and treats him with insulting arrogance, after he has met with favor in a community that is quite as musical as is New York, and quite as capable of judging music and its performances, the inevitable conclusion here is, that there is considerable axe-grinding under way for somebody. Discuss Mr. Paur, by all means, but at least have the discretion to refrain from setting up such twaddling conducting as that of Mr. Nikisch as a standard by which to judge him.

Some of the statements in the Times are remarkable. For instance, it says: "The fact is, that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind." But that is just what he has shown. He has musical temperament, and has communicated its warmth to the men of the orchestra,, for, as we have said, they have not, under any previous conductor, played with so much warmth. The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, last week, bore ample evidence to that fact, and, in the whole existence of the orchestra, it has never done warmer or more perfect work. When the Times says that the orchestra "plays smoothly, correctly, glibly, if you will, but with deadly dulness," it shows that the writer is not filled with the spirit of fairness. Nor is it any potent argument against the capacity of Boston to judge of a conductor's efficiency, by referring flippantly to her "provincial limits." By and by the New York critics will recover from the malady of Nikischtritis under which they are at present suffering, and then they will be clearer in judgment, even if they should not be fairer in spirit.

The Times has, at least, conducted its argument with dignity. Not so the Musical Courier, which returned, last week, to the attack on Mr. Paur, with all the bitterness and the offensive personalities that have characterized its treatment of Mr. Paur from the outset. Not only this, but it adheres to the misrepresentations in which it has steadily indulged. However, it is something in the nature of a compliment to be abused by the Courier, and its power to do injury is immeasurably, almost ludicrously out of proportion to its gleeful eagerness to work it. Without any hesitation, it announces that "Mr. Higginson has grown very tired of his new man." And yet we doubt if Mr. Higginson has taken the Courier into his confidence. The Courier is probably indebted for its information to some one or more of the disgruntled violinists who have busied themselves in inveighing against Mr. Paur in return for the discipline to which he has subjected them. It repeats its offensive fiat: "Mr. Paur must go," evidently firm in the faith that New York, as represented by the Courier, is all powerful in Boston. We are told, "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go!" New York is less influential here than is imagined by the Courier, for according to that veracious and highly respectable periodical, New York did want Arthur Nikisch,—and yet Arthur Nikisch's services were willingly dispensed with, and musical Boston has not given as much as one sigh for his departure. We are afraid that the Musical Courier is not yet in a position to cause Mr. Paur's dismissal. The wonder of it all is that New York should be so agitated over Mr. Paur. That city has Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Seidl, and is likely to have Mr. Theodore Thomas. It would seem that, in its wealth of conductors of its own, it had enough to attend to without troubling itself so greatly about Boston's conductor. Perhaps New York does not trouble itself, after all, and that all this pother by a few music critics, is of a limited, personal nature, rather than an expression of general opinion. It is not long since these writers decided that Walter Damrosch "must go;" and yet that gentleman is still at the fore. They have entered upon a combined opposition to Theodore Thomas, and yet the indications are that they will fail to write him down. Something must be wrong. Can it be that these writers are not so very influential, after all?

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mlle. Trebelli.

The Bostonians in "Robin Hood"—"Tabasco" Still Popular—Tonight's Attractions—Singers for Carney Hospital—Mr. and Mrs. Paur's Recitals—The Actors' Fund Benefit—Notes.

Conductor Paur found an opportunity to again recognize the Boston musicians, whom he has dealt with so generously during the season, at last evening's Symphony concert. In affording another hearing of John Knowles Paine's prelude to the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, opus 35, Mr. Paur gratified a long desired wish of those who enjoyed a hearing of the music composed by Prof. Paine for the tragedy when it was performed at Harvard University in 1881. Like all of the music by this composer, the "Edipus" prelude commands the respect and admiration of musical students. The mastery of the best forms of orchestral writing which it shows the composer to possess can but be recognized, and the treatment of the themes commands the approval of the most critical. The prelude was splendidly played by Mr. Paur and his musicians, and its performance was greatly enjoyed, the applause following it being finally quieted by an acknowledgement from the composer, who modestly rose in his seat on the floor to do so.

The symphony of the evening was the fourth of the Brahms series, and the tendencies of this composer toward his more melodious epoch, as shown in this composition, was again fully appreciated in its performance. Mr. Paur's reading of the several movements was admirable in every way, and caused general gratification to the followers of "Beethoven's successor."

The soloist of the evening was Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, who chose the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Don Giovani" for Donna Anna, "Non mi Dir" and an aria from Messenet's "Herodiade" for her numbers. It would be very pleasant to commend the singing of Mme. Trebelli and to return the compliments paid to American singers in their concert appearances in London. This, unfortunately, cannot be done with truth or justice to the rising singers of the day. Mme Trebelli has a very pleasant, musical voice, which she uses with good taste and with correct method. Her singing is, however, amateurish, her tones uncertain, and she shows in her vocal work a lack of finish which is especially noticeable in such selections as she chose for her appearance last evening. She found her audience kindly disposed toward her, however, and met with a pleasant reception and approving applause.

The programme was ended with Beethoven's brilliant overture to "King Stephen," which was capitally played and left the audience in a very happy frame of mind.

The season's series of concerts ends next Saturday evening with a programme which includes "The Huldigung's March," "The Mephisto" waltz, Schubert's overture to "Genoveva" and the sixth of the Beethoven symphonies.

The Representative Dramatic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Other Local Amusement Notes and Gossip.

The last but one of this season's Symphony concerts last night served to present one of John K. Paine's compositions, the prelude to his music written for the "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles. It is naturally of a stern and tragic order, written in a free style. It was given hearty applause, and Mr. Paine, who was in the body of the house, was obliged to rise and bow his thanks.

The soloist was Mlle. Antoinnette Trebelli, who has but recently arrived in this country. She has a simple, unaffected style, and sang a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" in magnificent fashion. It served to well display her excellent technique, and she showed herself to be possessed of considerable reserve power. She is more at home among the upper notes, which she produced with a bird-like sweetness and which won for her well-merited recognition. For her second appearance during the evening she rendered an arit from Massenet's "Herodiade," and, if possible, she even excelled her previous effort. At its conclusion she was recalled four times.

The symphony was Brahms's No. 4 in E minor, and was given such an interpretation under Mr. Paur's intelligent guidance as it never before had. The precision was excellent throughout. The final number was Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." For the final concert next Saturday there is no soloist. The composers drawn upon include Beethoven, Schumann, Liszt and Wagner.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1894.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

Prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles.....J. K. Paine
Recitative and aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Aria from "Herodiade," "Il est bon, il est doux".....Massenet
Overture to "König Stephan".....Beethoven

The catholicity of the management of Music Hall is admirable, never to be too much praised. Thursday night Mr. "Joe" Walcott knocked out Mr. "Tom Tracy," the champion welterweight, so that he was "done" and could not be persuaded to stand on his feet. Last night Mr. Paur had a lively set-to with Johannes Brahms, the heavyweight of Vienna. Betting on the result was pretty even, although slight odds were offered on Brahms by some who recognized him as a dead game sport and a glutton for punishment. The audience decided in favor of Mr. Paur, and there was great cheering. A few thought, however, that Mr. Paur had the worst of it.

Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the singer. She has an agreeable voice, which has been admirably trained. Her technic in cantabile or bravura responded fully last evening to the demands made upon it. She sings with delightful ease; there are no facial contortions; there is no apparent and distressing jugulation. The modesty and the grace of the singer enlarged the pleasure given by her song.

It was also a pleasure to hear the noble overture of Professor Paine. The spirit of Grecian tragedy is in this free, fluent and passionate music. The passion is never forced; there is no merely boisterous lament; and in the stormiest passages there is form and there is beauty.

* * *

The program of next Saturday's Symphony concert, the last of the season, will be as follows: Wagner, "Huldigung's March;" Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz; Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's Sixth symphony.

THE WOOLF IS AGAIN AT THE DOOR.

BENJAMIN, of the tribe of Woolf, has once more lashed himself into a fury because THE MUSICAL COURIER suggested that Mr. Paur was making a mess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore must go. Ben gets these attacks periodically. He comes in with the hard times, and is a veritable Woolf at the door. When he barks and shows his teeth, then you know that either Wagner has disturbed his feeble musical digestion or else THE MUSICAL COURIER has written something he did not like. It so happened several weeks ago that he heard the "Walküre" and also read (for the unfortunate man will persist in reading THE MUSICAL COURIER, although he hates it) that Paur was not a great conductor.

The "Walküre" soured him; THE MUSICAL COURIER infuriated him, and after playing over some of his own piano sonatinas on a harpsichord he sat him down and penned a foolish attack on Wagner and THE MUSICAL COURIER. Oh, Benny, keep thy temper! Thy wits are not so nimble as of yore. You know in your inmost consciousness (not conscience, worthy cantor) that Paur is a most mediocre conductor, and if he remains another year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra it spells its artistic "ruin." Come now, "Chatterer," acknowledge this and give over your senseless attacks of rage, because the press and public of New York will not submit to Mr. Paur being forced down their throats. We know you like Dussek better than you do Wagner, but you can't help it; it is your misfortune, not your fault. Because a pint measure wots not the capacity of a quart it is to be pitied and not blamed. Your pint of brains are not strong enough to endure Wagner's mighty music, but pray do not interfere with our enjoyment.

Take Paur. Keep Paur to yourself. Have a special hall built for him in Boston or, better still, in the suburbs, and let him play to you until the scales fall from your eyes. You are afflicted with musical ophthalmia, and so that will not be an untoward thing. But do not let your Paur come to New York. We don't want him. He bores us, and so do you.

Preach away to your little circle of readers that Wagner is a false god and THE MUSICAL COURIER is a false prophet. Nobody believes you; you don't believe it yourself. Come, now, do you? But you have one follower, for when you bark you wag your tail, and the wag is felt in the Boston "Courier." The name of the wag is Howard Malcolm Ticknor, and a sad wag he is, to be sure.

A Boston Critic Criticised.

UNDER the heading "Music" in a recent copy of the "Saturday Evening Gazette," of Boston, I find a gem of such musicianly acumen that it would do credit to the ability and good taste of—"the horse reporter" shall I say? And I cannot let it pass into oblivion without calling the attention of THE MUSICAL COURIER'S readers to some of its salient points.

The article purports to be a reply to THE MUSICAL COURIER'S recent criticism of Mr. Paur, the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which article THE MUSICAL COURIER stated that Mr. Paur had been an artistic and a business failure, a fact that it would seem idle to question.

This Boston critic, from the stronghold of his office, which he is pleased to call "a benighted spot"—I have no wish to quarrel with a term so unusually truthful—has heard no murmur regarding Mr. Paur's lack of success; neither has he even dreamed of hearing Mr. Paur's ability questioned.

If this critic wishes to laud his protégé and is able to find great merit where other and more competent critics can find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste. In his last article, however, "the Boston man" has given us one more of those vindictive attacks upon Mr. Nikisch, of about the same nature as the venomous and spiteful articles with which Mr. Nikisch was persecuted while in this country, and is not yet free from, although it is now nearly a year since he left America. Quite time enough for jealous rage to grow cool, one would think!

But, by some curious mathematical arrangement, no word of flattery for Mr. Paur is complete without a disparaging reference to Mr. Nikisch. In this latest article even Mr. Nikisch's clothing is not free from this fellow's musicianly criticism. Nikisch's cuffs and shoes claim so much of this critic's time and thought that one would fancy he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop prior to turning his mighty endowments in the direction of musical criticism—God save the mark!

That Mr. Nikisch had the temerity to direct in accordance with his own musical individuality, in preference to taking the meddling advice of "a third rate" critic, is no vital reason why the public should be forced to accept pages of vulgar personality in lieu of musical criticism. Indeed, in this fellow's work during the past year I can remember no criticism of a Symphony concert that did not contain some attack upon Mr. Nikisch; but venom and malice usually overreach themselves, and the man should remember that "sharp wits, like sharp knives, do ofttimes cut their owner's fingers!"

To quote the man's own words: "The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks" upon Mr. Nikisch, have received the most scathing criticism by the public, and I doubt whether the writer's sense of satisfaction would be quite so strong were he to hear the disgusted expressions of fair minded people against this method of work so peculiarly his own.

Perhaps the opinion of some of his readers would outweigh the doubtful success of such literary ventures, although I suppose the relief experienced by this embittered or dyspeptic apostle of mediocrity must be great, when, from the safe harbor of his "benighted spot," he can continue to attack a man far enough away to be unconscious of moles that burrow in Boston. In the article which has occasioned this letter the man has found room to criticise the English of THE MUSICAL COURIER (the other aspersions are unworthy of notice). It was, however, a bit superfluous for him to state that he does not understand the difference between "a first-rate" and a "second-rate" conductor—his articles show this so plainly that no confession is necessary. May I aid in so worthy a cause?

Mr. Nikisch is a "first-rate" conductor! If the Boston man will take the trouble to borrow a Worcester's Dictionary, he will find the word "first-rate" defined as "Preeminent, superior, best," and if he is gifted with a fair amount of intelligence, he can then realize the meaning of the word "second-rate" as applied to Mr. Paur—if not Worcester will again help him! In the mean time this man's refined use of the word "sloppy" is to be commended to all students of good English, commended both as an elegant term, and one calculated to make the person using it, hypercritical as to the diction of any literary work!

It really seems too bad that so much rancor should be thought necessary to insure Mr. Paur's success, but sad to relate, even in Boston where he has been most continuously "boomed" his has been but a "succés d'estime."

Should the man from Boston have difficulty in understanding either of these terms, I shall be glad to furnish him with a glossary, which, although it does not contain the delightful word "sloppy" contains others of equal force, that are less offensive to ears polite.

Now as a parting suggestion—since his motives are so patent to all—would it not be well for the man to leave all other musicians out of his dissertations and proclaim at once, "There is no god but Paur and Woolf is his Prophet?"

R. G. BROWN.

BOSTON, Mass., April 20, 1894.

Dates for Next Season.

SEIDL ORCHESTRA AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER is prepared at this early period to give the dates of the Seidl Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for next season. The latter will take place at the new Music Hall in Baltimore; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Academy of Music, Philadelphia, and Music Hall, New York, and the dates of the Boston institution are as follows:

Monday, November 5, 1894.....Baltimore
Tuesday, November 6.....Washington
Wednesday, November 7.....Philadelphia
Thursday, November 8.....New York
Monday, December 10.....Baltimore
Tuesday, December 11.....Washington
Wednesday, December 12.....Philadelphia
Thursday, December 13.....New York
Monday, January 14, 1895.....Baltimore
Tuesday, January 15.....Washington
Wednesday, January 16.....Philadelphia
Thursday, January 17.....New Yord
Monday, February 18.....Baltimore
Tuesday, February 19.....Washington
Wednesday, February 20.....Philadelphia
Thursday, February 21.....New York
Monday, March 25.....Washington
Tuesday, March 26.....Baltimore
Wednesday, March 27.....Philadelphia
Thursday, March 28.....New York

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Other Local Amusement Notes and Gossip.

The last but one of this season's Symphony concerts last night served to present one of John K. Paine's compositions, the prelude to his music written for the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles. It is naturally of a stern and tragic order, written in a free style. It was given hearty applause, and Mr. Paine, who was in the body of the house, was obliged to rise and bow his thanks.

The soloist was Mlle. Antoinnette Trebelli, who has but recently arrived in this country. She has a simple, unaffected style, and sang a recitative and aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" in magnificent fashion. It served to well display her excellent technique, and she showed herself to be possessed of considerable reserve power. She is more at home among the upper notes, which she produced with a bird-like sweetness and which won for her well-merited recognition. For her second appearance during the evening she rendered an arit from Massenet's "Herodiade," and, if possible, she even excelled her previous effort. At its conclusion she was recalled four times.

The symphony was Brahms's No. 4 in E minor, and was given such an interpretation under Mr. Paur's intelligent guidance as it never before had. The precision was excellent throughout. The final number was Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." For the final concert next Saturday there is no soloist. The composers drawn upon include Beethoven, Schumann, Liszt and Wagner.

.....

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1894.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given last evening, was as follows:

Prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles.....J. K. Paine
Recitative and aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Aria from "Herodiade," "Il est bon, il est doux".....Massenet
Overture to "König Stephan".....Beethoven

The catholicity of the management of Music Hall is admirable, never to be too much praised. Thursday night Mr. "Joe" Walcott knocked out Mr. "Tom Tracy," the champion welterweight, so that he was "done" and could not be persuaded to stand on his feet. Last night Mr. Paur had a lively set-to with Johannes Brahms, the heavyweight of Vienna. Betting on the result was pretty even, although slight odds were offered on Brahms by some who recognized him as a dead game sport and a glutton for punishment. The audience decided in favor of Mr. Paur, and there was great cheering. A few thought, however, that Mr. Paur had the worst of it.

Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the singer. She has an agreeable voice, which has been admirably trained. Her technic in cantabile or bravura responded fully last evening to the demands made upon it. She sings with delightful ease; there are no facial contortions; there is no apparent and distressing jugulation. The modesty and the grace of the singer enlarged the pleasure given by her song.

It was also a pleasure to hear the noble overture of Professor Paine. The spirit of Grecian tragedy is in this free, fluent and passionate music. The passion is never forced; there is no merely boisterous lament; and in the stormiest passages there is form and there is beauty.

* * *

The program of next Saturday's Symphony concert, the last of the season, will be as follows: Wagner, "Huldigung's March;" Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz; Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's Sixth symphony.

THE WOOLF IS AGAIN AT THE DOOR.

BENJAMIN, of the tribe of Woolf, has once more lashed himself into a fury because THE MUSICAL COURIER suggested that Mr. Paur was making a mess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore must go. Ben gets these attacks periodically. He comes in with the hard times, and is a veritable Woolf at the door. When he barks and shows his teeth, then you know that either Wagner has disturbed his feeble musical digestion or else THE MUSICAL COURIER has written something he did not like. It so happened several weeks ago that he heard the "Walküre" and also read (for the unfortunate man will persist in reading THE MUSICAL COURIER, although he hates it) that Paur was not a great conductor.

The "Walküre" soured him; THE MUSICAL COURIER infuriated him, and after playing over some of his own piano sonatinas on a harpsichord he sat him down and penned a foolish attack on Wagner and THE MUSICAL COURIER. Oh, Benny, keep thy temper! Thy wits are not so nimble as of yore. You know in your inmost consciousness (not conscience, worthy cantor) that Paur is a most mediocre conductor, and if he remains another year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra it spells its artistic "ruin." Come now, "Chatterer," acknowledge this and give over your senseless attacks of rage, because the press and public of New York will not submit to Mr. Paur being forced down their throats. We know you like Dussek better than you do Wagner, but you can't help it; it is your misfortune, not your fault. Because a pint measure wots not the capacity of a quart it is to be pitied and not blamed. Your pint of brains are not strong enough to endure Wagner's mighty music, but pray do not interfere with our enjoyment.

Take Paur. Keep Paur to yourself. Have a special hall built for him in Boston or, better still, in the suburbs, and let him play to you until the scales fall from your eyes. You are afflicted with musical ophthalmia, and so that will not be an untoward thing. But do not let your Paur come to New York. We don't want him. He bores us, and so do you. Preach away to your little circle of readers that Wagner is a false god and THE MUSICAL COURIER is a false prophet. Nobody believes you; you don't believe it yourself. Come, now, do you? But you have one follower, for when you bark you wag your tail, and the wag is felt in the Boston "Courier." The name of the wag is Howard Malcolm Ticknor, and a sad wag he is, to be sure.

A Boston Critic Criticised.

UNDER the heading "Music" in a recent copy of the "Saturday Evening Gazette," of Boston, I find a gem of such musicianly acumen that it would do credit to the ability and good taste of—"the horse reporter" shall I say? And I cannot let it pass into oblivion without calling the attention of THE MUSICAL COURIER'S readers to some of its salient points.

The article purports to be a reply to THE MUSICAL COURIER'S recent criticism of Mr. Paur, the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which article THE MUSICAL COURIER stated that Mr. Paur had been an artistic and a business failure, a fact that it would seem idle to question.

This Boston critic, from the stronghold of his office, which he is pleased to call "a benighted spot"—I have no wish to quarrel with a term so unusually truthful—has heard no murmur regarding Mr. Paur's lack of success; neither has he even dreamed of hearing Mr. Paur's ability questioned.

If this critic wishes to laud his protégé and is able to find great merit where other and more competent critics can find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste. In his last article, however, "the Boston man" has given us one more of those vindictive attacks upon Mr. Nikisch, of about the same nature as the venomous and spiteful articles with which Mr. Nikisch was persecuted while in this country, and is not yet free from, although it is now nearly a year since he left America. Quite time enough for jealous rage to grow cool, one would think!

But, by some curious mathematical arrangement, no word of flattery for Mr. Paur is complete without a disparaging reference to Mr. Nikisch. In this latest article even Mr. Nikisch's clothing is not free from this fellow's musicianly criticism. Nikisch's cuffs and shoes claim so much of this critic's time and thought that one would fancy he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop prior to turning his mighty endowments in the direction of musical criticism—God save the mark!

That Mr. Nikisch had the temerity to direct in accordance with his own musical individuality, in preference to taking the meddling advice of "a third rate" critic, is no vital reason why the public should be forced to accept pages of vulgar personality in lieu of musical criticism. Indeed, in this fellow's work during the past year I can remember no criticism of a Symphony concert that did not contain some attack upon Mr. Nikisch; but venom and malice usually overreach themselves, and the man should remember that "sharp wits, like sharp knives, do ofttimes cut their owner's fingers!"

To quote the man's own words: "The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks" upon Mr. Nikisch, have received the most scathing criticism by the public, and I doubt whether the writer's sense of satisfaction would be quite so strong were he to hear the disgusted expressions of fair minded people against this method of work so peculiarly his own.

Perhaps the opinion of some of his readers would outweigh the doubtful success of such literary ventures, although I suppose the relief experienced by this embittered or dyspeptic apostle of mediocrity must be great, when, from the safe harbor of his "benighted spot," he can continue to attack a man far enough away to be unconscious of moles that burrow in Boston. In the article which has occasioned this letter the man has found room to criticise the English of THE MUSICAL COURIER (the other aspersions are unworthy of notice). It was, however, a bit superfluous for him to state that he does not understand the difference between "a first-rate" and a "second-rate" conductor—his articles show this so plainly that no confession is necessary. May I aid in so worthy a cause?

Mr. Nikisch is a "first-rate" conductor! If the Boston man will take the trouble to borrow a Worcester's Dictionary, he will find the word "first-rate" defined as "Preeminent, superior, best," and if he is gifted with a fair amount of intelligence, he can then realize the meaning of the word "second-rate" as applied to Mr. Paur—if not Worcester will again help him! In the mean time this man's refined use of the word "sloppy" is to be commended to all students of good English, commended both as an elegant term, and one calculated to make the person using it, hypercritical as to the diction of any literary work!

It really seems too bad that so much rancor should be thought necessary to insure Mr. Paur's success, but sad to relate, even in Boston where he has been most continuously "boomed" his has been but a "succés d'estime."

Should the man from Boston have difficulty in understanding either of these terms, I shall be glad to furnish him with a glossary, which, although it does not contain the delightful word "sloppy" contains others of equal force, that are less offensive to ears polite.

Now as a parting suggestion—since his motives are so patent to all—would it not be well for the man to leave all other musicians out of his dissertations and proclaim at once, "There is no god but Paur and Woolf is his Prophet?"

R. G. BROWN.

BOSTON, Mass., April 20, 1894.

Dates for Next Season.

SEIDL ORCHESTRA AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER is prepared at this early period to give the dates of the Seidl Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for next season. The latter will take place at the new Music Hall in Baltimore; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Academy of Music, Philadelphia, and Music Hall, New York, and the dates of the Boston institution are as follows:

Monday, November 5, 1894.....Baltimore
Tuesday, November 6.....Washington
Wednesday, November 7.....Philadelphia
Thursday, November 8.....New York
Monday, December 10.....Baltimore
Tuesday, December 11.....Washington
Wednesday, December 12.....Philadelphia
Thursday, December 13.....New York
Monday, January 14, 1895.....Baltimore
Tuesday, January 15.....Washington
Wednesday, January 16.....Philadelphia
Thursday, January 17.....New Yord
Monday, February 18.....Baltimore
Tuesday, February 19.....Washington
Wednesday, February 20.....Philadelphia
Thursday, February 21.....New York
Monday, March 25.....Washington
Tuesday, March 26.....Baltimore
Wednesday, March 27.....Philadelphia
Thursday, March 28.....New York

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.

PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO. AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.

MONDAY, APRIL 23, 1894.

A Fine Treat Provided at the Twenty-third Symphony.

PRELUDE TO OEDIPUS

Prof. Paine's Immortal Music Grandly Rendered.

Mr. Paur's Work Received with the Most Intense Enthusiasm.

The programme of the 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Prelude to "Oedipus,".....J. K. Paine
Recitative and Aria, "Crudele? Ah No Mio bene!" from Don Juan.....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Aria from "Herodiade," Il est bon, il est doux, Massenet
Overture, "King Stephen,".....Beethoven
Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist.

It was gratifying to hear something played from the works of the greatest American composer, and to hear it played in so masterly a manner.

Never before has the nobility, the tragic power, the poetic sentiment and the lofty inspiration of Prof. Paine's immortal "Prelude" been brought forth with such startling vividness and overpowering effect as through the comprehensive grasp of Conductor Paur's reading and the wonderfully accurate delineation of his conception in its perfect rendering on this occasion.

It takes a musician of that broad and capacious mind, that depth of feeling and that artistic discernment possessed by Conductor Paur to encompass the magnitude of such a composition, to realize its classic purity, and through a just appreciation thereby to display its eminent characteristics.

Never before in the history of this superb orchestra has it surpassed, if equalled, the effect gained in the performance of this classic and inspired composition. Mr. Paur was recalled three or four times to respond to the enthusiastic applause of the audience, which applause did not cease until Prof. Paine, who was in the audience, arose and bowed his acknowledgment of his fellow-townsmen's approbation. This wonderful interpretation upon the part of Conductor Paur causes those who have proper appreciation of Prof. Paine's eminent genius to all the more desire that others of his equally praiseworthy compositions may find a place in Conductor Paur's programmes in future, in order that their value may be better realized and their beauties enhanced through his artistic conception and masterly interpretation.

Prof. Paine's works are upon the highest plane of classic composition and stand side by side with the works of Beethoven and Schumann. With the aid of such an exposition of their worth as Conductor Paur gave us in the rendering of the "Prelude," his audiences, unacquainted with the high value of Prof. Paine's compositions, would at once recognize the preeminence of their countryman's genius and appreciate it sufficiently to honor him as one of whom, in the realms of highest musical art, any nation may well be proud.

The Brahms Symphony is a work of great science and little contrast. Its themes are worked out with that profound knowledge, that contrapuntal skill and that unflagging zeal identical with its famous composer. There is an absence of color in the instrumentation, which, with the want of contrast in movements, serves much in destroying the listeners' interest. One also becomes weary with the overpowering sound that constantly prevails, especially in the third and fourth movements. Although a marvel of clearness and excellence in the playing, under Mr. Paur's baton, on the whole, it must be considered as a rather too robust performance.

The overture of "King Stephen" is hardly worthy a place upon a programme in these days. It would be no loss to art if both it and the "Dedication of the House" overture were shelved for all time. The cause of true art would not suffer thereby.

Miss Trebelli, the vocalist, is the daughter of the former famous opera singers, the late Mme. Trebelli, the contralto, and Sig. Bettini, the latter a renowned tenor, who, in company with Bosio and Badiali, was heard in Italian opera in Boston during the fifties.

Miss Trebelli has a clear and telling voice, but its quality is made hard and inflexible by her manner of producing it. The middle tones are liable to sink backward in the mouth and become a fragment below the pitch, while nearly all the high tones are forced. Her singing too often lacks flow, and sometimes the tones are "scraped" out of her throat. The top notes are generally thin and strident, and her style is spasmodic in its effort. Neither was her articulation to be commended. All these discrepancies rendered her performance rather dry and inexpressive. Much might have been done with such a good voice, such evident musical intelligence, and natural facility of execution, had its cultivation been differently directed.

The audience was enthusiastic with its applause and Miss Trebelli was recalled several times after each piece.

Mr. Paur, conducted the accompaniments in a most skilful and discreet manner, thereby aiding the singer at every

Next Saturday the 24th and last concert of this season's series will be given, with the following programme: Wagner's Huldigungs March; Liszt's Mephisto Waltz; Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MORE OF MR. PAUR.

The New York Musical Courier has had another lapse in the sanity of its career in the recurrence of its aberration shouts from its housetop that "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go."

Our esteemed contemporary might just as well keep cool and let his hair grow, for Mr. Paur will go, that is, go on conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next four seasons, regardless of the fact that the Courier and other New York critics do not appreciate his superior ability as an orchestral conductor.

We much fear that the extravagances and vulgarities of those inferior conductors and eminent noise defenders, Seidl and Nikisch, have served in vitiating the taste of our brother scribes in Gotham until their critical judgment has had a stroke of paralysis.

Well, gentlemen, dwell together in peace and harmony until Mr. Paur comes over to you again next autumn with his superb band rid of the inferior players that Nikisch's incompetency was the means of placing within its ranks, and you will have a good opportunity to improve your taste, and your critical judgment as well, in listening to the magnificent models of orchestral playing that will be vouchsafed you under the guidance of Mr. Paur's superior ability as an orchestral conductor. You might as well throw away your taxes, gentlemen, as far as Mr. Higginson's grindstone is concerned, for it is not at all at your command in any effort upon your part to sharpen their edges in your hunt for the scalp of Conductor Paur.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 23, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Paine: Prelude to the "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, Opus 35.
Mozart: Recitative, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni."
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Opus 98.
Massenet: Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade."
Beethoven: Overture to "König Stephan," Opus 117
Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli was the singer.

It was good to hear Mr. Paine's noble and dramatic prelude once more. Many of us well remember the thrill it gave us on that eventful evening in Sanders Theatre, some years ago, and how it put us into just the right receptive mood for the great tragedy that followed. If, like all genuinely dramatic preludes, it produces its best effect in its proper frame,—for it strikes the note of preparation and warning, and is not a fully complete thing in itself,—it has yet that in it that makes one glad to hear it at a concert. The music to "Œdipus Tyrannus" marks the full development of Mr. Paine's individual style, of what may be called his second manner. There was, upon the whole, but a short transition period leading from his earlier organ works, the pianforte sonatas, and the Mass in D to this second manner of his; "St. Peter" was the transitional work; in it, as in Wagner's "Lohengrin," almost the whole process of change can be traced. And yet, although one finds his second manner already pretty firmly established in parts of this oratorio, it is not until the "Œdipus Tyrannus" that we find it fully developed. Here he has, as the Germans say, fully discovered himself. It is somewhat curious, when we consider Mr. Paine's Anglo-Saxon blood and German training, to note how nearly his modes of expression approach the French in the "Œdipus" prelude; if the thought and feeling are plainly Northern and un-Latin, the form and expression are very French indeed. The work is too much Mr. Paine's own for one to speak of any special "influences" shown in it; yet, either by chance or similarity of dramatic ideal, he has drifted into a style that recalls Massenet and other modern Frenchmen, at their best, far more vividly than it does Wagner or any modern German. One finds that quasi-declamatory, recitative-like treatment in certain passages, and again that simple, broad development of melodious cantilena, that are characteristically French. Of other, less praiseworthy, French traits—of merely glittering superficiality of expression, or of that laziness of style that masquerades as "simplicity"—one finds no trace; the work is sincerely earnest from beginning to end. It was admirably played, and the composer was given an enthusiastic ovation by the delighted audience.

Brahms's great E-minor symphony was grandly played. In point of tempo the first and second movements seemed to us perfect; the third movement was, perhaps, taken just a shade too fast for entire clearness, and we should have liked the 3-2 time of the final Passacaglia to have gone a little more slowly—the variations in 3-2 time were, on the other hand, quite slow enough. It is to be noted, as regards this Finale, that Mr. Paur is the first to have made the flutes, first oboe, and first trombone play with sufficient vigor in the first eight measures to throw the theme into audible relief. Brahms's scoring in these eight measures, as in the first two measures of the first movement of his F-major symphony, is peculiar, one might almost say reckless, and seems calculated to veil the theme, rather than to give it prominence. We have never yet heard that all-important "F, A-flat, F" at the beginning of the F major symphony brought out with recognizable clearness; and last Saturday evening was the first time we have heard the theme of this Passacaglia in the E-minor symphony made distinctly audible. This is one of the very many passages in Brahms's orchestral works that require no little careful "doctoring" at rehearsal, if they are to sound clear at performance.

Beethoven's overture to Kotzebue's "König Stephan" is, with the possible exception of that to "Die Ruinen von Athen," his lightest overture; it is, in fact, a regular "theatre overture" in the fullest sense of the term. But it is bright, sparkling, and has all his characteristic energy and ebullience. There is little depth to it, and it often verges dangerously on the trivial; but one may say of it, on the whole, that here Beethoven "s'encanaillait — mais très-noblement!" It was brilliantly played.

Miss Antoinette Trebelli has a brilliant, rather light soprano voice, in the use of which she shows considerable skill. In the final Allegretto of Donna Anna's great aria she did those much-debated coloratura-passages very cleverly indeed, and came nearer to bringing the whole to an effective close than most singers we have heard. She still lacks, however, something of the depth and maturity of feeling and power of dramatic expression that would fit her to do full justice to this aria. She sang the Massenet air excellently well; we should have said, a little coldly, had it not been for the evident ecstasies into which she threw the audience, and "cold" singing seldom has this result. She was rapturously and repeatedly recalled.

The next, and last, programme is: Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch; Liszt, "Mephisto-Waltz:" Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," opus 81; Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral"), opus 68.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1894.

A LOVE FEAST.

Symphony Players Are Not Angry With Mr. Paur.

Messrs. Kneisel and Adamowski Deny New York Stories.

Cause of Rumors Said to Be an Attempt to Make Trouble.

Startling and sensational have been the reports circulated in New York in relation to our own Symphony Orchestra. War is said to exist between Conductor Paur and his principal players.

So interesting and spicy have been these New York reports that certain Boston papers copied them. They took care, however, to credit the clippings.

The stories, upon investigation by the Journal, prove to be merely very clever fictions. Their cleverness lies in the marvelous inventive powers of the authors, whoever they may be.

The latest story relates to those two brilliant violinists—Franz Kneisel and Timothee Adamowski. They are said, in this story, to be the authors of the rumors derogatory to Mr. Paur that have been flying around New York and Boston. The causes of the trouble are said to have been "call-downs" received from the leader.

The particular story in relation to Mr. Kneisel is that he came in late one day and that Mr. Paur fined him "for being systematically late." Hence, says the fiction writer, Mr. Kneisel's enmity! Enmity, by the way, that does not exist, except in the fertile brain of the aforesaid writer.

But, in order that the brilliant and popular violinist might have a chance to accept Priscilla's request and "speak for himself," a Journal man last evening went to Jamaica Plain.

Mr. Kneisel Was Never Fined.

Mr. Kneisel was found at his pretty new home at No. 47 Atherton Street. He was about to start for Cambridge, where his quartette was to appear at a subscription concert.

Mr. Kneisel was shown the clipping in relation to the alleged episode in which he is said to have figured.

"There is not a word of truth in it," said he, hotly. "It is false—it is not so. You ask me if I have been late?" The Journal's representative nodded. "You can say that I have been late but once this winter. That was only 10 minutes, owing to the street cars. I came in, and Mr. Paur smiled at me as I took my place in the orchestra. Explanations were not necessary, as he understood I would have come if I could, and it was only 10 minutes. I told him later and he understood. He has never fined me."

"Is there good feeling in the orchestra?" asked the Journal reporter.

"Yes. Every man does his duty and plays his best. There is no careless playing. It is just as it always has been. The men work hard and do their best." Mr. Kneisel spoke with much earnestness.

"Do you consider Mr. Paur to be a good conductor?"

In no uncertain tones and with a marked note of sincerity in his voice Mr. Kneisel answered "Yes."

Mr. Adamowski Much Amused.

The members of the Tavern Club were at dinner when the Journal reporter called there last night in search of Mr. "Tim" Adamowski. The clipping, already alluded to, had also said that Mr. Paur had told the charming "Tim" to "sit up and play like a man," which, probably on account of its wrong use of English, is said to have stirred up the versatile violinist to such an extent that he descended to backbiting tactics, which is not his way usually.

Mr. Adamowski came running down stairs as soon as he heard of the Journal man's arrival, and came into the reception room with a warm smile of welcome. He glanced at the clipping and, when he saw its source, laughed and said: "Oh, I pay no attention to that," with amused contempt.

"Then, Mr. Paur never made that remark to you?"

"Never," said the smiling musician, waving his well-cut blonde hair with a vehement shake of the head.

"There is good feeling existing between Mr. Paur and the orchestra?"

Again an amused laugh, and: "Perfectly. When Mr. Paur gave his concerto to-day the orchestra stopped to applaud him and Mrs. Paur."

"It seems absurd to ask, but have you ever circulated reports derogatory to Mr. Paur's skill as a conductor?"

"Never," said Mr. Adamowski, with a frank smile and a quick gesture that was even more expressive of sincere dissent than his words. Then he bid the reporter a cordial adieu, and slipped up stairs again.

An Attempt to Make Trouble.

From further investigations it appears that both men have repeatedly seized upon opportunities to speak well of the conductor. Mr. Kneisel has been particularly kind in this respect, having helped Mr. Paur in a manner that is only now made public, by defending him when he first came here.

The story of the fining of Mr. Kneisel probably springs from the fact that one of the minor players, not one of "the" quartette, was recently fined 50 cents for coming in half an hour late. But it was not Mr. Kneisel. This man had been late before, however.

Someone knowing of this turned it about and applied it to Mr. Kneisel.

Well, the friends of the orchestra say that the whole thing is an attempt to make trouble in the orchestra. Two reasons are assigned for this endeavor—New York jealousy of Boston's pet organization, or else a desire to get Theodore Thomas at the head of the orchestra.

But, judging by the love feast that now seems to be characteristic of the Symphony rehearsals and performances, these "nefarious" attempts are destined to be without fruit.

---

[116]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw last evening the close of the first year of his engagement. It may not therefore be impertinent to consider the man and his work.

***

When Mr. Paur first made his appearance on the stage some were disappointed. They complained of the rigidity of the beat, of a certain awkwardness of bearing, of an aggressive expression of performance of duty. They missed the manicured hands, the interesting pallor, the Delsartian movements of Mr. Nikisch, forgetting that when Mr. Nikisch first stood in public on the conductor's stand he revealed in the sight of the people that species of leg clothing known vulgarly as "accordion pants."

But they that were disposed to find fault on account of the reasons above stated were soon conquered by the intelligence and the honesty of Mr. Paur. They found that he was modest and that he thought more of music than of personal exhibition. They found in a month or two that as far as mechanism was concerned the performances were smoother than during the last two years of Mr. Nikisch's rule. And little by little they began to enjoy thoroughly a symphony or an overture without any thought of the interpreter who stood between them and the composer. And this is, perhaps, the highest praise than can be awarded a conductor.

***

The conductor is a necessary evil. It is not necessary to agree with Mr. Rowbotham and speak disparagingly of arrhythmic music because it necessitates a separate and distinct leader, whereas in an earlier and more primitive form the first violin or the head singer could serve all required purposes.

"The conductor is a necessary evil," says Ferdinand Hiller. "The more completely his individuality disappears from the sight of the audience the better it is. There is nothing worse than a conductor who usurps the place of the virtuoso and seeks to direct the attention of the public to his own personality, to his own performance. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' The conductor should hide behind the performance of his orchestra, and find his chief reward in its excellence. Nor should he ever forget, nor should he ever wish it to be forgotten, that he himself serves a superior officer, the composer, even when it happens by chance that he himself is really the superior man."

In a word there are to-day two well defined types of conductors: The first is the virtuoso-conductor (I use virtuoso in its modern and wrenched meaning): the second is the conductor like Mr. Gericke or Mr. Paur.

Mr. Nikisch is an excellent specimen of the virtuoso conductor. Such a conductor has supreme and sublime moments, especially in the performance of romantic works that appeal strongly to a romantic nature. Thus in conducting such a composition as Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Mr. Nikisch is not likely to be surpassed. In such a man temperament is so developed that it masters frequently the judgment, and when the work played is not largely temperamental, the conductor is bound to inject into it an element that is really foreign to it and of serious injury. The serene beauty of the ancients then becomes feverish and modern unrest. The cool and clear melody becomes a tortured strain. There are innumerable crescendos that lead to no legitimate climax. The orchestra, constantly on the rack, begins to lose the consciousness of reserve force that should be felt by an audience during the performance of a great work. Furthermore, the leading of such a conductor is apt to be fitful, moody, irregular, uneven. If there are moments of exaltation, moments of depression follow, and with them comes carelessness that is not far removed from slovenliness.

It is not to be denied that such a conductor as Mr. Nikisch is an interesting figure to many. His individuality is dramatic; he excites admiration and opposition; he is the subject of animated and often ignorant conversation. Some go to the concerts to see what he will do. The talk is about the conductor and not about the work performed under him. And does all this make for musical righteousness?

For my own part I prefer such a conductor as Mr. Paur, although I recognize fully the brilliant qualities of the other type.

It is true that Mr. Paur is not an "exciting" conductor, but is excitement the chief end of music?

I like and respect Mr. Paur for these reasons: First of all he is an excellent musician, and it is not necessary to discuss this question at length, for the fact is admitted by those who, here or in other towns, are, for some reason or other, hostile to him. He preserves rigid discipline in the orchestra, but this discipline is that of the intelligent leader, not of the priggish martinet; and this fact is not assumed, it is proved by the performance of the orchestra at the concerts. At the beginning of the season I was inclined to doubt his sense of color; I no longer have this doubt; Mr. Paur does not splash his canvas, and he prefers a brush to a palette knife, but he is a colorist of fine taste and more than ordinary skill. His attention to detail at the first was perhaps too fussy, but it must be remembered that matters of detail had been neglected sadly for two years before his coming, and the late remarkable performances under his direction of the "Heroic" Symphony of Beethoven and the fourth Symphony of Brahms show conclusively that in the present condition of the orchestra he conducts with mastering breadth of conception, nor is the detail slighted thereby. Furthermore, I like and respect this man because he seems to be eminently honest in his treatment of composer, orchestra and audience. He is free from affectation. No one would dream of calling him a poseur.

***

Because Mr. Paur is honest and unaffected he is dubbed by some that regard a symphony concert as a social function a bourgeois. The word bourgeois in English meant originally "a French citizen or freeman of a city or burgh, as distinguished from a peasant on the one hand and a gentleman on the other, now often taken as the type of the mercantile or shopkeeping middle class of any country." As used by these objectors to Mr. Paur, the word has undoubtedly the French tropical and [illegible] meaning, "vulgar," which follows [illegible] "bounty."

own home to prancing about in parlors where he would feel himself chiefly an object of curiosity. The atrocious crime of working in his garden or keeping hens might as well be brought against him.

And, after all, what has a respectable private life to do with the question of the proper performance of a symphony? Would that Jules Janin were alive and in Boston that he might ridicule the affair! Do you remember his remarks toward the close of his life of Deburau?

"Some men who wish to know everything, sensitive women who cannot endure any uncertainty concerning those whom they like, would perhaps be pleased to learn about the private life of the citizen Deburau—whether he has funds, a wife, and whether his wife has presented him with many little ones?

"Deburau has paid his taxes since the Revolution of July, and this is why he loves the date that has raised him to such a degree of importance. He has respectable furniture: Six chairs, a bureau, a bed, two cradles, a combination of bureau and writing desk, in which he keeps his shirt collars, cravats and gloves, when he puts them in it.

"His wife is pretty, bright-eyed, with a complexion full of color and tawny; and she has four children, whose sex it is difficult at present to determine, but they are jolly, nimble, clever, and they play together like kittens. Deburau is not yet a member of the National Guard.

"Outside of his artistic talent he has several social accomplishments. He can swim on his back, he can take to pieces a lock, he can play the flute, he can fence, he can write his name and he can hang a picture on the wall."

***

Mr. Paur is not a man to satisfy easily the naturally capricious. And it must be confessed that the popular taste in music and in performers is capricious.

As it was in the time of the Jesuit Father Louis Bertrand Castel, so it is to-day: "The pleasure derived from a popular concert is only real for a certain number of connoisseurs and zealous amateurs. Many in the audience are bored, and they go, as to a theatre, from force of habit, because it is the fashion, or from a desire to be anywhere except at home. The rapture of the majority is a moderate pleasure, which often comes from the sight of the crowd, or circumstances that are foreign to the music. One is tired of hearing always cantatas, and one wishes sontas; tired of sontas, he wishes motetts; wearied by French music, he longs for Italian compositions; bored by the violinist, he yearns for the sound of the viol."

***

Nor is Mr. Paur a man that will endure easily patronage. He thereby offends some of our most celebrated patrons and patronesses. Perhaps Mr. Paur has recognized the fact that mediocrity or utter worthlessness in music is surest of local, or, rather, parochial patronage, which patronage, somehow or other, always reminded me of lines from Thackeray's proposed inscription to be engraven under the image of George the First—Star of Brunswick:

"He hated Art and despised Literature;
But He liked train-oil in his salads,
And gave an enlightened patronage
To bad oysters."

PHILIP HALE.

The Last Symphony Concert of the Season of '93-'94—The Enthusiastic Applause Awarded Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor.

The program of the 24th Symphony concert, the last of the season of '93-'94, was as follows:

Huldigung's Marsch.....Wagner
Scene in the tavern—(Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust".....Liszt
Overture—"Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony No. 6.....Beethoven

As Mr. Paur appeared on the stage of Music Hall last evening he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause. At the end of the concert the great audience recalled him again and again. Seldom has a more flattering tribute been paid any conductor in this city.

This applause was undoubtedly an open manifestation of the appreciation in which this admirable conductor is held in Boston and a public recognition of the faithful work done by him during the past season, rather than the expression of specific delight awakened by the concert itself.

In another column of this issue of the Journal I have discussed the characteristics of Mr. Paur, the conductor. His weakness is a seeming inability to arrange an effective and well-contrasted program. The weakness is not peculiar to him; it was found in Mr. Gericke; it was found in Mr. Nikisch. So far as program-making is concerned, no one of our other Symphony conductors has equaled Mr. Henschel.

And yet the arrangement of the program of last evening shows in a curious way the musical sincerity and modesty of Mr. Paur. Remember that the concert was the last of the season. Now how many conductors would have thought of choosing as the last number the Pastoral Symphony? How many would have been content to dismiss the audience in such a simple manner? Nine out of ten would have said "Come now, we must make a splurge." They would have selected carefully some screaming, wall-shattering, sky-assailing piece, and called in the aid of all the pulsatile instruments known from the time of the Assyrians, who were a people delighting in noise.

The numbers of this program are well known, and they call now for no extended comment. The Pastoral Symphony undoubtedly gives vast pleasure to many, who are thrilled by the mimicry of birds and the trick thunder storm. But at the risk of being charged with blasphemy, may I ask humbly if the second movement is not so interminable that it is almost a musical bore of huge dimensions? And is the Symphony, as a whole, even when it is "illustrated" with real wheelbarrows and simpering ballet girls, as happened once in New York years ago, to be compared for a moment with any of the others of Beethoven, beginning with the third?

Mr. Paur has earned honestly his vacation. May he enjoy it as thoroughly as he accomplishes his musical duties.

The program book states that the opening concert of the 14th season will be given Oct. 13, and that Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 29.

And Still Recalcitrant!

The Musical Courier, in response to the comments we have made in this column, regarding its solemn decision that "Mr. Paur must go!" sets forth the following finely-pointed and keenly discriminating arguments. As will be seen, the reasoning is close, pertinent and convincing as to the impropriety of Mr. Paur remaining at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in face of the Courier's dignified and deeply conscientious opposition to him. It is true, that here and there, the Courier indulges in a little mirthfulness that is scarcely to the main point in question; but an exuberance of wit, especially when it is of the refined and brilliant order, felicitously exemplified by the Courier, carries its own excuse with it. Besides, something must be conceded to the exhilaration of spirits that must have attended the reading of our flattering remarks on the reputation for fairness, incorruptibility, honorable straightforwardness, and freedom from all suspicion of blackmailing that is enjoyed by the Courier, which, unfortunately, is quite unaccustomed to receive compliments of this nature, owing to the perverse hardheartedness of a censorious and misjudging world. We will, however, let the Courier speak for itself:

Benjamin, of the tribe of Woolf, has once more lashed himself into a fury because the Musical Courier suggested that Mr. Paur was making a mess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore must go. Ben gets these attacks periodically. He comes in with the hard times, and is a veritable Woolf at the door. When he barks and shows his teeth, then you know that either Wagner has disturbed his feeble musical digestion or else the Musical Courier has written something he did not like. It so happened several week ago that he heard the "Walküre" and also read (for the unfortunate man will persist in reading the Musical Courier, although he hates it) that Mr. Paur was not a great conductor. The "Walküre" soured him; the Musical Courier infuriated him, and after playing over some of his own piano sonatinas on a harpischord, he sat him down and penned a foolish attack on Wagner and the Musical Courier. Oh, Benny, keep thy temper! Thy wits are not so nimble as of yore. You know in your inmost consciousness (not conscience, worthy cantor) that Paur is a most mediocre conductor, and if he remains another year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it spells its artistic "ruin." Come, now, "Chatterer," acknowledge this, and give over your senseless attacks of rage because the press and public of New York will not submit to Mr. Paur being forced down their throats. We know you like Dussek better than you do Wagner, but you can't help it; it is your misfortune, not your fault. Because a pint measure wots not the capacity of a quart, it is to be pitied and not blamed. Your pint of brains are (sic) not strong enough to endure Wagner's mighty music, but pray do not interfere with our enjoyment. Take Paur. Keep Paur to yourself. Have a special hall built for him in Boston, or, better still, in the suburbs, and let him play to you until the scales fall from your eyes. You are afflicted with musical opthalmia, and so that will not be an untoward thing. But do not let your Paur come to New York. We don't want him. He bores us, and so do you. Preach away to your little circle of readers that Wagner is a false god and the Musical Courier is a false prophet. Nobody believes you; you don't believe it yourself. Come now, do you? But you have one follower, for when you bark you wag your tail, and the wag is felt in the Boston Courier. The name of the wag is Howard Malcolm Ticknor, and a sad wag he is, to be sure.

After this exhaustive and conclusive setting forth of Mr. Paur's incompetency, it is not easy to see on what reasonable grounds any man can longer defend our Symphony Orchestra conductor from the attacks that have been made on him in New York. There is, in the same issue that contains this exemplary specimen of refined taste, polished rhetoric and masterly logic, a communication, signed R. G. Brown, and purporting to have been written in Boston, that is scarcely less eloquent in point of sentiment, and scarcely less brilliant in point of reasoning. We have a very strong suspicion that it was concocted in New York, and not one hundred miles from the office of the Courier. We have never heard of R. G. Brown, and have carefully searched the Boston Directory and the Blue Book for the name; but only find it twice;—once in connection with steam-heating apparatus, and once in connection with a restaurant. The Brown of the Courier might be either, for his pipes seem to be over-heated and his stomach to be dyspeptic. However, be this as it may, the music critic of the GAZETTE is likened by him to "the horse reporter,"—whatever that may mean; is called "the Boston man,"—which would scarcely have been written by a resident of this city writing from this city; is called "this fellow"; "a third-rate critic"; "the man"; "the apostle of mediocrity"; "the man from Boston,"—which also would scarcely have been written from Boston by a Bostonian of a Bostonian. Unfortunately, the Brown who has written to the Courier is somewhat muddled. Because one of the GAZETTE articles made passing reference to Mr. Nikisch's cuffs and Mr. Nikisch's boots in response to the Courier's reference to the fact that Mr. Paur did not fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, Brown says: "One would fancy that he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop." It is not easy to see the connection between boots and haberdashery. Then, we are charged with saying that we do not "understand the difference between a 'first-rate' and a 'second-rate' conductor," which, as a matter of fact, we never did say, either in the form given or in any form that gave a colorable excuse for the misstatement. We are also accused of criticising the English of the Courier, which we never attempted to do. It is a thing, which in common with the English of Brown's letter, defies criticism. No; Brown wished to affirm that Mr. Nikisch is a first-rate conductor and that Mr. Paur is a second-rate conductor, and hence, such a trifle as truthfulness was not permitted to stand in his way. Brown, however, does not say why Mr. Nikisch is a good conductor or why Mr. Paur is a bad one. Does Brown know? Who is Brown, anyway? What does he mean when he says, "if this critic wishes to laud his protégé (protégé is good), and is able to find great merit, where other and more competent critics find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste." Can it be that Brown has not read what "more competent critics" have written in praise of Mr. Paur? Brown seems to have a sensitive sympathy with what he calls "ears polite." It would be well in him to look to his own ears, and to refrain from wagging them in public to an extent that attracts attention to their length.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the last concert of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: "Huldigungs March," Wagner; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven. There was a very large attendance. Mr. Paur was given a reception that was marked by exceptional warmth and enthusiasm, the applause lasting for some moments, and with a fervor that testified fully and heartily to the high esteem in which the conductor is held by the public of the Symphony concerts. Here, as at the close of the concert it would seem as if the audience wished to give unmistakable evidence of the real state of its feelings toward Mr. Paur, and to set at rest for once and all, and in the most decided manner, all rumors that had been set afloat, in this city and elsewhere, regarding the consideration in which it holds him. At the close of concert he was recalled five times, amid the most stormy plaudits, and shouts of "bravo" and the waving of handkerchiefs. Rarely before, at these concerts have we witnessed such a demonstration of friendly feeling, and of sincere admiration for the conductor. The performances throughout were of the highest order, the "Mephisto" waltz receiving one of the most brilliant and most effective interpretations that we ever heard accorded the work. The Schumann overture was nobly read and played, the climax being worked up with splendid power. The Beethoven symphony, which, by the way, has become to us the least interesting of the master's great works, was given faultlessly. In fact, both conductor and orchestra were at their best.

The season, just ended, was the thirteenth in the existence of the orchestra. In summing it up, there is little to add to the comments we have made on the conduct from week to week, in this column. Mr. Paur found the orchestra in a somewhat demoralized condition, owing to the lax discipline to which it had been subjected by his predecessor. Mr. Paur has restored it to all the efficiency it reached under Mr. Gericke, and imparted to it a more vigorous musical spirit than it had ever before manifested. It would seem, from reports, more or less in accordance with the exact facts, that have come to the general ear, that certain members of the orchestra did not take kindly to Mr. Paur, and displayed some resentment, that the favoritism which was shown them by Mr. Nikisch, was not continued by Mr. Paur, who, it appears, insisted on treating all the members of his orchestra in the same way, as it was perfectly just he should do. They were all equal in his eyes, and were all intended to strive for the same ends, and hence mere personal regard was sunk in a just consideration for the general results. It was complained by the malcontents that Mr. Paur did not rehearse his men with necessary diligence, which was somewhat amusing to all who know how restive and fretful musicians are under arduous rehearsals. However, whatever may be the truth or the falsehood of these stories anent lax rehearsing, the performances in public showed nothing of carelessness in preparation, and, after all, results, and not theories, are most to be looked to in such matters. Moreover, when it is remembered that the orchestra, or rather those of its members who seem, for some reason or other, to think themselves privileged to speak for it, found fault with Mr. Gericke and with Mr. Nikisch quite as freely as they have with Mr. Paur, it may be conceded that they are troubled with a chronic propensity to grumble at their superior officer. It does no special harm, particularly when the conductor has the will and the firmness to establish his authority, and to make it felt. This, Mr. Paur appears to have done. That he is an admirable musician, and a thoroughly able conductor, he has proved beyond all questioning. He has, however, shown no special skill in programme making, his programmes, as the rule, lacking in felicitous contrasts. Too often have we had a programme in which all the music has been similar in character, possibly with the intention of making them interesting from a historical point of view; but the want of variety in style and color has frequently made them dull, and, not seldom, tiresome. It is to be hoped that, next season, Mr. Paur may consider this subject, and bring a larger eclecticism and a more elastic judgment to bear on it. Of course, it is fully understood that German music must necessarily be the foundation of orchestral concerts, but it is not wholly unwise to pay some heed to the course of modern music in other nations, especially in full view of the important transition period at present prevailing in France and Italy. The first concert of the fourteenth season will be given October 13.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

As if to show that there was no foundation for the rumors which have been rife for the past several weeks relative to Conductor Paur's popularity, both with the Symphony patrons and those who compose the orchestra, the gentleman in question was last evening given the heartiest applause throughout the programme. It was first evident that they intended something of an ovation when he entered to take his accustomed place, and at the close of the programme his presence was redemanded five times. The fact that it was the last concert of the season served to draw out a large house, and Mr. Paur's stand was prettily trimmed.

The programme, though a short one, was very brilliant. It opened with Wagner's "March of Homage," which was given a spirited rendering. Following came the "Mephisto Waltz," by Liszt, which is a wild, fanciful bit, and which, too, was played in masterly fashion. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" did not arouse any marked amount of enthusiasm. The "Pastoral" symphony, with its delightfully pastoral suggestions, ended the programme, and its delicate shading was well brought out.

Of the composers who have been heard in this season's concerts, Beethoven leads with fourteen compositions, Moligne and Wagner eight and Brahms seven. There were eleven compositions which received their first hearings in this city.

The last of the Kneisel Quartet concerts for Cambridge took place in Brattle Hall on Tuesday evening. Mr. Max Heinrich was in fine voice. Both the soloist and Mr. Foote, the composer, were tendered an ovation, being recalled several times. Among the select audience, typically a musical one, were Professor J. K. Paine, Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Mackenzie, Miss Riddle, Professor Norton and daughters, the Misses Woodbury, Mr. Yatman, the violinist, and Mrs. Yatman, and others of social prominence.

[117]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, saw last evening the close of the first year of his engagement. It may not therefore be impertinent to consider the man and his work.

***

When Mr. Paur first made his appearance on the stage some were disappointed. They complained of the rigidity of the beat, of a certain awkwardness of bearing, of an aggressive expression of performance of duty. They missed the manicured hands, the interesting pallor, the Delsartian movements of Mr. Nikisch, forgetting that when Mr. Nikisch first stood in public on the conductor's stand he revealed in the sight of the people that species of leg clothing known vulgarly as "accordion pants."

But they that were disposed to find fault on account of the reasons above stated were soon conquered by the intelligence and the honesty of Mr. Paur. They found that he was modest and that he thought more of music than of personal exhibition. They found in a month or two that as far as mechanism was concerned the performances were smoother than during the last two years of Mr. Nikisch's rule. And little by little they began to enjoy thoroughly a symphony or an overture without any thought of the interpreter who stood between them and the composer. And this is, perhaps, the highest praise than can be awarded a conductor.

***

The conductor is a necessary evil. It is not necessary to agree with Mr. Rowbotham and speak disparagingly of arrhythmic music because it necessitates a separate and distinct leader, whereas in an earlier and more primitive form the first violin or the head singer could serve all required purposes.

"The conductor is a necessary evil," says Ferdinand Hiller. "The more completely his individuality disappears from the sight of the audience the better it is. There is nothing worse than a conductor who usurps the place of the virtuoso and seeks to direct the attention of the public to his own personality, to his own performance. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' The conductor should hide behind the performance of his orchestra, and find his chief reward in its excellence. Nor should he ever forget, nor should he ever wish it to be forgotten, that he himself serves a superior officer, the composer, even when it happens by chance that he himself is really the superior man."

In a word there are to-day two well defined types of conductors: The first is the virtuoso-conductor (I use virtuoso in its modern and wrenched meaning); the second is the conductor like Mr. Gericke or Mr. Paur.

Mr. Nikisch is an excellent specimen of the virtuoso conductor. Such a conductor has supreme and sublime moments, especially in the performance of romantic works that appeal strongly to a romantic nature. Thus in conducting such a composition as Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Mr. Nikisch is not likely to be surpassed. In such a man temperament is so developed that it masters frequently the judgment, and when the work played is not largely temperamental, the conductor is bound to inject into it an element that is really foreign to it and of serious injury. The serene beauty of the ancients then becomes feverish and modern unrest. The cool and clear melody becomes a tortured strain. There are innumerable crescendos that lead to no legitimate climax. The orchestra, constantly on the rack, begins to lose the consciousness of reserve force that should be felt by an audience during the performance of a great work. Furthermore, the leading of such a conductor is apt to be fitful, moody, irregular, uneven. If there are moments of exaltation, moments of depression follow, and with them comes carelessness that is not far removed from slovenliness.

It is not to be denied that such a conductor as Mr. Nikisch is an interesting figure to many. His individuality is dramatic; he excites admiration and opposition; he is the subject of animated and often ignorant conversation. Some go to the concerts to see what he will do. The talk is about the conductor and not about the work performed under him. And does all this make for musical righteousness?

For my own part I prefer such a conductor as Mr. Paur, although I recognize fully the brilliant qualities of the other type.

It is true that Mr. Paur is not an "exciting" conductor, but is excitement the chief end of music?

I like and respect Mr. Paur for these reasons: First of all he is an excellent musician, and it is not necessary to discuss this question at length, for the fact is admitted by those who, here or in other towns, are, for some reason or other, hostile to him. He preserves rigid discipline in the orchestra, but this discipline is that of the intelligent leader, not of the priggish martinet; and this fact is not assumed, it is proved by the performance of the orchestra at the concerts. At the beginning of the season I was inclined to doubt his sense of color; I no longer have this doubt; Mr. Paur does not splash his canvas, and he prefers a brush to a palette knife, but he is a colorist of fine taste and more than ordinary skill. His attention to detail at the first was perhaps too fussy, but it must be remembered that matters of detail had been neglected sadly for two years before his coming, and the late remarkable performances under his direction of the "Heroic" Symphony of Beethoven and the fourth Symphony of Brahms show conclusively that in the present condition of the orchestra he conducts with mastering breadth of conception, nor is the detail slighted thereby. Furthermore, I like and respect this man because he seems to be eminently honest in his treatment of composer, orchestra and audience. He is free from affectation. No one would dream of calling him a poseur.

***

Because Mr. Paur is honest and unaffected he is dubbed by some that regard a symphony concert as a social function a bourgeois. The word bourgeois in English meant originally "a French citizen or freeman of a city or burgh, as distinguished from a peasant on the one hand and a gentleman on the other, now often taken as the type of the mercantile or shopkeeping middle class of any country." As used by these objectors to Mr. Paur, the word has undoubtedly the French tropical and invidious meaning, "vulgar," which follows closely on the heels of "homely."

The charge is brought in all probability because Paur minds his own business, and own home to promenade about in parlors where he would feel himself chiefly an object of curiosity. The atrocious crime of working in his garden or keeping hens might as well be brought against him.

And, after all, what has a respectable private life to do with the question of the proper performance of a symphony? Would that Jules Janin were alive and in Boston that he might ridicule the affair! Do you remember his remarks toward the close of his life of Deburau?

"Some men who wish to know everything, sensitive women who cannot endure any uncertainty concerning those whom they like, would perhaps be pleased to learn about the private life of the citizen Deburau—whether he has funds, a wife, and whether his wife has presented him with many little ones?

"Deburau has paid his taxes since the Revolution of July, and this is why he loves the date that has raised him to such a degree of importance. He has respectable furniture: Six chairs, a bureau, a bed, two cradles, a combination of bureau and writing desk, in which he keeps his shirt collars, cravats and gloves, when he puts them in it.

"His wife is pretty, bright-eyed, with a complexion full of color and tawny; and she has four children, whose sex it is difficult at present to determine, but they are jolly, nimble, clever, and they play together like kittens. Deburau is not yet a member of the National Guard.

"Outside of his artistic talent he has several social accomplishments. He can swim on his back, he can take to pieces a lock, he can play the flute, he can fence, he can write his name and he can hang a picture on the wall."

***

Mr. Paur is not a man to satisfy easily the naturally capricious. And it must be confessed that the popular taste in music and in performers is capricious.

As it was in the time of the Jesuit Father Louis Bertrand Castel, so it is to-day: "The pleasure derived from a popular concert is only real for a certain number of connoisseurs and zealous amateurs. Many in the audience are bored, and they go, as to a theatre, from force of habit, because it is the fashion, or from a desire to be anywhere except at home. The rapture of the majority is a moderate pleasure, which often comes from the sight of the crowd, or circumstances that are foreign to the music. One is tired of hearing always cantatas, and one wishes sontas; tired of sontas, he wishes motetts; wearied by French music, he longs for Italian compositions; bored by the violinist, he yearns for the sound of the viol."

***

Nor is Mr. Paur a man that will endure easily patronage. He thereby offends some of our most celebrated patrons and patronesses. Perhaps Mr. Paur has recognized the fact that mediocrity or utter worthlessness in music is surest of local, or, rather, parochial patronage, which patronage, somehow or other, always reminded me of lines from Thackeray's proposed inscription to be engraven under the image of George the First—Star of Brunswick:

"He hated Art and despised Literature;
But He liked train-oil in his salads,
And gave an enlightened patronage
To bad oysters."

PHILIP HALE.

The Last Symphony Concert of the Season of '93-'94—The Enthusiastic Applause Awarded Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor.

The program of the 24th Symphony concert, the last of the season of '93-'94, was as follows:

Huldigung's Marsch.....Wagner
Scene in the tavern—(Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust".....Liszt
Overture—"Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony No. 6.....Beethoven

As Mr. Paur appeared on the stage of Music Hall last evening he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause. At the end of the concert the great audience recalled him again and again. Seldom has a more flattering tribute been paid any conductor in this city.

This applause was undoubtedly an open manifestation of the appreciation in which this admirable conductor is held in Boston and a public recognition of the faithful work done by him during the past season, rather than the expression of specific delight awakened by the concert itself.

In another column of this issue of the Journal I have discussed the characteristics of Mr. Paur, the conductor. His weakness is a seeming inability to arrange an effective and well-contrasted program. The weakness is not peculiar to him; it was found in Mr. Gericke; it was found in Mr. Nikisch. So far as program-making is concerned, no one of our other Symphony conductors has equaled Mr. Henschel.

And yet the arrangement of the program of last evening shows in a curious way the musical sincerity and modesty of Mr. Paur. Remember that the concert was the last of the season. Now how many conductors would have thought of choosing as the last number the Pastoral Symphony? How many would have been content to dismiss the audience in such a simple manner? Nine out of ten would have said "Come now, we must make a splurge." They would have selected carefully some screaming, wall-shattering, sky-assailing piece, and called in the aid of all the pulsatile instruments known from the time of the Assyrians, who were a people delighting in noise.

The numbers of this program are well known, and they call now for no extended comment. The Pastoral Symphony undoubtedly gives vast pleasure to many, who are thrilled by the mimicry of birds and the trick thunder storm. But at the risk of being charged with blasphemy, may I ask humbly if the second movement is not so interminable that it is almost a musical bore of huge dimensions? And is the Symphony, as a whole, even when it is "illustrated" with real wheelbarrows and simpering ballet girls, as happened once in New York years ago, to be compared for a moment with any of the others of Beethoven, beginning with the third?

Mr. Paur has earned honestly his vacation. May he enjoy it as thoroughly as he accomplishes his musical duties.

The program book states that the opening concert of the 14th season will be given Oct. 13, and that Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 29.

And Still Recalcitrant!

The Musical Courier, in response to the comments we have made in this column, regarding its solemn decision that "Mr. Paur must go!" sets forth the following finely-pointed and keenly discriminating arguments. As will be seen, the reasoning is close, pertinent and convincing as to the impropriety of Mr. Paur remaining at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in face of the Courier's dignified and deeply conscientious opposition to him. It is true, that here and there, the Courier indulges in a little mirthfulness that is scarcely to the main point in question; but an exuberance of wit, especially when it is of the refined and brilliant order, felicitously exemplified by the Courier, carries its own excuse with it. Besides, something must be conceded to the exhilaration of spirits that must have attended the reading of our flattering remarks on the reputation for fairness, incorruptibility, honorable straightforwardness, and freedom from all suspicion of blackmailing that is enjoyed by the Courier, which, unfortunately, is quite unaccustomed to receive compliments of this nature, owing to the perverse hardheartedness of a censorious and misjudging world. We will, however, let the Courier speak for itself:

Benjamin, of the tribe of Woolf, has once more lashed himself into a fury because the Musical Courier suggested that Mr. Paur was making a mess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore must go. Ben gets these attacks periodically. He comes in with the hard times, and is a veritable Woolf at the door. When he barks and shows his teeth, then you know that either Wagner has disturbed his feeble musical digestion or else the Musical Courier has written something he did not like. It so happened several week ago that he heard the "Walküre" and also read (for the unfortunate man will persist in reading the Musical Courier, although he hates it) that Mr. Paur was not a great conductor. The "Walküre" soured him; the Musical Courier infuriated him, and after playing over some of his own piano sonatinas on a harpischord, he sat him down and penned a foolish attack on Wagner and the Musical Courier. Oh, Benny, keep thy temper! Thy wits are not so nimble as of yore. You know in your inmost consciousness (not conscience, worthy cantor) that Paur is a most mediocre conductor, and if he remains another year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it spells its artistic "ruin." Come, now, "Chatterer," acknowledge this, and give over your senseless attacks of rage because the press and public of New York will not submit to Mr. Paur being forced down their throats. We know you like Dussek better than you do Wagner, but you can't help it; it is your misfortune, not your fault. Because a pint measure wots not the capacity of a quart, it is to be pitied and not blamed. Your pint of brains are (sic) not strong enough to endure Wagner's mighty music, but pray do not interfere with our enjoyment. Take Paur. Keep Paur to yourself. Have a special hall built for him in Boston, or, better still, in the suburbs, and let him play to you until the scales fall from your eyes. You are afflicted with musical opthalmia, and so that will not be an untoward thing. But do not let your Paur come to New York. We don't want him. He bores us, and so do you. Preach away to your little circle of readers that Wagner is a false god and the Musical Courier is a false prophet. Nobody believes you; you don't believe it yourself. Come now, do you? But you have one follower, for when you bark you wag your tail, and the wag is felt in the Boston Courier. The name of the wag is Howard Malcolm Ticknor, and a sad wag he is, to be sure.

After this exhaustive and conclusive setting forth of Mr, Paur's incompetency, it is not easy to see on what reasonable grounds any man can longer defend our Symphony Orchestra conductor from the attacks that have been made on him in New York. There is, in the same issue that contains this exemplary specimen of refined taste, polished rhetoric and masterly logic, a communication, signed R. G. Brown, and purporting to have been written in Boston, that is scarcely less eloquent in point of sentiment, and scarcely less brilliant in point of reasoning. We have a very strong suspicion that it was concocted in New York, and not one hundred miles from the office of the Courier. We have never heard of R. G. Brown, and have carefully searched the Boston Directory and the Blue Book for the name; but only find it twice;—once in connection with steam-heating apparatus, and once in connection with a restaurant. The Brown of the Courier might be either, for his pipes seem to be over-heated and his stomach to be dyspeptic. However, be this as it may, the music critic of the GAZETTE is likened by him to "the horse reporter,"—whatever that may mean; is called "the Boston man,"—which would scarcely have been written by a resident of this city writing from this city; is called "this fellow"; "a third-rate critic"; "the man"; "the apostle of mediocrity"; "the man from Boston,"—which also would scarcely have been written from Boston by a Bostonian of a Bostonian. Unfortunately, the Brown who has written to the Courier is somewhat muddled. Because one of the GAZETTE articles made passing reference to Mr. Nikisch's cuffs and Mr. Nikisch's boots in response to the Courier's reference to the fact that Mr. Paur did not fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, Brown says: "One would fancy that he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop." It is not easy to see the connection between boots and haberdashery. Then, we are charged with saying that we do not "understand the difference between a 'first-rate' and a 'second-rate' conductor," which, as a matter of fact, we never did say, either in the form given or in any form that gave a colorable excuse for the misstatement. We are also accused of criticising the English of the Courier, which we never attempted to do. It is a thing, which in common with the English of Brown's letter, defies criticism. No; Brown wished to affirm that Mr. Nikisch is a first-rate conductor and that Mr. Paur is a second-rate conductor, and hence, such a trifle as truthfulness was not permitted to stand in his way. Brown, however, does not say why Mr. Nikisch is a good conductor or why Mr. Paur is a bad one. Does Brown know? Who is Brown, anyway? What does he mean when he says, "if this critic wishes to laud his protégé (protégé is good), and is able to find great merit, where other and more competent critics find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste." Can it be that Brown has not read what "more competent critics" have written in praise of Mr. Paur? Brown seems to have a sensitive sympathy with what he calls "ears polite." It would be well in him to look to his own ears, and to refrain from wagging them in public to an extent that attracts attention to their length.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the last concert of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: "Huldigungs March," Wagner; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven. There was a very large attendance. Mr. Paur was given a reception that was marked by exceptional warmth and enthusiasm, the applause lasting for some moments, and with a fervor that testified fully and heartily to the high esteem in which the conductor is held by the public of the Symphony concerts. Here, as at the close of the concert it would seem as if the audience wished to give unmistakable evidence of the real state of its feelings toward Mr. Paur, and to set at rest for once and all, and in the most decided manner, all rumors that had been set afloat, in this city and elsewhere, regarding the consideration in which it holds him. At the close of concert he was recalled five times, amid the most stormy plaudits, and shouts of "bravo" and the waving of handkerchiefs. Rarely before, at these concerts have we witnessed such a demonstration of friendly feeling, and of sincere admiration for the conductor. The performances throughout were of the highest order, the "Mephisto" waltz receiving one of the most brilliant and most effective interpretations that we ever heard accorded the work. The Schumann overture was nobly read and played, the climax being worked up with splendid power. The Beethoven symphony, which, by the way, has become to us the least interesting of the master's great works, was given faultlessly. In fact, both conductor and orchestra were at their best.

The season, just ended, was the thirteenth in the existence of the orchestra. In summing it up, there is little to add to the comments we have made on the concer from week to week, in this column. Mr. Paur found the orchestra in a somewhat demoralized condition, owing to the lax discipline to which it had been subjected by his predecessor. Mr. Paur has restored it to all the efficiency it reached under Mr. Gericke, and imparted to it a more vigorous musical spirit than it had ever before manifested. It would seem, from reports, more or less in accordance with the exact facts, that have come to the general ear, that certain members of the orchestra did not take kindly to Mr. Paur, and displayed some resentment, that the favoritism which was shown them by Mr. Nikisch, was not continued by Mr. Paur, who, it appears, insisted on treating all the members of his orchestra in the same way, as it was perfectly just he should do. They were all equal in his eyes, and were all intended to strive for the same ends, and hence mere personal regard was sunk in a just consideration for the general results. It was complained by the malcontents that Mr. Paur did not rehearse his men with necessary diligence, which was somewhat amusing to all who know how restive and fretful musicians are under arduous rehearsals. However, whatever may be the truth or the falsehood of these stories anent lax rehearsing, the performances in public showed nothing of carelessness in preparation, and, after all, results, and not theories, are most to be looked to in such matters. Moreover, when it is remembered that the orchestra, or rather those of its members who seem, for some reason or other, to think themselves privileged to speak for it, found fault with Mr. Gericke and with Mr. Nikisch quite as freely as they have with Mr. Paur, it may be conceded that they are troubled with a chronic propensity to grumble at their superior officer. It does no special harm, particularly when the conductor has the will and the firmness to establish his authority, and to make it felt. This, Mr. Paur appears to have done. That he is an admirable musician, and a thoroughly able conductor, he has proved beyond all questioning. He has, however, shown no special skill in programme making, his programmes, as the rule, lacking in felicitous contrasts. Too often have we had a programme in which all the music has been similar in character, possibly with the intention of making them interesting from a historical point of view; but the want of variety in style and color has frequently made them dull, and, not seldom, tiresome. It is to be hoped that, next season, Mr. Paur may consider this subject, and bring a larger eclecticism and a more elastic judgment to bear on it. Of course, it is fully understood that German music must necessarily be the foundation of orchestral concerts, but it is not wholly unwise to pay some heed to the course of modern music in other nations, especially in full view of the important transition period at present prevailing in France and Italy. The first concert of the fourteenth season will be given October 13.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY.

As if to show that there was no foundation for the rumors which have been rife for the past several weeks relative to Conductor Paur's popularity, both with the Symphony patrons and those who compose the orchestra, the gentleman in question was last evening given the heartiest applause throughout the programme. It was first evident that they intended something of an ovation when he entered to take his accustomed place, and at the close of the programme his presence was redemanded five times. The fact that it was the last concert of the season served to draw out a large house, and Mr. Paur's stand was prettily trimmed.

The programme, though a short one, was very brilliant. It opened with Wagner's "March of Homage," which was given a spirited rendering. Following came the "Mephisto Waltz," by Liszt, which is a wild, fanciful bit, and which, too, was played in masterly fashion. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" did not arouse any marked amount of enthusiasm. The "Pastoral" symphony, with its delightfully pastoral suggestions, ended the programme, and its delicate shading was well brought out.

Of the composers who have been heard in this season's concerts, Beethoven leads with fourteen compositions, Moligne and Wagner eight and Brahms seven. There were eleven compositions which received their first hearings in this city.

The last of the Kneisel Quartet concerts for Cambridge took place in Brattle Hall on Tuesday evening. Mr. Max Heinrich was in fine voice. Both the soloist and Mr. Foote, the composer, were tendered an ovation, being recalled several times. Among the select audience, typically a musical one, were Professor J. K. Paine, Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Mackenzie, Miss Riddle, Professor Norton and daughters, the Misses Woodbury, Mr. Yatman, the violinist, and Mrs. Yatman, and others of social prominence.

* * * * * * * * *

[117]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 29, 1894.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON, ETC.

The week has not been prolific in concerts, and there is therefore little to chronicle. For Tuesday evening Mrs. Ada May Benzing had appointed the testimonial concert which was tendered her on behalf of her friends in the Church of the Unity and elsewhere, and on that evening the church contained a large and gratified audience. Mrs. Benzing is noticeable among resident contraltos for the fullness, amplitude, richness and strength of her voice, and her earnestness and enthusiasm of manner find also many admirers. Her principal fault in times past has been some want of reserve and repose; but she seems to be getting the better of this, and her singing gains much thereby. There is so much which is unusually fine and interesting in her tone and so much merit in her style that she has no need to attract attention by mere display of the volume or extent of her voice. She sang music of several schools and made them very effective. Various excellent artists assisted her in interesting instrumental numbers.

The first part of the last Symphony concert was pretty loud and lively. Wagner's "Huldigungs" march began it with large and stately strains. The great composer was never in better form and spirits than when he was writing for the brass choir; and although one finds in this score with its wide and various scheme of instrumentation the gentle and tasteful touch of Raff, who put the march into its present shape, one can still recognize the brass band feeling throughout the work, and wish that Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore might come back for a few days to give his version of it with all those wonderful and strange instruments of breath or blow which he had collected from various corners of the earth. The performance was a rousing one, and for once that kettledrummer had at times an accompaniment which almost covered him up.

Next was played the "Tavern" scene, with its Mephistophelian waltz, from Liszt's music to Lenau's "Faust." The scene is one of rough gaiety shot across with diabolical comment and malicious excitement of passion and desire. The reading was graphic in its outlines and dramatic in its color and motion. The many brief episodic bits for single instruments were capitally put in, and the sudden harp-sweeps were especially telling.

A graver matter succeeded in Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, although it is only sombre and disquieted in its early phases, its later moods being earnest, energetic, buoyant and brilliant.

The concert ended with a faithful, sympathetic and delightful rendering of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which is so entirely in touch with the temper and the promises of spring. Mr. Paur had no need to exaggerate at any point in order to obtain his desired effects. His men have learned to understand and to obey, and while he has gained for himself their dutiful respect, he has regained for them that good opinion of the public which they had been losing during the past few seasons.

At both the rehearsal and the concert Mr. Paur had a fine, warm reception and many full-hearted recalls.

And so ends the thirteenth season. It has been productive of much good, especially in restoring discipline and technique to the orchestra and confidence to the public. But the next season must do more. It must provide better programmes and recognize more fairly the musical talent of the world. Mr. Apthorp's careful digest of this season shows a total of ninety-six numbers of which ten had their first Boston hearings. Of that total, only eighteen, or less than one in five, were taken from other than German authors. Ten of these were French, Berlioz being drawn upon for four, Massenet and Saint-Saens for two each, and D'Albert and Molique being each named once. Russia, in the persons of Glinka and Tschaikowsky, supplied five pieces, and Boston men—Messrs. Paine, Loeffler and Johns, one each. That is not the right kind of showing and Mr. Paur must show more catholicity and wider love next winter. Some improvements are also needed in the personnel of the orchestra. The wood wind is not all equally good, and a man who will give tone instead of noise is necessary for the drums.

The fourteenth season is announced to begin on October 13, and it will probably sadden the heart (or the gizzard) of that unimportant New York weekly, which has so fretted and fumed over Symphony affairs, to find Mr. Paur's name still to the fore in spite of all its clamor. And, by the way, that same paper virtually acknowledges its defeat by ceasing to attack the Symphony cause and turning itself to the supporters of that cause. In a paragraph which is really nowhere nearly so ill-written as some of the music attributed to its editorial pens, it is pleased to characterize the COURIER as a bob to that kite to which it likens a neighbor of ours. This is probably meant to be uncomplimentary; but it is really more flattering to us than to our neighbor. For the best of kites will not fly well without a few bobs to balance and keep it straight, and the Gothamite kite would wobble a deal less if it could get itself a bob or two of better stuff than the one lightweight attachment which is all it has thus far hitched on. We have no objection to ascending heavenward with any lively and high-mounting kite, and we will do our best as an auxiliary in its flight. And our Gothamite contemporary may kindly remember that it was the bobs and strings of Franklin's kite which enabled him to catch the electric spirit, and that perhaps it may yet feel as if a little fresh lightning had been brought down for its own impalement if we should quote what a person very near its seat of authority said in Boston the other day about the necessity of abusing somebody or some interest here in order to attract a little attention to its own unnoticed self and so win the notoriety which it apparently prefers to respect.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

PROUD PAUR.

Symphony Season Closes Brilliantly.

Music Hall Filled With Fond Admirers.

Popular Leader Was Given Grand Ovation.

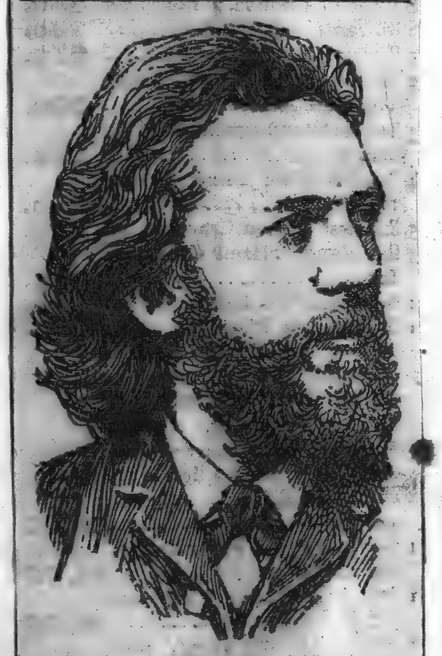
Conductor and Audience in Sympathy.

Beautiful Tone Pictures Given to Strings.

Emil Paur had a magnificent reception last evening. He was heartily welcomed before the concert, and he was still more heartily cheered at the close.

His music stand was beautifully twined with green, and on the book rest were two bunches of flowers tied with white satin ribbon, one of superb roses and the other of delicate lilies of the valley.

"I suppose," said a Beacon st woman in the balcony to her companion, "we shall have a wild night; or do you think that the audience is not enthusiastic enough over Paur to go wild?"



EMIL PAUR.

No reply came to the query, for at that moment Mr Paur stepped upon the platform and no reply was needed.

The vast audience, filling every seat in Music hall, cheered as one man. Loud and enthusiastic clapping came from every part of the auditorium and the galleries, handkerchiefs waved and a murmur of applause ran through the audience.

Mr Paur bowed again and again. He essayed to sit down, but the audience rang out more applause, and he rose and repeated his bowing, smiling as he did so.

Conductor and audience were evidently in sympathy, and from the moment Mr Paur took up the baton to the moment he laid it down finally, conductor and audience were in close touch with each other.

Conductor Paur's program for the closing concert of the 13th symphony season was dignified and marked by nothing novel in the musical line. Wagner's Huldigung's march, Liszt's Mephisto waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony were the offerings.

The stately measures of the Wagner march, with its simple harmonies so grandly worked out in the orchestration were finely played, the brasses and wood-winds performing their work with a notable degree of sonorousness and harmony.

The lively, demoniacal, Mephisto waltz was given with the proper abandon and rollicking spirit, and Schumann's brilliant overture was effectively treated. The second theme, with the hunting call figures, was splendidly given, and the finale was also admirable in every way.

Beethoven's familiar "Pastoral," or sixth symphony, which closed the program, was, as a whole, the most delightful number. The peasants' dance and thunder storm call for special mention, the "effects" not being allowed to overshadow the beautiful tone pictures given to the strings. In the finale the "harmonic audacities" were delightfully presented, showing the almost perfect team work of Mr Paur's orchestra.

The Beethoven finale was the signal for a wild burst of applause, which was kept up for some time, Mr Paur bowing and smiling. Then he left the platform, but the applause broke forth again, and in answer to repeated cries of "Paur, Paur," the delighted conductor came on and gave a series of bows, placing his hand over his heart and smiling his thanks for the warm reception.

Mr Paur was recalled and cheered four times, and then he held an informal reception as enthusiastic admirers came up to shake hands with him.

Well-known musicians in the audience were the loudest in their applause, and from all sides was heard the warmest praise of Mr Paur.

It was an ovation the most distinguished conductor might be proud of, and Mr Paur seemed at times overcome with the scene.

The 14th season of symphony concerts will begin Saturday evening, Oct 13, with Emil Paur as conductor.

SUNDAY [illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 119.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 13th season of the Symphony orchestra's concerts was ended with that given last evening under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, and the patrons rallied in full force to do honor to the occasion.

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Paur should have arranged his programme in such a way as to miss the desired effect which might easily have been attained by better care in this particular direction. The compositions chosen were excellent in every way, and if they had been turned top side down the season would have been ended in the most impressive fashion.

The arrangement of the programme was this: Wagner's "March of Homage," Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. It will be easily seen that the climax of this programme was in the beginning, and that what might have made an excellent opening made a very weak ending.

However, Mr. Paur and his programmes have been discussed sufficiently throughout this season, and it may be well to consider the character of the work done by the orchestra without further comment upon the selections and their arrangement.

The great march of Wagner was splendidly played throughout, the gradual working up of the theme which makes its principal feature being grandly done, and leaving a fine impression of the merits of this composition. The "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played, and the striking characteristics of the composition have seldom been brought out more distinctly or effectively. Schumann's lovely overture was played with excellent taste, and the reading of the Beethoven symphony commanded unqualified approval.

Mr. Paur had a grand ovation as he entered to take his stand at the gaily bedecked desk, and he had to repeat his acknowledgments of the applause a half dozen times before he could rap the orchestra to order. A similar scene followed the conclusion of the programme, the audience standing and applauding until he had repeatedly returned to bow his thanks for the favor shown him. He has good cause to be satisfied with the recognition of his season's labors by the patrons of the concerts and the official announcement of his continuance as conductor for next season was generally commended.

The season thus ended has been in some ways an uneventful one. There has been little that was sensational, but much that was satisfactory. Mr. Paur has shown himself to be a thoroughly conservative, careful and competent director. He has labored faithfully to make the concerts of the year command the respect of the best lovers of classical music, and in the works that he has placed upon his programme he has afforded a hearing of more standard compositions than novelties.

A summary of the programmes shows that 96 different compositions have been performed in the 24 concerts. Beethoven takes precedence in the list with 14 works. Wagner and Mozart follow with eight each, Brahms seven, Schumann five, Berlioz Liszt, Mendelssohn four each, Rubenstein, Schubert, Weber and Tschaikowsky three each, Bruch, Dvorak, Glinka, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Massenet, Saint Saens and Volkmann two each, and D'Albert Bach, Von Bulow, Goetz, Emil Hartman, Johns, Loeffler, Molique, Paine, Smetana, Richard Strauss one each.

Coming to Boston on so short a notice and with so limited a knowledge of American musicians, it is easy to pardon Mr. Paur for his limited recognition of the native born composer in his first season. He has, however, shown such a respect for the ability of those with whom he has been associated that it is natural to expect a more general hearing of the works of American composers in his concerts during the coming seasons.

All in all Mr. Paur's record during his first season is one to be heartily commended, and his retention for the entire term of his contract will certainly maintain the standing of Boston's orchestra in the front rank of the world's organization of this class.

The 14th season will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

[illegible]

MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth symphony concert, the closing one of the season, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.
Liszt: Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto-Waltz) from Lenau's "Faust."
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Opus 81.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral") Opus 68.

How well worth while it is to begin, or close, a symphony season with a "significant" composition is a matter of taste. Time was in Boston when the winter's orchestral music was usually ushered in by the "Weihe des Hauses" overture (the term "Weihe," "consecration," being generally accepted as giving this work a certain fitness as a sort of musical "grace before meat"), and the last concert ended in a blaze of glory with the third "Leonore," or some other composition with a stirring coda to it. The custom may have had its good and quasi-poetic side, but has been not a little laughed at in some quarters.

Surely Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, as a snapper to a long orchestral whip, is not open to the objection of would-be-significant splurginess; it is quiet enough in all conscience, and might be taken to signify (if, indeed, it signify anything beyond its own musical self) a desire to substitute the Catholic "Dona nobis pacem" for the more classic "Vos valete et plaudite." And yet the audience seemed, to a man, to take it in the latter sense,—or, perhaps, they needed no implied invitation to crown the season with an outburst of enthusiasm—for, when the last measure of the symphony had died away, they gave Mr. Paur such an ovation, bravo-shouting and hand-clapping as our old Music Hall has not often witnessed within its walls. Four times he was called out, responding, not with prima-donna alacrity, as if to catch the bubble reputation before it burst, but with dignified modesty, as of a man who was conscious of having done what he was engaged to do, and did not think honestly rendered services a matter for unusual demonstrations of praise.

The performance of the whole programme was extremely fine. The Huldigungs-Marsch was played with grand power and with a dignity of style that showed the work in its true light. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, too, went splendidly, and its whirling coda was given with immense effect. Liszt's "Mephisto-Waltz," which we are hearing, perhaps, a thought too often of late years, was played with a vim and finesse that left nothing to be desired. The ever-beautiful "Pastoral" was played well-nigh to perfection. One could only take exception to the rapid tempo of the Peasants' Dance, which sounded rather out of date in this year of grace 1894, and reminded one of the old-time conductor—"vom alten Schrot"—who, as a rule, was somewhat over-fond of very brisk Allegros. But, with this exception, the symphony was most sympathetically conducted and admirably played.

IF THERE WERE ANY QUESTION as to the universal and hearty public acceptance of Mr. Paur as the conductor of the symphony concerts, in spite of the diligent detraction which has followed his work here so unaccountably in certain New York journals, all such doubts must have taken to their heels with the same speed that certain "society" members of the orchestra did when the roar of generous and determined and persistent applause for the conductor set in Saturday night, recalling him to the stage no less than four times, while not a person left the hall. It was splendidly significant, because utterly spontaneous; it breathed a certain honest indignation, too, and the true Bostonian confidence in its own musical judgment. Boston has fully decided that Mr. Paur will do; and not only that, but that he is a musician of fine instincts and accomplishments. Boston's judgment is that of a community mature in musical experience, and does not require a masher at the conductor's desk

[1118]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 29, 1894.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON, ETC.

The week has not been prolific in concerts, and there is therefore little to chronicle. For Tuesday evening Mrs. Ada May Benzing had appointed the testimonial concert which was tendered her on behalf of her friends in the Church of the Unity and elsewhere, and on that evening the church contained a large and gratified audience. Mrs. Benzing is noticeable among resident contraltos for the fullness, amplitude, richness and strength of her voice, and her earnestness and enthusiasm of manner find also many admirers. Her principal fault in times past has been some want of reserve and repose; but she seems to be getting the better of this, and her singing gains much thereby. There is so much which is unusually fine and interesting in her tone and so much merit in her style that she has no need to attract attention by mere display of the volume or extent of her voice. She sang music of several schools and made them very effective. Various excellent artists assisted her in interesting instrumental numbers.

The first part of the last Symphony concert was pretty loud and lively. Wagner's "Huldigungs" march began it with large and stately strains. The great composer was never in better form and spirits than when he was writing for the brass choir; and although one finds in this score with its wide and various scheme of instrumentation the gentle and tasteful touch of Raff, who put the march into its present shape, one can still recognize the brass band feeling throughout the work, and wish that Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore might come back for a few days to give his version of it with all those wonderful and strange instruments of breath or blow which he had collected from various corners of the earth. The performance was a rousing one, and for once that kettledrummer had at times an accompaniment which almost covered him up.

Next was played the "Tavern" scene, with its Mephistophelian waltz, from Liszt's music to Lenau's "Faust." The scene is one of rough gaiety shot across with diabolical comment and malicious excitement of passion and desire. The reading was graphic in its outlines and dramatic in its color and motion. The many brief episodic bits for single instruments were capitally put in, and the sudden harp-sweeps were especially telling.

A graver matter succeeded in Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, although it is only sombre and disquieted in its early phases, its later moods being earnest, energetic, buoyant and brilliant.

The concert ended with a faithful, sympathetic and delightful rendering of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which is so entirely in touch with the temper and the promises of spring. Mr. Paur had no need to exaggerate at any point in order to obtain his desired effects. His men have learned to understand and to obey, and while he has gained for himself their dutiful respect, he has regained for them that good opinion of the public which they had been losing during the past few seasons.

At both the rehearsal and the concert Mr. Paur had a fine, warm reception and many full-hearted recalls.

And so ends the thirteenth season. It has been productive of much good, especially in restoring discipline and technique to the orchestra and confidence to the public. But the next season must do more. It must provide better programmes and recognize more fairly the musical talent of the world. Mr. Apthorp's careful digest of this season shows a total of ninety-six numbers of which ten had their first Boston hearings. Of that total, only eighteen, or less than one in five, were taken from other than German authors. Ten of these were French, Berlioz being drawn upon for four, Massenet and Saint-Saens for two each, and D'Albert and Molique being each named once. Russia, in the persons of Glinka and Tschaikowsky, supplied five pieces, and Boston men—Messrs. Paine, Loeffler and Johns, one each. That is not the right kind of showing and Mr. Paur must show more catholicity and wider love next winter. Some improvements are also needed in the personnel of the orchestra. The wood wind is not all equally good, and a man who will give tone instead of noise is necessary for the drums.

The fourteenth season is announced to begin on October 13, and it will probably sadden the heart (or the gizzard) of that unimportant New York weekly, which has so fretted and fumed over Symphony affairs, to find Mr. Paur's name still to the fore in spite of all its clamor. And, by the way, that same paper virtually acknowledges its defeat by ceasing to attack the Symphony cause and turning itself to the supporters of that cause. In a paragraph which is really nowhere nearly so ill-written as some of the music attributed to its editorial pens, it is pleased to characterize the COURIER as a bob to that kite to which it likens a neighbor of ours. This is probably meant to be uncomplimentary; but it is really more flattering to us than to our neighbor. For the best of kites will not fly well without a few bobs to balance and keep it straight, and the Gothamite kite would wobble a deal less if it could get itself a bob or two of better stuff than the one lightweight attachment which is all it has thus far hitched on. We have no objection to ascending heavenward with any lively and high-mounting kite, and we will do our best as an auxiliary in its flight. And our Gothamite contemporary may kindly remember that it was the bobs and strings of Franklin's kite which enabled him to catch the electric spirit, and that perhaps it may yet feel as if a little fresh lightning had been brought down for its own impalement if we should quote what a person very near its seat of authority said in Boston the other day about the necessity of abusing somebody or some interest here in order to attract a little attention to its own unnoticed self and so win the notoriety which it apparently prefers to respect.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

PROUD PAUR.

Symphony Season Closes Brilliantly.

Music Hall Filled With Fond Admirers.

Popular Leader Was Given Grand Ovation.

Conductor and Audience in Sympathy.

Beautiful Tone Pictures Given to Strings.

Emil Paur had a magnificent reception last evening. He was heartily welcomed before the concert, and he was still more heartily cheered at the close.

His music stand was beautifully twined with green, and on the book rest were two bunches of flowers tied with white satin ribbon, one of superb roses and the other of delicate lilies of the valley.

"I suppose," said a Beacon st woman in the balcony to her companion, "we shall have a wild night; or do you think that the audience is not enthusiastic enough over Paur to go wild?"

EMIL PAUR.

No reply came to the query, for at that moment Mr Paur stepped upon the platform and no reply was needed.

The vast audience, filling every seat in Music hall, cheered as one man. Loud and enthusiastic clapping came from every part of the auditorium and the galleries, handkerchiefs waved and a murmur of applause ran through the audience.

Mr Paur bowed again and again. He essayed to sit down, but the audience rang out more applause, and he rose and repeated his bowing, smiling as he did so.

Conductor and audience were evidently in sympathy, and from the moment Mr Paur took up the baton to the moment he laid it down finally, conductor and audience were in close touch with each other.

Conductor Paur's program for the closing concert of the 13th symphony season was dignified and marked by nothing novel in the musical line. Wagner's Huldigung's march, Liszt's Mephisto waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony were the offerings.

The stately measures of the Wagner march, with its simple harmonies so grandly worked out in the orchestration were finely played, the brasses and wood-winds performing their work with a notable degree of sonorousness and harmony.

The lively, demoniacal, Mephisto waltz was given with the proper abandon and rollicking spirit, and Schumann's brilliant overture was effectively treated. The second theme, with the hunting call figures, was splendidly given, and the finale was also admirable in every way.

Beethoven's familiar "Pastoral," or sixth symphony, which closed the program, was, as a whole, the most delightful number. The peasants' dance and thunder storm call for special mention, the "effects" not being allowed to overshadow the beautiful tone pictures given to the strings. In the finale the "harmonic audacities" were delightfully presented, showing the almost perfect team work of Mr Paur's orchestra.

The Beethoven finale was the signal for a wild burst of applause, which was kept up for some time, Mr Paur bowing and smiling. Then he left the platform, but the applause broke forth again, and in answer to repeated cries of "Paur, Paur," the delighted conductor came on and gave a series of bows, placing his hand over his heart and smiling his thanks for the warm reception.

Mr Paur was recalled and cheered four times, and then he held an informal reception as enthusiastic admirers came up to shake hands with him.

Well-known musicians in the audience were the loudest in their applause, and from all sides was heard the warmest praise of Mr Paur.

It was an ovation the most distinguished conductor might be proud of, and Mr Paur seemed at times overcome with the scene.

The 14th season of symphony concerts will begin Saturday evening, Oct 13, with Emil Paur as conductor.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCV. NO. 119.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1894.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 13th season of the Symphony orchestra's concerts was ended with that given last evening under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, and the patrons rallied in full force to do honor to the occasion.

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Paur should have arranged his programme in such a way as to miss the desired effect which might easily have been attained by better care in this particular direction. The compositions chosen were excellent in every way, and if they had been turned top side down the season would have been ended in the most impressive fashion.

The arrangement of the programme was this: Wagner's "March of Homage," Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. It will be easily seen that the climax of this programme was in the beginning, and that what might have made an excellent opening made a very weak ending.

However, Mr. Paur and his programmes have been discussed sufficiently throughout this season, and it may be well to consider the character of the work done by the orchestra without further comment upon the selections and their arrangement.

The great march of Wagner was splendidly played throughout, the gradual working up of the theme which makes its principal feature being grandly done, and leaving a fine impression of the merits of this composition. The "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played, and the striking characteristics of the composition have seldom been brought out more distinctly or effectively. Schumann's lovely overture was played with excellent taste, and the reading of the Beethoven symphony commanded unqualified approval.

Mr. Paur had a grand ovation as he entered to take his stand at the gaily bedecked desk, and he had to repeat his acknowledgments of the applause a half dozen times before he could rap the orchestra to order. A similar scene followed the conclusion of the programme, the audience standing and applauding until he had repeatedly returned to bow his thanks for the favor shown him. He has good cause to be satisfied with the recognition of his season's labors by the patrons of the concerts and the official announcement of his continuance as conductor for next season was generally commended.

The season thus ended has been in some ways an uneventful one. There has been little that was sensational, but much that was satisfactory. Mr. Paur has shown himself to be a thoroughly conservative, careful and competent director. He has labored faithfully to make the concerts of the year command the respect of the best lovers of classical music, and in the works that he has placed upon his programme he has afforded a hearing of more standard compositions than novelties.

A summary of the programmes shows that 96 different compositions have been performed in the 24 concerts. Beethoven takes precedence in the list with 14 works. Wagner and Mozart follow with eight each, Brahms seven, Schumann five, Berlioz Liszt, Mendelssohn four each, Rubenstein, Schubert, Weber and Tschaikowsky three each, Bruch, Dvorak, Glinka, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Massenet, Saint Saens and Volkmann two each, and D'Albert Bach, Von Bulow, Goetz, Emil Hartman, Johns, Loeffler, Molique, Paine, Smetana, Richard Strauss one each.

Coming to Boston on so short a notice and with so limited a knowledge of American musicians, it is easy to pardon Mr. Paur for his limited recognition of the native born composer in his first season. He has, however, shown such a respect for the ability of those with whom he has been associated that it is natural to expect a more general hearing of the works of American composers in his concerts during the coming seasons.

All in all Mr. Paur's record during his first season is one to be heartily commended, and his retention for the entire term of his contract will certainly maintain the standing of Boston's orchestra in the front rank of the world's organization of this class.

The 14th season will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1894.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth symphony concert, the closing one of the season, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.
Liszt: Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto-Waltz) from Lenau's "Faust."
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Opus 81.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral") Opus 68.

How well worth while it is to begin, or close, a symphony season with a "significant" composition is a matter of taste. Time was in Boston when the winter's orchestral music was usually ushered in by the "Weihe des Hauses" overture (the term "Weihe," "consecration," being generally accepted as giving this work a certain fitness as a sort of musical "grace before meat"), and the last concert ended in a blaze of glory with the third "Leonore," or some other composition with a stirring coda to it. The custom may have had its good and quasi-poetic side, but has been not a little laughed at in some quarters.

Surely Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, as a snapper to a long orchestral whip, is not open to the objection of would-be-significant splurginess; it is quiet enough in all conscience, and might be taken to signify (if, indeed, it signify anything beyond its own musical self) a desire to substitute the Catholic "Dona nobis pacem" for the more classic "Vos valete et plaudite." And yet the audience seemed, to a man, to take it in the latter sense,—or, perhaps, they needed no implied invitation to crown the season with an outburst of enthusiasm—for, when the last measure of the symphony had died away, they gave Mr. Paur such an ovation, bravo-shouting and hand-clapping as our old Music Hall has not often witnessed within its walls. Four times he was called out, responding, not with prima-donna alacrity, as if to catch the bubble reputation before it burst, but with dignified modesty, as of a man who was conscious of having done what he was engaged to do, and did not think honestly rendered services a matter for unusual demonstrations of praise.

The performance of the whole programme was extremely fine. The Huldigungs-Marsch was played with grand power and with a dignity of style that showed the work in its true light. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, too, went splendidly, and its whirling coda was given with immense effect. Liszt's "Mephisto-Waltz," which we are hearing, perhaps, a thought too often of late years, was played with a vim and finesse that left nothing to be desired. The ever-beautiful "Pastoral" was played well-nigh to perfection. One could only take exception to the rapid tempo of the Peasants' Dance, which sounded rather out of date in this year of grace 1894, and reminded one of the old-time conductor—"vom alten Schrot"—who, as a rule, was somewhat over-fond of very brisk Allegros. But, with this exception, the symphony was most sympathetically conducted and admirably played.

IF THERE WERE ANY QUESTION as to the universal and hearty public acceptance of Mr. Paur as the conductor of the symphony concerts, in spite of the diligent detraction which has followed his work here so unaccountably in certain New York journals, all such doubts must have taken to their heels with the same speed that certain "society" members of the orchestra did when the roar of generous and determined and persistent applause for the conductor set in Saturday night, recalling him to the stage no less than four times, while not a person left the hall. It was splendidly significant, because utterly spontaneous; it breathed a certain honest indignation, too, and the true Bostonian confidence in its own musical judgment. Boston has fully decided that Mr. Paur will do; and not only that, but that he is a musician of fine instincts and accomplishments. Boston's judgment is that of a community mature in musical experience, and does not require a masher at the conductor's desk

---

[118]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 30, 1894.

PAUR SATISFIES

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ATTENDANTS.

He Receives a Perfect Ovation at the Last of the Concerts—The Programme, However, is, as Usual, Poorly Arranged, which Makes the Salute all the More Significant.

When Mr. Paur stepped upon the platform Saturday evening he was welcomed in a most emphatic manner. It was evident that the large audience desired to put their verdict as to the conductor's ability on record; at the end of the concert the ovation was still more emphatic, and five times was the conductor obliged to come back to the platform to bow to the public enthusiasm. On no occasion, except at the farewell concert of Mr. Gericke, has a conductor of these concerts been given such a demonstration. One fact, therefore, may be taken as absolutely proven, Boston is satisfied with Mr. Paur, and is not casting any regretful glances towards the past.

As usual, however, the programme was an ill-assorted one; it began with pepper and ended with milk; after the most glowing instrumentation of the modern school it culminated with Beethoven in his weakest mood. It seemed as if the conductor purposely avoided a climax, and therefore the public demonstration was all the more significant. Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch" was the first number of the concert. The marches of Wagner are by no means his most successful works; they are often blatant without being very coherent; their pomp goes to the verge of bombast; but this march of homage which the composer wrote for his royal friend, Louis II. of Bavaria, is certainly far above the peculiar triplet salad which he served to America in 1876, and far more definitely national music. The performance was a magnificent one, clear and brilliant, the climaxes well wrought up, and the shading of the sweeping crescendo effects almost marvellous. The technique of the orchestra was further shown in the Mephisto waltz of Liszt. It was injudicious to follow the extreme brilliancy of the march with the sensational waltz scene, for an anti-climax was bound to come after so much spice. Come it did with Schumann's charming "Genoveva" overture, which, although admirably played (and the horns deserve special mention) seldom has had less effect. Liszt's "Mephisto" scene is an uncomfortable neighbor for any reasonably melodic work, for its furious dissonances, its conflagration of passions, its phantasmagoria of tone-colors are too abnormal. Liszt has here set all the canons of art at defiance, he deliberately chooses the ugliest progressions, he revels in empty fifths, he delights in the weirdest instrumental touches.

"My brain's on fire, I am crazing,
As I upon the girl am gazing"

is the keynote of this none too refined tone-picture, and Satan's fiddle forms the background. Messrs. Schuecker and Sautet gave good account of the harp and oboe parts in this work.

To oppose Schumann's dainty picture of the downfall of vice and the triumph of innocence to this fiendish carnival was to give the victory to "the roses and raptures of Vice," for certainly the "lilies and languors of Virtue" seemed rather tame by the comparison. The diminished ninth chords of the beginning of the Schumann work seemed quite a conservative matter when placed in juxtaposition with the large and varied assortment of fifth progressions which Liszt had gathered together; and although the triumphant character of the finale made some amends, as a whole the overture was cast into shadow by the flames of its predecessor.

Then came Beethoven's sixth symphony to close the season. It almost seemed like self-abnegation on the part of Mr. Paur to choose this work as the finale of a very successful series of concerts; it was as if he scorned all fictitious aid and determined that there should be no climax to his efforts as a peg whereon to hang applause. Yet one plea might be put forth for the use of this symphony as keystone to the musical arch; it is programme music, and the non-musician dearly loves a story to be connected with his tones. If instrumental music is to be employed only for the purpose of telling a story, our art must at once be ranked far below poetry, painting, or sculpture. "Programme music" may be defined as instrumental music which either by a special title, or a printed plot, endeavors to convey definite ideas to the auditor. The vagueness of music is its strength. "Pure music" conveys emotional impressions, and becomes a stimulant to that which is poetical within the hearer, and in doing this performs a function which no other art can achieve as well. Yet the general public will forever crave a story in music. It seems to have been the same in ancient Greece, for Dorian, the Athenian wit, was once asked to listen to a representation of a storm at sea given upon the kithara, at the end of which he sensibly said: "I have heard a greater tempest in a pot of boiling water" (the origin of our "tempest in a teapot"), rebuking the absurd striving for definite effects in an art which should generally remain subjective.

Beethoven was the first to admit this style of work to the symphonic field and he produced thereby his weakest symphony. His apology at the beginning of the first movement (marked "more a picture of impressions than picture-painting") shows that he did not consider programme music the highest expression of art. Just this first movement is the best part of the symphony, since it is a well-developed sonata movement, and does not attempt to portray things with exactitude. This was played excellently and the effect of the retarding of the opening figure was a good one. The brusquerie of the closing theme and the heartiness of the coda founded chiefly upon this theme, were points of especial excellence. Beethoven seems to have left his good resolutions with the end of the first movement, and the symphony thereafter leaves the subjective for the objective school. The second movement is one of the nods of Homer. The composer seems to have sat down by the brook and waited for the water to run by, determined to picture it to the very end. Yet this particular movement is one of the great delights of the laity; here is something tangible, and when they recognize that the clarinette is a cuckoo, the oboe a [illegible], and that there is other identifiable

Imagine themselves musical analysts and feel a corresponding glow of satisfaction. The next movement is a better employment of the photographic process, for the playing of the village band, the entrance of the heavy-shod mountaineers, the three notes of the cracked bassoon constitute musical humor, and one must always be glad to see sunshine in the sensitive nature, to see Beethoven at play. The thunderstorm, too, may be ranked as one of the best pictures of its class; the anxious hush before the storm, the wonderful effect of piping wind upon the piccolo, and many other touches, show how keen an observer of nature Beethoven must have been.

The thunder-storm catalogue is rather a long one, Haydn in the "Seasons," Wagner in "Die Walkuere," Bach in "Ye Lightnings," St. Saens in "The Deluge," Berlioz in the "Symphonie Fantastique," Rossini in the overture to "William Tell," have all produced spells of bad weather, but Beethoven's storm may still be awarded the palm in this field of musical meteorology. In the clearing up of the shower a peculiar point may be noted; the shepherd appears sounding his horn for his flocks. Now the English horn is the very instrument for this. Wagner in "Tannhaeuser" and Schumann in "Manfred" have employed it splendidly in this direction, and Rossini brought it in at a precisely similar episode to the Beethoven one (after a storm) in a masterly fashion: but Beethoven seems to have had no knowledge of the capacity of the instrument, and never uses it in his scores. Only in a scarcely known trio, op. 87, does he call for this noble instrument, and even here it is doubtful whether he had not one of the old-fashioned oboes in mind. In this symphonic finale he brings in clarinette and French horn for the shepherd calls. The clarinette deserves mention not only for its work here, but for its far more difficult passages in the second movement. The finale is dull music, it has no great climax, it is tiresome in repetition; it is the only weak finale that Peethoven ever made to a symphonic work. The applause that burst forth at the end was therefore not meant for this especial work, but became a public indorsement of Mr. Paur, a tangible statement that our music lovers do not sympathize with the attacks that have recently been made upon him. In such an indorsement the present writer most cordially joins. From the second month of the conductor's service here these columns have pointed out the gradual rehabilitation of our orchestra; the laxity which threatened the loss of that wonderful ensemble which Mr. Gericke has built up has disappeared, the orchestra is becoming what it was in its best days.

In the matter of modern progress too, Mr. Paur is showing himself a great acquisition, we are having the new works of the world on our programmes with commendable promptness. They are not always great works but we must needs hear them once for the sake of comparison. In this catholicity of taste the present conductor bids fair to be the foremost of all the symphonic leaders we have yet had here. Only one important blemish remains to chronicle; the programmes seem to be made up without any system, and sometimes even upon a bad system. The programme of this very concert may be taken as an instance; it came in like a lion and went out like a lamb; it led up to an anti-climax with conspicuous skill. But this is a fault that can be overcome; in the greater matters our conductor has been weighed and not found wanting. He is not a man who has reached the culmination of his powers, he is still growing and is likely to be even greater in a few years than he is today. He may yet attain the elasticity and caprice of his immediate predecessor, in addition to the virility, intelligence and musicianly conservatism which he already possesses.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER.
PUBLISHED BY TRAVELLER PUBLISHING CO., AT 307 WASHINGTON STREET, OPP. OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE.
MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1894.

THE LAST SYMPHONY

Conductor Paur Given an Appreciative Au Revoir.

EFFECTIVE PROGRAMME.

Colonel Higginson Shares the Applause.

All Paur Rumors Offically Laid to Rest by the Programmes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the 24th and last concert of this season's series at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was performed:

Huldigunzs March..... ..... Wagner
Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt
"Genoveva" Overture.....Schumann
Symphony No. 6.....Beethoven

Mr. Paur has proved in the half dozen or so selections that he has given from Wagner's works to be an admirable exponent of that great modern genius. And so on this occasion he made much of the noisy, blatant and simple, if not commonplace "March of Homage" of the mighty Richard.

The performance of the "Mephisto Waltz" was one of rare brilliancy, and reflected credit upon the wonderful skill of the orchestra and the admirable conducting of Mr. Paur alike.

Both the overture to "Genoveva" of Schumann and the Beethoven's sixth symphony were given in a manner that displayed the just estimate that Conductor Paur possesses of the value of the classics, and showed also his integrity in dealing with the works of the older masters. The playing of the orchestra in these two numbers was simply perfect, as it was also in the two previous and more modern compositions. One has only to grumble at the wearisome length of the slow movement of the symphony.

It is gratifying to observe the complete rehabilitation of the orchestra under the rigid discipline of Mr. Paur, after its depreciation under the influence of Mr. Nikisch's connection with it during the previous four seasons. The judicious have to rejoice that the theatric vulgarity that offended during Nikisch's incumbency has been entirely displaced since Mr. Paur's advent, and a high and noble form of interpretation been instituted in its place. Mr. Paur has made an eminent success as a conductor, and every unprejudiced listener must acknowledge his superiority in this respect.

Mr. Paur has, however, one short-coming, and that is the inability to arrange an interesting and well-contrasted programme. Neither has he shown a sufficiently catholic taste in the selection of authors to be represented in his programmes. It might be a profitable effort upon his part to study the make-up of the programmes presented by Theodore Thomas at his Symphony Concerts and imitate the latter conductor in his liberal manner of drawing from the works of composers of all nationalities, and in his happy contrasting of works, old and new, grave and gay, German and French, Russian and American, etc.

Mr. Paur must remember that conservative and partisan Leipsic is one place and cosmopolitan America quite another, and that as the former is quite content within its narrow boundaries, here in America exists an ever restless spirit of constant expansion in matters of music as well as in the ordinary affairs of mechanics and business generally.

We look out upon the whole world, while the vision of the denizen of Leipsic seldom reaches beyond the borders of its own township.

Mr. Paur is not alone in this matter of ill-contrasted and ill-liberally framed programmes, for both Gericke and Nikisch were similarly afflicted. To be sure, Gericke improved considerably as he recognized the necessity of his becoming more catholic in his tastes, but he did not advance much beyond the Viennese formula in his selections for performance.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur will recognize the necessity as well, but will correspondingly advance in his taste, and next season give his listeners much more varied and discriminatingly arranged programmes.

A most significant feature of the concert on Saturday evening was the warm and hearty welcome extended Mr. Paur when he appeared to begin the performance. The audience in the most spontaneous manner applauded Mr. Paur, the demonstration being of extraordinary duration in its enthusiasm. At the end of the performance Mr. Paur was recalled several times, the tumultuous and constant applause, with shouts of "Bravo!" obliging him to come forth again and again to bow to the immense audience of admirers, whose confidence and admiration he had gained through the earnest, modest, conscientious, musician-like and skilful manner in which he has fulfilled the duties of his onerous position. I doubt if there has ever been so spontaneous, so enthusiastic, and so heartfelt an offering extended anyone in the musical profession since Music Hall has existed as was the expression of the audience on Saturday evening in Mr. Paur's behalf.

If there were any grumbling, sore-headed or self-sufficient and mistaken players among the orchestra, they had a fine opportunity to discover in whom the public put its trust, as the master of the situation.

It is only to be regretted that Mr. Higginson could not have been brought out of his retirement as one of this great audience, to have been the recipient also of a demonstration that would have shaken the walls of the Music Hall. In his extraordinary modesty, this great benefactor to the cause of music in Boston should be assured that the munificence of his effort in behalf of the interests of his music-loving townsmen is duly appreciated, and that he has made for himself a niche in the cause of art that must ever redound to his memory and as permanently call forth the gratitude of all those who have reaped the blessings that arise from the beneficence of his generous act.

The opening concert of the 14th season will take place Saturday evening, Oct. 13, 1894. It is unnecessary to state that Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor, regardless of the effort of the affected critics of the New York press to disparage his continuance.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Musical Courier of New York has degraded itself in the personality of its vulgar attack upon Mr. B. E. Woolf, the eminent critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette. Also the senseless correspondence of one R. G. Brown of Boston, an attempt to belittle the value of Mr. Woolf's criticisms upon incompetency of Nikisch, is discreditable to its columns, to say nothing of the self-evidence of its having been "cooked up" in the Courier office.

[119]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1894.

There have been distressing rumors of late concerning intestine strife in symphony rehearsals. Perhaps you have heard of them. There were reports that some of the players lounged at their ease until they were corrected sternly; that some, regarding the rehearsals as a movable feast, sauntered in at their convenience and were fined severely, as though by a baseball umpire; that for these and other reasons the rehearsals were like bear garden exercises or legislative proceedings.

You will be delighted to hear that all these rumors are base fabrications. One report alleged that Mr. Kneisel was fined "for being systematically late." And what did Mr. Kneisel say the 24th to a reporter of the "Journal"?

"There is not a word of truth in it," said he, hotly. "It is false—it is not so. You ask me if I have been late?" The "Journal's" representative nodded. "You can say that I have been late but once this winter. That was only ten minutes, owing to the street cars. I came in and Mr. Paur smiled at me as I took my place in the orchestra. Explanations were not necessary, as he understood I would have come if I could, and it was only ten minutes. I told him later and he understood. He has never fined me."

"Is there good feeling in the orchestra?" asked the "Journal" reporter.

"Yes. Every man does his duty and plays his best. There is no careless playing. It is just as it always has been. The men work hard and do their best." Mr. Kneisel spoke with much earnestness.

Another rumor represented Mr. Paur as telling Mr. "Tim" Adamowski to "sit up and play like a man." And what did Mr. Adamowski say to a "Journal" reporter the 24th?

He glanced at the clipping, and when he saw its source laughed and said: "Oh, I pay no attention to that," with amused contempt.

"Then, Mr. Paur never made that remark to you?"

"Never," said the smiling musician, waving his well cut blond hair with a vehement shake of the head.

"There is good feeling existing between Mr. Paur and the orchestra?"

Again an amused laugh, and "Perfectly. When Mr. Paur gave his concerto to-day the orchestra stopped to applaud him and Mrs. Paur."

"It seems absurd to ask, but have you ever circulated reports derogatory to Mr. Paur's skill as a conductor?"

"Never," said Mr. Adamowski, with a frank smile and a quick gesture that was even more expressive of sincere dissent than his words.

* * *

Equally absurd, no doubt, are the stories that Mr. Kneisel was always yawning and saying, "I'm so tired," and that Mr. Adamowski was always dusting his fiddle, his fiddle box, his clothes, and stopping in the middle of a passionate phrase to pull up his trousers at the knees.

* * *

I am happy to inform you that I am now able to give an accurate account of a Symphony rehearsal; "accurate," because it came from the lips of one of the oldest members of the orchestra. Of course I am not at liberty to mention his name, for if I did the miserable man would in all probability be imprisoned during the summer in Bumstead Hall, chained on the floor so that he would have ever before his eyes the nightmare ceiling, and the only food furnished him would come from the restaurant once kept by Mr. Ober.

When Mr. Paur enters the room, the members of the orchestra cheer wildly and take regularly an oath of allegiance. In this oath they bind themselves to die for him, if it should ever thus be necessary to prove devotion. A loving cup is passed about, and then they all enter into the morning's work. Mr. Paur, far from being a martinet, welcomes discussion of the proper reading, which is finally adopted by a majority vote. When the men are tired Mr. Paur tells funny stories, which are generally taken from the last number of the "Fliegende Blätter." The program of the following concert is made out by drawing names of pieces from a hat, and this version of the game of authors gives genuine amusement. Indeed the rehearsals are so jolly that the men look forward to them, and some sit up all night so that they will not oversleep and be tardy.

* * *

The program of the last Symphony concert of the season was as follows:

Huldigung's March	Wagner
Mephisto Waltz	Liszt
Overture, "Genoveva"	Schumann
Symphony No. 6	Beethoven

Mr. Paur was applauded loudly before and after the concert, and, indeed, he was recalled several times, but I doubt if all this was an expression of the particular enjoyment of the evening; for the concert, as a whole, was dull.

Is it blasphemy to question the great musical worth of the Pastoral Symphony? The second movement seems to me interminable; nor do I care for the mimicry of birds, nor do I care for the thunder storm.

Do you know anything about the truth of the story that in New York, somewhere between 1860 and 1868, this symphony was "illustrated"—was it at Niblo's?—by the introduction of real wheelbarrows and a ballet? It is my impression that I read such a statement in a review published in the New York "Tribune" of the Philharmonic concert November 28, 1868. At that time I was at school in New York, and was not Tostée singing in "La Grande Duchesse" that season? "I remember running away to thus snatch a fearful joy. If I am not mistaken, Aujac, Le Duc, Duchesne, Lagriffoul were in the company. Would that opera bouffe had now such interpreters in this country!

This reminds me that Lillian Russell will appear at the Hollis the 30th in "Giroflé-Girofla," and that "Utopia, Limited," will be sung at the Boston Museum May 14 by the present New York company.

* * *

Let us look for a moment at the summary of the Symphony season published in the program book. Beethoven leads, and his name occurs 14 times; Mozart and Wagner are credited with 8 numbers apiece; Brahms with 7; Schumann with 5; Mendelssohn, Berlioz and Liszt with 4 apiece; Rubinstein, Weber, Tschaikowsky, Schubert, with 3 apiece. Haydn's name appears twice, Händel twice, Bach once and Clayton Johns once. Other names are Massenet (2 and vocal), Saint-Saëns (2), Smetana (1), R. Strauss (1), Dvorák (2), Glinka (2), Gluck (2), Bruch (2), Volkmann (2), D'Albert (1), Bülow (1), Goetz (1), E. Hartmann (1), Loeffler (1), Molique (1), Paine (1).

Tschaikowsky's last symphony and Goldmark's "Sappho" were not put in rehearsal.

* * *

These were the soloists: Nordica, Eames, Kneisel (2), Schroeder (2), Mrs. Paur, Adamowski, Baermann, Materna, Busoni, Max Heinrich, Loeffler, Blauvelt, Schulz, Roth, Trebelli.

Neither Mr. de Pachmann nor Mr. Friedheim, nor Mr. Marteau appeared at these concerts during the season.

* * *

The symphonies were as follows: Beethoven, 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 and two movements of the 9th; Berlioz, Fantastic and three movements of "Romeo and Juliet;" Brahms, 1, 2, 4; Dvorák, "From the New World;" Goetz, F major; Haydn, No. 2 (B and H); Liszt, "Faust;" Mendelssohn, No. 3; Mozart, G minor, "Jupiter;" Rubinstein, "Dramatic;" Schubert, C major; Schumann, 1, 4; Strauss, F minor.

* * *

The Symphony program book states that the opening concert of the fourteenth season will be given October 13 and that Mr. Paur will be the conductor. I earnestly hope that during the next season Mr. Paur will present more interesting, more catholic and more strongly contrasted programs.

It is absolutely necessary to hear each season "Standard" symphonies and overtures like unto the books which "no gentleman's library should be without." Why cannot an Auber overture be given occasionally? And I agree heartily with Mr. Finck in deploring the neglect of Johann Strauss. Better by far a waltz by him than one of the pessimistic machines of Strauss, whose first name is Richard. Or why should Haydn be represented only by one or two symphonies? Or why should a suite by Massenet be tabooed? Why should we not have an opportunity of hearing Templeton Strong's "Sintram" symphony? Then there is a man named Peter Benoit.

PHILIP HALE.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

MR. PAUR MUST GO.

IN Mr. Philip Hale's letter from Boston in our last issue you may read this in an interview with Mr. and Mrs. Paur:

"Everywhere in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur; "when we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

The stories referred to were of course about Mr. Paur's enforced resignation and approaching departure for Europe. We would like to know by what right Mr. Paur used the names of Messrs. Nikisch, Seidl and Damrosch in this case. It was, to say the least, impertinent and in bad taste. The three gentlemen named would not stoop to "sending out those stories." The fact of the matter is that the Paurs are provincial. Mr. Paur never held a first-class position as an orchestra conductor in Germany, and his sudden accession to good fortune has made him talk foolishly. He is not in the same class as Seidl, Nikisch or Gericke, and he commits a terrible breach of professional courtesy when he speaks as above quoted of fellow musicians.

Damrosch and Seidl are not sitting up at nights devising "those stories" to hurt the reputation of Mr. Paur. They have their own orchestras to look after. Besides "those stories" contain much that is probable. Colonel Higginson has grown very tired of his new man. Business has fallen off greatly, not only in New York, but even in Boston. The reason given for the abandonment of the customary spring tour was that Mr. Paur could not stand our sleeping cars. This is very funny. Mr. Nikisch, if we recollect aright, was averse to travel, but he traveled and conducted nevertheless. The plain truth of the matter is that the public is not interested in Mr. Paur's work and his terrible earnestness and rigid disciplinarianism do not compensate for a lack of magnetism and personal distinction. Mr. Paur must go. His stay may be prolonged longer than we wish, but public opinion here and in Boston will prove too strong.

As to the contract talk, that is nonsense. Colonel Higginson can force Mr. Paur to resign to-morrow. Mr. W. J. Henderson also took a hand in the controversy. In last Sunday's "Times" he had, among other things, the following to say:

The Boston "Saturday Evening Gazette," in commenting on this matter, seems to labor under the delusion that rigid discipline is all that is needed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no doubt that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated in this important requirement since the day when Wilhelm Gericke laid down the baton. Mr. Nikisch's warmest admirers could not fail to see that in his efforts to attain power, warmth and variety he sacrificed the superb precision, the military unanimity which Mr. Gericke developed. That the falling off in these matters was in some measure due to a lack of discipline must have been patent to the most casual observer. But it was also due to the conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important effects.

Now Mr. Paur, with all due respect to the opinions of the wise men of Boston, has not advanced a single step toward the restoration of this fine precision. On the contrary under his lead the orchestra has about reached the level of the Brooklyn Philharmonic under Theodore Thomas. It plays smoothly, correctly, glibly if you like, but with deadly dullness. The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here are gone, and with these qualities have departed the eloquent phrasing, the wondrously significant accentuation of Mr. Nikisch. The fact is that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind. He is the personification of respectability. And that is all.

The "Saturday Evening Gazette" in a gentle way intimates that the welfare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is none of New York's business. We regret to be forced into mild but firm dissent from this proposition. The first and most obvious reply to Boston is: "If your orchestra is none of our business, keep your orchestra at home." But it is not necessary to justify comment on the narrow ground that because the orchestra visits this city we have a right to talk about it. The New York "Times" has, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in New York, steadfastly maintained the opinion that it was the best concert orchestra in this country, and one of the best in the world. Since it has been regarded as the representative American orchestra, its welfare is of interest to every lover of music in the United States. For that reason this paper discusses it, and will continue to do so in spite of intimations from Boston that poaching on one's neighbor's preserves is reprehensible. The Boston Symphony Orchestra belongs to the United States, and the Hub will not be able to shut its greatness up within her provincial limits.

New York knows perfectly well what it wants as an orchestral conductor. New York does not want Theodore Thomas. New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1894.

There have been distressing rumors of late concerning intestine strife in symphony rehearsals. Perhaps you have heard of them. There were reports that some of the players lounged at their ease until they were corrected sternly; that some, regarding the rehearsals as a movable feast, sauntered in at their convenience and were fined severely, as though by a baseball umpire; that for these and other reasons the rehearsals were like bear garden exercises or legislative proceedings.

You will be delighted to hear that all these rumors are base fabrications. One report alleged that Mr. Kneisel was fined "for being systematically late." And what did Mr. Kneisel say the 24th to a reporter of the "Journal"?

"There is not a word of truth in it," said he, hotly. "It is false—it is not so. You ask me if I have been late?" The "Journal's" representative nodded. "You can say that I have been late but once this winter. That was only ten minutes, owing to the street cars. I came in and Mr. Paur smiled at me as I took my place in the orchestra. Explanations were not necessary, as he understood I would have come if I could, and it was only ten minutes. I told him later and he understood. He has never fined me."

"Is there good feeling in the orchestra?" asked the "Journal" reporter.

"Yes. Every man does his duty and plays his best. There is no careless playing. It is just as it always has been. The men work hard and do their best." Mr. Kneisel spoke with much earnestness.

Another rumor represented Mr. Paur as telling Mr. "Tim" Adamowski to "sit up and play like a man." And what did Mr. Adamowski say to a "Journal" reporter the 24th?

He glanced at the clipping, and when he saw its source laughed and said: "Oh, I pay no attention to that," with amused contempt.

"Then, Mr. Paur never made that remark to you?"

"Never," said the smiling musician, waving his well cut blond hair with a vehement shake of the head.

"There is good feeling existing between Mr. Paur and the orchestra?"

Again an amused laugh, and "Perfectly. When Mr. Paur gave his concerto to-day the orchestra stopped to applaud him and Mrs. Paur."

"It seems absurd to ask, but have you ever circulated reports derogatory to Mr. Paur's skill as a conductor?"

"Never," said Mr. Adamowski, with a frank smile and a quick gesture that was even more expressive of sincere dissent than his words.

* * *

Equally absurd, no doubt, are the stories that Mr. Kneisel was always yawning and saying, "I'm so tired," and that Mr. Adamowski was always dusting his fiddle, his fiddle box, his clothes, and stopping in the middle of a passionate phrase to pull up his trousers at the knees.

* * *

I am happy to inform you that I am now able to give an accurate account of a Symphony rehearsal; "accurate," because it came from the lips of one of the oldest members of the orchestra. Of course I am not at liberty to mention his name, for if I did the miserable man would in all probability be imprisoned during the summer in Bumstead Hall, chained on the floor so that he would have ever before his eyes the nightmare ceiling, and the only food furnished him would come from the restaurant once kept by Mr. Ober.

When Mr. Paur enters the room, the members of the orchestra cheer wildly and take regularly an oath of allegiance. In this oath they bind themselves to die for him, if it should ever thus be necessary to prove devotion. A loving cup is passed about, and then they all enter into the morning's work. Mr. Paur, far from being a martinet, welcomes discussion of the proper reading, which is finally adopted by a majority vote. When the men are tired Mr. Paur tells funny stories, which are generally taken from the last number of the "Fliegende Blätter." The program of the following concert is made out by drawing names of pieces from a hat, and this version of the game of authors gives genuine amusement. Indeed the rehearsals are so jolly that the men look forward to them, and some sit up all night so that they will not oversleep and be tardy.

* * *

The program of the last Symphony concert of the season was as follows:

Huldigung's March	Wagner
Mephisto Waltz	Liszt
Overture, "Genovefa"	Schumann
Symphony No. 6	Beethoven

Mr. Paur was applauded loudly before and after the concert, and, indeed, he was recalled several times, but I doubt if all this was an expression of the particular enjoyment of the evening; for the concert, as a whole, was dull.

Is it blasphemy to question the great musical worth of the Pastoral Symphony? The second movement seems to me interminable; nor do I care for the mimicry of birds, nor do I care for the thunder storm.

Do you know anything about the truth of the story that in New York somewhere between 1860 and 1868, this symphony was "illustrated"—was it at Niblo's?—by the introduction of real wheelbarrows and a ballet? It is my impression that I read such a statement in a review published in the New York "Tribune" of the Philharmonic concert November 28, 1868. At that time I was at school in New York, and was not Tostée singing in "La Grande Duchesse" that season? "I remember running away to thus snatch a fearful joy. If I am not mistaken, Aujac, Le Duc, Duchesne, Lagriffoul were in the company. Would that opera bouffe had now such interpreters in this country!

This reminds me that Lillian Russell will appear at the Hollis the 30th in "Giroflé-Girofla," and that "Utopia, Limited," will be sung at the Boston Museum May 14 by the present New York company.

* * *

Let us look for a moment at the summary of the Symphony season published in the program book. Beethoven leads, and his name occurs 14 times; Mozart and Wagner are credited with 8 numbers apiece; Brahms with 7; Schumann with 5; Mendelssohn, Berlioz and Liszt with 4 apiece; Rubinstein, Weber, Tschaikowsky, Schubert, with 3 apiece. Haydn's name appears twice, Händel twice, Bach once and Clayton Johns once. Other names are Massenet (2 and vocal), Saint-Saëns (2), Smetana (1), R. Strauss (1), Dvorák (2), Glinka (2), Gluck (2), Bruch (2), Volkmann (2), D'Albert (1), Bülow (1), Goetz (1), E. Hartmann (1), Loeffler (1), Molique (1), Paine (1).

Tschaikowsky's last symphony and Goldmark's "Sappho" were not put in rehearsal.

* * *

These were the soloists: Nordica, Eames, Kneisel (2), Schroeder (2), Mrs. Paur, Adamowski, Baermann, Materna, Busoni, Max Heinrich, Loeffler, Blauvelt, Schulz, Roth, Trebelli.

Neither Mr. de Pachmann nor Mr. Friedheim, nor Mr. Marteau appeared at these concerts during the season.

* * *

The symphonies were as follows: Beethoven, 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 and two movements of the 9th; Berlioz, Fantastic and three movements of "Romeo and Juliet;" Brahms, 1, 2, 4; Dvorák, "From the New World;" Goetz, F major; Haydn, No. 2 (B and H); Liszt, "Faust;" Mendelssohn, No. 3; Mozart, G minor, "Jupiter;" Rubinstein, "Dramatic;" Schubert, C major; Schumann, 1, 4; Strauss, F minor.

* * *

The Symphony program book states that the opening concert of the fourteenth season will be given October 13 and that Mr. Paur will be the conductor. I earnestly hope that during the next season Mr. Paur will present more interesting, more catholic and more strongly contrasted programs.

It is absolutely necessary to hear each season "Standard" symphonies and overtures like unto the books which "no gentleman's library should be without." Why cannot an Auber overture be given occasionally? And I agree heartily with Mr. Finck in deploring the neglect of Johann Strauss. Better by far a waltz by him than one of the pessimistic machines of Strauss, whose first name is Richard. Or why should Haydn be represented only by one or two symphonies? Or why should a suite by Massenet be tabooed? Why should we not have an opportunity of hearing Templeton Strong's "Sintram" symphony? Then there is a man named Peter Benoit.

PHILIP HALE.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1894.

MR. PAUR MUST GO.

IN Mr. Philip Hale's letter from Boston in our last issue you may read this in an interview with Mr. and Mrs. Paur:

"Everywhere in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur; "when we were in New York the last time friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

The stories referred to were of course about Mr. Paur's enforced resignation and approaching departure for Europe. We would like to know by what right Mr. Paur used the names of Messrs. Nikisch, Seidl and Damrosch in this case. It was, to say the least, impertinent and in bad taste. The three gentlemen named would not stoop to "sending out those stories." The fact of the matter is that the Paurs are provincial. Mr. Paur never held a first-class position as an orchestra conductor in Germany, and his sudden accession to good fortune has made him talk foolishly. He is not in the same class as Seidl, Nikisch or Gericke, and he commits a terrible breach of professional courtesy when he speaks as above quoted of fellow musicians.

Damrosch and Seidl are not sitting up at nights devising "those stories" to hurt the reputation of Mr. Paur. They have their own orchestras to look after. Besides "those stories" contain much that is probable. Colonel Higginson has grown very tired of his new man. Business has fallen off greatly, not only in New York, but even in Boston. The reason given for the abandonment of the customary spring tour was that Mr. Paur could not stand our sleeping cars. This is very funny. Mr. Nikisch, if we recollect aright, was averse to travel, but he traveled and conducted nevertheless. The plain truth of the matter is that the public is not interested in Mr. Paur's work and his terrible earnestness and rigid disciplinarianism do not compensate for a lack of magnetism and personal distinction. Mr. Paur must go. His stay may be prolonged longer than we wish, but public opinion here and in Boston will prove too strong.

As to the contract talk, that is nonsense. Colonel Higginson can force Mr. Paur to resign to-morrow. Mr. W. J. Henderson also took a hand in the controversy. In last Sunday's "Times" he had, among other things, the following to say:

The Boston "Saturday Evening Gazette," in commenting on this matter, seems to labor under the delusion that rigid discipline is all that is needed in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no doubt that the orchestra has steadily deteriorated in this important requirement since the day when Wilhelm Gericke laid down the baton. Mr. Nikisch's warmest admirers could not fail to see that in his efforts to attain power, warmth and variety he sacrificed the superb precision, the military unanimity which Mr. Gericke developed. That the falling off in these matters was in some measure due to a lack of discipline must have been patent to the most casual observer. But it was also due to the conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important effects.

Now Mr. Paur, with all due respect to the opinions of the wise men of Boston, has not advanced a single step toward the restoration of this fine precision. On the contrary under his lead the orchestra has about reached the level of the Brooklyn Philharmonic under Theodore Thomas. It plays smoothly, correctly, glibly if you like, but with deadly dullness. The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here are gone, and with these qualities have departed the eloquent phrasing, the wondrously significant accentuation of Mr. Nikisch. The fact is that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind. He is the personification of respectability. And that is all.

The "Saturday Evening Gazette" in a gentle way intimates that the welfare of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is none of New York's business. We regret to be forced into mild but firm dissent from this proposition. The first and most obvious reply to Boston is: "If your orchestra is none of our business, keep your orchestra at home." But it is not necessary to justify comment on the narrow ground that because the orchestra visits this city we have a right to talk about it. The New York "Times" has, since the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in New York, steadfastly maintained the opinion that it was the best concert orchestra in this country, and one of the best in the world. Since it has been regarded as the representative American orchestra, its welfare is of interest to every lover of music in the United States. For that reason this paper discusses it, and will continue to do so in spite of intimations from Boston that poaching on one's neighbor's preserves is reprehensible. The Boston Symphony Orchestra belongs to the United States, and the Hub will not be able to shut its greatness up within her provincial limits.

New York knows perfectly well what it wants as an orchestral conductor. New York does not want Theodore Thomas. New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go.

- PHOTOGRAPH -
ORIGINAL STORED
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

The Kneisel Quartet . . of Boston

Season 1893=94

Under the management of
C. A. ELLIS
Music Hall, Boston

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

THURSDAY, APRIL 26, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

J. K. PAINE. PRELUDE to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of SOPHOCLES, op. 35.

HANDEL. CONCERTO GROSSO, No. 10, in D minor.
I. Ouverture: Lento.—Allegro.
II. Air: Lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Allegro.
V. Allegro moderato.

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in C minor, No. 3.
Allegro con brio.—Largo.—Rondo: Allegro.

MOZART. SYMPHONY in C major. "Jupiter."
I. Allegro vivace.
II. Andante cantibile.
III. Menuetto: Allegretto.—Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

WEBER. OVERTURE. "Oberon."

Soloist:

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The Kneisel Quartet was organized in 1884 by Franz Kneisel, who came to America in that year to accept an appointment as Concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to establish a series of Chamber Music Concerts in Boston, to be of the same high standard as those of the larger organization.

The Quartet includes the leading Viola and the leading 'Cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is made up of the following artists:

Franz Kneisel, 1st Violin.
Otto Roth, 2d Violin.
L. Svecenski, Viola.
Alwin Schroeder, Violoncello.

Its annual series of concerts in Boston, New York, and other cities attract the attention of connoisseurs and professionals alike, and have been pronounced by the most exacting critics to be unexcelled by those of any similar organization in the world.

. . Press Notices . .

.....

"In all these works the playing of Mr. Kneisel and his fellows was quite beyond praise, altogether lovely in tone and sentiment, and finished in execution. The audience was rapturous in its applause after each movement."—N. Y. Tribune.

.....

"It is not too much to say that the Beethoven quartet was played divinely."—N. Y. Times.

.....

"This Quartet [Kneisel] is the greatest in America; and, allied to its beauty of tone production,—a true quartet tone,—its interpretations are always significant and truthful."—N. Y. Recorder.

.....

"Everything that Messrs. Kneisel, Roth, Svecenski, and Schroeder select is sure to be well played."—N. Y. Evening Post.

.....

"The fifth quartet of the series which forms Beethoven's Op. 18 was given with a perfection that aroused the audience (which was as large as the hall would allow) to the most fervid applause at the end of each movement. Such marvellous ensemble, such exquisite shading, require something more graphic than type for adequate description."—Boston Advertiser.

.....

"The Dvořák quartet was given with a perfection that makes all criticism ridiculous. Never have the Kneisels done a finer piece of artistic work."—Boston Transcript.

.....

"It is no hyperbole to say that the playing of the Kneisel Quartet at their fourth concert was perfect."—Boston Beacon.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, April 11, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

6

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1894:::::

Tuesday Evening, April 3, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The : : Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL.
OTTO ROTH.
L. SVECENSKI.
ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Miss Marie Geselschap, assisting.

Programme.

DITTERSDORF. (1737-1799.)
QUARTET in E flat major.
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto, (non troppo presto).
Finale. (Allegro vivace.)

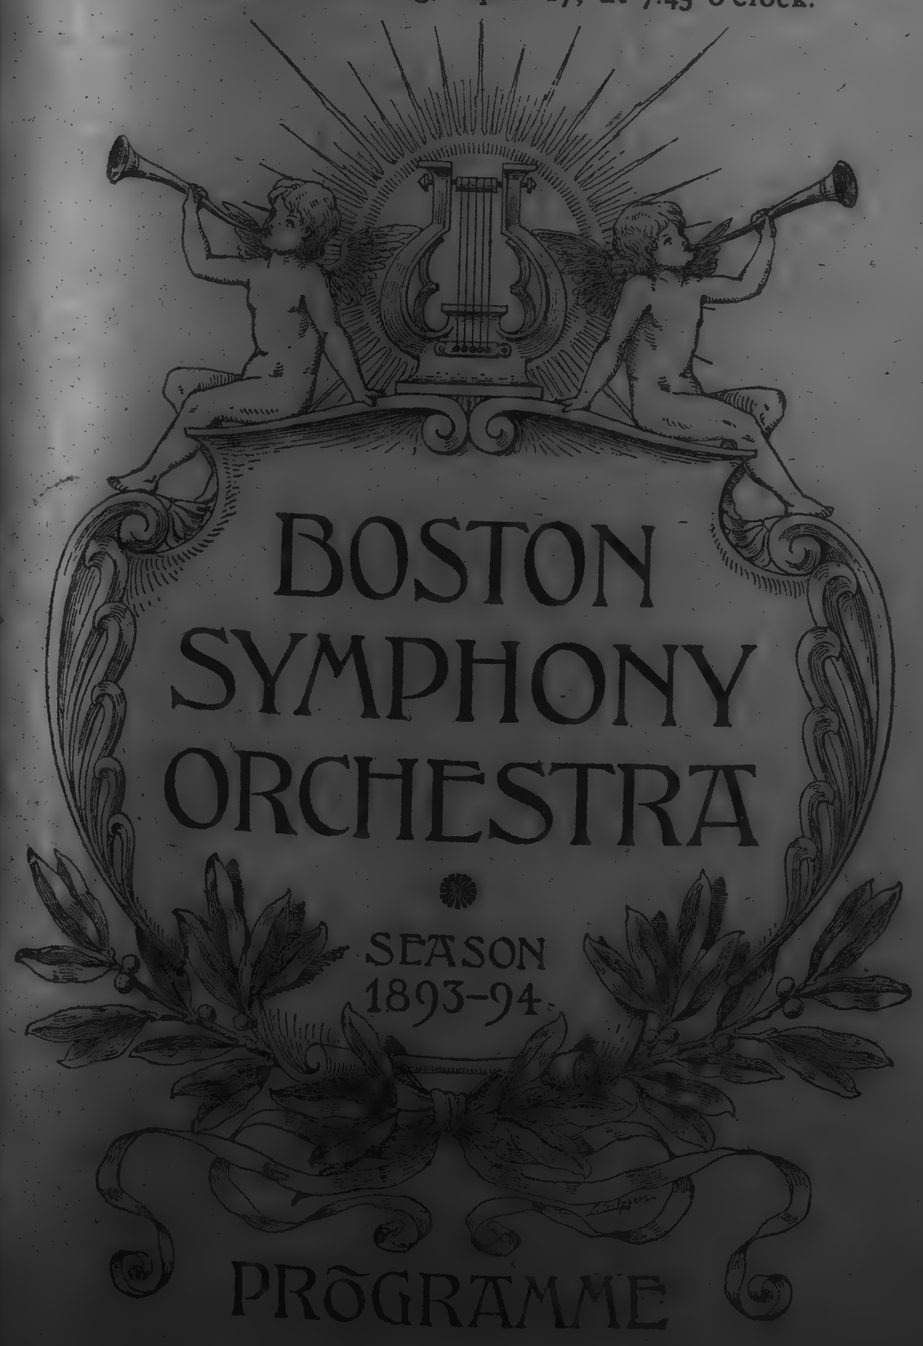
GRIEG.
SONATA for PIANO and VIOLONCELLO in A minor, op. 36.
Allegro agitato.—Andante molto tranquillo.—
Allegro.—Allegro molto e marcato.

BEETHOVEN.
QUARTET No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.
Allegro.—Molto adagio.—
Allegretto.—Finale. Presto.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The date of the next Concert is April 24.

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, April 17, at 7.45 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 5, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LOUIS ADOLPHE COERNE. HIAWATHA: SYMPHONIC POEM, op. 18.
(after the "Song of Hiawatha." by Longfellow.)
I. Hiawatha's birth and childhood; his struggle with his Father Mudjekeewis, the West-Wind.
II. Hiawatha's wooing of Minnehaha.
III. Dance of Pau-puk-keewis and Song of Chibiabos at the Wedding Feast.
IV. a) Death of Minnehaha.
b) "The White Man's Foot."
(CONDUCTED BY THE COMPOSER.)
(First time in America.)
Solo Violin: MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

C. M. LOEFFLER.
FANTASTIC CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA. (MS.)
Allegro.—Adagio.—Allegro.—
Theme Russe: Poco allegretto.—Presto.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor, (Scotch.) op. 56.
I. Introduction: Andante con moto.—
Allegro un poco agitato.
II. Vivace non troppo.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivacissimo.—Allegro maestoso assai.

Soloist:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

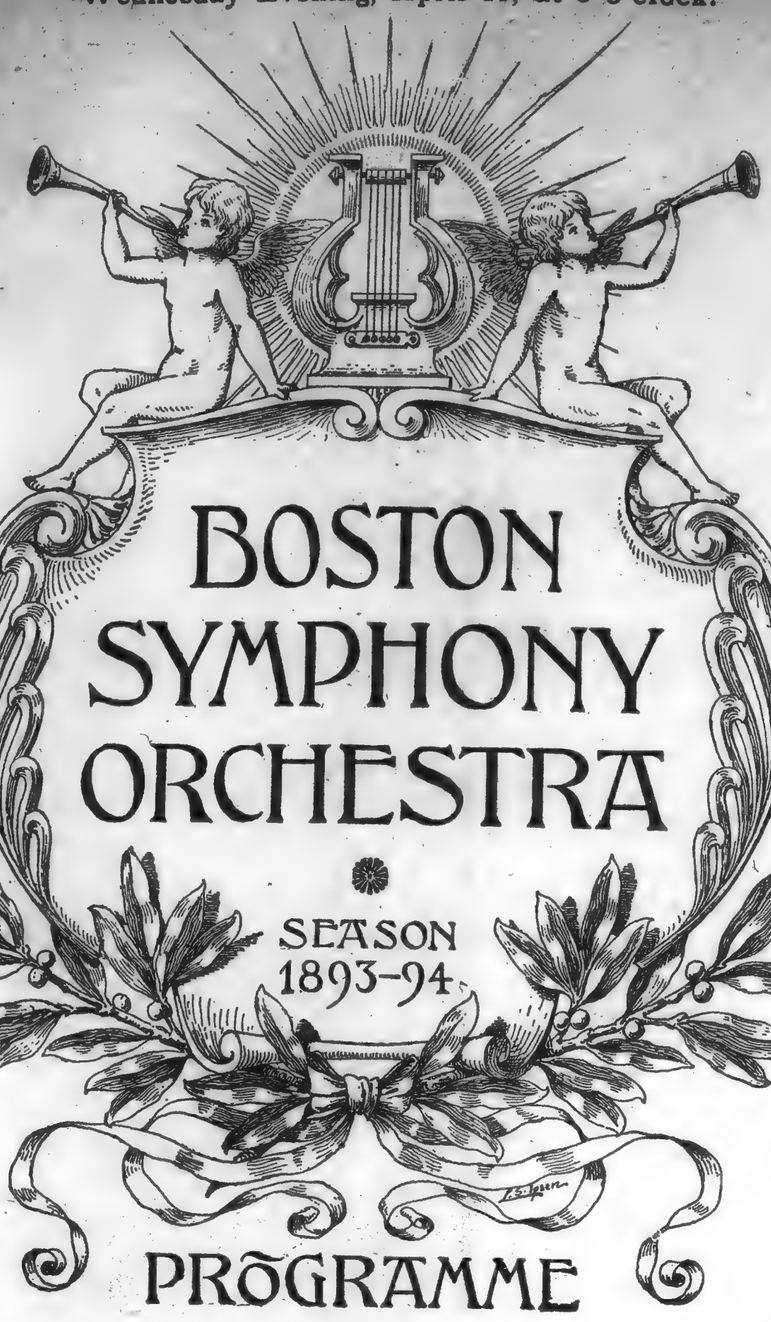
The Tenth and last Concert will be Thursday, April 26.

The Mason and Hamlin "Liszt" Organ used at this Concert.

[126]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, April 11, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94.

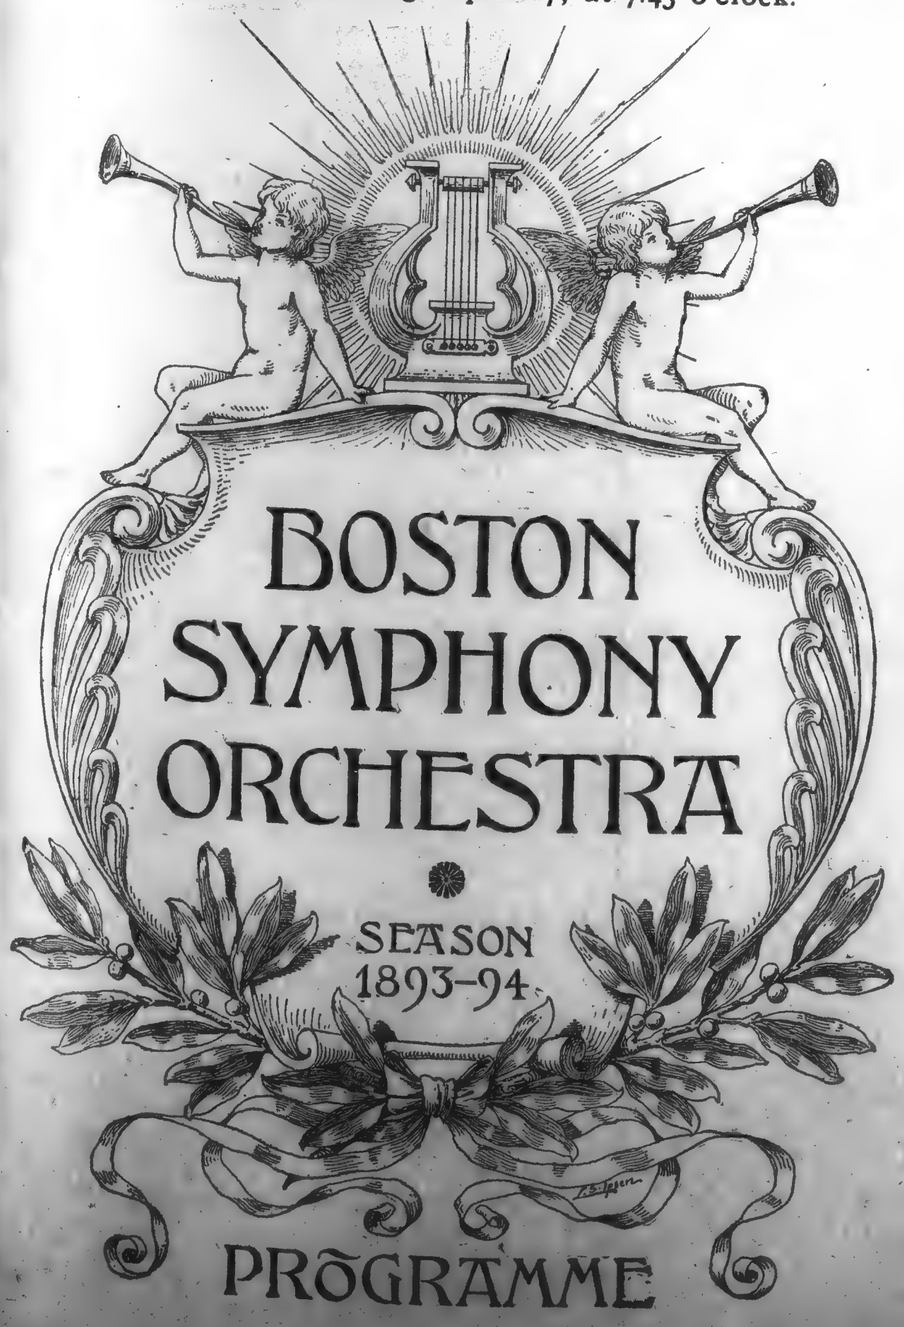
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

6

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, April 17, at 7.45 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

::::1894::::

Tuesday Evening, April 3, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The : : Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL.
OTTO ROTH.
L. SVECENSKI.
ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Miss Marie Geselschap, assisting.

Programme.

DITTERSDORF. (1737-1799.) QUARTET in E flat major.
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto (non troppo presto).
Finale.—Allegro vivace.

GRIEG. SONATA for PIANO and VIOLONCELLO in A minor, op. 36.
Allegro agitato.—Andante molto tranquillo.—
Allegro.—Allegro molto e marcato.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.
Allegro.—Molto adagio.—
Allegretto.—Finale.—Presto.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The date of the next Concert is April 24.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 5, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LOUIS ADOLPHE COERNE. HIAWATHA: SYMPHONIC POEM, op. 18.
(after the "Song of Hiawatha," by Longfellow.)
I. Hiawatha's birth and childhood; his struggle with his Father Mudjekeewis, the West-Wind.
II. Hiawatha's wooing of Minnehaha.
III. Dance of Pau-puk-keewis and Song of Chibiabos at the Wedding Feast.
IV. a, Death of Minnehaha.
b, "The White Man's Foot."
(CONDUCTED BY THE COMPOSER.)
(First time in America.)
Solo Violin: MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

C. M. LOEFFLER. FANTASTIC CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA. (MS.)
Allegro.—Adagio.—Allegro.—
Theme Russe: Poco allegretto.—Presto.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor, (Scotch.) op. 56.
I. Introduction: Andante con moto.—
Allegro un poco agitato.
II. Vivace non troppo.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivacissimo.—Allegro maestoso assai.

Soloist:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Tenth and last Concert will be Thursday, April 26.

The Mason and Hamlin "Liszt" Organ used at this Concert.

[126]

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, April 11, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

6

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1894:::::

Tuesday Evening, April 3, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The : : Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL.
OTTO ROTH.
L. SVECENSKI.
ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Miss Marie Geselschap, assisting.

Programme.

DITTERSDORF. (1737-1799.)
QUARTET in E flat major.
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto, (non troppo presto).
Finale. (Allegro vivace.)

GRIEG.
SONATA for PIANO and VIOLONCELLO in A minor, op. 36.
Allegro agitato.—Andante molto tranquillo.—
Allegro.—Allegro molto e marcato.

BEETHOVEN.
QUARTET No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.
Allegro.—Molto adagio.—
Allegretto.—Finale. Presto.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The date of the next Concert is April 24.

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, April 17, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

6

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 5, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LOUIS ADOLPHE COERNE. HIAWATHA: SYMPHONIC POEM, op. 18.
(after the "Song of Hiawatha." by Longfellow.)
I. Hiawatha's birth and childhood; his struggle with his Father Mudjekeewis, the West-Wind.
II. Hiawatha's wooing of Minnehaha.
III. Dance of Pau-puk-keewis and Song of Chibiabos at the Wedding Feast.
IV. a) Death of Minnehaha.
b) "The White Man's Foot."
(CONDUCTED BY THE COMPOSER.)
(First time in America.)
Solo Violin: MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

C. M. LOEFFLER. FANTASTIC CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA. (MS.)
Allegro.—Adagio.—Allegro.—
Theme Russe: Poco allegretto.—Presto.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor, (Scotch.) op. 56.
I. Introduction: Andante con moto.—Allegro un poco agitato.
II. Vivace non troppo.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivacissimo.—Allegro maestoso assai.

Soloist:

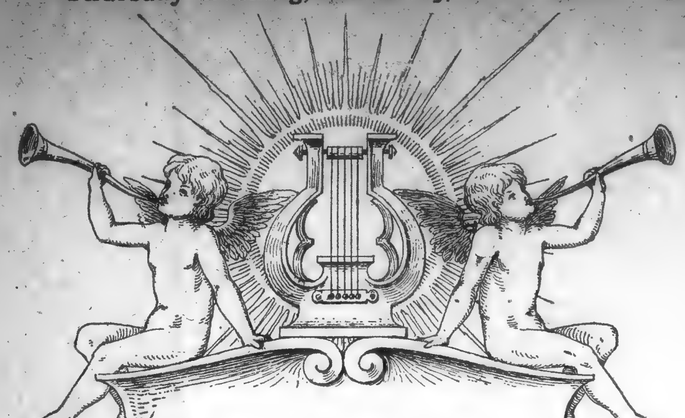
MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Tenth and last Concert will be Thursday, April 26.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,

Thursday Evening, March 29, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

5

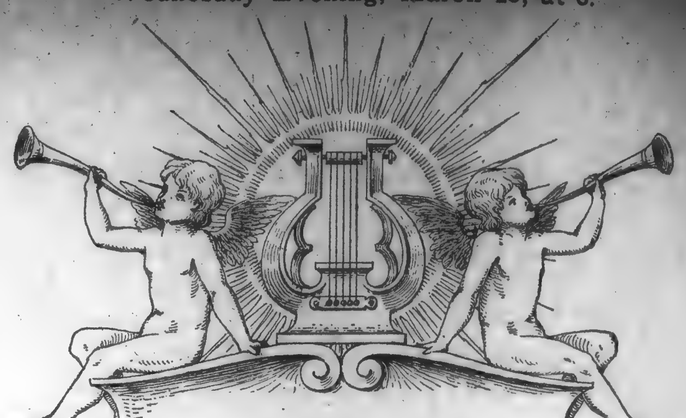
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules of Carnegie Music Hall forbid their distribution at the hall.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, March 28, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Mar. 30, at 3. Saturday Evening, Mar. 31, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE.

Tuesday Afternoon, March 27, at 3 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

[127]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, WORCESTER.
Tuesday Evening, March 13, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.
Monday Evening, March 26, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, March 19, at 8.

Eighth Concert

(The Last of the Season.)

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

DITTERSDORF. (1737-1799.)
QUARTET in E flat major.
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto, (non troppo presto).
Finale. (Allegro vivace).

BEETHOVEN.
QUARTET No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.
Allegro.—Molto adagio.—
Allegretto.—Finale. Presto.

DVOŘÁK.
QUINTET in E flat major, op. 97.
Allegro ma non tanto.—Allegro vivo.—
Andante.—Finale.
(MS.) (First time.)
Second Viola; MR. MAX ZACH.

[128]

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

:::::1894:::::

Wednesday Evening, March 21, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The : : Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL. L. SVECENSKI.
OTTO ROTH. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mrs. Emil Paur, assisting.

Programme.

HAYDN.
QUARTET in G minor, op. 74, No. 3.
Allegro.—Largo assai.—Menuetto (allegretto.)
Finale (allegro con brio.)

BRAHMS.
TRIO, for PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN, and VIOLONCELLO, in B major, op. 8.
Allegro con moto.—Scherzo, allegro molto.—
Adagio non troppo.—Finale. Allegro molto agitato.

DVOŘÁK.
QUARTET in F major, op. 96. (MS.)
Allegro ma non troppo.—Lento.—
Molto vivace.—Finale (vivace.)

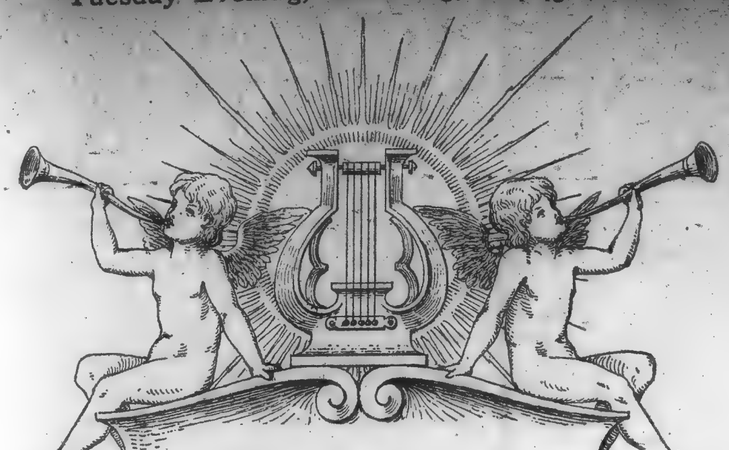
The Piano is a Steinway.

The date of the next Concert is April 3.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, WORCESTER,

Tuesday Evening, March 13, at 7.45 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

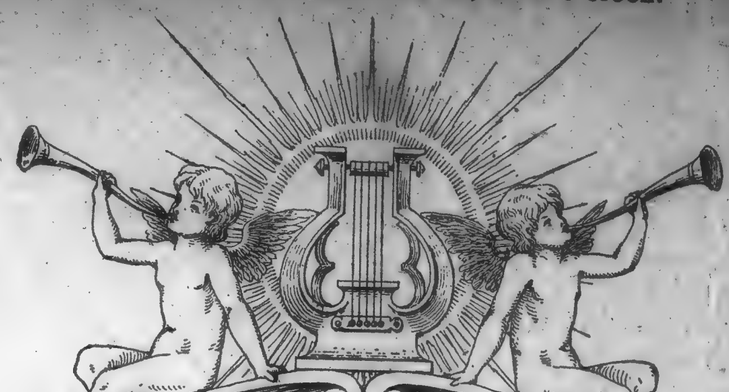
C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . . WASHINGTON,

Monday Evening, March 26, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R, COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, March 19, at 8.

Eighth Concert

(The Last of the Season.)

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

DITTERSDORF. (1735-1799.)
QUARTET in E flat major.
Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto. (non troppo presto).
Finale. (Allegro vivace).

BEETHOVEN.
QUARTET No. 2, in E minor, op. 59.
Allegro.—Molto adagio.—
Allegretto.—Finale. Presto.

DVOŘÁK.
QUINTET in E flat major, op. 97.
Allegro ma non tanto.—Allegro vivo.—
Andante.—Finale.
(MS.) (First time.)
Second Viola; MR. MAX ZACH.

[128]

BRATTLE HALL, : : CAMBRIDGE.

::::1894::::

Wednesday Evening, March 21, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The : : Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL.
OTTO ROTH.
L. SVECENSKI.
ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mrs. Emil Paur, assisting.

Programme.

HAYDN.
QUARTET in G minor, op. 74, No. 3.
Allegro.—Largo assai.—Menuetto (allegretto.)
Finale (allegro con brio.)

BRAHMS.
TRIO, for PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN, and VIOLONCELLO, in B major, op. 8.
Allegro con moto.—Scherzo, allegro molto.—
Adagio non troppo.—Finale. Allegro molto agitato.

DVOŘÁK.
QUARTET in F major, op. 96. (MS.)
Allegro ma non troppo.—Lento.—
Molto vivace.—Finale (vivace.)

The Piano is a Steinway.

The date of the next Concert is April 3.

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, March 5, at 8.

Seventh Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Charles Molé.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SERENADE for FLUTE, VIOLIN, and VIOLA, in D major, op. 25.
Entrata (Allegro).—Tempo ordinario d'un Menuetto.—Allegro molto.—Andante con Variazioni.—Adagio.—Allegro vivace e disinvolto.

BRAHMS. QUARTET, in A minor, op. 51.
Allegro non troppo.—Andante moderato.—Quasi Minuetto, moderato.—Finale (Allegro non assai).

HAYDN. QUARTET, in C major, op. 33, No. 3.
Allegro moderato.—Scherzo (Allegretto).—Adagio.—Finale (Presto).

The Eighth Concert will be March 19.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ. SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE in C major, op. 14A.
I. RÊVERIES—PASSIONS: Largo.—Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. UN BAL: Valse, Allegro non troppo.
III. SCÈNE AUX CHAMPS: Adagio.
IV. MARCHE AU SUPPLICE: Allegretto non troppo.
V. SONGE D'UNE NUIT DU SABBAT: Larghetto.—Allegro.

CHABRIER. ENTR'ACTE, from "Gwendoline."

RUBINSTEIN. BALLET-MUSIC, from "Feramors."
I. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire; moderato con moto (D minor.)
II. Dance of Bayaderes I. Allegretto (B flat major.)

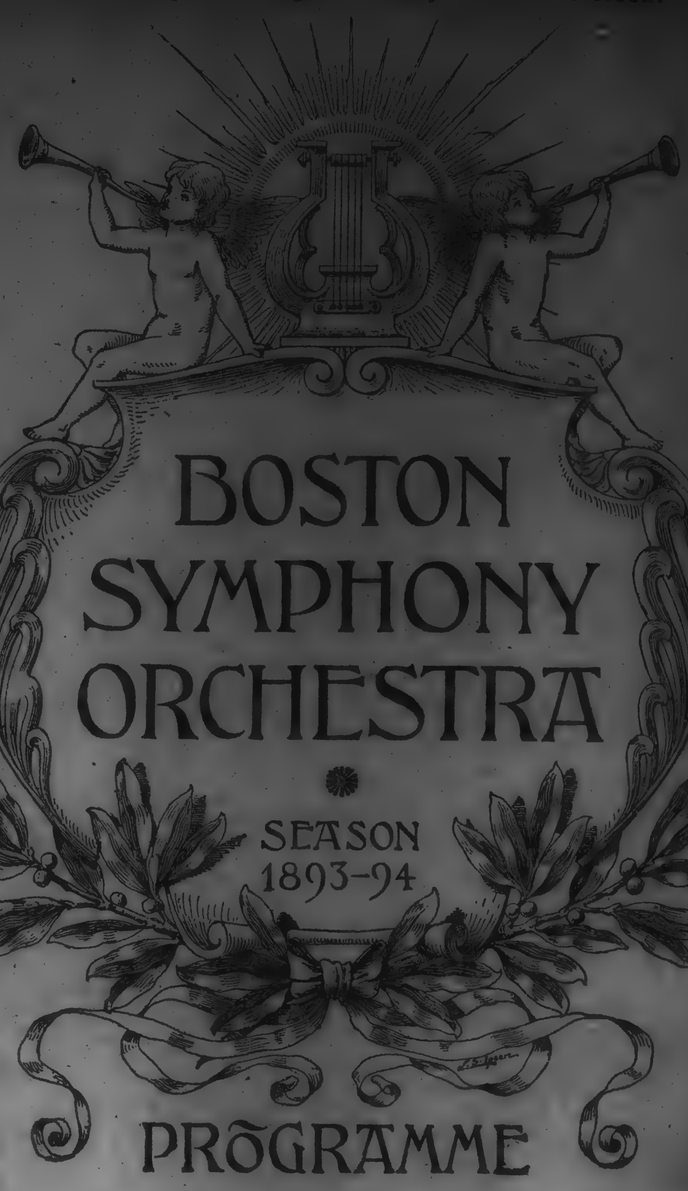
SCHUMANN. OVERTURE. "Manfred."

The Ninth Concert will be Thursday, April 5.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 28, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ. SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE in C major, op. 14A.
I. RÊVERIES—PASSIONS: Largo.—Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. UN BAL: Valse, Allegro non troppo.
III. SCÈNE AUX CHAMPS: Adagio.
IV. MARCHE AU SUPPLICE: Allegretto non troppo.
V. SONGE D'UNE NUIT DU SABBAT: Larghetto.—Allegro.

CHABRIER. ENTR'ACTE, from "Gwendoline."

RUBINSTEIN. BALLET-MUSIC, from "Feramors."
I. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire; moderato con moto (D minor.)
II. Dance of Bayaderes I. Allegretto (B flat major.)

SCHUMANN. OVERTURE. "Manfred."

The Ninth Concert will be Thursday, April 5.

[129]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, March 5, at 8.

Seventh Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Charles Molé.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SERENADE for FLUTE, VIOLIN, and VIOLA, in D major, op. 25.
Entrata (Allegro).—Tempo ordinario d'un Menuetto.—Allegro molto.—Andante con Variazioni.—Adagio.—Allegro vivace e disinvolto.

BRAHMS. QUARTET, in A minor, op. 51.
Allegro non troppo.—Andante moderato.—Quasi Minuetto, moderato.—Finale (Allegro non assai).

HAYDN. QUARTET, in C major, op. 33, No. 3.
Allegro moderato.—Scherzo (Allegretto).—Adagio.—Finale (Presto).

The Eighth Concert will be March 19.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, February 28, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ. SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE in C major, op. 14A.
I. RÊVERIES—PASSIONS: Largo.—Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. UN BAL: Valse. Allegro non troppo.
III. SCÈNE AUX CHAMPS: Adagio.
IV. MARCHE AU SUPPLICE: Allegretto non troppo.
V. SONGE D'UNE NUIT DU SABBAT: Larghetto.—Allegro

CHABRIER. ENTR'ACTE, from "Gwendoline."

RUBINSTEIN. BALLET-MUSIC, from "Feramors."
I. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire: moderato con moto (D minor.)
II. Dance of Bayaderes I. Allegretto (B flat major.)

SCHUMANN. OVERTURE. "Manfred."

The Ninth Concert will be Thursday, April 5.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ. SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE in C major, op. 14A.
I. RÊVERIES—PASSIONS: Largo.—Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. UN BAL: Valse. Allegro non troppo.
III. SCÈNE AUX CHAMPS: Adagio.
IV. MARCHE AU SUPPLICE: Allegretto non troppo.
V. SONGE D'UNE NUIT DU SABBAT: Larghetto.—Allegro

CHABRIER. ENTR'ACTE, from "Gwendoline."

RUBINSTEIN. BALLET-MUSIC, from "Feramors."
I. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire: moderato con moto (D minor.)
II. Dance of Bayaderes I. Allegretto (B flat major.)

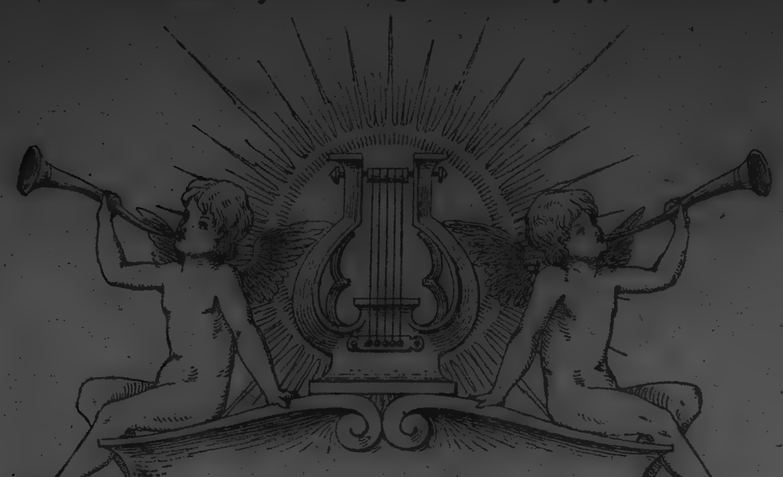
SCHUMANN. OVERTURE. "Manfred."

The Ninth Concert will be Thursday, April 5.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, February 7, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street

---

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, February 12, at 8.

Sixth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Programme.

ARTHUR FOOTE. — QUARTET, in E major, op. 32.
Allegro comodo.—Scherzo, (Vivace).—
Andante un poco con moto.—Allegro con fuoco.
(MS. first time.)

BEETHOVEN. — QUARTET, in C major, op. 59, No. 3.
Introduzione, (Andante con moto). Allegro vivace.—
Andante con moto quasi allegretto.—
Menuetto (Grazioso).—Allegro molto.

RAFF. — PIANO TRIO, in G major, op. 112.
Rasch, froh bewegt.—Sehr rasch.—
Mässig langsam.—Rasch durchaus belebt.

The Piano is a Chickering.

The Seventh Concert will be March 5.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PROGRAMME.

BACH. — SUITE No. 2, in B minor, for STRING ORCHESTRA and FLUTE.
I. Overture.—Largo.—Allegro.—Largo.
II. Rondeau.
III. Sarabande.
IV. Bourrée I., alternateivement.—Bourrée.
V. Polonaise.
VI. Double.
VII. Badinerie.

HAYDN. — SYMPHONY in D major. (No. 2, B. and H.)
Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—
Minuet.—Allegro spiritoso.

BRUCH. — "KOL NIDREI." for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 47.

WEBER. — OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

MR. LEO SCHULZ.

The Eighth Concert will be Thursday, March 8.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

(ONLY APPEARANCE THIS SEASON.)

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

H. GOETZ. — SYMPHONY in F major, op. 9.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

BIZET. — ARIA, "Pearl Fishers."

VOLKMANN. — SERENADE for STRINGS, No. 3, in D minor, op 69.
Larghetto non troppo.
Violoncello Solo; MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

RUBINSTEIN. — BALLET-MUSIC from "Feramors."
I. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire: Moderato con moto.
II. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto.

GOUNOD. — VALSE. "Roméo et Juliette."

BERLIOZ. — OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini."

Soloist:

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

[130]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, February 7, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street

---

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BACH. SUITE No. 2, in B minor, for STRING ORCHESTRA and FLUTE.
I. Overture.—Largo.—Allegro.—Largo.
II. Rondeau.
III. Sarabande.
IV. Bourrée I., alternateivement.—Bourrée.
V. Polonaise.
VI. Double.
VII. Badinerie.

HAYDN. SYMPHONY in D major. (No. 2, B. and H.)
Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—
Minuet.—Allegro spiritoso.

BRUCH. "KOL NÌDREI." for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 47.

WEBER. OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

MR. LEO SCHULZ.

The Eighth Concert will be Thursday, March 8.

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, February 12, at 8.

Sixth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin.
L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Programme.

ARTHUR FOOTE. QUARTET, in E major, op. 32.
Allegro comodo.—Scherzo. (Vivace).—
Andante un poco con moto.—Allegro con fuoco.
(MS. first time.)

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET, in C major, op. 59, No. 3.
Introduzione, (Andante con moto). Allegro vivace.—
Andante con moto quasi allegretto.—
Menuetto (Grazioso).—Allegro molto.

RAFF. PIANO TRIO, in G major, op. 112.
Rasch, froh bewegt.—Sehr rasch.—
Mässig langsam.—Rasch durchaus leicht

The Piano is a Chickering

The Seventh Concert will be March 5.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94.

CONCERT

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

ONLY APPEARANCE THIS SEASON

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

H. GOETZ. SYMPHONY in F major, op. 9.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento
IV. Finale. Allegro con fuoco.

BIZET. ARIA, "Pearl Fishers."

VOLKMANN. SERENADE for STRINGS, No. 3, in D minor, op 69.
Larghetto non troppo.
Violoncello Solo: MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

RUBINSTEIN. BALLET-MUSIC from "Feramors."
I. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire
Moderato con moto.
II. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto.

GOUNOD. VALSE. "Roméo et Juliette."

BERLIOZ. OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini."

Soloist:

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

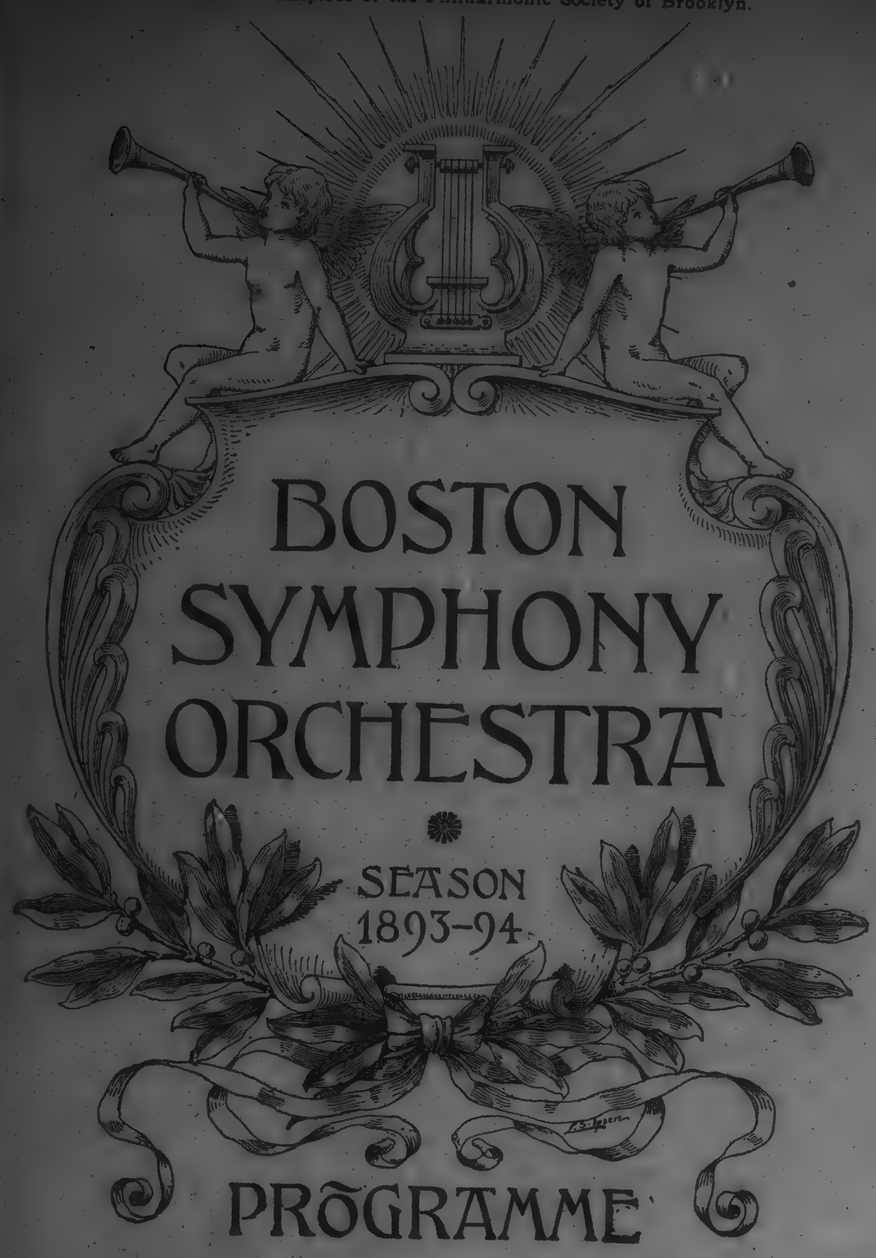
[130]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Feb. 9, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

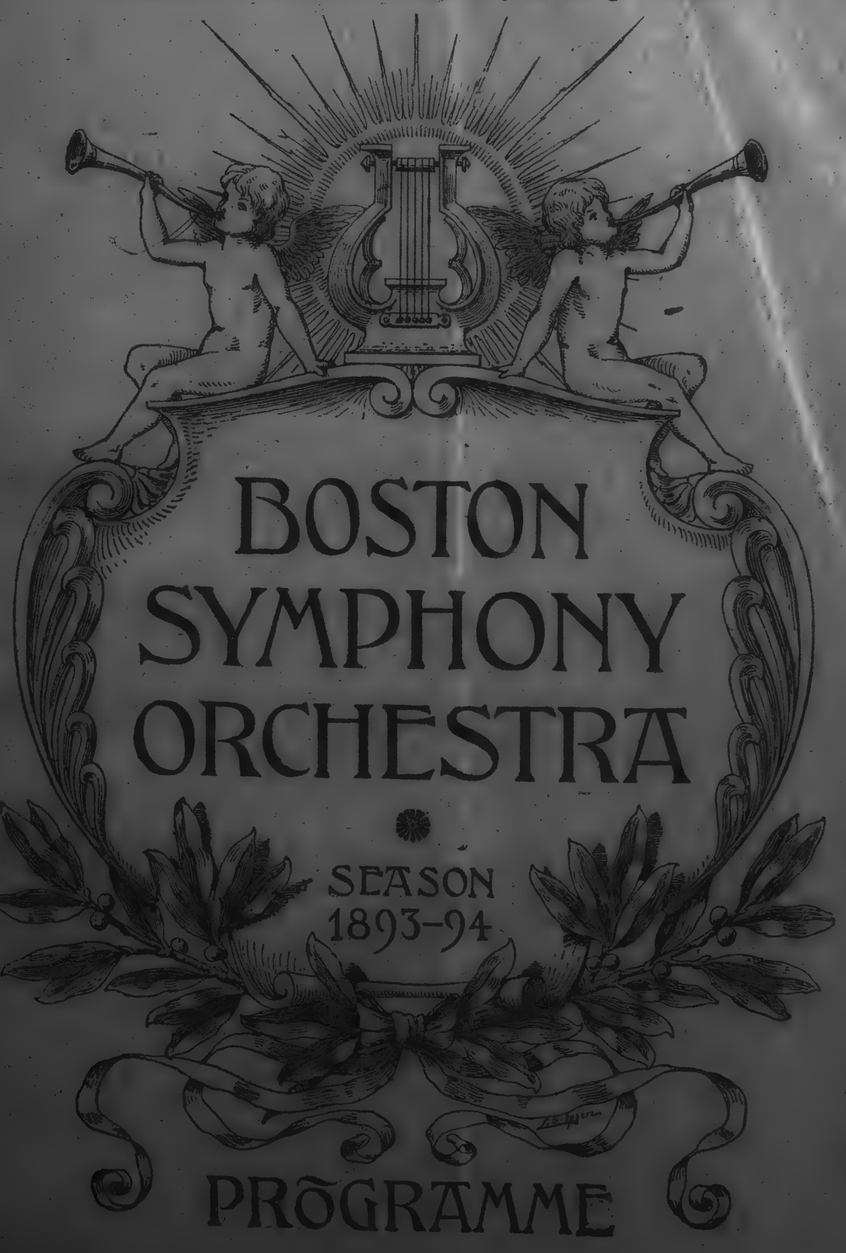
C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE,

Tuesday Afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

Grand Orchestra.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
CONDUCTOR

SOLOISTS.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER. MONS. CH. MOLÉ

Program

1 OVERTURE. "Euryanthe." Weber

2 SERENADE IN D MINOR Volkmann

CELLO SOLO. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

3 SIEGFRIED IDYL. Wagner

4 SOLO FOR FLUTE. "Tremolo." Demessermann

MONS. CH. MOLÉ.

5 INTERMEZZO. "Naila." Delibes

6 BALLET MUSIC. "Rosamunde." Schubert

7 OVERTURE. "Rosamunde." Schubert

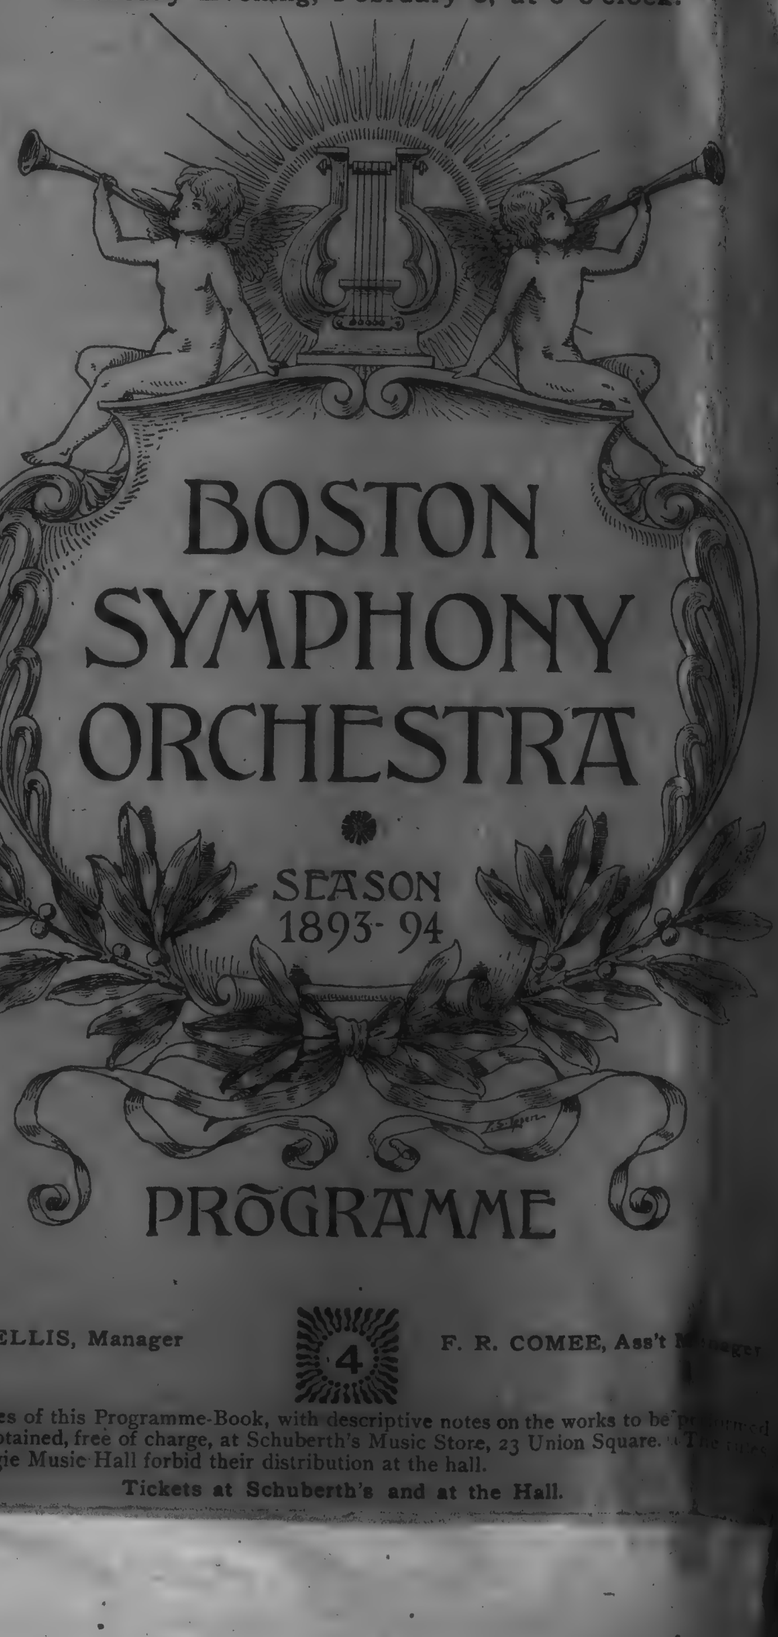
WEDNESDAY EVENING,
JANUARY 31, 1894.

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,

Thursday Evening, February 8, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules of Carnegie Music Hall forbid their distribution at the hall.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Hall.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Feb. 9, at 3. Saturday Evening, Feb. 10, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE,

Tuesday Afternoon, February 6, at 3 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

Grand Orchestra.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL,
CONDUCTOR

SOLOISTS.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER. MONS. CH. MOLÉ

Program

1 OVERTURE. "Euryanthe." Weber

2 SERENADE IN D MINOR Volkmann

CELLO SOLO, MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

3 SIEGFRIED IDYL. Wagner

4 SOLO FOR FLUTE. "Tremolo." Demessermann

MONS. CH. MOLÉ.

5 INTERMEZZO. "Naila." Delibes

6 BALLET MUSIC. "Rosamunde." Schubert

7 OVERTURE. "Rosamunde." Schubert

WEDNESDAY EVENING,
JANUARY 31, 1894.

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,

Thursday Evening, February 8, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules of Carnegie Music Hall forbid their distribution at the hall.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Hall.

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, January 22, at 8.

Fifth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E flat major, op. 127.
Maestoso.—Allegro teneramente.—
Adagio ma non troppo e molto cantabile.—
Scherzando vivace.—Finale.

DVOŘÁK. FOUR LOVE-SONGS, op. 83.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard.

BEACH. ROMANZA for VIOLIN with Piano Accompaniment.
(MS. first time.)

SCHUMANN. PIANO QUINTET in E flat major op. 44.
Allegro brillante.—In modo d'una marcia.—
Scherzo (molto vivace).—Allegro ma non troppo.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The Sixth Concert will be February 12.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. SERENADE, No. 7, in D major "Haffner."
I. Allegro maestoso.—Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto.—Trio.
IV. Rondo: Allegro.
VIII. Adagio.—Allegro assai.
Violin Obligato; MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

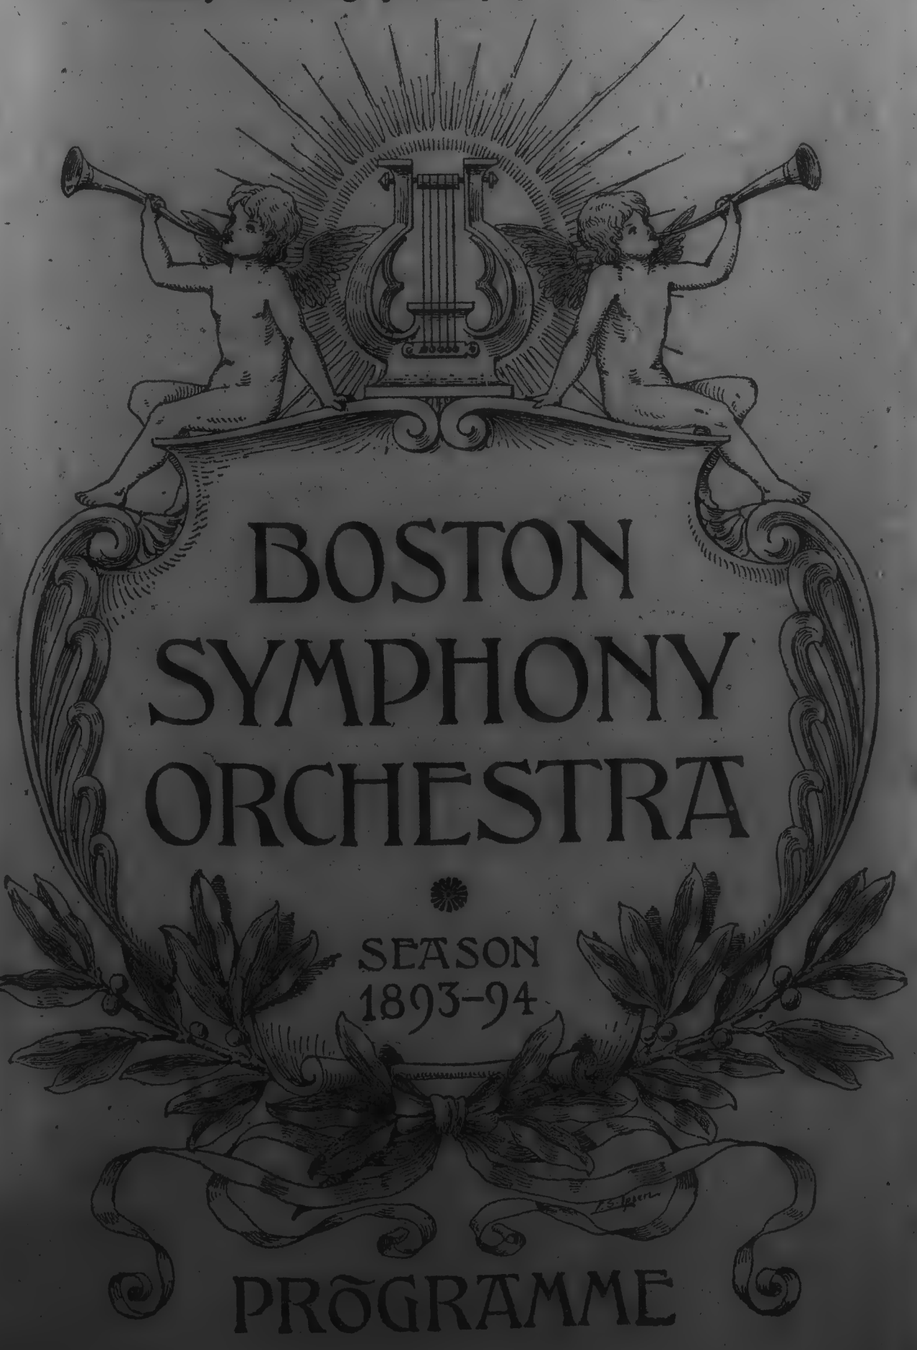
BRAHMS. AKADEMISCHE FEST-OUVERTURE, in C minor, op. 80.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro.
IV. Allegro.

The Seventh Concert will be Thursday, February 15.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, January 30, at 7.45 o'clock.

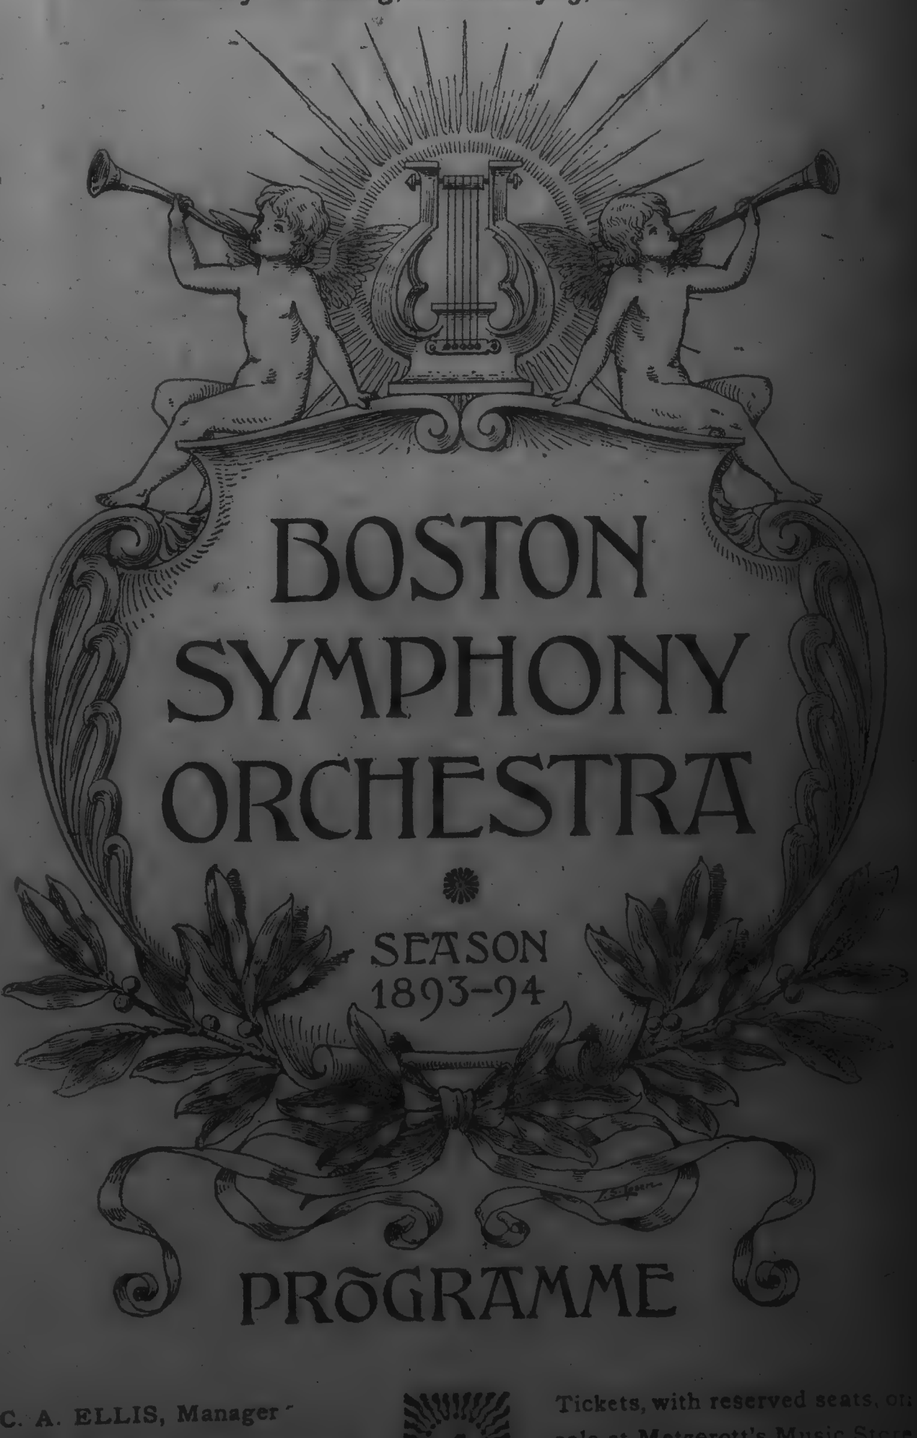


C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Monday Evening, February 5, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, January 22, at 8.

Fifth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Mr. Eliot Hubbard.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in E flat major, op. 127.
Maestoso.—Allegro teneramente.—
Adagio ma non troppo e molto cantabile.—
Scherzando vivace.—Finale.

DVOŘÁK. FOUR LOVE-SONGS, op. 83.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard.

BEACH. ROMANZA for VIOLIN with Piano Accompaniment.
(MS. first time.)

SCHUMANN. PIANO QUINTET in E flat major op. 44.
Allegro brillante.—In modo d'una marcia.—
Scherzo (molto vivace) —Allegro ma non troppo.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The Sixth Concert will be February 12.

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, January 30, at 7.45 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART. SERENADE, No. 7, in D major "Haffner."
I. Allegro maestoso.—Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto.—Trio.
IV. Rondo: Allegro.
VIII. Adagio.—Allegro assai.
Violin Obligato; MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

BRAHMS. AKADEMISCHE FEST-OUVERTURE, in C minor, op. 80.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro
IV Allegro

The Seventh Concert will be Thursday, February 15.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Monday Evening, February 5, at 8 o'clock.

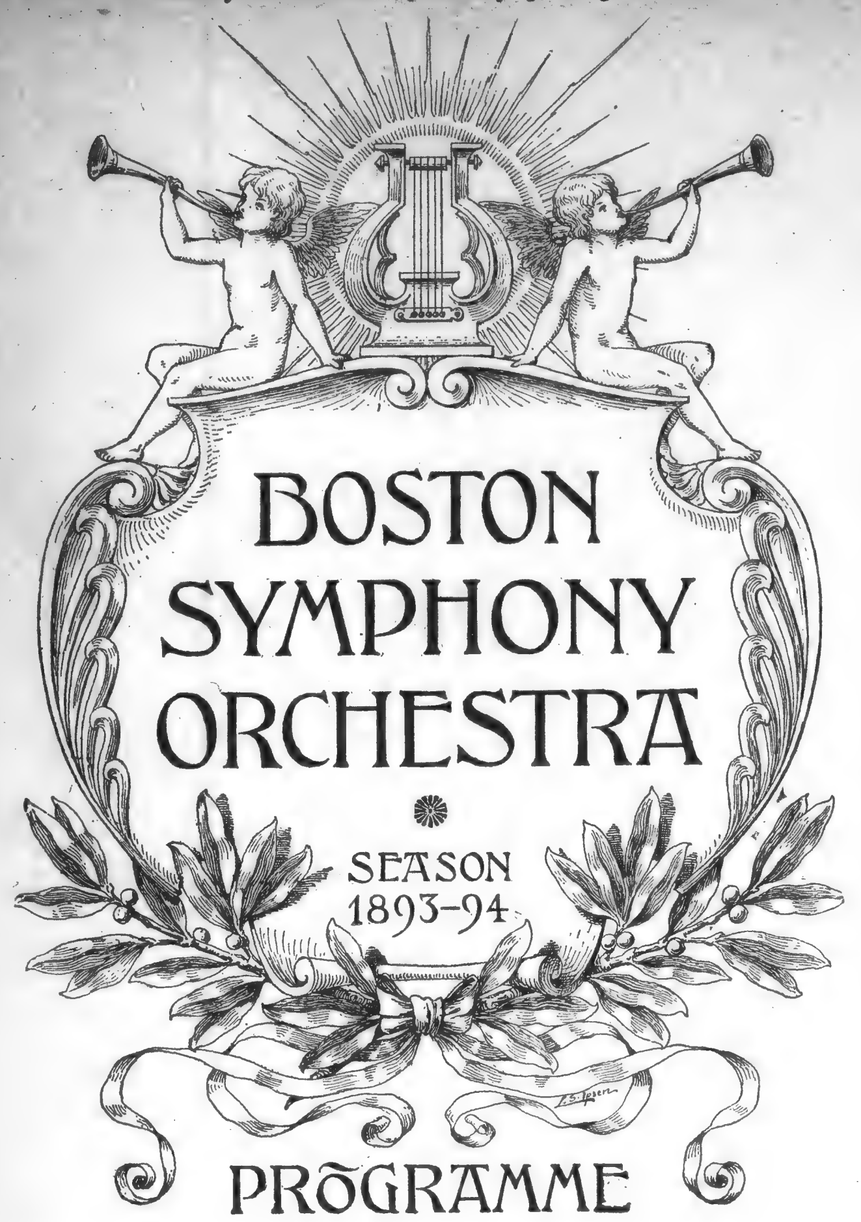
C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE,
Tuesday Afternoon, January 9, at 3 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,
Friday Afternoon, Jan. 12, at 3. Saturday Evening, Jan. 13, at 8.15.
Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

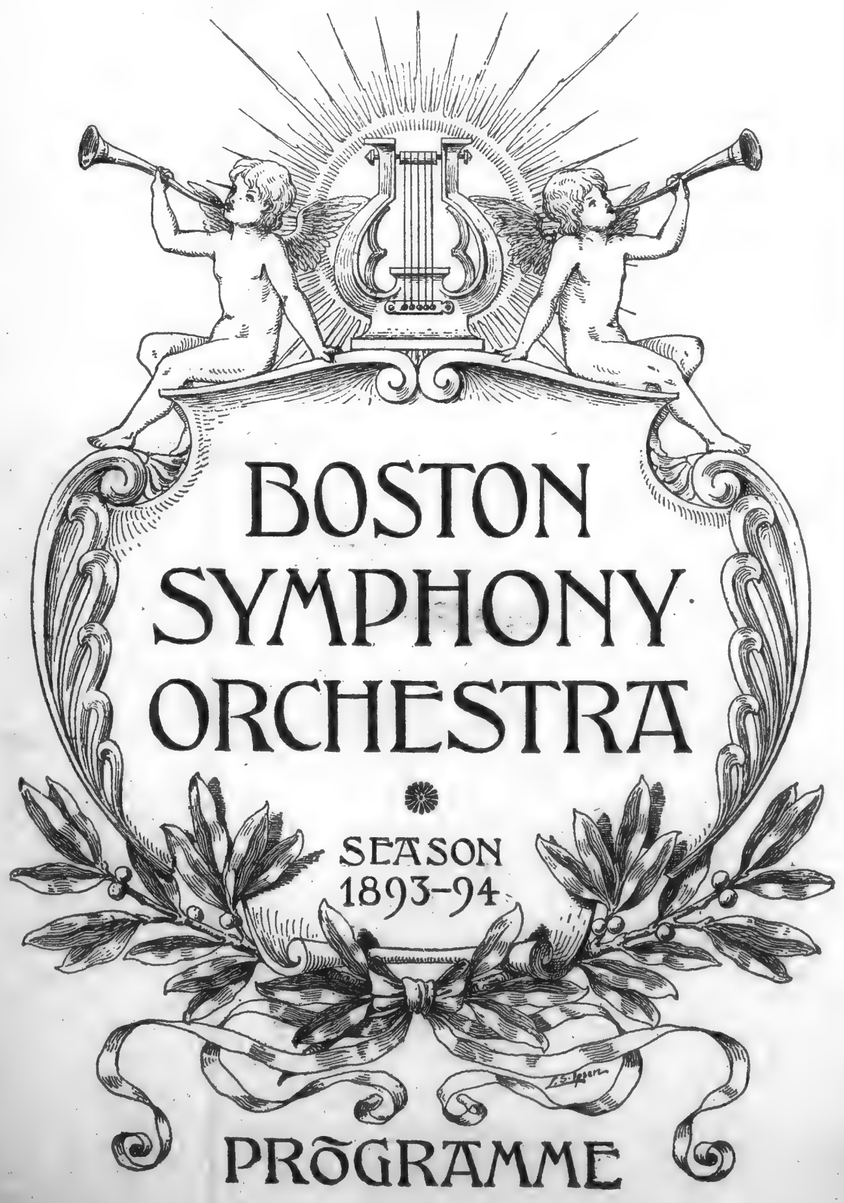
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, January 17, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

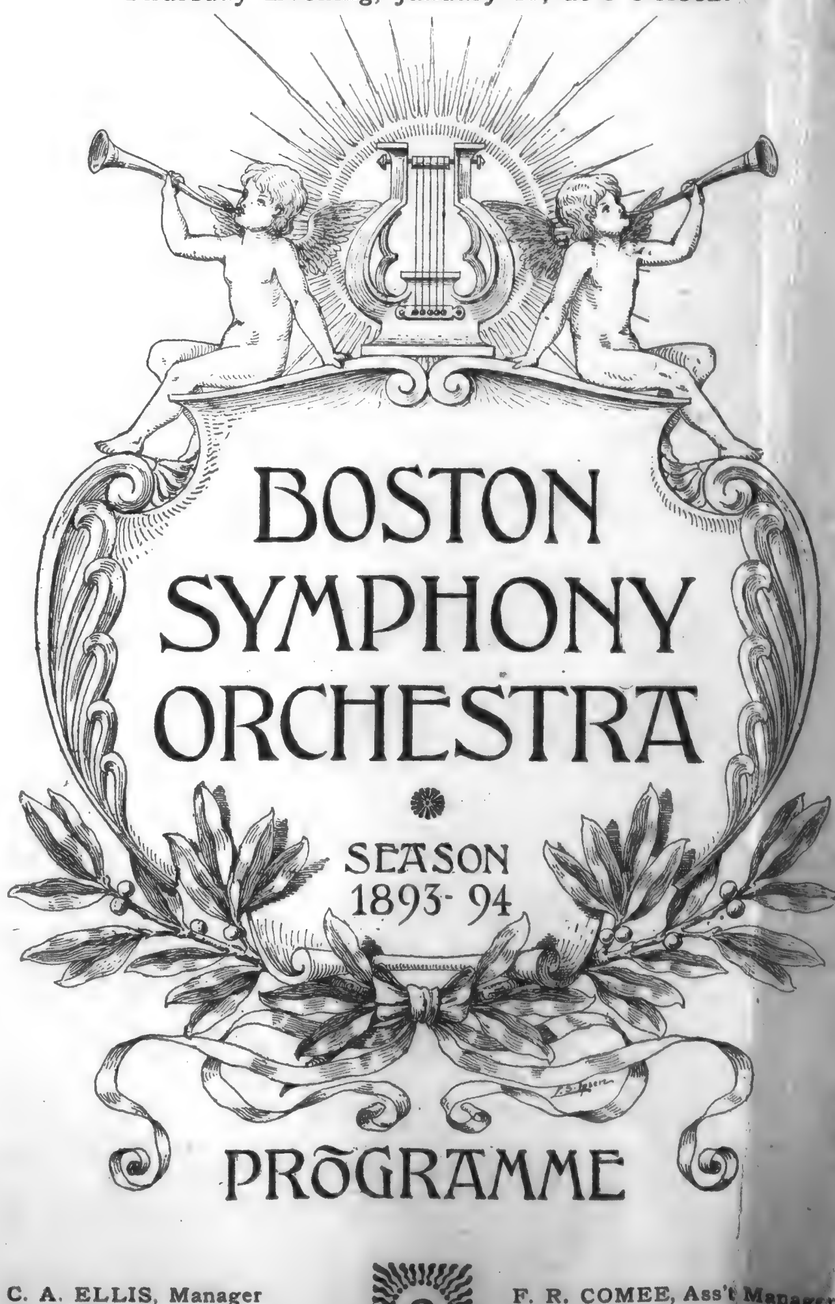
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,
Thursday Evening, January 11, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager

3

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules of Carnegie Music Hall forbid their distribution at the hall.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Hall.

MUSIC HALL NEW YORK

Season of 1893-94.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EMIL PAUR, - - Conductor.

Second Concert,
Thursday Evening, December 14,
At Eight.

. . PROGRAMME . .

Hermann Goetz - - - - Symphony in F major, Op. 9

I. Allegro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio. ma non troppo lento.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Ludwig van Beethoven - First Movement from Concerto for Violin, in D major, Op. 61.
(Cadenza by JOACHIM.)

Camille Saint-Säens - - Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," in A major, Op. 31.

Ludwig van Beethoven - Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72.

Adagio.
Allegro.

Soloist, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

☞ TICKETS NOW READY AT BOX OFFICE.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.
I. Un poco sostenuto. Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'Istesso tempo.
IV. Adagio. Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

GLUCK. ARIA from "Alceste."

WEBER. OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

WEBER. ARIA. "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster." from "Oberon."

TSCHAIKOWSKY. OVERTURE, "1812."

Soloist:

MME. AMALIA MATERNA.

The Sixth Concert will be Thursday, January 25.

[134]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Monday Evening, January 8, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

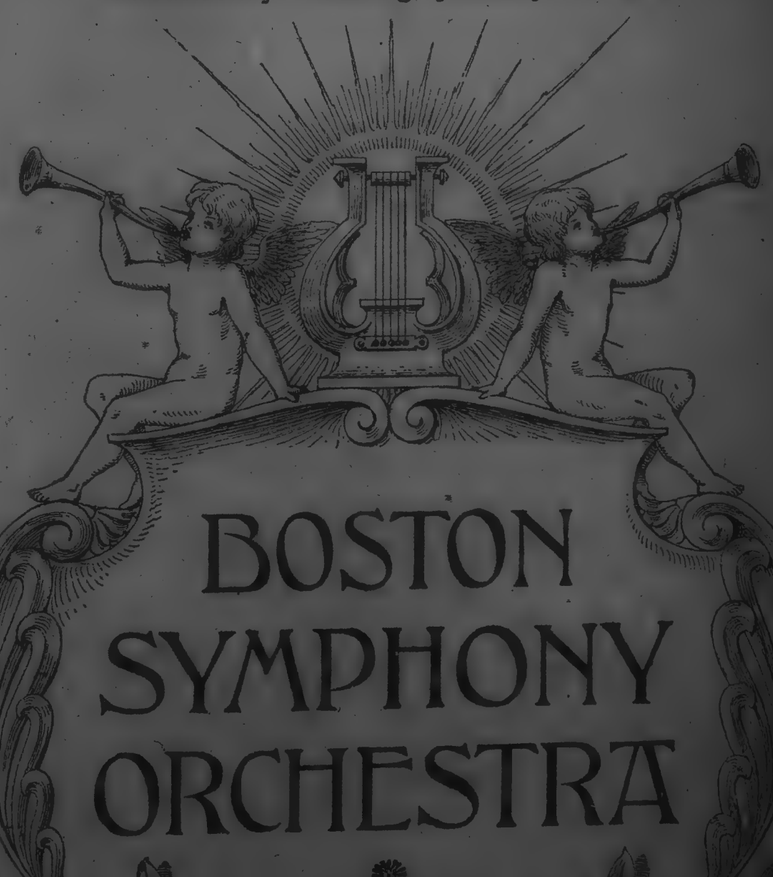
3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

---

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, January 10, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL NEW YORK

Season of 1893-94.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EMIL PAUR, - - Conductor.

Second Concert,
Thursday Evening, December 14,
At Eight.

. . PROGRAMME . .

Hermann Goetz - - - - Symphony in F major, Op. 9

I. Allegro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio. ma non troppo lento.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Ludwig van Beethoven - First Movement from Concerto for Violin, in D major, Op. 61.

(Cadenza by JOACHIM.)

Camille Saint-Säens - - Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," in A major, Op. 31.

Ludwig van Beethoven - Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72.

Adagio.
Allegro.

Soloist, Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

☞ TICKETS NOW READY AT BOX OFFICE.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

I. Un poco sostenuto. Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'Istesso tempo
IV. Adagio. Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

GLUCK. ARIA from "Alceste."

WEBER. OVERTURE. "Euryanthe."

WEBER. ARIA. "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster." from "Oberon."

TSCHAIKOWSKY. OVERTURE, "1812."

Soloist:

MME. AMALIA MATERNA.

The Sixth Concert will be Thursday, January 25.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,

Monday Evening, January 8, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

---

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, January 10, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street

[134]

NEWTON CLUB.

Grand Orchestra

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 27, 1893.

. . . Programme. . . .

1. Overture, "Fra Diavalo." — Auber
2. Two movements from the Symphony No. 1. — Beethoven
   Andante cantabile con moto.
   Allegro molto vivace.
3. a Prelude, "The Deluge." — Saint-Saens
   b Valse des Sylphes. — Berlioz
   c Don Ceśar de Bazan. — Massenet
4. Introduction and Valse lente, from the Ballet "Sylvia." — Delibes
5. a Andante from the Suite "L'Arlesienne." — Bizet
   b Notturno from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." — Mendelssohn
   c March. "Alla Turca." — Mozart
6. a Aase's Death, from the Suite "Peer Gynt." — Grieg
   b Funeral March of a Marionette. — Gounod
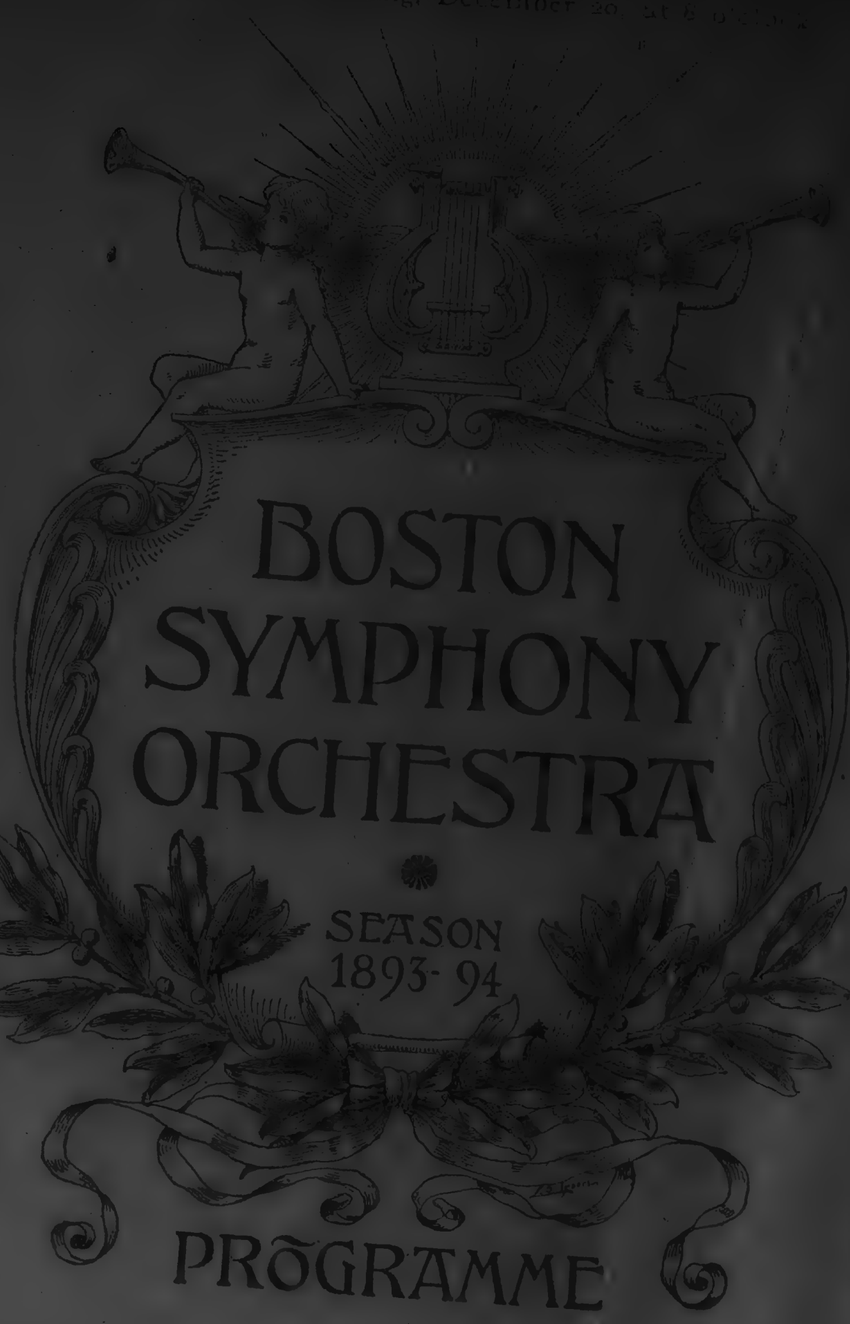
7. Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor." — Nicolai

INFANTRY HALL,
Wednesday Evening, December 20, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, January 1, at 8.

Fourth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. — L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. — ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. F. Busoni.

Programme.

DVOŘÁK. — QUARTET in F major, op. 96. (MS.)
Allegro ma non troppo.—Lento,—Molto vivace.
Finale. (vivace).
(First Public Performance.)

BRAHMS. — PIANO QUARTET in G minor, op. 25.
Allegro.—Intermezzo, (Allegro ma non troppo.)—
Andante con moto.—
Rondo a la Zingarese, (Presto).
PIANO; MR. BUSONI.

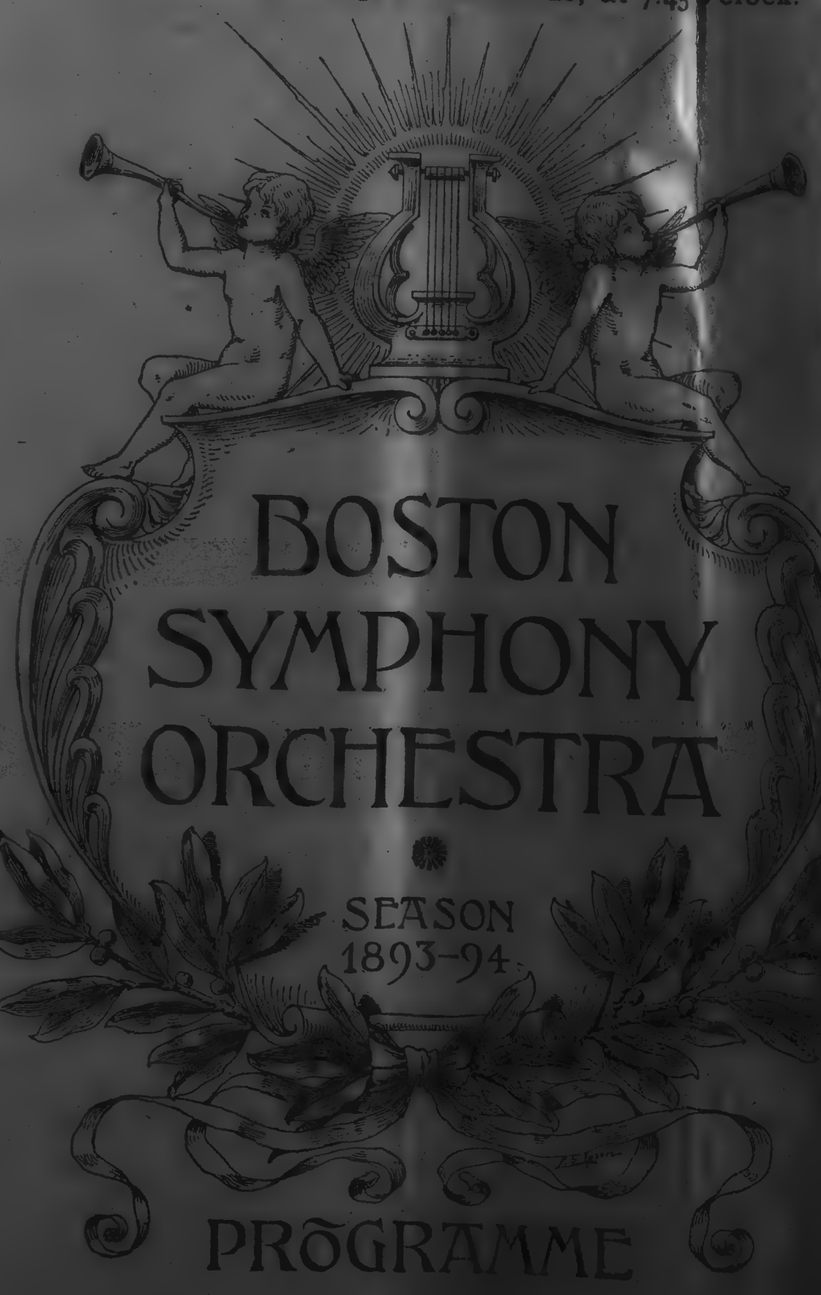
BEETHOVEN. — QUINTET in C major, op. 29.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio molto espressivo.
Scherzo, (Allegro)—Presto.
2d Viola; MR. ZACH.

The Piano is a Steinway.

The Fifth Concert will be January 22.

[135]

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Thursday Evening, December 28, at 7.45 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved on sale at C. L. Gorham's Music Store, 454 Main

NEWTON CLUB.

Grand Orchestra

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 27, 1893.

. . . Programme. . . .

1. Overture, "Fra Diavalo." Auber

2. Two movements from the Symphony No. 1. Goldmark
   Andante cantabile con moto.
   Allegro molto vivace.

3. a Prelude, "The Deluge." C. Saint-Saëns
   b Valse des Sylphes. Berlioz
   Don Cesar de Bazan. Massenet

4. Introduction and Valse lente, from the Ballet "Sylvia." Delibes

5. a Andante from the Suite "L'Arlesienne." Bizet
   b Notturno from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn
   March "Alla Turca." Mozart

6. a Aase's Death, from the Suite "Peer Gynt." Grieg
   b Funeral March of a Marionette. Gounod

7. Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor." Nicolai

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, January 1, at 8.

Fourth Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. F. Busoni.

Programme.

DVOŘÁK. QUARTET in F major, op. 96. (MS.)
Allegro ma non troppo.—Lento.—Molto vivace.
Finale. (vivace).
(First Public Performance.)

BRAHMS. PIANO QUARTET in G minor, op. 25.
Allegro.—Intermezzo. (Allegro ma non troppo.)—
Andante con moto.—
Rondo a la Zingarese. (Presto).
PIANO; MR. BUSONI.

BEETHOVEN. QUINTET in C major, op. 29.
Allegro moderato.—Adagio molto espressivo.
Scherzo. (Allegro)—Presto.
2d Viola; MR. ZACH.

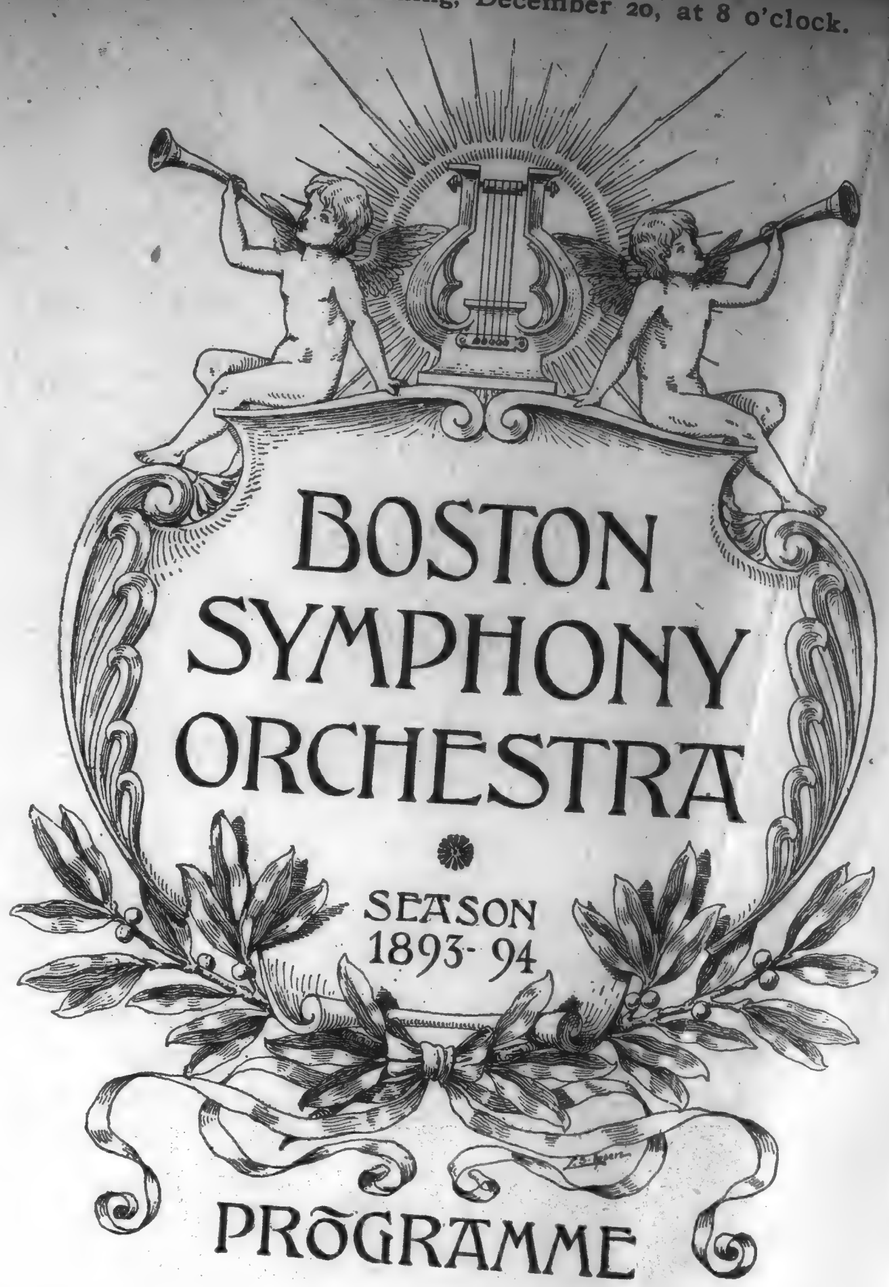
The Piano is a Steinway.

The Fifth Concert will be January 22.

[135]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, December 20, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R COMEE, Ass't Manager

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Thursday Evening, December 28, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

STRAUSS. SYMPHONY in F minor, op. 12.

I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II. Scherzo: Presto. Trio: l'istesso tempo.
III. Andante cantabile.
IV. Allegro assai, molto appassionato.

BRAHMS. VARIATIONS on a THEME by HAYDN.

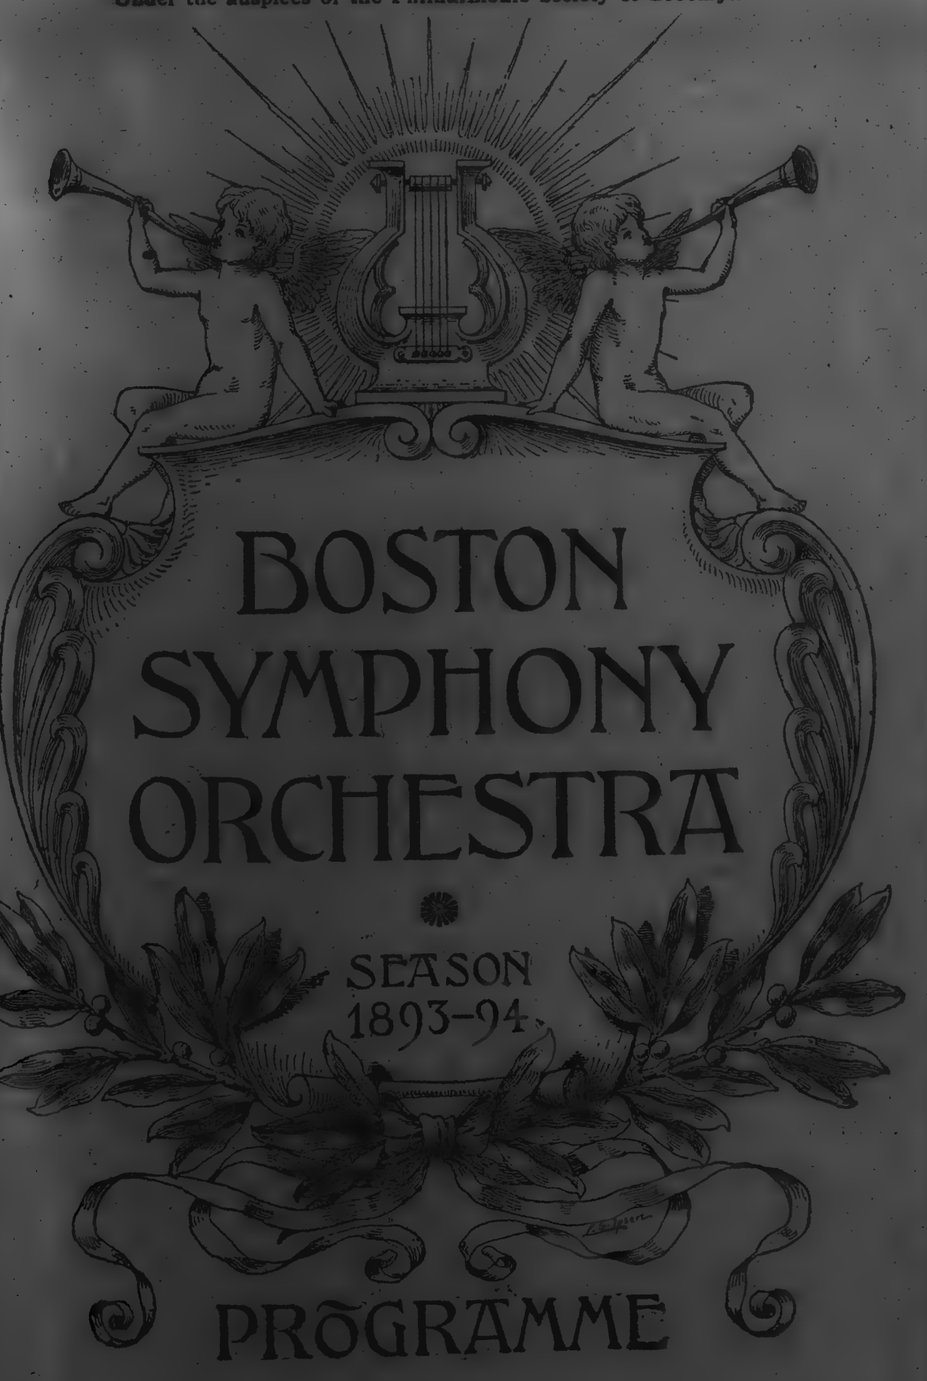
BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE, "Leonore," No. 3.

The Fifth Concert will be Thursday, January 4.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Dec. 15, at 3. Saturday Evening, Dec. 16, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

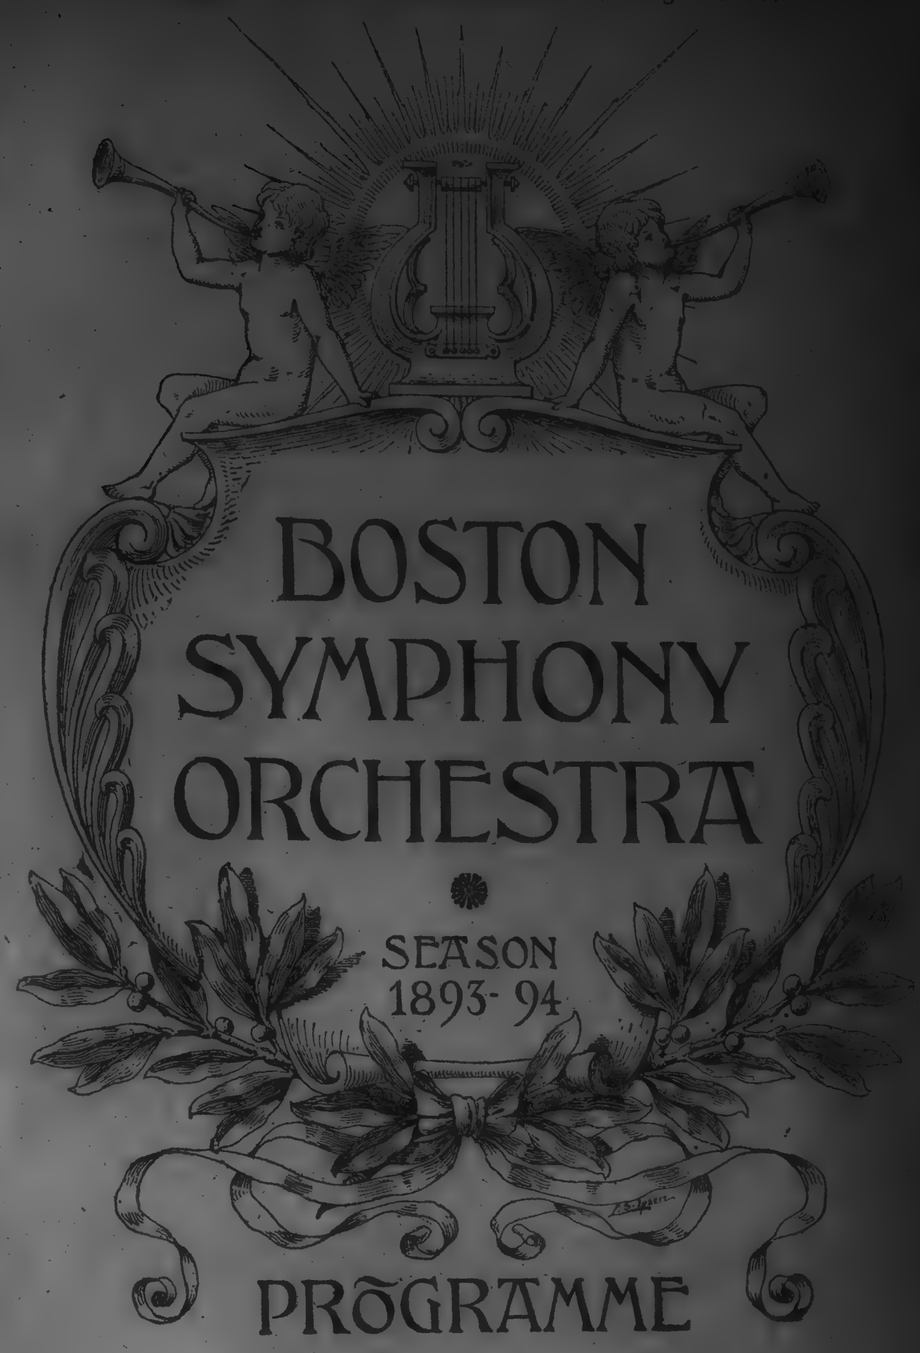
Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

[136]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . . . BALTIMORE.

Tuesday Afternoon, December 12, at 3 o'clock.



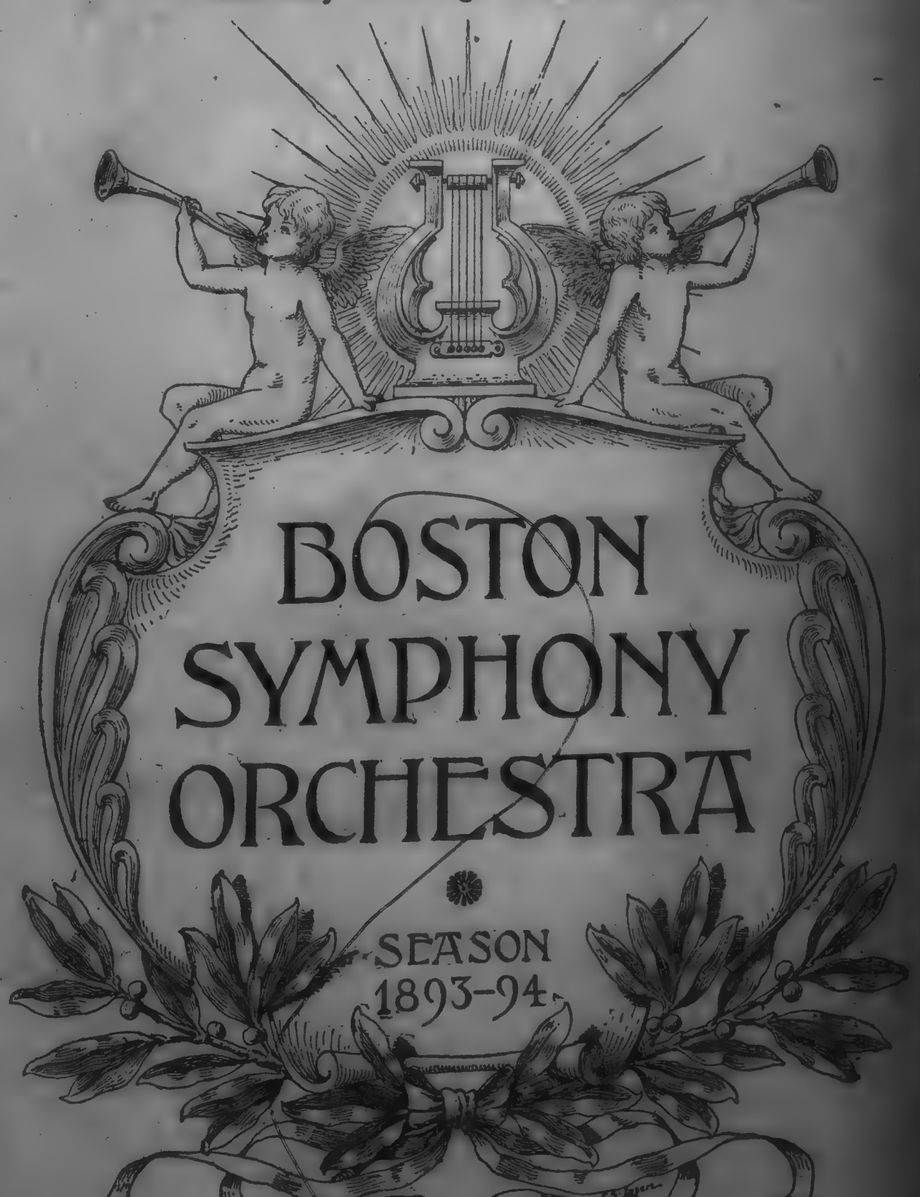
C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Wednesday Evening, December 13, at 8.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

STRAUSS.	SYMPHONY in F minor, op. 12. I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso. II. Scherzo: Presto. Trio: l'istesso tempo. III. Andante cantabile. IV. Allegro assai, molto appassionato.
BRAHMS.	VARIATIONS on a THEME by HAYDN.
BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE, "Leonore," No. 3.

The Fifth Concert will be Thursday, January 4.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE,

Tuesday Afternoon, December 12, at 3 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

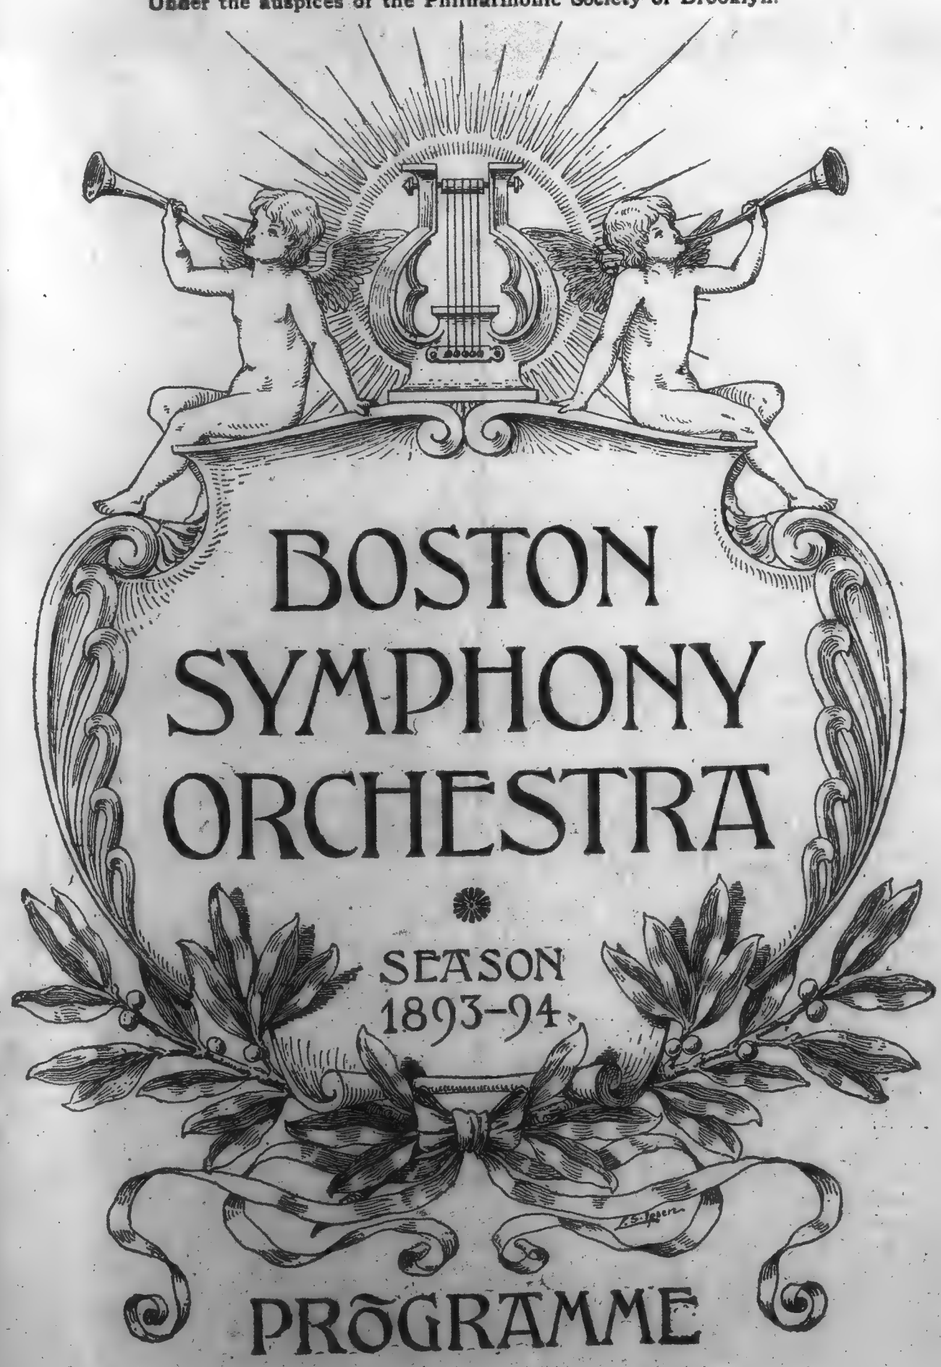
2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street. . . . .

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,

Friday Afternoon, Dec. 15, at 3. Saturday Evening, Dec. 16, at 8.15.

Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,

Wednesday Evening, December 13, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street .

[136]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Monday Evening, December 11, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,
Thursday Evening, December 14, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 29, 1893.

Grand Orchestra

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, Conductor.
MISS OLIVE MEAD, Soloist.

Programme.

1. Symphony in C major (Jupiter). — Mozart
   - I. Allegro vivace.
   - II. Andante cantabile.
   - III. Menuetto: Allegretto.—Trio.
   - IV. Finale: Allego molto.
2. Concerto for Violin. — Vieuxtemps

   MISS MEAD.
3. a Le dernier Sommeil d'une Vierge. — Massenet
   b Don Cæsar de Bazan. — Massenet
   c Toreadore and Andalouse from Bal Costume. — Rubinstein
4. Rhapsodie for Violin. — Hauser

   MISS MEAD.
5. Entr'acte from Rosamunde. — Schubert
6. a Minuet. — Boccherini
   b Gavotte. — Bach
7. Overture, "Zampa." — Herold

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, December 4, at 8.

Third Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. — L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. — ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Leo Schulz.

Programme.

MOZART. — QUARTET in D minor.
Allegro moderato.—Andante.—
Menuetto. (Allegretto.) Allegro ma non troppo.

D'ALBERT. — QUARTET in F flat major, op. 11.
Andante con moto.—Allegro vivace.—
Adagio ma non troppo e con molta espressione.—
Allegro.
(First time in America.)

SCHUBERT. — QUINTET in C major, op. 163.
Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio.—
Scherzo.—(Presto.)—Allegretto.—

2d Violoncello, Mr. Leo Schulz.

The Fourth Concert will be January 1.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Monday Evening, December 11, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

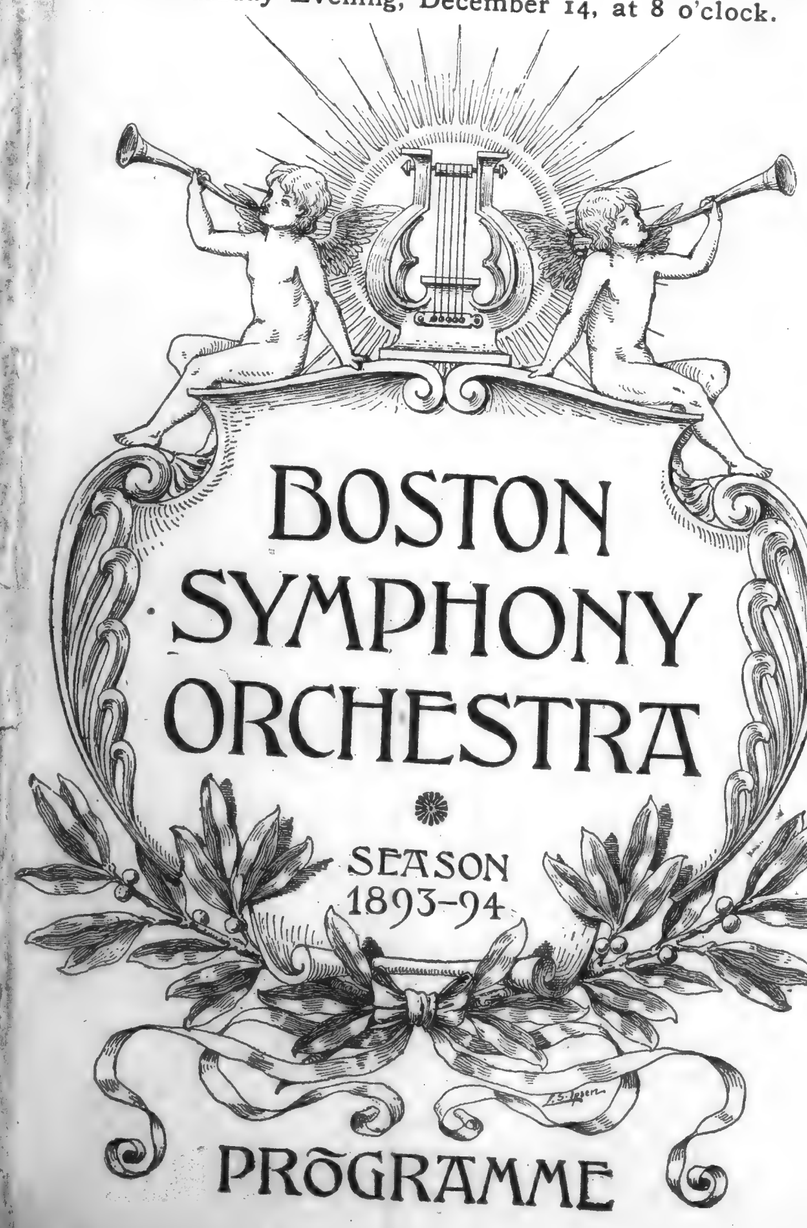
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,
Thursday Evening, December 14, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

...pies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed ...ained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules ... must be held at distribution at the hall.

Wednesday Evening, Nov. 29, 1893.

Grand Orchestra

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.
MISS OLIVE MEAD, SOLOIST.

. . . Programme. . . .

1. Symphony in C major (Jupiter). — Mozart
   - I. Allegro vivace.
   - II. Andante cantabile.
   - III. Menuetto: Allegretto.—Trio.
   - IV. Finale: Allego molto.
2. Concerto for Violin. — Vieuxtemps

MISS MEAD.

3. a Le dernier Sommeil d'une Vierge. — Massenet
   b Don Cæsar de Bazan. — Massenet
   c Toreadore and Andalouse from Bal Costume. — Rubinstein
4. Rhapsodie for Violin. — Hauser

MISS MEAD.

5. Entr'acte from Rosamunde. — Schubert
6. a Minuet. — Boccherini
   b Gavotte. — Bach
7. Overture, "Zampa." — Herold

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, December 4, at 8.

Third Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. — L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. — ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Leo Schulz.

Programme.

MOZART. — QUARTET in D minor.
Allegro moderato.—Andante.—
Menuetto. (Allegretto.) Allegro ma non troppo.

D'ALBERT. — QUARTET in E flat major, op. 11.
Andante con moto.—Allegro vivace.—
Adagio ma non troppo e con molta espressione.—
Allegro.
(First time in America.)

SCHUBERT. — QUINTET in C major, op. 163.
Allegro ma non troppo.—Adagio.—
Scherzo.—(Presto.)—Allegretto.—

2d Violoncello, MR. LEO SCHULZ.

The Fourth Concert will be January 1.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HERMANN GOETZ. SYMPHONY in F major, op. 9.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

HENRI WIENIAWSKI. ROMANZA AND FINALE from CONCERTO No. 2, for VIOLIN, in D minor.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS. SYMPHONIC POEM. "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," in A major, op. 31.

RICHARD WAGNER. OVERTURE to "Tannhaeuser."

Soloist:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

The Fourth Concert will be Thursday, December 7.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, November 22, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

[138]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.

Wednesday Evening, November 15.

. . Programme . .

1. Overture. "Oberon." Weber
2. Andante, from the Symphony in C minor, No. 5. Beethoven
3. Symphonic Poem.
"Le Rouet d'Omphale." Saint-Saëns
4. a Bridal Song. b In the Garden.
From the "Rustic Wedding." Goldmark
5. Valse Lente. Volkmann
6. Scherzo. Goetz
7. Entr'acte from "Philemon and Baucis." Gounod
8. Overture "Anacreon." Cherubini

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, November 28, at 7.45 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HERMANN GOETZ. SYMPHONY in F major, op. 9.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.
III. Adagio ma non troppo lento.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

HENRI WIENIAWSKI. ROMANZA AND FINALE from CONCERTO NO. 2, for VIOLIN, in D minor.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS. SYMPHONIC POEM. "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," in A major, op. 31.

RICHARD WAGNER. OVERTURE to "Tannhaeuser."

Soloist:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

The Fourth Concert will be Thursday, December 7.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, November 22, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Infantry Hall. . .

[138]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR FRANZ KNEISEL, CONDUCTOR.

Wednesday Evening, November 15.

. . Programme . .

1. Overture. "Oberon." Weber
2. Andante, from the Symphony in C minor, No. 5. Beethoven
3. Symphonic Poem.
"Le Rouet d'Omphale." Saint-Saëns
4. a Bridal Song.)
b In the Garden.)
From the "Rustic Wedding." Goldmark
5. Valse Lente. Volkmann
6. Scherzo. Goetz
7. Entr'acte from "Philemon and Baucis." Gounod
8. Overture "Anacreon." Cherubini

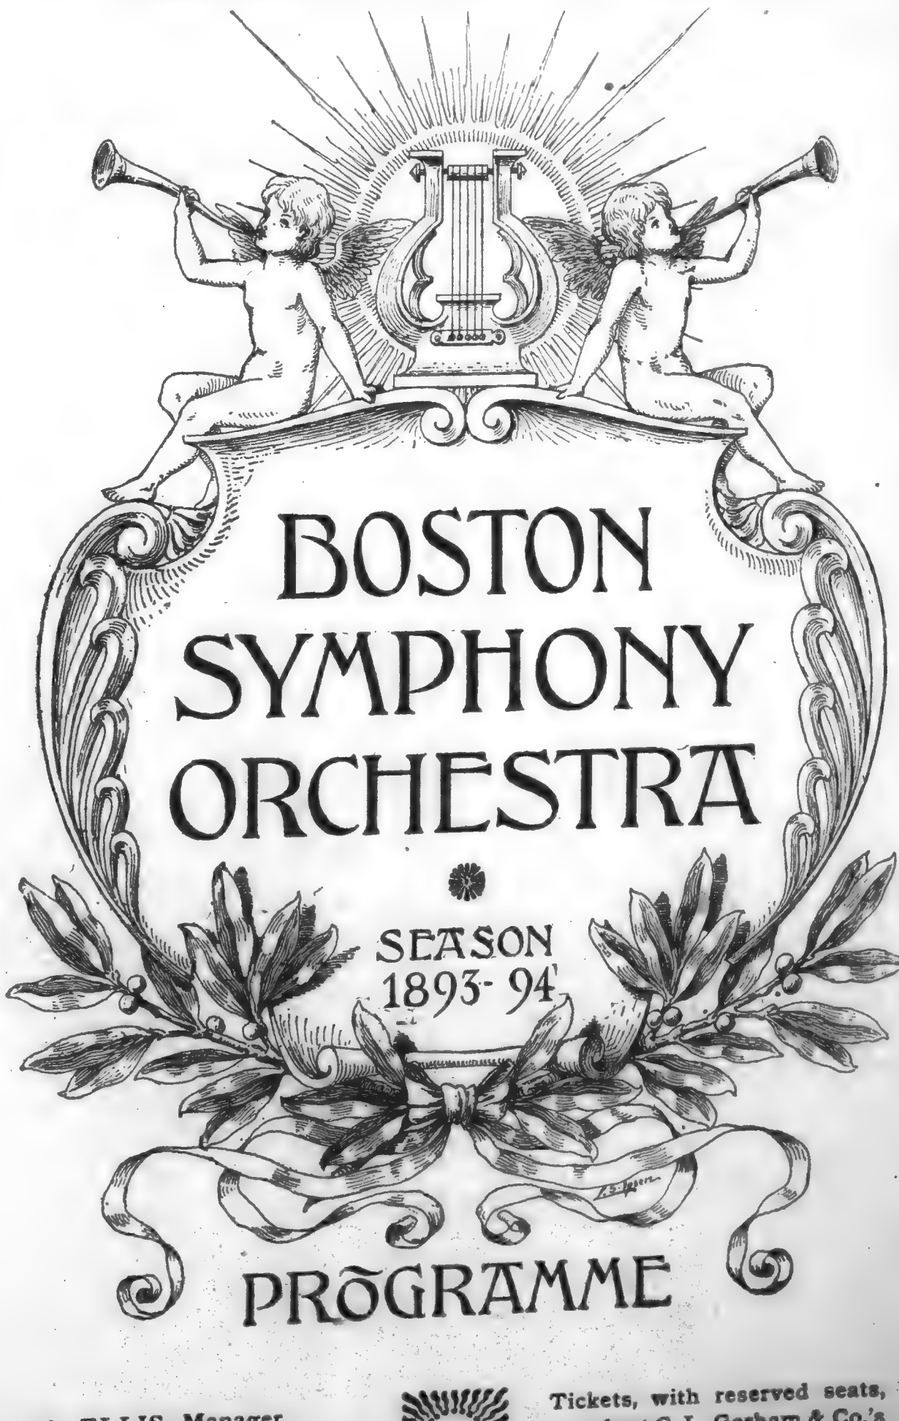
- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MECHANICS' HALL, ... WORCESTER,
Tuesday Evening, November 28, at 7.45 o'clock.



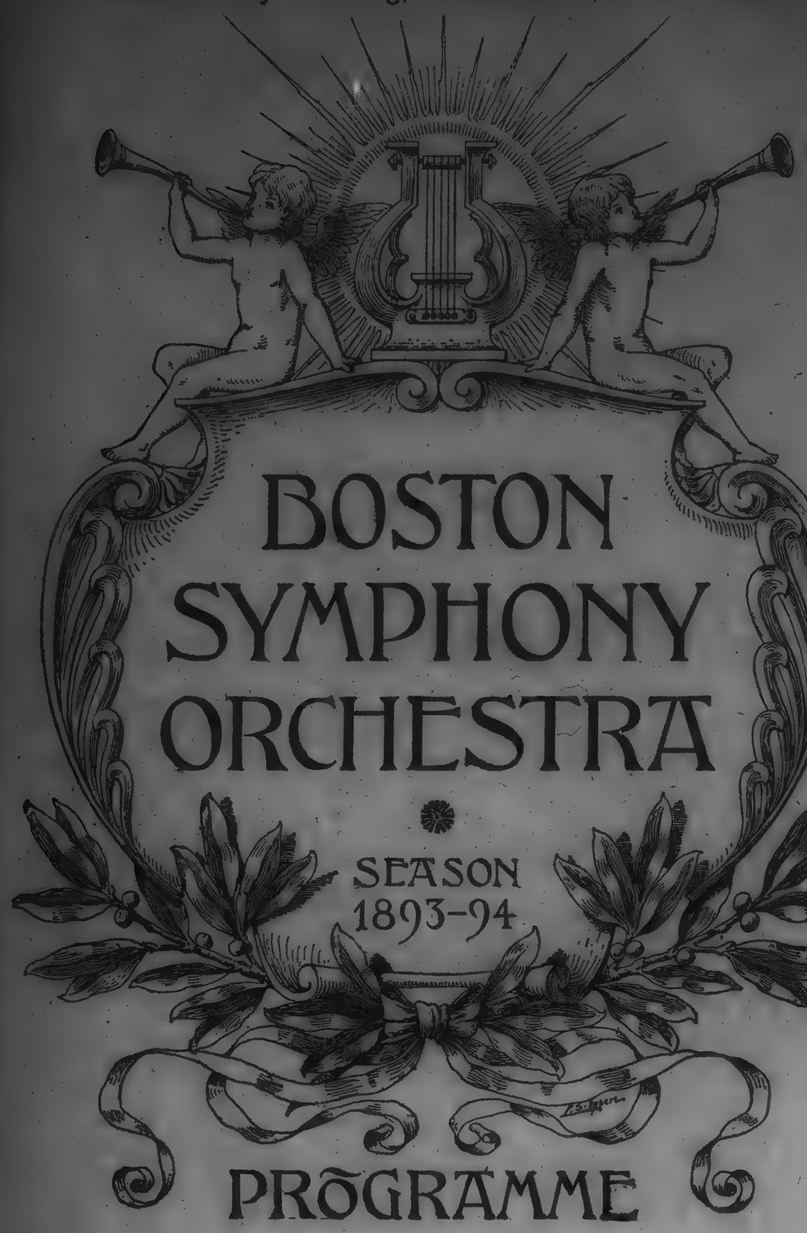
C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store, 454 Main Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,
Wednesday Evening, November 8, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

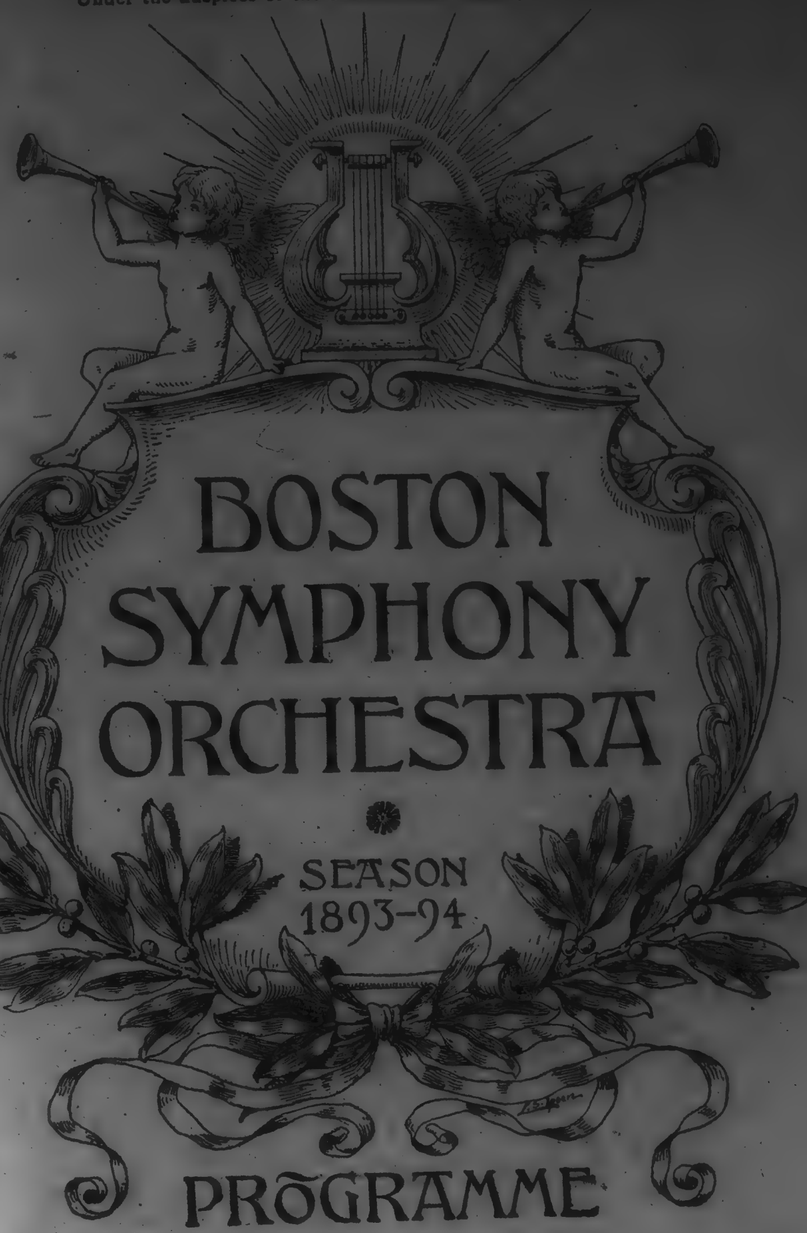
SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules of Carnegie Music Hall forbid their distribution at the hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,
Friday Afternoon, Nov. 10, at 3. Saturday Evening, Nov. 11, at 8.15.
Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

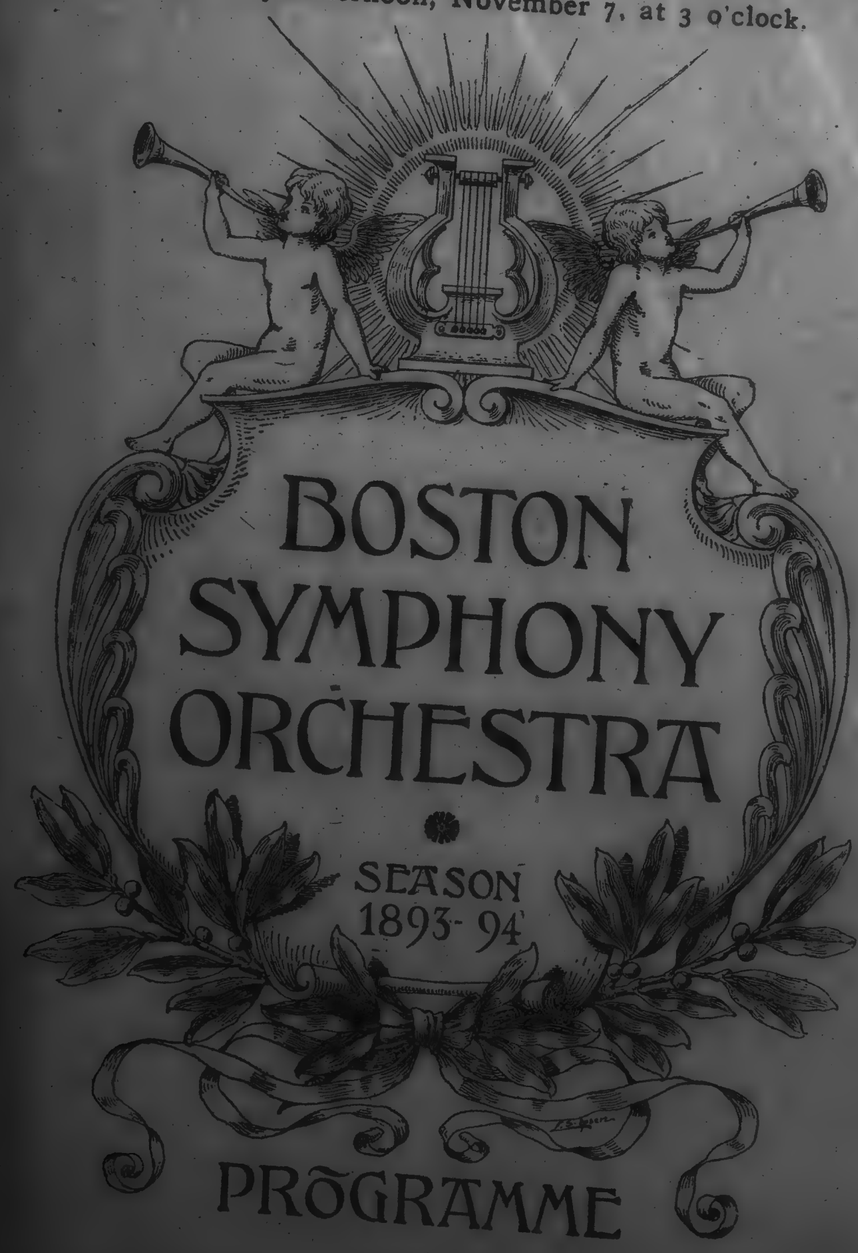
SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE,
Tuesday Afternoon, November 7, at 3 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A ELLIS, Manager
F R COMEE, Ass't Manager

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street.

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, November 13, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. Emil Paur.

Programme.

SMETANA. QUARTET in E minor.
Allegro vivo appassionato.—
Allegro moderato a la Polka.—
Largo sostenuto.—Vivace.
(First time at these Concerts.)

SCHUBERT. PIANO TRIO in E flat major, op. 100.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—
Scherzo, (allegro moderato).—Allegro moderato.

BEETHOVEN QUARTET in G major, op. 18.
Allegro.—Adagio cantabile.—
Scherzo (Allegro).—Allegro molto quasi Presto.

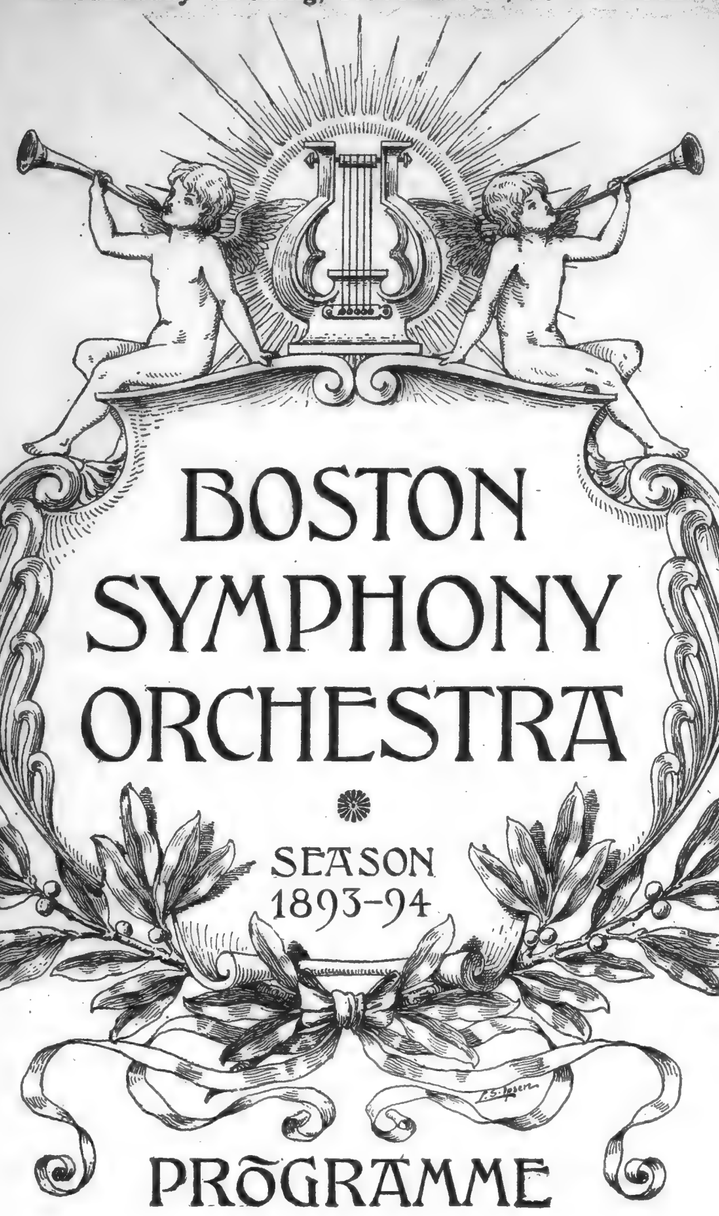
The Piano is a Steinway.

The Third Concert will be December 4.

[139]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... NEW YORK,
Wednesday Evening, November 8, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

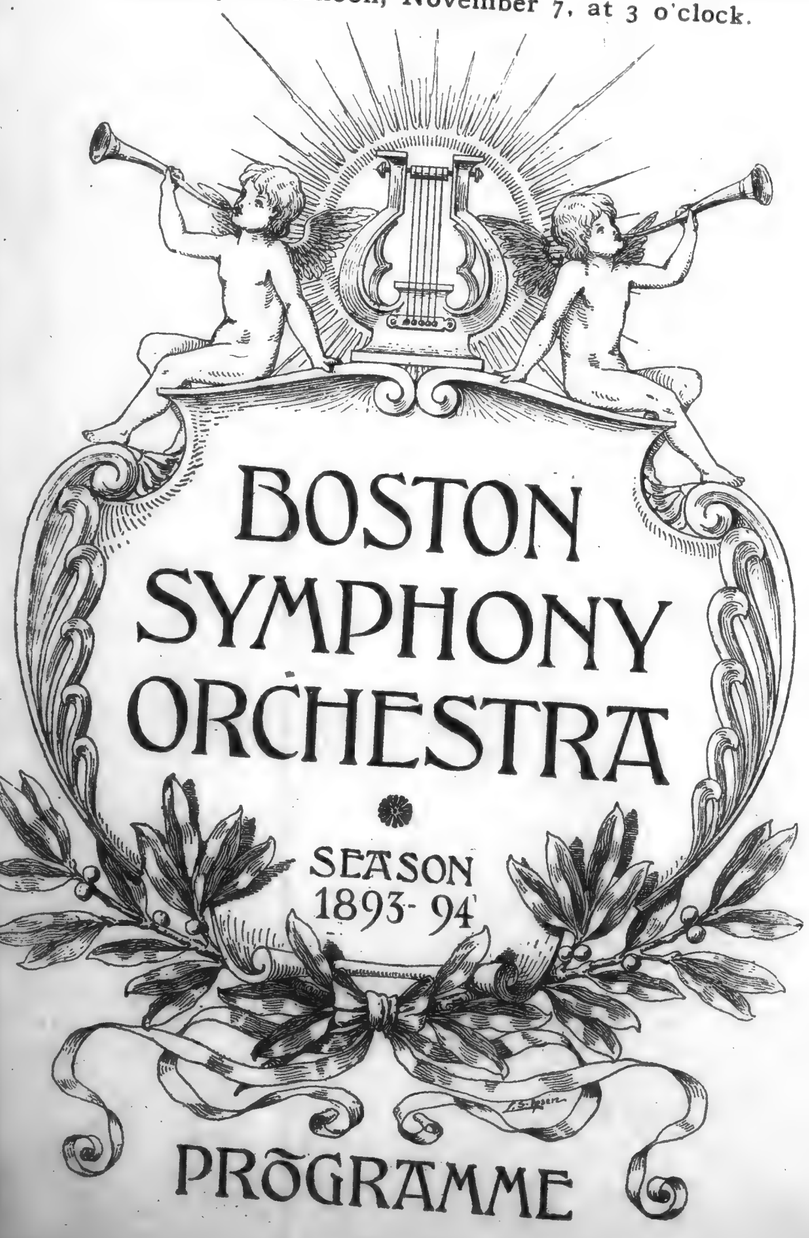
SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-Book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square. The rules of Carnegie Music Hall forbid their distribution at the hall.

FORD'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE, . BALTIMORE,
Tuesday Afternoon, November 7, at 3 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

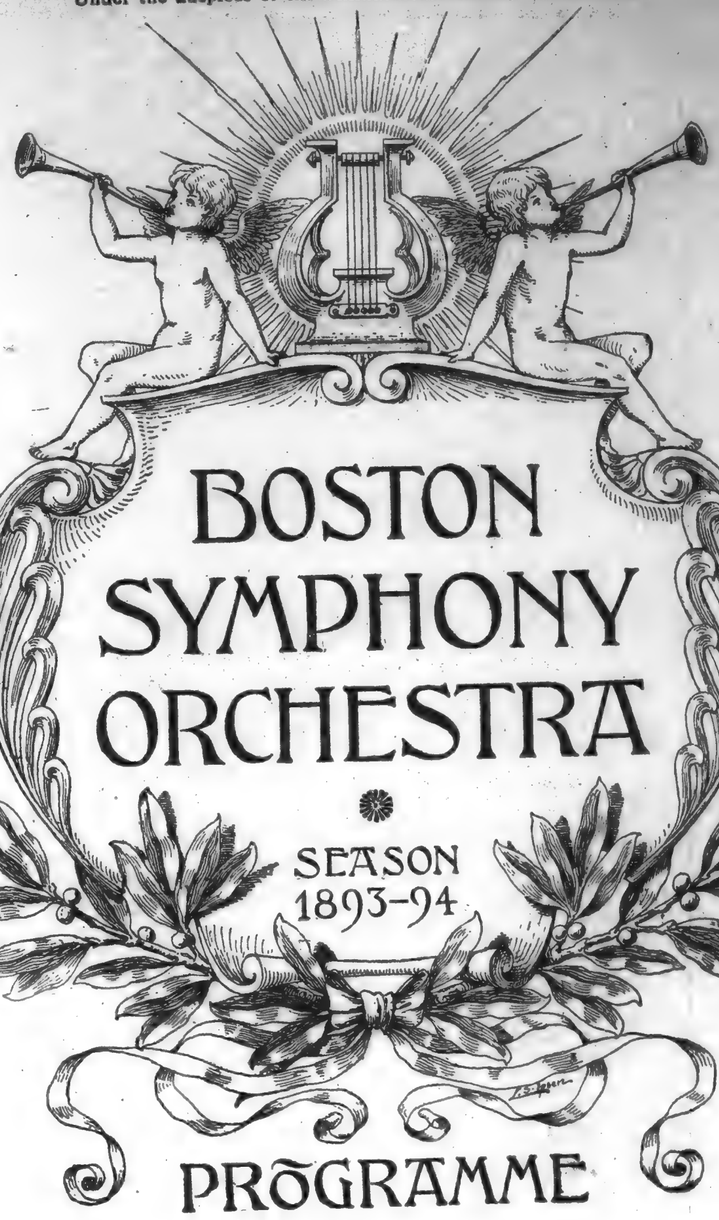
SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A ELLIS, Manager
F. R COMEE, Ass't Manager

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's Ticket Office, No. 13 North Charles Street. . . . .

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN,
Friday Afternoon, Nov. 10, at 3. Saturday Evening, Nov. 11, at 8.15.
Under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, November 13, at 8.

Second Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mrs. Emil Paur.

Programme.

SMETANA. QUARTET in E minor.
Allegro vivo appassionato.—
Allegro moderato a la Polka.—
Largo sostenuto.—Vivace.
(First time at these Concerts.)

SCHUBERT. PIANO TRIO in E flat major, op. 100.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—
Scherzo. (allegro moderato).—Allegro moderato

BEETHOVEN QUARTET in G major, op. 18.
Allegro.—Adagio cantabile.—
Scherzo (Allegro).—Allegro molto quasi Presto

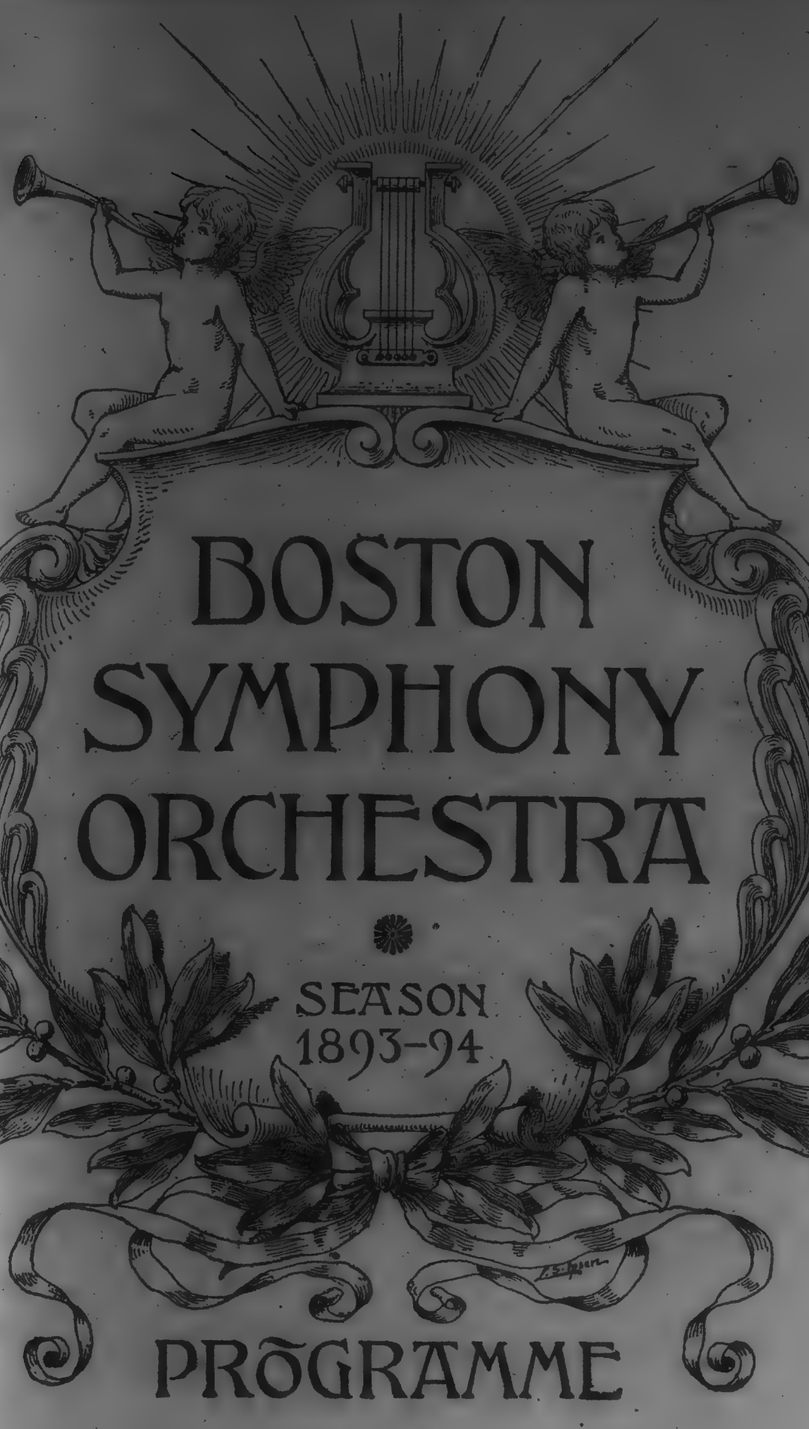
The Piano is a Steinway.

The Third Concert will be December 4.

[139]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,
Monday Evening, November 6, at 8 o'clock.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

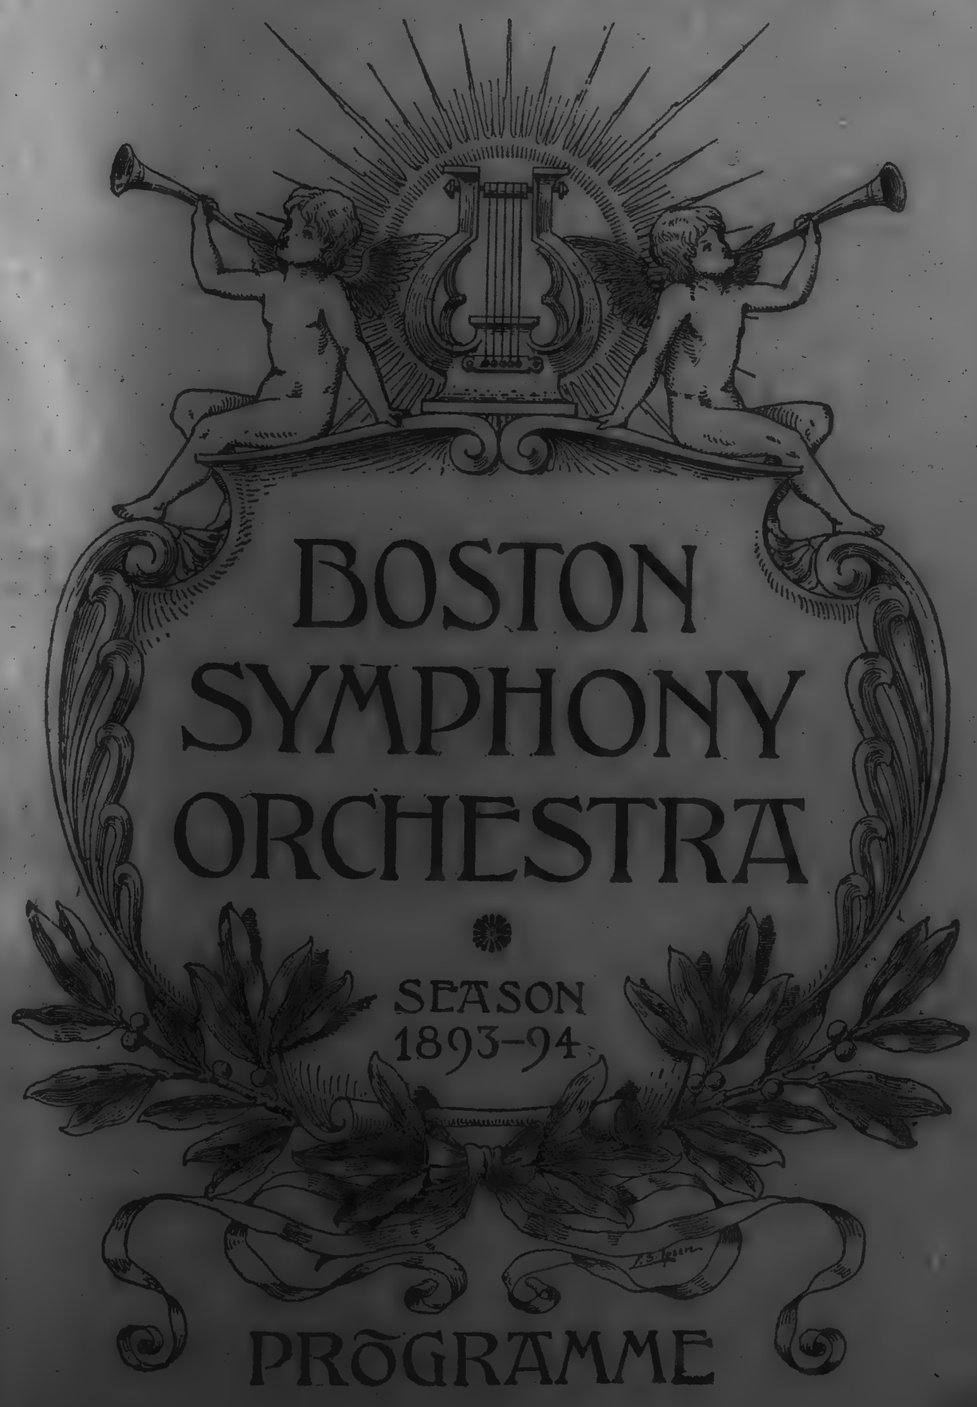
SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,
Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUBERT. SYMPHONY No. 9, in C major.
I. Andante. Allegro. ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

SCHUBERT. SONG WITH ORCHESTRA. "The Erl King."

DVOŘÁK. SLAVISCHE RHAPSODIE No. 2, in G minor, op. 45

BEETHOVEN. RECITATIVE: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and ARIA: "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio."

BERLIOZ. OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini."

Soloist:

MME. NORDICA.

The Third Concert will be Thursday, November 16.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94 . . .

FIVE CONCERTS IN MECHANICS' HALL, WORCESTER

Tuesday Evening, November 28.

Thursday Evening, December 28.

Tuesday Evening, January 30.

Tuesday Evening, March 13.

Tuesday Evening, April 17.

. . SOLOISTS . .

MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT. MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.
MR. MAX HEINRICH. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $6.

The sale of subscription tickets opens Wednesday, November 15, at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

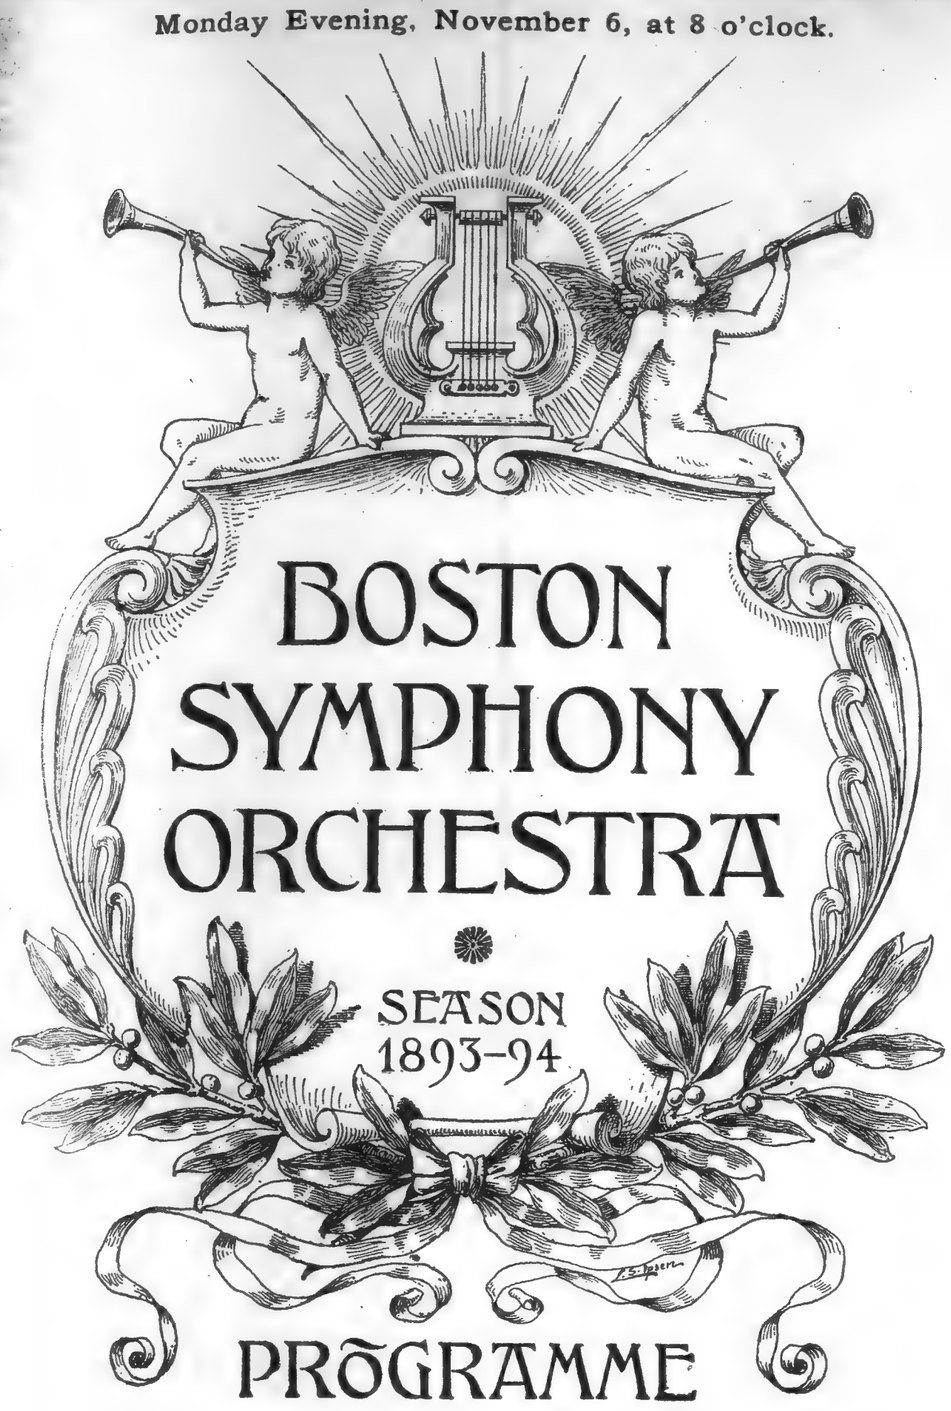
[140]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON,

Monday Evening, November 6, at 8 o'clock.

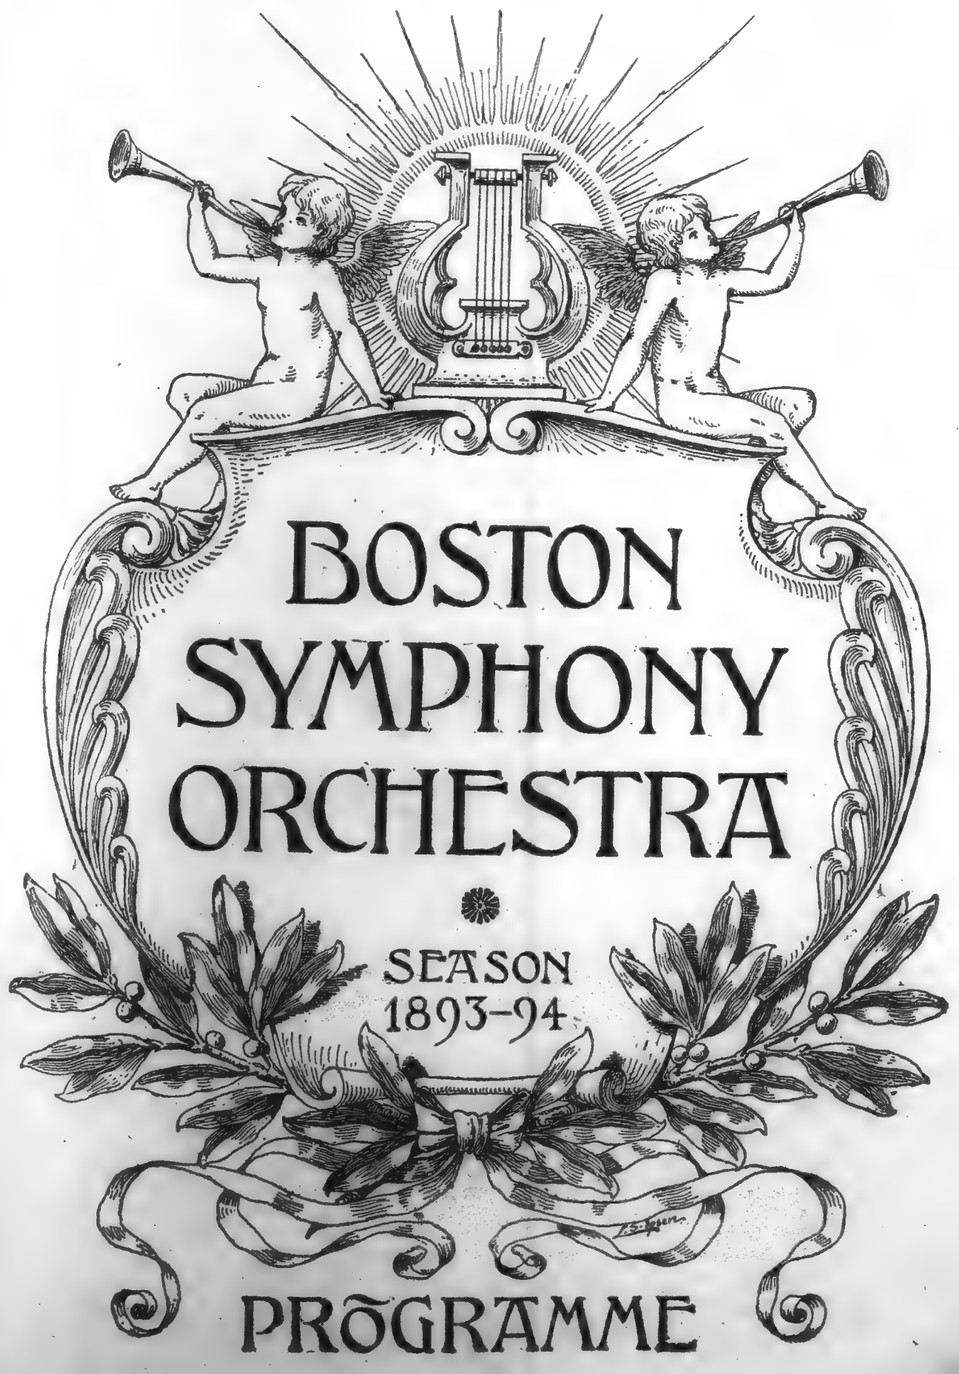


C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,

Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 1221 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUBERT. SYMPHONY No. 9, in C major.
I. Andante. Allegro. ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

SCHUBERT. SONG WITH ORCHESTRA. "The Erl King."

DVOŘÁK. SLAVISCHE RHAPSODIE No. 2, in G minor, op. 45

BEETHOVEN. RECITATIVE: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and ARIA: "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio."

BERLIOZ. OVERTURE. "Benvenuto Cellini."

Soloist:

MME. NORDICA.

The Third Concert will be Thursday, November 16.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

. . . THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94 . . .

FIVE CONCERTS IN
MECHANICS' HALL, WORCESTER

Tuesday Evening, November 28.

Thursday Evening, December 28.

Tuesday Evening, January 30.

Tuesday Evening, March 13.

Tuesday Evening, April 17.

. . SOLOISTS . .

MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT. MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.
MR. MAX HEINRICH. MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.
AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $6.

The sale of subscription tickets opens Wednesday, November 15, at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s Music Store.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[140]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major. "Eroica." op. 55
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio: The same tempo.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

VOLKMANN. SERENADE No. 3, in D minor, op. 69.
Solo Violoncello; Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

CHERUBINI. OVERTURE. "Anacreon."

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, October 25, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1893-94

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5.00, and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, October 30, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in F major, op. 59, No. 1.
Allegro.—Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando.—
Adagio molto e mesto.—Theme Russe, (Allegro).

HAYDN. QUARTET in G minor, op. 74, No. 3.
Allegro.—Largo assai.—Menuetto (allegretto).—
Finale. (Allegro con brio.)

BRAHMS. QUINTET in F major, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio.—
Grave ed appassionato.—Presto.
Second Viola; Mr. ZACH.

The Second Concert will be November 13.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major. "Eroica." op. 55

I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio: The same tempo.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

VOLKMANN. SERENADE No. 3, in D minor, op. 69.
Solo Violoncello; Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

CHERUBINI. OVERTURE. "Anacreon."

CHICKERING HALL.

NINTH SEASON, 1893-94.

Monday Evening, October 30, at 8.

First Concert

BY

The Kneisel Quartet.

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin. L. SVECENSKI, Viola.
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin. ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF

Mr. Max Zach.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. QUARTET in F major, op. 59, No. 1.
Allegro.—Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando.—
Adagio molto e mesto.—Theme Russe, (Allegro).

HAYDN. QUARTET in G minor, op. 74, No. 3.
Allegro.—Largo assai.—Menuetto (allegretto).—
Finale. (Allegro con brio.)

BRAHMS. QUINTET in F major, op. 88.
Allegro non troppo ma con brio.—
Grave ed appassionato.—Presto.
Second Viola; Mr. ZACH.

The Second Concert will be November 13.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE,
Wednesday Evening, October 25, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, $5.00, and single tickets for the first concert at $1.25 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall. . . . . .

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND